Ideo Sequeſter appellatur quod ejus qui electus ſit, utraque pars fidem ſequatur. Gel. l. 20. c. 10. Sequeſter eſt qui errantibus medius intervenit, qui apud Græcos μέσος dicitur, apud quem pignora deponi ſolent, à ſequendo dictus, quod ejus fidem utraq; pars ſequatur. Iſid. l. 10. Etym.

There are five things (by which we may more diſtinctly underſtand Job's meaning) belonging to a Dayeſ-man, or an Umpire.

Firſt, He muſt be agreed upon and choſen by both parties; for unleſs he be accepted by both of them, he can have no power to determine for or againſt either of them.

Secondly, He muſt hear both ſides ſpeak, and alledge what they can for themſelves, before he determines.

Thirdly, He muſt beat out the matter by interrogatories and queſtions; he muſt not ſtay upon the bare narrative of the perſons.

Fourthly, He muſt have power to conclude and determine of the differences betwixt them.

Fifthly, Both parties muſt be bound, at leaſt by promiſe, to ſtand to the determination which he ſhall make. Such an one is a Dayeſ-man among men; who is alſo called a Compromiſer, and his work, the Compromiſing of a matter, becauſe as he is elected by the mutual conſent, ſo confirmed by the mutual promiſe of thoſe who are at variance, to reconcile them, and take up their differences. Now, ſaith Job, as there is no Judge, ſo there is no Dayeſ-man betwixt me and God,

Talis Judex vocatur Compromiſſarius quaſi ex compromiſſo à litigatoribus ſumpto.

That might lay his hand upon us both.

Some underſtand the words [upon us both] of Job and his Friends; There is not a Dayeſ-man betwixt me and my Friends, not one that can judge and conſider of my innocency and their charge: As if he had ſaid, Though I will not plead it out with God, yet I dare refer the controverſie betwixt you and me to an equal Umpire, I dare go to the trial of my innocency with you, but I ſee no Dayeſman; you are all parties in the buſineſs, and I know none of that will ſtand between us indifferently and unprejudiced.

But the Text refers clearly to God, There is no Dayeſman, none to arbitrate the matter between God and me, None to lay his hand upon us both.

To lay on hands is diverſly uſed in Scripture. The hand ſignifies all power: Hence, to lay the hands, is to put forth power; and to do ſo, is taken ſometimes in an ill ſence, and ſometimes in a good ſence.

Firſt, In an ill ſence; and ſo to lay the hands, is to ſtrike or ſmite even to death, Gen. 22. 12. Lay not thine hand upon the Child, upon Iſaac, that is, do not ſlay him. We have the ſame expreſſion (Gen. 37. 22.) when Reuben pleaded for Joſeph, that he ſhould not be murdered; Shed no blood; but caſt him into this pit, and lay no hand upon him; that is, do not deſtroy him. This laying on of the hands notes a violent act, either proceeding from holy zeal or juſtice, as in Nehemiah, who threatens the prophaners of the Sabbath, If ye do ſo again, I will lay hands on you; or from malice, as in the chief Prieſts, who ſought to lay hands on Chriſt the Lord of the Sabbath (Luke 20. 19.) And Chriſt propheſying what the condition of his Diſciples and of Believers ſhould be, what uſage they ſhould find in the world, tells them (Mat. 21. 12.) They ſhall lay their hands upon you, and perſecute you. Thus Haman thought ſcorn to lay his hands on Mordecai alone (Eſth. 3. 6.) He had a deſign to take revenge upon the whole Nation of the Jews.

Secondly, To lay on the hands, is taken in a good ſence; and ſo I find it uſed three wayes.

Firſt, In Benedictions, Mark 10. 16. Chriſt took up the young Children in his arms, and laid his hands upon them, and bleſſed them. As under the Law, Lev. 1. 4. & 4. 15. The people or the Elders laying their hands upon the Beaſt, which was to be offered in Sacrifice, intimated the laying of all their ſins by faith upon Chriſt, of whom that Sacrifice was a type. So Chriſt laying his hands upon thoſe Children, implied the beſtowing and powring out of mercy upon them, in the pardoning of their ſins, and the furniſhing of them with the Graces of his Spirit. The ſame action uſed by the Apoſtles, in the name of Chriſt, had the ſame ſignification and effect. When Peter and John came to Samaria, and ſaw what work the Word had made among that people, They laid their hands on them, and they received the Holy Ghoſt, Acts 8. 17. Paul likewiſe laid his hands on the Diſciples at Epheſus, and they received the holy Ghoſt, Acts 19. 6. It was uſed alſo as a ſign of healing, Mark 16. 18. They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover. And (Mat. 9. 18.) the Ruler saith unto Christ, My Daughter is sick, but come and lay thy hands on her, and she shall be healed. Some interpret the Rulers desire of this sign, to be as a sign he had faith, so also that his faith was weak. The Centurion (concerning whom Christ testified, I have not found so great faith, no not in Israel) desired Christ but to speak the word only, and his servant should be healed (Mat. 8. 8.) As a word is the proper object of faith, so faith acts most properly, when it rests and lives upon a word only. Signes are mercies to the weak, and they are witnesses of our weakness. Signes are but Crutches and Spectacles to help the lameness and dim-sightedness of faith. But to our Text.

Secondly, Laying on of hands was used in the ordination or solemn setting of a man apart unto an Office, The Children of Israel, that is, some of the chief of them (under the Ceremonial Law) laid their hands upon the Levites (Num. 8. 18) Which was either a testification that they gave up all carnal and worldly interests in them, and bequeathed them wholly unto God; or an approbation of their Office, and of the Levites ministration in it on their behalf. The same Ceremony (for the matter) was continued in the sending forth of Gospel-officers. Neglect not the gift which is in thee, which was given thee by propheſie, with the laying on of the hands of the Presbytery, was Paul's counsel to Timothy, in reference to himself (1 Tim. 4.14.) And in reference to others (1 Tim. 5.22.) Lay hands suddenly on no man, And Paul and Barnabas being immediately designed by God for a special work of the Ministry, to which they wer called before, were sent away with fasting and prayer, and the laying on of hands, Acts 13. 3.

Impositio manuum potestatis signum, q. d. quæ nunquam nostrum valet manu imposita coercere. Mer. Tenere nemo est ille componere, & controversia abhorres ad fœdus concordiamque adducere. Pacificatoris effigies delineatur ad alternatum litigatium manum alternatim extendens, ut junctis dextris pacis fœdus iniretur. Quintil. Quibus nulla fœderis servati fides mendacem dextram habere dicuntur.

Thirdly, The hand specially signifies civil power, Psal. 89. 25. I will set his hand also in the Sea, and his right hand in the floods, that is, I will give him power over them who dwell by the Seas. And then laying on of hands implies the authority which one man hath over another, to determine or resolve a Case, or to settle a business between them, and that is the intendment of it here; There is no Dayesman that might lay his hand upon us both, that is, who may authoritatively decide and make an end of this controversie. To impose the hand, was to compose the difference. I find a threefold posture of the Dayes-man observed in the action of his hand.

First, He put forth his hands towards the parties, desiring them to join hands, or (as we speak) to shake hands and be friends. Joining hands signifies consent (Exod. 23. 1.) Thou shalt not put thy hand with the wicked, that is, thou shalt make no agreement with him. Some of the Ancients describe the Pacificator or Dayes-man, having his hands closed into the hands of those between whom he was to make peace: Hence they who are unfaithful in covenant, are said to have a lying or a deceitful right hand. The Prophet Isaiah speaking of a false worshipper, who had engaged his faith to serve Idols, concludes, He feedeth of ashes, a deceived heart hath turned him aside that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand? (Isa. 44. 20.) or (as other translate) Is there not a lie at my right hand? Noting, that the Idol to which he had given his heart and hand, would deceive him most, when he trusted most to it.

Secondly, The Dayes-man eying the temper or distemper, both of the Complainant and Defendant, laid his hand gently now upon one, and then upon another, using his best Rhetorick to perswade, yea, to conjure them to peace and quietness: Sir, said he to one, I beseech you to accept of these terms and conditions; 'tis you that have done the wrong, and trespassed against your neighbour: and presently he bespake the other, that he would pass by the offence, heal the breach, forget the injury, or take reasonable satisfaction for his dammage.

Cum quadam attentione, studio & industria ponere. Arbiter medius inter litigantes benignè manum super hunc nunc super illum ponere solebat, dicens, Tum hoc hallucinatis tu vero bene egisti, sed hoc & hoc facere non debuisti. Bold.

Thirdly, The Dayes-man giving sentence, laid his hand upon the head of him whom he found faulty and to have done the wrong, in token of condemnation. Among the Ceremonies of consecrating the Levitical Priests, this is given in command (Exod. 29. 10.) Thou shalt cause a Bullock to be brought before the Tabernacle of the Congregation, and Aaron and his Sons shall put their hands upon the head of the Bullock: And in the Rules given concerning the Burnt Offerings of the people, it is directed, that the bringer shall lay his hand upon the head of the burnt offering, &c. (Lev. 1. 4.) Now this laying of the hands upon the head of the Sacrifice, implied the laying of their sins upon the head of the Sacrifice, and that, the laying of their sins upon the head of Christ, on whom the Prophet assures us, the Lord hath laid the iniquity of us all (Isa. 53. 6.) And as the laying on of the hand upon the head of the beast, transferred their sins upon him, so likewise that sentence of death and condemnation which was due to their sin, and was presently executed by slaying of the Beast; which was a lively type of Christ (the Lamb slain from the beginning of the world) dying under a sentence of condemnation in the stead of sinners.

Lastly, The laying on of the hand notes the keeping of the parties in compass; for contenders use to be very violent one against another.

Thus to the present Text. The laying on of the hand signifies only the composing or compounding of a difference. When Job complained or affirmed only, There is no Dayes-man betwixt us, his meaning was, that there was no man who could take up the matter betwixt God and him, there was none such to be found; for he speaks not only (de facto) that there was no Dayes-man; but (de impossibili) as of a thing which was impossible to be: As if he had said, I would gladly refer this matter to arbitration; but the Lord, who is engaged with me, is above the arbitration of men or Angels: Creatures may not meddle with any of his matters further then they are called, and I know not of any whom God hath called to, or appointed over this matter.

Non potest dari Deo mihique simul litigantibus arbiter: quasi in Deum eque ac in me potestate exercendo.

Hence observe First, When Controversies arise, the rule of Love bids us refer our differences to the determination of Brethren.

Job speaks according to the usage of those dayes; men did not presently run to Law, and call one another before the Judge, they had Dayes-men and Umpires to determine matters between them. Thus Jacob bespeaks Laban (Gen. 31. 37.) Whereas thou hast searched all my stuff, what hast thou found of all thy houshold-stuff? set it here before my brethren and thy brethren, that they may judge betwixt us both. The Apostle (1 Cor. 6. 1, 5.) is very angry with the Corinthians, because they were so hasty to go to Law; Verily there is utterly a fault among you, because ye go to Law one with another. What! is there not a Dayes-man among you? Is there not a man among you fit to be an Arbitrator? I speak to your shame (saith Paul) Is it so that there is not a wise man among you, no not one that shall be able to judge between his brethren? But brother goeth to Law with brother, and that before the unbelievers. The sin of these Corinthians was the greater, because the Judges were heathen; yet such contendings bear a proportion of sinfulness, though Judges be Christians. To bring every matter to the Judgment-Seat, when (possibly) a Brother or a Friend might take up the matter, is a transgression against the Law of Love. We should rather labour after reconcilements, then Suits in Law, which are a cause, not only of trouble and expence, but of great breaches and heart-burnings among Friends and Brethren. We have a proverbial speech among us, A lean Arbitration is better then a fat Judgment. It is better to the Parties, they shall get more by it; the charge of obtaining Right by Law, many times eating out all, and sometimes more then all, alwayes a considerable part of that which the Law gives us as our Right. We use to say to dissenters, Be friends, the Law is costly. 'Tis very costly to most mens purses, and to some mens Consciences. 'Tis rare if a man wrongs not his soul by seeking the rights of his Credit or Estate.

In proverbio est, potiores esse iniquas pacis conditiones optima judicis sententia.

Secondly observe, That, No creature can umpire the business betwixt God and man.

There is a twofold reason of it.

First, He that is our Umpire is supposed wiser then our selves. They who cannot agree, need more wisdom then their own to work their agreement. But there is no creature wise as God, yea, there is no creature wise but God; who is therefore called The God only wise. God is best able to judge of his own actions. No man hath been his Counsellor (Rom. 11. 34.) much less shall any man be his Judge: Men sometimes abound too much in their own sence; but God must abound in his. His will is the rule of all, much much more his wisdom; or rather his wisdom is the rule of all, because his will is; his will and wisdom being the same, and of the same extent, both infinite.

Oportet ut in judice sit major potestas, quæ possit utrãq; partem comprimere.

Secondly, He that is a Dayes-man or Umpire, must (according to the rules before spoken of) have power to compel the parties to submit or stand to what he shall determine. But as we cannot lay any restraint upon God, from doing what he will; so we cannot lay any constraint upon him to do what we will. Who shall force the Lord? To whom hath he given an assumpsit, or ingaged himself under a penalty to perform what he shall award? The Lord doth whatsoever he pleaseth both in Heaven and Earth, and he will do no more then he pleaseth. Perswasion cannot move him, much less can power compel him. He that is above all in power, cannot be dealt with any way, but by perswasion. And he who is above all in wisdom, cannot be perswaded by any against his own will.

There is indeed a Dayes-man betwixt God and man, but God himself hath appointed him. God hath referred the differences betwixt himself and man, unto Jesus Christ; and (his own good will and free grace moving him thereunto) he stands engaged in the bonds of his everlasting truth and faithfulness to perform what Jesus Christ, as Mediator, should ask for us: unto him we may safely commit our cause and our souls, with that assurance of the Apostle (2 Tim. 1. 12.) I know whom I have believed, and am perswaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day. Christ, God-man is Umpire between God and man; what we trust him with shall not miscarry: he will make our Cause good, and our persons acceptable before God at that great day. It is infinite mercy, when we were neither able to manage our own cause, nor to find out any in Heaven or Earth who could, that then God himself should find out one, in wisdom and power like himself, one who thought it no robbery to be equal with God, to be our Dayes-man. Many of the Ancients interpret this Text, either as Job's desire and prayer, that Christ would come in the flesh, O that there were a Dayes-man betwixt us: or as a prophesie of Jesus Christ, to come as our Dayes-man in the flesh, There is no Dayes-man yet, but a Dayes-man shall come. The sence is pious, but the context will not bear it: In Chap. 16. v. 21. and Chap. 17. v. 3. We shall find Job speaking clearly of the Mediator Jesus Christ, and of his great work of atonement between God and man. But here he seems to keep to the present controversie, about the business of affliction, not of salvation.

Take two or three consectaries flowing from the whole matter.

First, Job at the lowest speaks highly of God, and humbly of himself.

The greater his afflictions were, the purer was his language.

He was not able to grapple with God, and there was none to be found who could umpire the matter betwixt them. The will of God is the supreme Law. What he will do with us, we must be content he should. The secrets of his providence are beyond our search, and his judgments above our reach.

Secondly, The greatness and transcendency of God should keep us low in our own thoughts.

Our knowledge of God is the present cure of our own pride. The knowledge of God causeth us to know our selves; and that which makes us know our selves, cannot but make us low in our selves. Though a proud man is commonly said, To know himself too much, yet the truth is, he doth not know himself enough, no, not at all, as he should know himself. Many are proud of, and with their knowledge, yet pride is the daughter of ignorance. Some pride lodges in every mans heart, because more then some ignorance doth. Job had some of both, in his; why doth he lay the thought of the infinite glory and soveraignty of God so often to his heart, but to keep down or to cure the swellings of his heart.

Thirdly, It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of God.

He is not a man as we are (we are not able to match him) and there is (among men) no Dayes man betwixtus. David made it his election (2 Sam. 24.) To fall into the hands of God, and not into the hands of man. And it is best for us to fall into the hands of God (as David put himself into his hands) with respect to his great mercies. But wo unto us, if we fall into his hands, as contenders with his great power. Shall we thus provoke the Lord? Are we stronger then he? It is our duty, when we do, and our priviledge that we may, cast our selves into the hands of God, when the hand of man oppresseth us; for (as one of the Ancients speaks sweetly and feelingly) If thou doest deposit thy injuries with him, he is able to revenge thee; if thy losses, he is able to repair thee; if thy sickness, he is able to heal thee; and if thy death, he can raise thee up, and estate thee in life again. Thus (I say) it is best to fall into the hands of God, in expectation of mercy, through the Mediator; but it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God, upon contempt of mercy obtained by the Mediator: So the Apostle argues (Heb. 10. 26.) If men sin wilfully after they have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation, &c. Thence concluding (vers. 31.) It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. They who sleight the blood of Christ, and neglect the great salvation tendered to sinners by him, can have no more sacrifice for sin. Wicked men crucifie to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to open shame (Heb. 6. 6.) But God will not crucifie his Son, or put him to open shame again for them. God will not make another Gospel for them (as he must, if they be saved) who contemn this. No, there remains no more sacrifice for sin, these men who once (with all man-kind) fell into the hands of God by transgressing his Law, are now (under another notion) fallen into his hands, even by the contempt of the Gospel; and now God saith, I will deal with them alone, for they have refused the Dayes-man whom I sent, and who was ready to lay his hand upon us both. It had been inconceivably sad with us all, if, as in the case of Job's temporal lost estate, there was no Dayes-man between God and him on earth; so in the case of our spiritual lost estate, there had been no Dayes-man between God and man in heaven: but it will be unconceivably more sad with those, who having had the tender of such a Dayes-man, shall be found contemners of him. Greatest love neglected, breaks forth and ends in greatest wrath.

Satũ idoneus est patientiæ sequester Deus, si injuriam deposueris juxta eum, ultor est; si damnum, restitutor; si dolorem, medicus; si mortem, resuscitator est. Tertul. l. de Patient.

VERS. 34, 35.

Let him take his rod away from me, and let not his fear terrifie me.
Then would I speak, and not fear him: but it is not so with me.

WE have shewed (in the two former verses) Job renouncing and protesting against all thought of contending at all with God; He is not a man as I am, that I should answer him, &c. In these two he desireth God not to contend with him: as if he had said, Lord, I will not plead or dispute with thee; and I know (such is thy soveraignty) thou mayest do what thou pleasest with me; Yet, oh that thou wouldst be pleased to abate of the severity of thy proceeding, and to remit the fierceness of that wrath, wherein thou appearest against me, that I might have liberty to spread my condition in thy presence. I have no friend to take up the matter for me; but I would open my case in a few words my self, if I might obtain a cessation but for the time of treaty, if thou wouldst forbear fighting, while I am speaking. Let him take his rod away from me, and let not his fear terrifie me. Then would I speak, &c.

Exploratum est me non posse Deum, coram superiore aliquo judice sistere: quocirca superest, ut ipse sit supremus judex, apud quem ego pro me dicere paratus sum, si contrahet flagellum calamitatis quo me cædit, & exteniet formidinẽ majestatis quâ concutior. Pined.

Let him take his rod away from me.

The Rod hath divers acceptions: The word Shebet in the Hebrew, is taken sometimes strictly for a branch, bough, or sprig, growing forth from the stock of a tree: and because a rod or a staff is made of the branch of a tree, therefore the same word signifies both.

Secondly, It signifies a Scepter; the Scepter of a King, which emblems the power of a King. Ahasuerus held forth his golden Scepter to Queen Esther, in token of acceptance (Esth. 5. 2.) And because in ancient times (as the Learned observe) obſerve) they were wont to make Scepters of ſuch rods, and all Scepters have the form or ſhape of a rod, therefore the original expreſſes the rod and the Scepter by the ſame word (Gen. 49. 10.) The Scepter [Shebet, the rod] ſhall not depart from Judah, nor a Law-giver from between his feet. Thy Scepter, O God, is a Scepter of righteouſneſs (Pſal. 45. 6.) that is, thou uſeſt thy Scepter righteouſly. The Scepter notes two things; Firſt, Authority to judge or command. Secondly, Power to correct or puniſh; both are included in that propheſie of the Kingdom of Chriſt (Pſal. 110. 2.) The Lord ſhall ſend the rod of thy ſtrength out of Sion; that is, he ſhall inveſt thee with power to govern, as the next words expound it, Rule thou in the midſt of thine enemies. Commanders in war direct with a rod or leading ſtaff; and Magiſtrates puniſh with a rod in times of peace.

Sceptrum quod priſci reges majeſtatis & ſeveritatis gratia, manu tenebant, baculus erat.

Sceptrum ſignificat regium Dominium, cujus ſignum erat ſceptrũ. Tribus quæ ex uno patre tanquam baculus ex una arbore nata eſt. Percuſſio, punitio, plagâ, quæ fit baculo.

Hence thirdly, By a Metonymy the Scepter imports dominion, rule and government it ſelf, Amos 1. 8. I will cut off him that holdeth the Scepter; that is, who hath the government in his hand.

Fourthly, The word is often uſed in Scripture to ſignifie a Tribe, or a family of perſons, becauſe a Tribe is as a branch ſprung from one ſtock; ſo the twelve Tribes of Iſrael (like twelve branches) ſprung from that great and ancient ſtock, the Patriarch Jacob.

Laſtly, The word ſignifies puniſhment or correction; correction is often given with a rod, therefore to be under the rod is to be under puniſhment. Thus the Lord threatens to viſit the tranſgreſſion of the houſe of David with a rod, and their iniquity with ſtripes, Pſal. 89. 32. The rod and reproof give wiſdom (Prov. 29. 15.) The rod hath a voice, Hear the rod (ſaith the Prophet, Mich. 6. 9.) but 'tis beſt when a voice is joyned with the rod, and inſtruction mixed with correction.

There are in the Hebrew (to note that by the way) five words, which ſignifie a rod or a ſtaff. Some reſolve that ſeeming contradiction which is in the two Evangeliſts, Matthew and Mark, by the different ſignification of theſe words. When Chriſt (Matth. 10. 10. as alſo, Luke 6. 3.) ſent forth his Apoſtles to preach the Goſpel, among other inſtructions and directions given them for their journey, this is one, Take no ſtaves. But (Mark 6. 8.) Chriſt commanded them that they ſhould take nothing for their journey ſave a ſtaff only. One Evangeliſt ſaith, they muſt not take ſtaves, and in the other they are bidden to take ſtaves. Now (ſay theſe) in Matthew and Luke, where he forbids his Diſciples to take ſtaves, he expreſſeth himſelf by the word in the Text, Shebet, which ſignifies a correcting or ſmiting ſtaff: Take no ſtaves to ſmite and ſtrike with, ye go out with a meſſage of peace in your mouths, let there not be ſo much as an inſtrument of contention in your hands. But in Mark he uſeth the word Miſnan, which ſignifies a ſtaff to lean upon; Take a ſtaff to reſt or eaſe your ſelves upon, or to help your ſelves on in your travel; A walking ſtaff, but not a ſtriking ſtaff. Thus they reconcile the difference. But though this interpretation be good, yet this ground of it apppears not, either in the Syriack, which in both Texts hath the word Shebet, or in the Greek, which expreſſes both by (ῥάβδος) So then we muſt rather ſay, that the ſame word ſignifies a ſtaff for both uſes, and that when Chriſt forbids his Diſciples a ſtaff, he means a ſtaff to ſtrike with (Preachers muſt be no ſtrikers, according to the Apoſtles rule in Timothy) and that when he bids them take a ſtaff, he means a walking ſtaff. Itineriant Preachers might be wearied with travelling, as well as with ſpeaking.

But to the Text. The rod which Job deſires might be removed, is, that ſore affliction which the ſoveraign power of God laid upon him, and exerciſed him with. As if he had ſaid, Lord, thou dealeſt with me upon the height of thy prerogative, and I acknowledge thou mayeſt do ſo: But my humble ſuit and prayer is, that thou wouldeſt afflict me leſs then thou haſt, though thou haſt not afflicted me more then thou mayeſt. Thou haſt not injured me at all, but O that thou wouldeſt relieve me.

He ſpeaks to this ſence with a little variety of words, (Chap. 13. 20, 21.) Only do not two things unto me, then will I not hide my ſelf from thee; withdraw thine hand from me, and let not thy dread make me afraid. And in a language not unlike this, he deſcribes the peace and proſperity of wicked men (Chap. 21. 9.) Their houſes are ſafe from fear, neither is the rod of God upon them. We find alſo that Elihu (who undertook Job, and debated the matter with him, when theſe three had no more to ſay, or would ſay no more) He, I ſay, perceiving what it was which Job had complained of as an impediment of ſpeaking unto God, promiſes that himſelf would give him no ſuch impediment or cauſe of complaint (Chap. 33. 7.) Behold, my terror ſhall not make thee afraid, neither ſhall my hand be heavy upon thee; As if he had ſaid, The Lords hand hath been heavy upon thee, and his terror hath made thee afraid, but (take my word) I will deal gently and mildly with thee, My terror ſhall not make thee afraid, neither ſhall my hand be heavy upon thee. So that, Job's deſire is only this, that he might have eaſe or releaſe from his preſent ſorrows. And 'tis (not improbably) conceived, that he alludes to the cuſtom of the Judges in thoſe Eaſtern Countries, who laid a rod upon ſome offenders in token of condemnation, and took it off from others in token of abſolution, of grace and favour. Take thy rod away from me.

Affliction is called a rod in a three-fold conſideration.

Firſt, Becauſe of the ſmart of it. Afflictions are grievous and painful to fleſh and blood. They grieve and pain the outward man, while the inward man takes pleaſure in them. I (ſaith Paul) take pleaſure in infirmities, in reproaches, in perſecutions, in neceſſities, in diſtreſſes for Chriſts ſake (2 Cor. 12. 10.) that is, my ſpirit doth, for no affliction (not that for Chriſts ſake) is joyous for the preſent, but grievous to the fleſh. For, as the Spirit would not do thoſe evils of ſin, which the fleſh would and doth (The evil which I would not, that I do, was Paul's cry, Rom. 7. 19.) So the fleſh would not endure thoſe evils of ſorrow, which the Spirit would and doth. And as a believer delights in the Law of God, after the inward man, when corruption is vext and troubled at it; ſo a believer delights in the rod of God, after the inward man, when corruption is moſt impatient and unquiet under it. Hence the Apoſtles counſel to the diſperſed Jews, Rejoyce when ye fall into divers temptations (James 1.) that is, into divers afflictions; the fleſh hath its ſenſe, and feels ſmart; but the Spirit is armed with faith, which overcomes the ſmart. Affliction were not ſo much as a rod, if it did not make us ſmart; and we are not ſo much as Chriſtians, if we cannot bear the ſmart with patience, or overcome it with faith.

Secondly, Affliction is called a rod, in regard of the hand that uſeth it. A ſword is in the hand of a Judge, and a rod in the hand of a father. God deals with his people as a father with his children in afflicting them. When we moſt provoke his Fatherly diſpleaſure againſt us, he doth not wiſh (as Balaam when his Aſſe offended him) that there were a ſword in his hand to ſlay us; he only takes up a rod to ſcourge us. Hence

Thirdly, Affliction is called a rod, in regard of the end for which it is ſent. A rod is not prepared to kill, nor is it an inſtrument of cruelty. A rod is not for deſtruction, but for correction. There are indeed deſtroying rods, which God will deſtroy, and ſave his people who are deſtroyed by them; I will deſtroy the rod of the oppreſſor (Iſa. 9. 4.) Nebuchadnezzar the rod of Gods anger, was a deſtroying rod, yet they among the Jews, who feared God, were only corrected, while they were deſtroyed. The Lord means no hurt to thoſe who are good, when he makes them ſmart and die under the rod of thoſe who are evil. If ever any man might think he had a ſword in his bowels, rather then a rod upon his back, Job might; yet even he calls it a rod, while he calls to God, for the removing of it, Remove thy rod away from me. And ſeeing he calls to have it removed, we may Obſerve,

That it is lawful to pray againſt affliction.

We may pray to be eaſed of that, which we muſt be patient under. To be diſcontented with affliction is ſinful, but it is no ſin (it is a duty) to deſire the taking of it away. For Firſt, We may pray for the preventing of afflictions, therefore we may pray for the removing of afflictions, we may pray, Lord, keep thy rod off from us; therefore we may pray, Lord, take thy rod off from us.

Secondly,

Secondly, Afflictions themselves are evil. There is no good in them, nor can they do us any good of themselves. The good cometh from a superior work, from those admirable influences and concurrences of God upon; and with corrections. The rod is an evil in it self, and will make us worse, unless the Lord make it a blessing to us. Some are stubborn under the rod: and their hearts are hardened, while themselves are melted in the fire of affliction. As man lives not by bread alone, so man mends not by the rod alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. 'Tis little less then a miracle that this dry rod (as that of Aaron did natural) should blossom and bring forth spiritual fruit, the fruit of righteousness.

Thirdly, We may pray for the removing of afflictions, because the Lord often sends afflictions upon this message, to bespeak prayer. Many a soul is sluggish in prayer till awakened by the voice of the rod. When the rod makes the flesh smart, then the Spirit (in whom any thing of the Spirit is) cries mightily unto God, and among the many things about which the soul exercises prayer under afflictions, this is one, that the afflictions may be removed. As they always sin, who murmur at and quarrel with God, because he corrects them; so also do they, who say, they care not how long he corrects them, or let him correct them, as long as he will. It is as ill a sign when a child will not pray his parent to spare him, when he is about to chasten him, or to stay his hand when he is chastening of him, as it is to resist his chastisement. There may be greater contempt of God in lying under affliction, then in resisting it. Now, as it is our duty to pray for deliverance out of trouble; so it is one end why the Lord casts us into trouble, that we may be engaged to pray for deliverance.

But take it with a caution, we must not pray absolutely for deliverance, or the removal of afflictions, but at least with an implicit limitation. While we are striving earnestly for the taking away of the rod, we should be ready to submit, if the Lord will not take it away. A believer may say to the Lord (as wrestling Jacob) I will not let thee go except thou bless me; but he must not say, I will not let thee go, except thou now deliver me. Time, and means, and manner must all be laid at Gods feet, and submitted to his wisdom. And we must honour God, though he will not remove the rod, even while we are praying that he would remove it.

For the close of this point, consider, the rod may be removed, not only by a total release from affliction; But

First, By an abatement of the affliction. As we are said to leave off those graces, from the degrees and lively actings of which we fall and decline: He that lacketh these things (that is, who aboundeth not, as he hath heretofore, in the exercise of them) is blind, &c. (2 Pet. 1. 9.) Thou hast left thy first love, saith Christ to the Angel of Ephesus, when the heat of his former love was cooled: So the Lord may be said to remove our troubles, when he remits the extremity, and cools the heat of them.

Secondly, The rod is removed, when it is sanctified to us, when the Lord (who is excellent in workings) causeth it to do us good. The Saints die, yet death is abolished, as to the Saints, by the death of Christ (2 Tim. 1.10.) because Christ hath pluckt out the sting of their death, and made it a gain to them. Thus while Christ makes temporal losses or sufferings an advantage to the spiritual estate of his people, he takes them away. And as outward blessings are taken away, from wicked men, while they possess them; riches are not riches to them, nor is their honour an honour to them, because they are ensnared by them: So the outward cross is taken away from the godly, while they suffer, because they are bettered by the cross.

Thirdly, Affliction is removed from us, when Christ gives us strength to bear affliction. Nothing grieves us, either in active or passive obedience, but what is either against our wills, or above our power. It is all one to have a burthen taken off our shoulders, or to have so much strength given as makes it easie to us. While the Saints have trouble upon their backs and loins, they have no trouble in their hearts and spirits, when their spirits are carried above those troubles. To conquer an enemy is more noble then to have none. Much more (which is promised the Saints in the throng of forest enemies) to be more then conquerors. In all, or any of these wayes Job's prayer may be fulfilled, Take away thy rod from me,

And let not thy fear terrifie me.

There was somewhat more upon Job then a rod, or it was an extraordinary rod, a rod like a Scorpion.

Formidabilis, terribilis Emathah.

Let not thy fear terrifie me.] The word which we translate [Fear] comes from a root signifying that which is very formidable and terrible. Fear and dread shall fall upon them (Exod. 15. 16.) that is, they shall be extreamly afraid, even dead with fear, as the next words import; They shall be still as a stone, &c. there is a letter added (as the Hebricians observe) to the word used by Moses, implying the excess of fear. Giants are called by this name Emims (Deut. 2. 11.) because they are of a dreadful aspect. The whole host of Israel trembled at the sight of Goliah, (1 Sam. 17. 14.) An Idol is expresst by this name Emim: And there is a double reason of it. Either because Idols are a terror to their worshippers: we hear how at this day poor Pagans who worship Idols, are extreamly oppresst with slavish fear of displeasing them. The true God is terrible to his despisers: but false Gods are terrible to their worshippers.

μὴ με ἐφοβέτο. Ne me transversum agat Sept. Alius, ne me consternet.

Or Secondly, They were called Emims in a way of contempt; Yours are terrible Gods sure: They have hands, and handle not; feet, and walk not; eyes, and see not. Here are terrible gods. So then, Idols are Emims, either because they are really to be feared so little; or because they are superstitiously feared so much.

Job's fear was no needless fear, he was not terrified with a fancy, though his fancy was ready enough to over-act upon his afflictions, and so encreased his fear; Let not thy fear, that is (say some) fearful thoughts or sights terrifie me. So (Chap. 7. 14.) When I say, my bed shall comfort me, my couch shall ease my complaint; then thou scarest me with dreams, and terrifiest me with visions. There is an humbling and a cleansing fear; The fear of the Lord is clean, not only in the nature of it, but in the effects of it (Psal. 19. 9.) There is also an amazing, and a terrifying fear: such the letter of the original imports this to be, even a fear bordering upon madness, as if he were rather frighted then afraid, and scared, rather then troubled.

Ex vi verbi originalis ejusmodi terror est qui hominē exagitat & quasi extra valde distrahit.

Others expound this fear with reference to the two former verses, especially to the verse immediately fore-going. There Job desires a Dayes-man, or complains that there is none; here he tells us what he might have expected, if he had one. As if he had said, Had I a Dayes-man, then I know he would take away the rod from me, that is, he would give judgment that I should be eased of this affliction; and his fear should not terrifie me, that is, he would never give a sentence which should be a terror to me. That's a fair sence in reference to what he spake before; but I rather keep his meaning within the compass of what he is speaking here.

And then by fear we may understand,

First, Those rayes and beams of Majesty, which the Lord letting out a little upon Job, he was not able to bear them. We find when in those ancient times God appeared, the beholders were terrified. Manoah's wife tells her husband, A man of God came unto me, and his countenance was like the countenance of an Angel of God very terrible, (Judg. 13. 6.) And when God appeared to Abraham, an horror of great darkness fell upon him (Gen. 15. 12.) In what a woful plight was Daniel, receiving the visions of God? (Dan. 10. 8.) God who is the joy of his people, is also a terror to them. Things which are not what they seem to be, are not so terrible near hand as at a distance. God who is infinitely more then he can seem to be, is more terrible near hand then at a distance. Hence it is, that when God, who is always near us, shews himself to be so, our spirits fail within us. In that presence of God which we shall have in glory, there will be fulness of joy. And in that presence of God which we have in the ways of grace, there is abundance of joy. But if while we are here in a state of grace, some little of that presence of God which is proper to the state of glory falls upon us, we are more distressed then comforted with it. How much more then when God cloaths himself with terror, and (as he did to Job) so reveals himself unto us?

Pavoris nomine intelligendū putarem fulgorē, splendorem, vel majestatem nimiam; qua prisci illis temporibus nonnunquam Deus, vel Angelus pro Deo servis suis apparebat. Bol.

Secondly, We may interpret this fear (by the former part of the Verse) the rod; his afflictions were terrible, the hand of God lifted up to smite him, made him afraid. But whether it were this or that, the Majesty of God overawing him, or the Rod of God chastening him, the sence is plain, Job was oppresst with fear from the Lord, yea, with terror from the Almighty, causing this vehement deprecation, Let not his fear terrifie me. Hence observe,

First, That, God sometimes appears terribly to those he loves entirely.

Job was one of Gods darlings, and God was embracing him while he was scourging him. Job had kisses from heaven, when he felt nothing but lashes here upon the earth. The heart of God was full of love, while his hand was filled with a rod; his bowels yearned upon Job, and his face terrified him at the same time. That precious man Heman was followed with terrors and visions of amazement all his dayes; I am afflicted and ready to die from my youth up: while I suffer thy terrors, I am distracted (Psal. 88. 15.) The terrors of God, even terrors to distraction, may be the present portion of those whose portion is everlasting mercy. Observe,

Secondly Man is not able to bear the anger of God.

Though he be but correcting us, yet we cannot bear his anger toward us. This caused the Prophet to cry out (Jer. 10. 24.) Correct me, O Lord, but not in thine anger. The words are not a Prayer for correction (I know no warrant for that) but a submission to it; as if he had said, Lord, I am willing to bear thy correction, but I cannot (and who can?) bear thine anger. The Church complains (Psal. 90. 7.) We are consumed by thine anger, and by thy wrath we are troubled. The fatherly anger of God is as a consuming fire, and we are but as stubble before it: What then is the fierceness of that anger, which he will powr out upon wicked men for ever? Who knoweth the power of thine anger: (Psal. 90. 11.) Man cannot understand how powerful the anger of God is, much less stand before the power of his anger. As man cannot comprehend the love of God (Eph. 3. 18, 19.) The Apostle exhorts, To know the love of God which passeth knowledge, that is, to know so much of it as is knowable (the love of God is past the knowledge, not only of Nature, but of Grace, because it is infinite) So we should labour to know the anger of God, which passeth knowledge, that is, to know it so far as it is knowable. The anger of God cannot be fully known, because it hath an infiniteness in it, as well as his love. And as the one shall never be fully known, but by enjoying it; so neither can the other, but by feeling it. Upon this consideration, the Lord makes that gracious promise to his people (Isa. 57. 10.) I will not contend for ever, neither will I be alwayes wrath, for the spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made. But is not the spirit or soul of man of an everlasting make? And shall not the damned endure the contendings of Gods wrath for ever, and not fail? The substance of the soul cannot fail, and the spirit is incorruptible: The spirit is full of moral corruption, but it is not subject to natural corruption, or the corruption of its nature. How glad would the damned be if their spirits might fail, and their souls return to nothing? The failing of the spirit under the wrath of God, is the failing of its hope and courage. Thus the spirit sinks, and the immortal soul dies away under the sense and weight of Gods displeasure.

But what if the Lord should take away his rod, and change his terrors into smiles? what will Job do then? when this is granted, see what he will do.

Verse 35. Then would I speak, and not fear him; but it is not so with me.

Καὶ οὐ φοβηθῶ ἀλλα λαλήσω. Sept.

But is this the use which Job would make of the mercy he begs? Doth he entreat the Lord to take his terrifying fear away from him, and then resolve not to fear him at all? Whose voyce is this? Is this the voyce of Job, I will speak and not fear him? Job's character in the first Chapter was, A man fearing God; and dares he now say, I will speak and not fear him? As the fear of God ought to be the seasoning of all our works and actions, so it ought to be the seasoning of all our words and speeches: why then doth he say, I will speak and not fear him?

To clear this, I answer, Fear may be taken two wayes: Either for the grace of fear, or for the perturbation of fear. When Job saith, I would speak and not fear him, his meaning is not to lay down that fear of God, which is a bridle to the soul, keeping it from sin, or that reverential affection which fits us for, and should act us in every holy duty we perform to God: When Job prayed to be free from the fear of God, he resolved thus to fear God. 'Tis only the perturbation of fear, distracting fear, not sanctifying, humbling fear, which Job would lay aside, when God should please to withdraw his terrifying fear. And so his mind is plainly this; If the Lord will be intreated to remit the extremity of my affliction, and remove those terrors wherewith I am affrighted, then I would speak boldly and chearfully to him, I would set out the truth of my case, and declare the innocency of my person. Vehement passions hinder my reason; 'tis uneasie to speak, till I am eased of my pains: I cannot tell how it is with me, so long as it is thus with me. Hence observe,

Qui in judicio consternatur non potest rectè agere causam suã, seq; ita ut oportet defendere ac tueri, terror enim impedimento est ei. Pined.

That, Extremity of fear is an interruption to Speech.

While Sense is much troubled, Reason cannot act much. When Ephraim spake trembling, he exalted himself in Israel, (Hos. 13. 1.) There, to speak trembling, is, to speak humbly. Our words to God should be accompanied with low thoughts of our selves. Ephraim's trembling is opposed to pride and hardness of heart. They who thus tremble at the Word of God, are fittest to speak to God: yet excessive trembling hinders us in speaking. And until the Lord quiets and composes our hearts by a word from heaven, till he speak to our distempered minds, as once to the raging sea, Be quiet and still; we cannot utter our hearts, or declare our minds unto him. When God sends a gracious message to poor sinners, and invites them to a conference, as he did his ancient people (Isa. 1. 18.) Come, let us reason together: then they come boldly to the Throne of Grace, notwithstanding their crimson and scarlet sins. Then they are not afraid to speak, they may speak and not fear him.

But (saith Job) it is not so with me.

There is much diversity of opinion about these words. Mr. Broughton translates, I am not so with my self; and gives this Note upon it, I am not such with my self as Gods scourge seemeth to make me, or such as your words would make me. The Septuagint renders it, I am not so conscious to my self, or I am not so self-guilty. The Hebrew word for word runs thus, For not so I with my self. Some difference arises from the first Particle; we read [But] most [For] the original is rather causal then exceptive; I would speak and not fear him, for it is not so with me.

But the word which causes the greatest difference, is that which we translate [So] It is not so with me. The Hebrew is Chen, and that hath two principal significations. It signifies sometimes right or just, and is applied both to persons and to things.

Particula Chen propter variam quam habet significationem, varias quoque interpretationibus ansam præbet, est enim vox æquivoca, plura significans. Bol.

First, Unto things, Jer. 8. 6. The Lord hearkened and heard, and there was no man that spake (Chen) aright, or things which were right. Jer. 23. 10. The word is opposed to evil; Their course is evil, and their force is not right, that is, the force, might or power which they have, is not set upon or employed about that which is right, but wholly bent to do wrong; or they commit evil with all their might.

Secondly, The word [Chen] is applied unto persons; noting a man that is upright-hearted, faithful and honest, both in conscience and conversation. When Joseph's brethren (Gen. 42. 11, 19, 31.) pleaded for themselves, they say unto him, We are (Chenim) right men, we are no spies. We are not come to find out the weakness of the Land, but to get a supply of our own wants. Joseph said, Ye are spies, ye come to circumvent us, to put tricks upon us, to work your own ends, by discovering what we are; No, say they, pray, Sir, do not misunderstand us, we are (Chenim) honest, right-hearted, plain-meaning men.

Qui bonam habet συνείδησιν, est (כן) rectus apud seipsũ: testatur igitur se bonam habere conscientiam & inde παῤῥησίαν apud Deum, si non pro jure suo agere, vel gratia uti velit. Coc.

Secondly, The word is used adverbially; It is not so with me, that is, It is not so as you imagine. In which sence you find it, Gen. 1. 7. The Lord said, Let there be light, and it was (Chen) so; as the Lord commanded, so it was, Eccl. 8. 10. I saw the wicked buried who had come and gone from the place of the holy, and they were strangers in the City where they had done so.

Upon

Upon both these considerations of the word, different interpretations of the whole are grounded.

First, Taking the word to note an upright-hearted man, Job is conceived to speak interrogatively, as if he put this Question, For am I not right in my self? As if he had said, If you think it too much boldness that I have said, I would speak unto God, and not fear him; Am not I right in my self? Am not I sound and true at heart? Thus he seems to allude unto that testimony which God gave of him at the first verse of this Book, a man perfect and upright; As if he had said, I am no Turn-coat or Apostate, I am as I was, and I doubt not but I shall be what I am, still perfect before God, and upright with men. And if so, why may not I have boldness to come unto God, and speak freely with him? They who are sincere with God, may have great boldness in coming unto God. Uprightness hath boldness with men, and uprightness hath boldness towards God; though no uprightness or righteousness in man can give him boldness in himself, yet it may give him boldness in another. He may be assured, that though he cannot be accepted for his righteousness, yet being upright, he shall be accepted.

Secondly, Others read it negatively; I would speak and not fear him, for I am not right in, or with my self. And so the sence may be made out thus, I have not gone about to justifie my self all this while, I have not stood upon my own righteousness pleading with God; if my righteousness were in my self, then I might fear to speak with God, though his fear should not terrifie me, and though he should take away his rod from me; but I have a better bottom then my own, I am not right in my self, I am right only in the free grace of God, and in the righteousness of my Redeemer. According to this exposition, he returneth to his first proposition, laid down in the second verse of this Chapter; How should man be just or righteous with God? I am not right in my self. As I said in the beginning of my answer, Man is not righteous; so I now conclude in my own particular case, I am not righteous in my self; and being righteous in another, if God would but give me a little respite from these sorrows, I would speak, and not be afraid. This teaches us,

First, That, The confidence and the holy boldness which the Saints have in coming unto God, is grounded upon the righteousness of Christ, not upon any worthiness in themselves.

Secondly observe, He that is most upright in heart, is most forward to acknowledge, most constant in acknowledging his own unrighteousness.

They who are most proud, are most empty. And they who have least, usually speak with the most. Sincerity rates it self low; I am not right, that is, righteous, saith upright Job.

Thirdly (say others) I am not right in my self, that is, I am at present uncomposed and unsetled in my own spirit: As if Job had said, I desire that the Lord would remove his fear, and mitigate my afflictions, that I might speak with him, and not fear; for as yet I am not right in my self, my spirit is so overwhelmed, and my thoughts are so troubled within me, that I have not the free use of my own understanding, nor can my Reason do its office, much less my Grace. I am scarce in my right mind, but rather as a man distracted (so was Heman) with the terrors of the Lord; I know not how to manage Faith under such fears, the Majesty and dreadfulness of God oppress my spirit; as I am, I am not my self. The Vulgar gives this interpretation instead of a translation; For I cannot answer while I am afraid. Hence note, Quia non sic sum apud me; ut nunc sum, sc. in hac afflictione ut me nunc tractat & exagitat Deus, sum velut extra me, animi impos. Merc.

Neque enim meo nutu possum respondere. Vulg.

A godly man in sore temptations, may for a while appear less then a man.

Fears hinder him from shewing the best of his natural self, much more any thing of his spiritual self.

Further, note two things, experienced by many of the Saints in the day of their distress.

First, A godly man under greatest afflictions, keeps to the opinion of his own integrity, yet builds his comfort upon the free Grace of God.

He can, according to the first interpretation of these words, challenge all with this Question, Am I not right in my self? Is there not integrity in my spirit? and according to the second, he is ready to make this negative confession, I am not right in my self, I stand not upon my own integrity.

Secondly, The Saints in great afflictions, are often so overwhelmed with the Majesty of God, that they are not able to express their interest in God, much less make out the comforts of that interest.

The former of these arises from that seed of holiness and stock of Grace abiding in them. The other ariseth from the natural weakness of flesh and blood, in which they abide, and from the moral corruption of nature abiding in them.

Thus we see how the sence of the Text rises, as the word [Chen] is understood nominally, for right or just. We translate it adverbially, But it is not so with me; or, For it is not so with me. This reading bears a threefold interpretation.

First, In construction with the former words, thus: Let him take away his rod, &c. then will I speak and not fear him; for it is not so with me, that is, I am not so fearful, or of so low a spirit, I am not such a stranger, or of so little acquaintance with God, that I should not know how to speak unto him, or that I should be afraid to speak to him. If the Lord would but hide that brightness of his own glory, which dazles me, and ease me of my own pains, which distract me, I should sure enough speak unto him, and declare my cause.

But secondly, We rather refer it to the false and unkind opinion of his friends, who judged him a wicked man, or an hypocrite, which he here denies; It is not so with me: As if he had said, If the Lord would be pleased to grant what I have petitioned, I would speak unto him without fear or doubt of being heard; for it is not so with me, namely, as you have suspected and imagined all this while, or as you think it is. I am not the man you take, or rather mistake me to be; if I were, then though the Lord should take all his afflictions from me, and withdraw his terrors, yet I should be afraid to speak unto him, yea, I should be afraid to pray unto him: every prayer (were I wicked) would be a praying down judgment upon my self: But seeing I can boldly affirm, my Conscience also bearing me witness, that though I sin, yet I love not to sin, that though I am weak, yet I am not wicked, as ye have charged me; my heart being thus clear before God, I cannot fear to open my mouth, and report my cause before God.

Non sic impius ego apud me. Pag. Non sum talis qualem me putatis. Vatabl. Merc.

Hence observe (which hath been offered from other passages in this book, and therefore I shall only observe it.)

That, A godly man standeth to, and knoweth his own integrity in the midst of all the clamors and slanders, the misapprehensions or aspersions of friends or enemies.

Whosoever loads and charges him with studied or approved hypocrisie, he will (and he ought to) unload and discharge himself (at least) with Job's plain denial; you suspect me thus, but I am sure it is not so with me.

Thirdly, The words may bear this meaning, I have sought and earnestly intreated the Lord to abate my afflictions, and to remove his terrors; But it is not so with me: Alas, I do not find that the Lord hath done any of these things for me. His rod is still upon my back, and his terrors stand as thick about my soul as ever: was ever poor man in such a plight as I? 'Tis not (alas) with me as I have prayed, or as I would have it. The rod smarts, and terrors amaze me still. Hence note,

That, A godly man may pray in affliction, and not presently be relieved in or from his affliction.

Many a soul can say, It is so with me as I have prayed, I have the wishes and desires of my soul; yet many (and I believe many more then can) cannot say so. The Lord lets precious prayers lie unanswered to our sense. We may pray long before we find it so with us as we have prayed, and yet those prayers are not lost, but laid up; not buried, but sown. And it becomes us to have patience till the harvest, though it be a late one.

Lastly, There is an opinion which gives this verse connection with the first of the next Chapter. As if Job had thus resolved, upon the Lords not answering his petition, Had the Lord condescended to take away his rod, and remove his terror, as I requested, then I had somewhat to say, and I would would have spoken it unto him, but because it is not so, or because I am not answered, therefore I with my self (the word [Speak] is not in the Text: but such supplies of a word are frequent, not only in the Hebrew, but also in other languages) Seeing I have not liberty to speak to the Lord, I will powr my complaint into mine own bosom, and commune with my own heart. He pursues this tacite resolution in Chap. 10. which begins thus, My soul is weary of my life, I will leave my complaint upon my self.

CHAP. X. Vers. 1.

My soul is weary of my life, I will leave my complaint upon my self, I will speak in the bitterness of my soul.

JOB having in the former Chapter justified God in afflicting him, and maintained his own integrity, notwithstanding those afflictions, now returneth to that work, about which he had been too busie before; yet that, wherein it seems he only found (as the case stood with him) some little ease and refreshing; The breathing out of his afflicted spirit in sad complainings; He resumes his former lamentation, and renews afresh what he had been more then large enough in, at Chap. 3, 6, 7. of this Book. Here, as there, he shews how ill it was with him, and what cause he had to be in heaviness, under the pressure of so many evils.

Afflicti sæpe se exonerari putant, si laxiùs habenis de suo dolore queruntur & suas enumerent calamitates uberrima oratione. Merc.

And here, more then there, he remonstrates that he conceived himself more hardly dealt with, then stood not only with the goodness of God in his nature, but with that goodness which he had formerly acted both towards others and himself: This encouraged him about the close of the Chapter (vers. 20, & 22.) to petition again, that he might have a little refreshing before he lay down in his grave: and that God would (after these storms) return him some of those fair dayes he had enjoyed, before he returned to the earth, and should be seen no more.

Argumentis, utitur à natura Dei & ante accepta ipsius beneficiis, quibus mala hæc quæ immisit Deus magnopere repugnare videantur. Merl.

His complaint is very rhetorical and high, yet with an allay or mixture of modesty. Indeed his spirit brake out, and passion got head, at vers. 18, 19. where he expostulates with God, in the language of Chap. 3. Wherefore hast thou brought me forth out of the womb? &c. But abating that excess of his tongue and spirit, his complaints are knit up with solid arguments, and his Queries put the point resolutely, yet humbly, home to God himself: that he would be pleased to shew the reason of his present dealings, and why he varied so much from what he had done in former times.

Vehemens quidem partibus omnibus & gravis est querimonia, sed modesta, si unum illud excipiatur exemplum. ver. 3, 19. Merc.

The first verse gives us a general ground of this and of all his sorrowful complaints; the wearisomness of his life.

My soul is weary of my life, I will leave my complaint upon my self.

The Argument may be formed thus,

He hath reason to complain of his afflictions, whose afflictions are so heavy upon him, and so bitter, that he hath reason to be weary of his very life.
But thus my case stands, my afflictions are so bitter to, and heavy upon me, that I am weary of my life.
Therefore I have reason to complain.

The assumption of this Syllogism is contained in the first words of the verse, My soul is weary of my life. And the conclusion, in the latter; Therefore I will leave my complaint upon my self; I will speak in the bitterness of my soul.

My soul is weary of my life.] Life and soul are often in Scripture put promiscuously for the same, but here they differ. The soul may be taken two wayes,

First, Strictly, as it is opposed to the body.

Secondly, In a more large sence (by a Synechdoche of the part for the whole) for the whole man consisting of body and soul: If so here, then the meaning of Job in saying [My soul is weary of my life] is no more then this, I (Job) am weary of my life; that is, of the marriage or union of my soul and body, O that this band (which I (though most are grieved at the weakness of theirs) find too strong) were broken, or a bill of divorce granted for their seperation. Life is the bond or tie by which soul and body subsist together: And when that bond is broken or cut asunder by the stroke of death, the body goes to the grave, and the soul or spirit returns to God who gave it.

Again, When Job saith, My soul is weary of my life. Life may be taken either for the act of life, and so the sence is, I am weary of living; or it may be taken for the manner of life, and so the sence is, I am weary of that course or state of life wherein I am. Life is often put (not strictly for the act of living, but) for the state or condition in which a man lives, or with which life is cloathed; The circumstances and concomitants of life are called life. Thus in our common speech, when a man is in misery, another saith, I would not have his life, or, what a life hath he? The Apostle's character of all natural men, is, that they are alienated from the life of God (Ephes. 4. 18.) that is, they cannot endure to live such a life as God lives, or as he commands them to live; they cannot endure to be holy, as he is holy, or holy, as he calls them to be holy, in all manner of conversation. Thus Job was alienated from his own life; I (saith he) am weary of my life; that is, of a life thus imbittered, thus afflicted.

My soul is weary.] The word which we translate [weary] varies the understanding of this sentence. It signifies properly to be weakned, as also to be melted or molten with heat; because a man that is extreamly heated or melted by heat, is weakned, his spirits and strength being drawn forth and dissipated. But it is most commonly applied to that weariness which arises from the displeasedness or irksomness of our minds. All burdens upon the body are light, compared with those which reach the soul. Three things weary and load the soul.

First, The filth and guilt of our own sins. I will sprinkle you (saith the Lord, Ezek. 36. 31.) with clean water, &c. What's the effect of this? It follows, Then shall you remember your own evil wayes, and loath, or be weary, of your selves (it is this word) because of all your abominations. As if the Lord had said, before I change your hearts, ye sin, and are not wearied of your sins; nay, ye make a sport of, and dally with them: But when I shall work that great change upon your hearts, your opinion and apprehensions of sin will change too: nothing will be so bitter or burdensom, so unpleasant or wearisom to your souls as sin. Fools make a mock of sin; they who are truly wise, mourn and groan under the sense and weight of it.

Secondly, The unsuitableness and perverseness of other mens manners or dispositions weary the soul. The righteous soul of Lot was vexed from day to day, in seeing and hearing the unrighteous deeds of the debauched Sodomites (2 Pet. 2. 8.) The soul of God is said to be wearied by such courses of the sons of men (Psal. 95. 10.) Fourty years long was I grieved, or wearied, with that generation. The Lord (as we may speak with reverence) was even weary of his life, he had such a troublesom people to deal with; they grieved him at the heart (as the old world did, Gen. 6.6.) and were a heavy burden to his Spirit. That's the Apostle's language, in his description of that peoples frowardness, and of Gods patience towards them (Act. 13. 18.) He suffered their manners fourty years in the wilderness; which some some render, He bare them as a burthen; the continual murmurings and unbelief of that people were to the Lord (who is yet above all passion) as a heivy weight is to a man, or as the peevishness and unquietness of a sucking child is to the nurse, as our Translators conceive the Greek word should rather be. Thus also he reproves the same people by the Prophet (*Isa.*43.24.) Thou hast wearied me with thine iniquities. And Christ (though by another word) speaks the same thing of his own Disciples (Mark 9.19. when the man possest with an unclean spirit being brought to them, they could not cast him out) How long shall I be with you? How long shall I suffer you? I am wearied with your unbelief, O ye of little faith. The Disciples were still so slow of heart, and came so short of a Gospel-spirit, that Christ professeth, He was burthened even with them; How long shall I suffer you? The ill manners of all, are a weariness to the good, but theirs most who are nearest to them. Which is also the reason, why a godly man is wearied most of all with the corruption of his own heart, for that is nearest to him of all.

Now, as our sins, and the ill manners of others weary the soul: so

Thirdly, The pains and troubles which are upon the body often cause such grief of mind, as is an extream weariness to the soul: That's the meaning of this Text [My soul is weary of my life] That is, my life is filled with such outward troubles, as fill my inward man with trouble, and weary my very soul.

Secondly, The word is translated by divers of the learned Rabbies, To cut, yea to cut off, as with a sword, or any other edged instrument: These render Job's mind thus, My soul is cut off in me, or My soul is cut off from my life; As if he had said, My dayes are at an end, I am ready to die, the threed of my life is cut, I am but a dead man. While life continues, soul and body are as it were one piece, but death divides them; or the recourse of night and day, runs the threed of time through our lives, till our web (longer or shorter) be finished, and then the threed is cut. To which similitude Hezekiah alludes in his mourning death-bed song, as he supposed (Isa. 38. 10, 12.) I said in the cutting off of my dayes, &c. Mine age is removed from me, as a shepherds tent, I have cut off like a Weaver my life, he will cut me off with pining sickness or from the thrum, which being woond about the beam, the Weaver having finished his work, cuts the web off from it. The same word in the Hebrew signifies pining sickness, and a thrum, because of the thinness and weakness of it. My life (saith Hezekiah) is spent, I am at the very last cast, the yarn of time is all wrought off, therefore my life is ready to be cut off. I am a borderer upon death, and to be numbred among the dead, rather then among the living. Such a sence this reading gives the Text of Job, My soul is cut off from my life.

Verbum קוט ex sententia R. David, & R. Mardoc. significat excidere aut succidere. Excisa est anima mea in me. Pag. Vatab. &c. Actum est de vita mea, en morior, vel perinde ac si mortuus planè sim.

Thirdly, The word signifies a reluctance or displicency of spirit, arising from the sight and sense of that which is very loathsom, filthy, and of an evil savour. It answers the Greek word rendered Abomination (Matth. 24. 15.) The abomination of desolation, he means the Romans, who being Idolaters, their worship was abominable; and who being Lords of the world, their power was formidable, and laid all Countries waste and desolate, which opposed them, or which they had a mind to oppose. And so when Job saith, My soul is weary of my life; his meaning is represented thus; My soul refuses to inhabit, or to act so filthy a body as mine; My soul loaths to dwell, or stay any longer in this nasty lodging. As David (*Psal.*120.5.) speaks of his weariness in dwelling amongst wicked men, because of their moral filthiness, or the pollution of their minds and wayes. Wo is me that I sojourn in Meshec; that I dwell in the tents of Kedar; So Job seems to speak, in reference to the natural pollution and filthiness of his own body. Wo is me that I sojourn in such a diseased body, and dwell (which yet will not die) in such a dying carcase. The noble tenant, my soul, is weary of staying in such a stinking and filthy habitation, and I perceive (for I have moved him hitherto in vain) the great Land-lord will neither repair it, nor as yet let it fall. As then a man, who lives in an ill or incommodious house, saith, I am weary of dwelling in it; or as a man that hath a filthy garment, saith, I am weary of wearing it: So saith Job here, My soul is weary of my life, were I well rid of it, I should be well.

Fourthly, Many of the Jewish Doctors tell us, that the most strict and proper signification of this word, is, To contend or strive, to chide or wrangle (we may give it in that homely language.) As if the meaning of Job were, My soul doth even contend, chide and wrangle with my life; my soul contests and disputes the matter with my life, why it will not end, that I may get out from this body of mine, and go beyond the reach of these afflictions. The 95. Psalm, vers. 10. is so translated, Fourty years long did I contend, chide or contest angerly with that generation: The Lord did often chide with the people of Israel, and they used to chide with Moses; whence one place was called Meribah; yea, through their unbelief they did chide with God himself, and (there is no reason dust and ashes should have the last word) God also gave them their chidings, and told them plainly their own, more then once. Thus the soul of Job chid his life; what's the reason that I am held in this condition, why wilt thou not be gone that I may be at rest? Carnal men chide with their lives for hastening so fast away, because they know of no rest, or have hope of none hereafter. A godly man may be brought to chide with his life for making no more haste away, because he finds none, or so little rest here. Elihu (Chap. 33. 19.) describing the method in which God uses to humble proud man, adds, He is chastened also with pain upon his bed, and the multitude of his bones with strong pains; He is chastened, the word signifies also reproving or convincing by arguments, and that in a quick and passionate, as well as in a rational and solid way. Now, while afflictions chidingly smite us, we are apt to chide them, and give them at least a word for a blow. Job did not only chide with his afflictions, but with his life, because it would not depart and be gone, being so unkindly used and imbittered by afflictions. His soul did even chide his life out a doors.

R. Moyse cum aliis Hebræis doctoribus, existimat propriam vocis significationem esse, litigare aut contendere. Litigavit anima mea in vita mea. Litigavi. Pag.

The Chaldee paraphrast gives the meaning yet higher, My soul is grown cruel against my life; As if he had said, I am so exceedingly afflicted and pained that my soul begins to rage against my life, I can hardly hold my own hands off from my life, and I would not have God hold his. Let not my life be spared; how glad should I be to see it poured out? Anguish is come upon me (as the Amalakites reports of Saul, 2 Sam. 1. 9.) because my life is whole in me. O that God would stand upon me and slay me; my soul is hardned against my life (like the Ostrich against her young ones, Chap. 39. 16.) as if it were not mine. Let me die, and that shall be a favour, smite me, and that will be to me as a precious ointment, though it break my head, and let out my troubled spirits. Then we are cruel to our lives, when we care not what's done to us, or how we are used, so we may be rid of our lives.

Crudelis effecta est anima mea. Chald. Homo qui sibi-ipsi mortem precatur adversum se sævire videtur.

But (to pass this) our translation is clear and significant, [My soul is weary of my life.] I am so weary of the pains wherein I live, that I had rather my life should end, then my pains should continue.

Job complained in Chap. 3. he complained at Chap. 6, 7. he erred twice, yea, thrice upon this point before, yet now we hear him complaining, as if he had not complained at all. This was Job's infirmity: though somewhat hath, and more may be said to take off those aspersions which his friends cast upon him for complaining, yet no doubt it was his sin to complain; especially to break out so often, and in such bitter complainings.

Hence observe, A godly man may (possibly) fall often into the same sin.

Where grace taketh hold of the heart, it breaks the custom and spoils the trade of sin; yet a godly man may sin over the same sin, and renew the same transgression. The trade of sin is spoiled, when the soul leaves devising, plotting, contriving sin, which Acts denominate a worker of iniquity. The custom of sin is broken, when though the same sin be committed again, yet the soul puts in it's plea and complaint against it. 'Tis here as in civil things, if we make our challenge or demand, the custom is gone, though the acts be renewed by the power and prevalency of the opposite party; yet, when I say a godly man may fall into sin often, I mean not of gross and scandalous sins; God doth not let his people fall often into the mire. Noah was not often drunk, nor did David commit adultery often, or more then once. The grace of God which bringeth salvation, teacheth teacheth us to deny ungodlineſs and worldly luſts. And if a godly man fall often into any the leaſt ſin, yet he lies not in ſin, becauſe he renews repentance, as often as he ſins, and riſes as often as he falls: he reſolves (through the ſtrength of Chriſt) never to ſin; when through his own weakneſs, and the violence of temptation, he is ſoon after over-taken or ſurpriz'd with ſin. David profeſſeth (Pſal. 119. 30.) I have choſen the way of truth: His election was Truth; truth of heart, which is oppoſed to hypocriſie; truth of judgment, which is oppoſed to error; and truth of ſpeech, which is oppoſed to lying; yet he ſlipt with his tongue, more then once; and told an untruth, more then one. He cannot be acquitted from this failing, when he anſwered Abimelech the Prieſt, The King hath commanded me a buſineſs, and hath ſaid unto me, Let not any man know any thing of the buſineſs whereabout I ſend thee, and what I have commanded thee; and I have appointed my ſervants to ſuch a place (1 Sam. 21. 2.) He again faulters with his tongue, and ſpeaks either falſly or doubtfully, when the King of the Philiſtines asked him, Whether have ye made a rode to day? And David ſaid, againſt the South of Judah, &c. (1 Sam. 27. 10.) whereas his invaſion was againſt the Geſhurites, and the Gezrites, and the Amalekites (verſ. 8.) He that overcame the Bear, the Lion, and Goliah the Giant, is overcome by fear, and the mother of it, unbelief. David's example ſhould be no encouragement, ſhall be no excuſe to thoſe who willingly fall often into the ſame ſin. A good man is not priviledg'd from doing it, but no man is priviledg'd to do it. Such examples muſt not teach us to ſin, but they teach us how unable we (alone) are to keep our ſelves from ſin: they teach us alſo, what need we have to depend upon, and look up to Chriſt, that we may be kept from ſin: if he leave us but a little unto our ſelves, the fleſh will diſcover much of it ſelf, and we ſhall quickly ſhew what our natures are, though we are renewed by grace. We muſt truſt to the ſupplies, not to the receipts of grace.

Secondly, When Job ſaith, [My ſoul is weary of my life.] We learn,

That, Soul and life in man are two diſtinct things.

For howſoever (as was toucht in explication) the ſoul is often put for the whole man, and ſo the ſence of my ſoul is weary, may be but this, I am weary of my life: yet the Holy Ghoſt would never denominate all man by that, which is not, not a part of man. That's a brutiſh opinion which makes the ſoul nothing, or nothing elſe but life, and this life no more in entity then the life of a beaſt, which vaniſheth, when it dieth. That theſe Opinioniſts tell us, they believe the body ſhall riſe again by the power of God, cannot ſatisfie for this fall, which their opinion gives the ſoul: neither doth the immortality of the ſoul at all contradict (which was threatned for, and is the wages of ſin) the death of the whole man. For death conſiſts not (if we may ſay a privation doth conſiſt) in the annihilation, but in the ſeparation of thoſe parts of man, ſoul and body, which by life are united and kept cloſe together.

Thirdly, When Job ſaith, My ſoul is weary of my life, we learn,

That the life of man may grow to be a burthen to him.

In Chap. 3. Job wiſheth for death; his wiſh was examined there, about the lawfulneſs of it; I ſhall now only examine (a touch about which was given lately) whence this wearineſs of life, cauſing wiſhes to be rid of life, doth ariſe. There is a wearineſs of life incident only, and proper to wicked men; And there is a wearineſs of life, which may grow upon the beſt of men. Take a brief account of the uſual grounds of both.

First, Carnal men are often ſick with diſcontent, and die of a humor: If the Lord will not give them their luſts, they bid him take their lives. Neceſſaries and competencies will not ſatisfie them, they muſt have ſuperfluities; they languiſh, if they have not Quails to their Manna, as Iſrael once deſired and had. Was it any thing but this, which made Ahab go home ſullen and ſad? Sullen ſadneſs is a degree of this wearineſs. Ahab had a Kingdom, and yet he could not live without a vineyard. He that takes away another mans life to obtain what he deſires, thinks his own life ſcarce deſireable, unleſs he may obtain it. There was a ſpice of this diſtemper in Jonah, though a good man, and a Prophet (Jonah 4. 8.) becauſe the Lord did but kill his Gourd, kill me too, ſaith Jonah, He wiſhes himſelf to die, and ſaid (his Gourd being dead) It is better for me to die then to live. It is an exceſs of deſire, when we deſire any outward thing (much more when we deſire things unneceſſary, things not to ſupply our wants, but to ſerve our luſts:) as Rachel did children (who are the beſt and nobleſt of outward things) Give me them, or elſe I die (Gen. 30. 1.)

Secondly, Some wicked men are wearied of their lives by the horror of their conſciences. A Hell within, makes the world without a Hell too. They who have a ſight of eternal death (as the wages of ſin) without the ſight of a remedy may ſoon be weary of a temporal life. As much peace of conſcience and ſoul-joy in believing, makes ſome of the Saints wiſh themſelves out of the body; ſo alſo doth trouble of conſcience, and grief of ſoul make many of the wicked. A man who is not at all weary of committing ſin may be weary of his life, becauſe he hath committed it. And he, who was never troubled that his wickedneſs is an offence againſt God, may feel his wickedneſs extremely offenſive againſt himſelf. To ſuch a ſoul the evil of ſin is ſo great an evil of puniſhment, that he is ready to cry out with Cain, My puniſhment is greater then I can bear. Yea, what his guilty conſcience feared, comes to be the deſire of many under the ſame guilt, That every one that findeth them would ſlay them: And ſome are ſo weary of their lives at the ſight of ſin, that they make away their lives themſelves, hoping to get out of the ſight of ſin. There are ſins which cry to God for vengeance, and ſome cry to the ſinner himſelf for vengeance. This cry was ſo loud and forcible in the ears of Judas, that it cauſed him to go away and hang himſelf. And what made Ahithophel weary of his life, but his wickedneſs? The rejecting of his counſel was not ſo much the reaſon of it, as the ſinfulneſs of his counſel: A good man may be troubled at others, when his good counſel is not accepted, but he grows not unacceptable to himſelf; nay, he is well-pleaſed that he hath given honeſt counſel, though none will take it, though all are diſpleaſed at it. But they who aim not at the pleaſing of God in what they do, think themſelves undone (and dye they will) if they pleaſe not men.

Thirdly, Inordinate cares for the things of this life, make others weary of their lives. He that cannot caſt his care upon God, may ſoon be caſt down himſelf. Chriſt (Luke 21. 34.) cautions his Diſciples, Take heed leſt your hearts be over-charged with the cares of this life. That which Chriſt would prevent in the Saints, falls often upon carnal men, their hearts are over-charged with cares; cares are compared to a burden, and they are compared to thorns, they do not only preſs, but vex and wound: Their weight preſſes ſome to death, their ſharpneſs wounds others to death: and not a few would go out of the world, becauſe they cannot get ſo much of it, as they would.

Theſe things (among others) make wicked men weary of their lives. There are other things which make godly men weary of their lives; ſuch are theſe,

First, The violence of Satans, and the worlds temptations. The ſoul would gladly be rid of the body, that it might be beyond the reach and aſſaults of the Devil, and his aſſiſtants. There's a Serpent every where, but in the heavenly Paradiſe. Only they complain not of temptation, who are willing ſlaves to the tempter. The Apoſtle (1 Cor. 10. 13.) aſſures the Corinthians, There hath no temptation taken you, but ſuch as is common to man; but God is faithful, who will not ſuffer you to be tempted above what you are able, but will with the temptation alſo make a way to eſcape, that ye may be able to bear it. As if he had ſaid, Temptations are ſore burdens, and although yours hitherto have been but ordinary temptations, ſuch as uſually befall the Saints; though yours be moderate afflictions, and of a common ſtature, ſuch as in the eye of reaſon any man may deal with by a common aſſiſtance of grace; yet there are temptations, which (if God, the faithful God ſhould not come in with greater aſſiſtances then uſual) you are not able to bear. They who wreſtle with more then fleſh and blood, alwayes need more then the ſtrength of fleſh and blood to help them in their wreſtlings.

wrestlings. And because they are often assaulted with greater strength, therefore they are assisted with greater strength. For if God do either withdraw his help from the Saints, or leave them to wrestle with Satan alone, and to fight single with his Armies, or if he do not proportion the aid he sends to the temptations he permits, they are sadly overcharged though they can never be totally overcome; and 'tis possible to grow weary of the battel, though we are assured of the victory. It is the honour of the Saints to conquer when they are tempted; but it is their happiness to be above or without temptation. How many poor souls put up Bills of complaint, and beg prayers against temptations. Paul prayed thrice; that is, often and much, when the messengers of Satan buffeted him; whether his were an inward or an outward temptation, is doubted; but without doubt that temptation made his life burdensome to him, till he received that answer from God, My Grace is sufficient for thee.

Secondly, The Saints are wearied with the weight of their sinful hearts. Inward corruption burdens more then outward temptation; and were it not for corruption within, temptation without could not be very burdensome. The Devil tempted Christ, but because he found nothing at all in him, complying with, or suitable to his temptations, therefore Christ threw them off with ease. That enemy without could do us no hurt (he might put us to some trouble) if he found no correspondence within. The traitor in our own bowels opens our ports, and lets in the adversary. His sparks could never enflame us, if he found no tinder in us. The baseness and unbelief, the lusts and vanities of our minds are apt to take fire at every injection. A gracious soul cannot live here without sin, and yet can easier die then sin. Paul (Rom. 7. 24.) cries out, O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death, or, from this body of death! That is, from my body which is subject to death by reason of these remains of carnal corruption or from my carnal corruptions, which are the remains of my spiritual death, and are worse to me then any death. All the afflictions of his life, and the pains of his body were but a play, and a kind of sport, compared with the trouble which this body of death put him to. He rejoyced in tribulation, but he could not but mourn under corruption. Many poor souls are so vexed with these mystical Canaanites, that their spiritual Canaan (the state of Grace) is to them like Egypt, the Land of their captivity. And when they are commanded to rejoyce, they answer, if we could not sin, we could rejoyce; How shall we sing the Lords song in a strange Land? O that we might go home!

Thirdly, The Saints grow weary of their lives through the wickedness of other mens lives; not only do their own corruptions burden them, but (which shews the holiness of their hearts more) the corruptions of others. The sinfulness and pollutions of the times and places wherein they live, especially of persons they are related to, makes their lives grievous, and imbitters all their comforts. Rebekah, that good woman, tells her husband Isaac (Gen. 27. 46.) I am weary of my life because of the Daughters of Heth; for if Jacob take a wife of the daughters of Heth, such as these which are of the daughters of the Land, What good shall my life do me? The sweetness of my life is gone if this son miscarry, as his Brother hath done before him. The Prophet Jeremy cries out, O that I had in the wilderness a lodging place of wayfaring men, that I might leave my people, and go from them: What made him so weary of living among them? (and that was but a step on this side being weary of his life.) The next words shew us; They be all Adulterers, an assembly of treacherous men (Jer. 9. 2.) Better be in a waste wilderness among wild beasts, then in a populous City, among beastly men, 'Tis a part of our compleat happiness in heaven, that we shall have no ill neighbours there. They who are evil, can take pleasure in those who do evil. But the more holiness any one hath, the more is he burdened with the unholiness of others. And that's the reason why God himself is expresst to be so exceedingly burdened with the sins of men, to be wearied and broken with them, to be laden with them, as a Cart with sheaves, He is infinitely holy. Grieve not the holy Spirit of God (Eph. 4. 30.) The Spirit is so holy that sin (which is unholiness) grieves him presently. And in proportion, look how much any man is more holy then others, by so much is he more afflicted with the impurity of others. As the holy Spirit of God, who is all holy, so the spirits of holy men (who yet have a mixture of sin) cannot but be afflicted with the sins of men.

Fourthly, Some of the Saints would part with this life, because they have got such assurance and evidence of a better life. When much of eternal life appears to a godly man, he is weary of a temporal life. Natural things are but burdensome trifles to those who are stored with spiritual. Christ saith (Luke 5. 39.) No man having drunk old wine, straightway desireth new; for he saith the old is better: He that tastes what is better then he enjoyes, is unsatisfied with all he enjoyes. We can hardly be perswaded what we have is good, when we see better of the same kind. How much more hardly is this perswasion wrought in us, that earthly things (which differ in kind from heavenly) are any great good, when heavenly things are open before us? When the Disciples (at the transfiguration) had but a glimpse of Glory, they say, It is good to be here; let us build three Tabernacles. They do not speak comparatively, as if now they had met with somewhat better then ever they had before; but positively, as if they had never met with any good before. When the Spirit carries the Saints into his Wine-cellar, and gives them a draught of everlasting consolations, the wine of worldly comforts will not down; they begin to distrelish the dainties and delicacies of the Creature. A true sight of heaven makes the earth scarce worth the looking after, or the living in. Such live, because God will have them live to do him service, not because they desire to live to serve their own ends. Paul was in a great straight betwixt two (Phil. 1. 23.) whether he should depart or abide in the flesh: but the straight was not in reference to himself, he was assured dying would be to him but a travelling to Christ, and therefore death was to him an easie election. His straight was only this, whether he should not abide still in the flesh, to supply the needs of the Church, and forbear Glory a while, that he might prepare others for Glory. The same Apostle (2 Cor. 5. 4.) saith in the first verse, We know that if the earthly house of this Tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God, an house made without hands, eternal in the heavens. When their Faith was thus upon the wing, soaring up to the assurance of an house made without hands; they grew weary of their smoakie cottages presently: they could not endure to live in those poor Lodges, corruptible bodies, having a view of such glorious Palaces; therefore he adds, In this we groan earnestly, desiring to be cloathed upon with our house which is from heaven. The word signifies groaning, as a man that hath a weighty burden lying upon him, which makes him fetch his wind even from his bowels. The body is the burden, rather then the house or the cloathing of the soul, when once the soul knows it shall be cloathed with an house which is from heaven. As (I said before) much of hell in this life, makes wicked men weary of this life, so also doth much of heaven. The Roman Orator tells us, that a young man, who lived in great prosperity, having read Plato about the Immortality of the Soul, was so affected, that he threw himself violently from a high wall into the Sea, that he might have a proof of that Immortality, by his experience of it. The Gospel forbids such haste, and knows no such wayes to happiness. As Christ (not we) hath purchased that estate; so Christ must lead us (we must not thrust our selve) into the possession of it: but yet the earnests, the fore-tastes and first-fruits of heaven, which the Saints find in this life (though they be such as eat the marrow & fatness, such as may have the very cream and spirits of the Creature to live upon) make them groan often and earnestly for the next life. This is good, but heaven is better.

Lastly, Which is the case of this Text, The Saints may grow weary of their lives from the outward afflictions and troubles of this life. Sickness and pains upon the body, poverty and want in the estate, reproaches and unkindnesses put upon our persons, with a thousand evils to which this life is subject every day, cause many to wish and long for an end of their dayes. And though they are ready to submit to the will of God, if he hath appointed to them a longer conflict with these evils, yet they cannot but shew their willingness, yea their gladness to part with their lives, lives, that they may part with such troubles accompanying their lives.

And as the afflictions of the body natural, so of the body politick, may make them weary of their lives. How many in Germany and Ireland have been so wearied with hearing the voyce of the Oppressor, that they have wished themselves in their graves, only to get out of their hearing? And with us, since these troubles began, have not many been tired with living? Have they not cried after death, and wooed the grave, as being weary of the world? The Prophet (Isa. 32.2.) speaks of a weary Land. A man (meaning Christ) shall be as the shadow of a great rock in a weary Land. The Land it self (being insensible) could not be weary; but he calls it a weary Land, because the inhabitants living in the Land, were wearied with the troubles and continual vexations which they found there. In these cases the soul of a Believer stands (like Abraham, when the Angels passed by) at the Tent-door of his Body, ready to come forth, looking when God will but call; yea, he cries out that he may be called (in the language of Job) My soul is weary of my life.

I will leave my complaint upon my self, I will speak in the bitterness of my soul.

I will leave, &c.] That is, I will carry my complaint no further, it shall trouble none but my self.

The Original signifies also to strengthen or fortifie (Neh. 3.8.) They fortified Jerusalem unto the broad wall; we put in the Margin, They left Jerusalem to the broad wall: so the sence of Job may be this, My pain does not abate, but encrease, why then should I remit or abate my complaint? I will strengthen my complaint as long as my sorrows are strengthened.

My complaint.] That word hath been explained before; it signifies an inward, as well as an outward complaint, and that most properly. Some translate it so here; I will groan in silence with my self. But the Text requires, rather that we interpret it of an external complaint formed up into words. The Septuagint are express, and so is Austin, I will leave my words upon my self: both interpreting it of a vocal declaration of his mind and meaning.

Permittam mihi mussitationem. Tygur. Silentio egomet ingemiscam & Philosophabor. Polych. Deponam à me querimoniam meam. Jun.

The greatest difficulty lies in those words [upon my self] One renders, I will leave my complaint off, or lay it aside from my self. As if Job meant to give over this work of complaining, and to compose his heart to quietness, how unquiet soever his estate continued. But his following practice seems to confute this interpretation, and to deny any such intention.

Others give this sence, I will speak at my own peril, and if any danger or inconvenience come of it, I will bear it my self, I will run that venture. Job uses such language (chap. 13.13.) Hold your peace, let me alone that I may speak, and let come on me what will. We may gloss it with that Heroical resolution of Queen Esther, (Est. 4. 16.) So will I go in unto the King, which is not according to the Law, and if I perish, I perish. The Hebrew Preposition hath various acceptions.

Præpositio ב frequenter per super, nonnunquam per cum, & aliquando per adversus redditur. Nihil contra Deum, in me tantum desaviam. Pin.

First, (as we) It is translated Upon. Secondly, With. Thirdly, Against. Fourthly, Concerning or about.

We may take in any of, or all these translations. And from all, the meaning of Job seems to rise thus, I intend not to speak a word against God, I will not charge the Almighty with injustice, or with rigor, to do which, were highest wickedness; I purpose indeed to complain, but I will complain only upon or with my self, concerning or against my self, I will not utter a word against the wisdom of God, or accuse his Providence; I will not shoot an arrow against Heaven, or send out a murmur against the most High.

There are two wayes of leaving our complaints upon our selves.

First, When we let them lie wholly upon our selves, and will not go to God for strength or patience to bear them. Who can sufficiently mourn over them, who leave their complaints in this sence upon themselves? It is sinful and foolish to leave our complaints thus upon our selves. 'Tis a duty to leave them upon God, and to powr them into the bosom of Christ, who can, and who only can either ease us of them, or make them easie to us; who can, and who only can take off our burdens, or enable us to carry them. The burden of our ordinary cares will break our backs, if left upon our selves; how then shall we in our own strength stand under the burden of extreamest sorrows?

Secondly, We leave our complaint upon our selves, when we make no excuses or evasions, but plainly charge the fault upon our selves. Thus we ought to leave all our complaints upon our selves. It is sinful and foolish to charge any of them wholly upon the Devil, or at all upon God. An honest heart takes them home, and saith, God is righteous, but I am a transgressor; what he hath done, he may do, and he hath done justly in all that he hath done. This is the sence of Job's resolution, I will leave my complaint upon my self. Hence observe, Whatsoever a godly man suffereth, he will not charge God with it, but himself.

He is more careful of the honour of God, then of his his own peace; and had rather die, then the glory of God should suffer. O Lord (saith Daniel, chap. 9 7.) righteousness belongeth unto thee, but unto us confusion of face: And (vers. 14.) The Lord is righteous in all his works which he doth, for we obeyed not his voyce. When the Angel was smiting Israel with the Plague of Pestilence, David bespeaks the Lord in reference to the people, Lo, I have sinned, and done wickedly; but these sheep what have they done? Let thine hand I pray thee be against me, &c. (2 Sam. 24. 17.) I take the blame to my self, Lord, upon me let thy stroak be, even upon me, not upon Israel: So saith the soul in reference unto God; upon me be the blame of all the troubles and afflictions which I feel, not upon God; What hath God done? All that he hath done is right, and just and good. It is an argument of a holy frame of heart, to be often judging our selves, and alwayes acquitting of God, to be often complaining of our selves, and to be ever exalting God; to be alwayes thanking him for our comforts, and alwayes saying, we may thank our selves for our sorrows. Whatsoever the Lord saith or doth concerning us, we should not only say with Hezekiah (when a sad message was brought him, 2 Kings 20. 19.) Good is the word of the Lord; but also, good are the works of the Lord. Many men are ready to lay their sins (much more their sorrows) upon God. So the Apostle represents them (Rom. 9. 19.) Thou wilt say unto me, why doth he then find fault? Why doth God complain of us? We have more reason to complain of, and charge our faults on God. If he hardeneth whom he will, why are we blamed for being hardened? For who hath resisted his will? Thus they question God, who hath resisted thy will? whose lives are nothing else but a continued war against, and resistance of his will. They who strive most to comply with the will of God, complain often of themselves for resisting it. And though they know God hardeneth whom he will, yet they will not leave the hardening of any upon God, as his fault, but as his prerogative. They confess it to be as great an act of holiness in God, to harden some men in sin, as it is to soften others by his Grace: Mercy appears in the one, Justice appears chiefly in the other, but holiness equally in both.

I will speak in the bitterness of my soul.

A bitter soul bringeth forth bitter words. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. If there be abundance of joy in the heart, the mouth will speak joyfully; and if there be abundance of sorrow in the heart, the mouth speaks sorrowfully. As when there is abundance of filth in the heart, the mouth speaks filthiness. We may see the Lines and Image of a mans mind drawn upon his words. One man speaks in the anger of his soul, and he speaks eagerly; another speaks in the pride of his soul, and he speaks proudly. A third speaks in the prophaneness of his soul, and he speaks prophanely. Again, one speaks in the courage of his soul, and he speaks couragiously. Another speaks in the patience of his soul, and he speaks patiently. A third speaks in the faith of his soul, and he speaks believingly. There is a nearness to this sence, in that of the sixtieth Psalm (ver. 6.) God hath spoken in his holiness: and we are assured he cannot but speak holily, who is all holy. I (saith Job) will speak in the bitterness of my soul, and he spake bitterly; his soul was bitter, and so was his speech too.

Loquar quicquid mihi afflictio suggesserit.

What

What he means by the bitterness of his soul, hath been opened heretofore in the third Chapter, and in the seventh Chapter, v. 11. Thither I refer the Reader.

In brief, I will speak in the bitterness of my soul, is either this, I will let out the sorrow of my heart at my tongue, and it shall appear by what I say, what I feel. Or,

Non tam mea futura sunt verba quam meæ amaritudinis; hæc enim imperat & extorquet orationem.

Further, I will speak in the bitterness of my soul, may be taken as an Apology for what he spake. As if he had said, Do not charge my complaint upon my own account; If I speak bitterly, it is not I that speak, but the bitterness that is in me. As Paul, when he did what he would not, pleads in the seventh of the Romans, It is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. It is not I Paul, an Apostle, nor I regenerate Paul; but the remains of unregenerate Paul, of Paul a Pharisee, which rebell against the Law of God. In the same manner saith Job here, and so say the Saints; Are we at any time impatient, and complain more then becometh us? know it is not we that speak, but the bitterness of our hearts; the thing which we would not, that speak we; and therefore it is not we that speak, but the sorrow that dwelleth in us.

So then, speaking in the bitterness of the soul, notes either the excess or greatness of a complaint, or the cause and spring of a complaint. The complaints of Job came not from the ordinary temper of the spirit, but from the troubles of his estate, distempering his spirit, he desired rather to be praising and glorifying God for his receipts, then complaining over his own wants. But his wants were such, as he could not refrain from complaining; I will speak in the bitterness of my soul.

But what speaks he?

As when he first spake these words (chap. 7. 11.) he presently turned his speech to God, desiring him to deal more sweetly with him; and puts the question, Am I a Sea, or a Whale? &c.

So here, after he hath set forth his resolvedness to complain, he presently turns his speech to God, imploring favour, I will say unto God, do not condemn me (verse 2.) and he puts the question (verse 3.) Is it good unto thee that thou shouldest oppress? As if he had said, Lord, I cannot but complain of my condition, and I must take the boldness to complain to thee; but I will not complain of thee, as if thou wert mine enemy; nor will I contend with thee, as if thou wert a party; my meaning and scope is only this, to supplicate thee as my Judge; I will say unto God, Do not condemn me, &c.

VERS. 2, 3.

I will say unto God, Do not condemn me, shew me wherefore thou contendest with me.

Is it good unto thee that thou shouldest oppress? that thou shouldest despise the work of thine hands, and shine upon the counsel of the wicked?

IN the former verse Job resolved to complain; in this second he begins his complaint; I will say unto God, &c. He complains to God, not against God. He leaves his complaint upon himself, but he rendereth and presenteth it before the Lord; I will say unto God.

What he saith, may be cast into a double request.

First, That God would not condemn him.

Secondly, That he would instruct or convince him; as if he had said, Lord, do not use thy absolute power to destroy me; do not reject me, because thou wilt: Shew me the reason of thy proceedings, that I may either sit down contented with what is amiss in my state, or reform and amend what is amiss in my life.

Do not condemn me.

Μὴ μὲ ἀσυβῆν δεῖξαι. Noli me docere impium esse. Sept. Fortè graviore aliqua tristitia obrutus, impiam aliquam vocem emittam, q. d. Noli occasionem quærere mei lapsus.

The Septuagint hath a very different rendring of this clause, I will say unto God, Do not teach me to be wicked, or to do wickedly; but is it not wickedness as black as hell, to suppose that God teaches any man to be wicked? The Lord hates wickedness, and can he teach it? The Lord punishes wickedness, therefore he cannot teach it.

The mind of the Greek Translators is not that God doth formally teach any to be wicked, but that some learn wickedness, or are ensnared in sin by that which God doth unto them: As if Job had said, Lord, do not encrease and heap affliction upon me: Do not over-grieve and burden the spirit of thy poor creature, lest he should even be forced through impatience, to speak unadvisedly, or to do any thing unbecomingly: Lord, do not occasion me through the extremity of my afflictions, to say or do that which I must repent and be ashamed of. Which is also the sence of that Petition in the Lords Prayer, Lead us not into temptation. Great afflictions lay us open to great temptations. And as great calamity is an occasion for our Graces and Virtues to shew themselves; so also for our Lusts and Corruptions. Some never appear so holy; and others (I mean of those who are really godly) never shew so much unholiness, as in affliction. Hence that request of Agur (Prov. 30. 9.) Lord, feed me with food convenient for me, lest I be poor and steal, and take the name of my God in vain. Such is the meaning of the Septuagint, when they say, Lord, teach me not to be wicked. God teaches man to be holy, both by his word, and by his works; yet some of his works may occasion the flesh to learn wickedness, and to act wickedly.

Verba sunt hominis se excusantis, & quasi præcastigatis liberiorè suam orationem, Æqu.

Secondly, These words may be understood as a Preface, or a Rhetorical introduction to prepare the ears of the Lord to receive the Bill of Complaint, which Job was about to put up unto him: As if he had said, Lord (possibly) through the tediousness of my pain, and the continuance of my sorrows, words may slip from me, of which I shall not be able to give a good account, or others make a fair construction; yet, Lord, do not condemn me: Do not censure me; I speak only to excuse my self, not to accuse thy Majesty, to speak only in my own defence; let not what I speak be an offence to thee. Lord, I have so great a weight of affliction upon me, that I cannot but hope thou wilt give my words some grains of allowance, if they should want their due weight of wisdom and of holiness. As Abraham when he was about to pray for Sodom, makes his apologies and preparatory speeches unto to God; Let not my Lord be angry, and I will speak; and I will speak yet this once (Gen. 18.) So here, I will speak, &c. But I will first say unto God, Do not condemn me. If (my infirmities prevailing over me) I speak amiss, Lord, be not critical with me, examine not every word strictly. Strong passions make an unruly Orator; and when the Speaker bears much, he may expect to be much born with by his Hearers. That's a second, But rather, רשע Verbum condemnandi ferè semper ad culpam pertinet. Noli me peragere reum aut sontem pronunciare. His suppliciis videris me velut impium, sceleratumq; palam declarare. Pin. Ne quæso me ita affligas ut omnes qui hoc vident, & judicent me propter peccata gravissima talia pati.

Thirdly, We may take the words as a plain deprecation, Do not condemn me; the Hebrew is literally thus rendred, Do not wicked me, that is, Do not count me, or cast me for a wicked man. But did the Lord account Job as a wicked man? Or had Job an opinion that the Lord did account him so? Surely Job had good (yet humble) thoughts of himself, though he endur'd so many evils; yea, he was perswaded that the Lord (who laid those evils on him) had good thoughts of him too: and when he saith, Do not condemn me, doubtless he had hopes, possibly he had assurances that the Lord had justified and acquitted him: Why then resolves he, I will say unto God, Do not condemn me?

First, We may expound him thus, Lord, Do not that against me which may give the world occasion to condemn me; or, Lay not thy hand so heavily upon me, lest they that understand not the reason of thy dealings, should be occasioned to adjudge me wicked: though Job had a witness above, and a record on high, though he knew his reputation was unblemished before God in the midst of all these breaches upon his Family, and botches upon his Body, yet he knew men would condemn him as guilty of the most notorious evils of sin, when they saw him languishing under such unparallell'd evils of punishment. This moved him to pray, Lord, Do not condemn me, by making me an Object of the worlds condemnation.

Permitto rerum aliarum jactu-ram, sed non possum non dolere vehementer læsâ meæ sanctitatis & innocentiæ existimationem. Pin.

Again, The words (Do not condemn me) may have this meaning; Lord, Do what thou wilt with me, only do not condemn me. His earnest deprecation of this, may carry in it a willing submission to any thing besides this. And 'tis very usual with men to do so; we think we could bear any affliction but that, or better then that which is upon us. Yet Job had great reason to chuse any affliction rather then this. He might well say, I can (through thy Grace enabling me) bear these or any other pains of my body, and losses in my estate, but I know not how to bear the loss of mine innocency, or the reproach of being thrown out of thy favour. The world and these my friends will be confirmed in their misapprehensions of me, if thou dost not speedily deliver me, and confute their rash judgment by some eminent mercy.

Condemnation hath three things in it which make it grievous.

First, The penalty of the sentence.

Secondly, The disfavour of the Judge.

Thirdly, The stain of his integrity who is condemned.

To have but so much as a suspition or jealousie of the displeasure of God, afflicts the spirit of a godly man, more then all his other afflictions. Though Job had a sure interest in the favour of God, and was freed from the penalty of condemnation, by his union with Christ; yet sometimes clouds and darkness came over him, and terrours of the Lord did fight against him, which caused those sad lamentations in the sixth Chapter: but here he is chiefly troubled at the stain of his integrity in the eye of the world, who beholding his afflictions. blotted him as a wicked man, and esteemed him forsaken of God, even utterly discarded and cast out of his sight. Hence observe,

First, That, Great afflictions carry a charge of wickedness upon the afflicted.

Paul having escaped death in a wreck at Sea, could not escape a hard censure at Land, when a Viper was seen upon his hand: This man (say those Barbarians of Melita, among themselves) is no doubt a murderer, whom though he hath escaped the Sea, yet vengeance suffereth not to live (Acts 28. 4.) We find also that those exemplary judgments which befel the Galileans, whose blood Pilate had mingled with their Sacrifices (it seems he caused them to be slain while they offered Sacrifice) and those upon whom the Tower of Siloe fell, left them all under a charge of highest wickedness; else Christ had not taken it off, saying, Suppose ye that those Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? or those eighteen upon whom the Tower of Siloe fell, think ye that they were sinners above all that dwelt in Jerusalem? As if he had said, I, who know your thoughts, know ye are ready to think so. It is a very ill, but it is a very common thing, to judge both of persons and of causes by success. Doth a man gain and thrive in the world? here's a man sure whom God loves, saith the world. Though a Jeremy can say, Why doth the way of the wicked prosper? He can see them to them to be wicked through all their prosperity; yet, how often are they accounted righteous who prosper? and good, who enjoy good? But doth a man wither and go down the wind in the world? He is a man sure, whom God hates, saith the world. Man is apt to think them the worst, who suffer worst, and that they have sinned most, who have most sorrow. The Prophet (Isa. 53. 4, 5.) foretels that Christ himself, while he bore our griefs, and carried our sorrows, should be esteemed stricken, smitten of God and afflicted. Christ was esteemed a great sinner, when God gave him up to be smitten for sinners; therefore he adds, But he was wounded for our transgressions, &c. Hence observe,

Secondly, The displeasure of God is more grievous to the Saints, then all other pressures and sorrows whatsoever.

Job saith not, Lord, do not afflict me, do not chasten me, lay not thine hand upon me more; but, Lord, do not condemn me: It is infinitely worse to be condemned, then to be chastened, yea, then to be killed. Condemnation carries in it an argument of disfavour, and that makes it so burdensome. As the love of God is better to us, then all the good things of this life (Psal. 4. 6.) Many will say, who will shew us any good? This is the great Query of the world: but what saith David? Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us; thou hast put gladness in my heart, more then in the time that their Corn and their Wine encreased. And as the favour of God is better to us then the good things of this life, so then life, which is better then all earthly goods (Psal. 63. 3.) Thy loving kindness is better then life. Now, I say, as the Love of God is better to us then the best things in the world; so the displeasure of God is worser to us then the worst things that are in the world: all the Torments and Racks, all the Sicknesses and distempers, all the Reproaches and Contempts of men have not so much evil in them to us, as one Frown from God. Hence, as when two sore Diseases (suppose the Gout and the Stone) both very painful, yet one much exceeding, at once afflict the Body, the Patient forgets the less; so it is, when inward and outward sorrows at once seize upon one man, when the Arrows of God are fastened in his spirit, he forgets his Arrow in his flesh. The wounds of the Spirit heal all the wounds of the flesh; they make them as if they were no wounds, or not worth the complaining of.

Thirdly observe, To be accounted wicked, is a sore affliction.

It is an affliction to have an ill name, though we deserve it not, and to be accounted wicked, though we are not; it is, I grant, far better to be censured, then to be flattered. It is very ill when others count us, and worst of all, when we account our selves better then we are; yet it is no small evil to be accounted worse then we are, especially to be accounted evil, when we are good, A wound in our honour is not a wound to be slighted. It was no small part of the sufferings of Christ, that he was numbred with the transgressors in his death, and called Beelzebub, a friend of Publicans and sinners, while he lived.

That, Condemnation is the adjudging of one to be wicked.

Condemnation supposeth a man guilty, and leaveth him under a penalty. As Justification is the adjudging and declaring of a person to be righteous, or the accepting of him for righteous in another, who is not righteous in himself; so Condemnation is the adjudging, pronouncing and declaring of a man to be wicked, who in himself is wicked. That's Job's first Request, I will say unto God, Do not condemn me: As if he had said, Seeing thou art the God and Father of all who call upon thee in Faith, and fear thy Name; therefore in Faith and Filial Reverence I beseech thee to acquit me of my sin; yea, because I know thou hast acquitted me, therefore deal not with me as if I were condemned for sin. Make it appear that thou art my God, either by removing these stroaks (which represent me to the world as thy Enemy, rather then thy Son) or by removing the dread and terror of them, that they may appear as exercises of my Grace, not as revenges upon, or punishments of my sin; that while my Body is pained with thy Rod, my Soul may rejoyce in thy Love; and that while I am under this Cross, I may triumph over it. Or if thou art resolved still to detain me at this rate of suffering, then I have another humble Suit:

Shew me wherefore thou contendest with me.

That's his second Request.

Shew me.] The word signifies to make a matter intelligible or plain to the understanding: If I must feel these pains, then make me to understand them also: Let not the whole weight of my sorrows lie upon my Sense, manifest them to my Reason; the more I know of them, the better I shall manage and endure them. חודיע Fac scire me.

Shew me wherefore thou contendest with me.] The Word which we translate contend, signifies properly contention between party and party, not the Sentence of the Judge. The Parties to a Suit, contend, but do not condemn. The Judge condemns the delinquent party, but he doth not contend. His Office is, to hear the Cause, and upon full evidence on both sides, to pass his Sentence. Job speaks in the stile of both, desiring the Lord not to condem him as a Judge, and to shew him why he contended with him, as a Party. Thus the Lord is said in Hosea, to have a controversie with the Inhabitants of Israel (Hos. 4. 1.) And it seems by another Prophet, that he had continued a long one with them, and therefore promised, I will not contend for ever, Isa. 57. 16. ריב Partium est non judicis, partes litigant, non condemnant, judex condemnat, non litigat. Dru.

Further, Cause me to know, or, shew me wherefore thou contendest with me, is, as if Job had said, Lord, my troubles and and sorrows are very well known, they run into every eye, they are apparent enough to the world; all see that thy hand is lifted up, and I feel it: but the reason of it I do not understand, much less do they; there is a curtain drawn between the world, and the reason why I am troubled; yea, there is a curtain drawn between me, and the reason of my troubles: Now therefore, Lord, draw back the curtain, or unvail my eyes; let me see clearly, and let the world see why I am thus afflicted; for though I know I am a sinner and have many failings, yet I know nothing my self: I am not conscious of any wickedness, or close hypocrisie, much less of any prophaneness or apostacy, which should cause thee to pour out such full viols of thy indignation upon me; Then, Shew me wherefore thou contendest with me.

This [Wherefore] may have a three-fold reference;

First, Shew me, whether it be for sin or no?

Secondly, If it be for sin, Shew me for what sin it is?

Thirdly, If it be not for sin, Shew me for what else it is? What is the thing thou aimest at and intendest? What's the end thou proposest to thy self in these my unheard of afflictions?

But is it lawful to put such queries, or to desire such resolutions from the Lord? Ought not Job to have prayed for wisdom how to bear his cross, rather then have asked knowledge, why it was laid upon him?

Job desired a reason, first, Not to satisfie his curiosity, but his conscience; not that he would be prying into Gods secrets, or unlocking the cabinet of his counsel to see what was there; but that the secrets of his own heart might be opened, and a discovery made to him of what was hid there. He desired a reason, not doubting the justice or goodness of God, but as suspecting some evil in himself, as yet unseen.

Or, secondly, He desired a reason, not so much to satisfie himself, as that the world might be satisfied; that they who judged and condemned him, as an hypocrite, might have their rash judgment confuted and answered by a determination from heaven. As if he had further said, Lord, if thou wouldest but shew me this thing, it would either stop the mouthes of those who have been so forward to censure me; or stop my mouth from any further complainings to thee: I cannot rescue my self out of thy hand, nor dare I accuse thy wisdom, in laying thy hand upon me. But, Lord, deal not with me by the strict rule of thy soveraignty, which is to act above all rules, and to do what thou wilt, because thou wilt, without giving a reason to thy creature. I cannot charge thee with injustice, if thou shouldst resolve to keep me still unresolved. I know thou art not obliged to give me an account of any of thy matters; but Lord, condescend so far to dust and ashes. Shew me wherefore thou contendest with me. If it be for sin, a sight of that (through thy grace) will humble me for it, and cause me to return to thee from it. If it be for trial, I shall undergo it with more patience, and my friends will behold me under it with more charity. Let all or some of these considerations prevail with thy majesty, to open this secret to me, and expound the mystery of my afflictions; Shew me wherefore thou contendest with me. Observe hence,

First, An afflicted soul is very sollicitous about the reason of his affliction.

He that knows what it is to be in the dark, loves not to be in the dark. As natural, so moral light is sweet, and spiritual light is sweetest of all. Man would not be under concealments, or have all about him mysteries and riddles. Evil men love not that light which shews them a rule against their sins, but any man would have light to shew him the reason of his sufferings. To be troubled we know not why, is an aggravation of our troubles. That is more then felt, which is only felt. As to know the cause of a disease, leads and lets us into the way of a perfect cure, so to know it is half a cure. Job, as here he doth, so heretofore he had complained that his way was hidden (Chap. 3. 23.) and here as before, he solicites that his way might be cleared to him.

Secondly observe, A godly man may be long in the dark about the reason of Gods dealings with him.

He labours alwayes to give an account of his own heart and wayes to God, but he is seldom able to give an account of the wayes of God toward him. The way of God both in mercy and in judgment is in the Sea, and his foot-steps are not seen. As there is much of the Word of God, which a sincere heart after many prayers and much study, is not able to give a reason of: so also are there many of his works. The Text of both is dark to us, till God make the Comment, and he sees it best sometimes to make us call and call, wait and wait before he makes it. There was famine in the Land of Israel three years, year after year, and yet David knew not the cause; doubtless he did often examine his own heart, and look into the Kingdom, to see what might be a provocation there, but saw nothing, till (after three years) he enquired of the Lord, who answered, It is for Saul, and for his bloody house, because he slew the Gibeonites (2 Sam. 21. 1.) It is more then probable that David had enquired of the Lord before that time. A holy heart, especially one so holy as David was, can hardly let personal affliction be a day or an hour old, without enquiring of the Lord about it: And shall we think that David let this National affliction grow three years old, before he enquired of the Lord about it? Surely, then this enquiry after the end of three years, was that grand and most solemn enquiry by Urim and Thummim, appointed as the last refort to God in cases of greatest difficulty and concernment; till David used this means, he found no resolution of that case, why the Lord contended with his Kingdom by famine, year after year. Neither had Job got resolution (when he thus complained) why the Lord contended with him, by sore diseases and mighty terrors, day after day.

But because it might yet be wondered at by some, how he durst adventure to put up such a request to God; he argues further, in the next verse, that the state wherein he was, seemed to necessitate him to it, and to prompt or put that request into his mouth; As if he had said, My condition cries aloud to me, that I should cry aloud to God, Shew me wherefore thou contendest with me. For, far be it from me to think that the Lord delighteth in oppression, in breaking the work of his own hands, or in maintaining the works of wicked men: wicked Judges use to do so, whom God will never encourage (as with a light shining from heaven) by his example. Far be it from me to think so dishonourably of God, and therefore I am thus importunate to know the reason of his dealings with me, and what his thoughts are concerning me.

Ne cui mirũ videatur istud à me postulari, res ipsa huc me adegit, absit enim à me, ut tibi placere posse existimem violentam cujuspiam oppressionem. Bez.

Vers. 3. Is it good unto thee that thou shouldest oppress? that thou shouldest despise the work of thine hands, and shine upon the counsel of the wicked.

Nequaquam probat aliorum iniquã vim multò minus ipse alios opprimit. Sanct.

Is it good, &c.] I am sure it is not, it is not pleasing unto thee to oppress, to despise the work of thy hands, thou delightest not to shine upon the counsel of the wicked: Thou canst not endure any of these evils acted by man, much less wilt thou act them thy self: Thou who art just, even justice it self, canst not love oppression; thou who art merciful, even mercy it self, wilt not despise the work of thine hands: thou who art holy, even holiness it self, how shouldest thou delight in wicked men? Thou art of purer eyes then to behold iniquity, and approve of it. What blasphemy then is it to imagine that thou dost practise it. Thy justice, thy mercy, thy holiness, are such as cannot admit the taint of these aspersions.

Omnes vias injustitiæ quibus terreni judices corrumpi & jus pervertere solent à Domino conatur amoliri. Mer.

So then, in vers. 3, 4. Job reckons up those wayes, by which earthly men corrupt or pervert justice; and he removes them all from the Lord. Some men do, but God doth not oppress: Some men do, but God doth not destroy the work of his hands: Some men do, but God never doth shine upon the counsel of the wicked.

Interrogatio sensum reddit omnino contrariam, nequaquam probat, &c. Sanct.

Is it good to thee that thou dost oppress? &c.

Ab absurdis argumentatur, quæ in Deo minimè sunt, tamen cogitari possunt ab infirmitate humana. Jun.

These interrogations (we see) are vehement negations, they flatly and peremptorily deny, what they seem doubtingly to enquire. The sence is, It is not good unto thee; yea, it is evil in thy sight to oppress, &c. Thou hatest oppression, wrong dealing shall not dwell with thee. Job puts these questions, not as if he questioned, whether it were good to the Lord to oppress, or good to destroy the work of his hands, and to shine upon the counsel of the wicked; These were no points of controversie with him, nor did he seek resolution about them. Yea, he therefore begs a reason of the Lord, wherefore he was so oppressed, because he knew it was not good unto Him that he should oppress.

Is it good unto thee?] The Hebrew signifies three things.

First, That which is profitable.

Secondly, That which is pleasant.

Thirdly, That which is just, right, or honourable, any thing tending to reputation. And there may be this threefold sence of it in this place.

Numquid tibi proderit? Vatab.

First, Is it good unto thee? that is, Comes there any advantage unto the Lord by oppressing? Surely none, What profit is there in our blood?

Secondly, Is it good unto thee? that is, Is it pleasing or delightful? Is the Lord taken with the afflicting of his people? I know he doth not willingly afflict the children of men.

Thirdly, Is it good unto thee? that is, Dost thou reckon it thine honour to lay thy hand severely upon thy poor creatures? No, it is thy glory to pass by a transgression. Now seeing it is not good unto thee any of these wayes, seeing thou hast no gain or profit by it, no joy or delight in it, no glory or honour from it. Shew me wherefore thou contendest with me; That's still the burden of this mournful Song, Is it good unto thee?

עשק Significat opprimere aliquem verbis aut factis. Nunquid bonum tibi videtur, si calumnieris me? Vulg.

That thou shouldst oppress?] The word which we translate to Oppress, signifies a double oppression. First, An oppression by our words. And secondly, An oppression by our actions, the oppression of the tongue, and the oppression of the hand. The tongue is a great tyrant, the tongue will lay on load, and draw blood. The Vulgar understands it of this tongue-oppression; Is it good for thee that thou shouldest calumniate or slander me? that is, Give others occasion to speak evil of me. That is a good sence. Slander and censure wound deep, hard words bruise the credit and break the heart, as well as hard blows bruise the flesh, and break the bones. But take it here rather for oppression by outward violence: So the word is often used, (Psal. 119. 122.) I have done judgment and justice, give me not over to mine oppressors, to those who would wrong me, because I have done right. And it noteth, as an open or violent oppression, so a cunning, subtil oppression, a cheating, fraudulent oppression. All wrong, how close and cunning soever, is oppression. We have that sence of the word (Hos. 12. 7.) He is a merchant, the balances of deceit are in his hand, he loveth to oppress. How doth a Merchant oppress? He comes not like a thief or a Nimrod with a sword in his hand, bidding you, Deliver your purse or your life, commanding you to give up your right, or your liberty; but while in buying and selling, in trading and dealing, he offers you a fair bargain, or as we say, a penny-worth for your penny, he smites you secretly, and cuts your throat (as famine doth) without a knife: the balances of deceit are in his hand. Balances are put for all instruments, or means of trading, by these he deceives: light weights oppress the State, as a heavy weight presses the body. The word imports also oppression by with-holding what is due, as well as by taking away what we duly hold (Deut. 24. 14.) Thou shalt not oppress an hired servant that is poor and needy; that is, thou shalt not detain or keep back any part of his wages.

The word (you see) is of a large sence, Is it good unto thee to oppress? I know thou wilt not oppress me, either by speaking evil of, or over-censuring me; either by open violence, or by secret fraud; either by taking from me what I have, or by detaining from me, what I ought to have. Thou wilt not oppress either with tongue or hand; either as a robber with thy sword, or a merchant with thy balances. Thus Job expostulates upon highest confidence, both of the justice and holiness of God; as if he had said, Lord, I know thou doest not love to oppress; no thou art merciful and full of compassion. Whence is it then that thou seemest to act so unlike thy self? Is this thy pity to a poor creature, and thy love to the work of thy hands? Thou usest to rejoyce in the consolation of thy people, and mercy pleaseth thee; Thou usest to send out rivers of goodness for wearied souls to bathe in, and streams of comfort for thirsty souls to drink and be refreshed in. How is it then that a bitter cup is put to my lips continually, and that I am overwhelmed in a salt Sea, in a Sea of gall and bitterness?

Hence observe, God is so good and gracious that he loves not to greive his creature.

Among men (Micah 7. 4.) The best of them is as a brier, the most upright is sharper then a thorn hedge. Even they that seem most gentle and compassionate, will yet sometimes scratch like briars, and tear like thorns: but the Lord changeth not, neither do his compassions fail. The actings of God appear sometimes unsutable to his nature, but they are never so. When he breaks us to pieces, he delights not in our breakings; nor doth he ever break his own, but with an intent to bind them up again. God is so far from loving to oppress, that one of his most eminent works of providence is, to relieve those who are oppressed (Psal. 12. 4.) For the oppression of the poor will I arise, saith the Lord. And when the Lord arises, oppressors shall fall. O Lord (cryes Hezekiah in his sickness) I am oppressed, undertake for me (Isa. 38. 14.) As if he had said, this disease like a mercileſs tyrant oppresses my spirit, death hath even mastred me, and got the victory over my house of clay. Lord, Come to my rescue, thou wast wont to deliver poor men, as a prey out of the hand, yea mouths of their oppressors. O deliver me from this cruel sickness, which is ready to oppress my life, and hale me as a prisoner to the grave. Is it good unto thee that thou shouldest oppress? And,

That thou shouldest despise the work of thine hands?

DAM Significat rejicere cum fastidio, tanquam vile & contemptum quid. Mer. in Pagn. Ex fastidio & contempta sequi solet rei contempta oppressio, aut abjectio. Hunc hominem quem tuis manibus formasti de luto terræ. Dru.

This clause hath the same sence in general with the former, It is not good unto thee, It is neither pleasing nor profitable, nor honourable, That thou shouldest despise the work of thine hands.

Some translate this clause by oppression, Is it good that thou shouldest oppress the work of thine hands? The word in propriety signifies to despise: we have met with it more then once before; it noteth also loathing, yea abhorring. And it may very well bear that other sence of oppressing: for when a man loaths a thing and abhors it, he will quickly slight and oppress it: who cares what becomes of that which he abhors? These two are joyned together (2 King. 17. 20.) The Lord rejected all the seed of Israel, and afflicted them, and delivered them into the hand of spoilers, until he had cast them out of his sight. When once the Lord rejected, or despised the seed of Israel, they were presently afflicted and delivered up to spoiling.

That thou shouldest despise the work of thine hands. He means himself or any other man; all men being the work of Gods hands. The word which we translate work, strictly taken, signifies hard work, extream labour, labour with weariness. Here understand it in a large sence, for God works not to weariness. And when after he had finished the whole work of creation, it is said by Moses (Gen. 2. 2.) That he rested on the seventh day from all the work which he had made. The meaning is only this, he gave over or ceased to work, not that his work put him to any pain or need of rest.

But why is man called, The work of Gods hands? Hath God (who is a Spirit) hands or any bodily part?

By an ordinary figure in Scripture, hands and feet, eyes and ears, are ascribed unto God. He is therefore said to have hands, because he works, not because he works with hands. The hand is the instrument of work. Philosophers call it The Organ of Organs; man is called the work of Gods hand, because the hand is mans instrument in working. Now whereas man is called, The work of Gods hands, it imports three things;

First, An immediety in the work, or an immediate work. God made man himself without any help.

Secondly, An exactness in the work, the work proclaims an accurate author, The work of thy hands, a special piece of work, No hand but thine could make such a piece.

Thirdly, It notes the fulness and compleatness of the work, a work consummate and perfect, having the last hand put to it. Man is the work of Gods hands in all and each of these sences.

Heaven is called a building of God, an house not made with hands (2 Cor. 5. 1.) Man is a building of God, and he is the work of Gods hands, yet God made man without hands,

hands, as much as he made heaven without hands. The hand of God implies two things;

First, The Power
Secondly, The Wiſdom } of God.

Man is the work of both, For the inviſible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly ſeen, being underſtood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and God-head. Now, if the beams and beauty of the divine nature be viſible in all that was created, then much more in man, who is the epitome or ſum of all that was created.

Alio argumento injuſtitiam à Deo auſert, quod artifices ſua opera amare ſoleant. Merc.

When Job puts the queſtion, Is it good unto thee to deſpiſe the work of thy hands? he alludes to Artificers, who having made an excellent piece, will not deſtroy or break it in pieces, no, they are very tender of their work, yea, they are apt to boaſt and grow proud of it. The inſtinct of nature teaches us to love, not only that which is our own by natural production, but that alſo which is our own by artificial conception or operation. Indeed if a man make a mean, or an unworthy piece, he deſpiſes it; ſuch work diſcommends the workman, and he will break or burn it, rather then let it be made publick to the publiſhing of his own weakneſs or unskilfulneſs. Man was the Maſter-piece of the whole viſible Creation. Man was made (not as other creatures) to have a being only, but that he might be in the likeneſs of God, and bear his image. The Lord needs not be aſhamed of, neither doth he deſpiſe any part of his work, much leſs this, which is the beſt and nobleſt part of his work. Hence obſerve in general,

In utero matris mea tam concinnè & aptè formaſti, deſtrues?

Man is the work of God.

All of man, man throughout is the work of God. The fabrick of his body is Gods work. I am fearfully and wonderfully made, ſaith David, marvellous are thy works, and that my ſoul knoweth right well; my ſubſtance was not hid from thee, when I was made in ſecret, &c. In thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were faſhioned, when as yet there was none of them (Pſal. 139. 14, 15.) A skilful Architect, before he builds, draws a model, or gives a draught of the building in his Book, or upon a Table; there he will ſhew you every room and contrivance: in his book are all the parts of the building written, while as yet there are none of them, or before any of them are framed and ſet up. In alluſion to Architects, and other Artiſans, David ſpeaks of God, In thy book were all my members written; that is, Thou haſt made me as exactly, as if thou hadſt drawn my ſeveral members, and my whole proportion with a pen or penſil in a book, before thou wouldeſt adventure to form me up. The Lord uſes no book, no pen to decipher his work. He had the perfect Idea of all things in himſelf from everlaſting; But he may well be ſaid to work as by pattern, whoſe work is the moſt perfect pattern.

As the body, ſo the ſoul of man is the work of Gods hand too. His power and wiſdom wrought it, and work mightily in it. In regard of bodily ſubſtance, the moſt inferior creatures claim kindred of man, and he may be compared to the beaſt that periſheth; but in regard of the ſoul, man tranſcends them all, and may challenge a nearneſs, if not an equality with the Angels. The body is to the ſoul but as a mud wall which impriſons ſome pretious treaſure; at beſt but like a gold ring to a ſparkling Diamond. If the more unworthy part of man, be a work worthy of God, how much more is his more worthy part? There is yet ſomewhat in man of Gods making, which is better then either of theſe parts, and is indeed all man. There is ſomewhat in man more excellent then man. The qualities of man are ſuperior to his nature: man by his nature, differs only from a beaſt, but ſome men by their qualities differ from other men: one man hath better qualities then another, but no man hath a better nature then another. As the ſoul is more excellent then the body, and reaſon then ſenſe, ſo inward gifts are more excellent then the ſoul, and grace then reaſon. Theſe are the beauty, the gildings and engravings of the inner man. The Aſſyrians are called the work of Gods hands, not only in reference to creation, but regeneration in Chriſt (Iſa. 19. 25.) Bleſſed be Ægypt my people, and Aſſyria the work of my hand, and Iſrael mine inheritance. 'Tis a promiſe of the calling of the Gentiles, when they who were not a people ſhould receive Chriſt, and be made the ſpiritual Iſrael, by the mighty work of God. This alſo is the work which David intends, when he invites all lands to ſerve the Lord with gladneſs; becauſe it is he that hath made us, and not we our ſelves (Pſal. 100. 3.) Hence the Apoſtle calls all believers emphatically, The work of God (Epheſ. 2. 10.) We are his workmanſhip created in Chriſt Jeſus unto good works. Man is the workmanſhip of God, as he is fitted for natural and civil works; but he is moſt of all the workmanſhip of God, as he is fitted for ſpiritual and holy works. All is the work of God, but this is curious work, workmanſhip indeed.

From the whole, take three cautions.

First, Be not proud of what ye are, all's the work of God: How beautiful or comely, how wiſe or holy ſoever ye are, 'tis not of your ſelves. What hath any man either in naturals or ſupernaturals, which he hath not received?

Secondly, Deſpiſe not what others are or have, though they are not ſuch exact pieces, though they have not ſuch excellent endowments as your ſelves, yet they are what the hand of God hath wrought them, and they have what the hand of God hath wrought in them. Be more thankful if ye are better framed, and have more workmanſhip beſtowed upon you, ſleight not thoſe upon whom God hath beſtowed leſs.

Thirdly, Deſpiſe not what your ſelves are; to do ſo is a ſin, and a ſin (in reſpect of the body) very common. Many are aſhamed to be ſeen, as God hath made them; few are aſhamed to be ſeen what the Devil hath made them. Many are troubled at ſmall defects in the outward man: Few are troubled at the greateſt deformities of their inner man; they call for no repairs, for no freſh colours to be laid on there; many buy artificial beauty to ſupply the defects of natural, who never had a thought of buying (without money) ſpiritual beauty to ſupply the defects of ſupernatural. The crookedneſs and diſtortions, the blackneſs and uncomelineſs of the ſoul are moſt deplorable, yet are they little deplored; we are called every day to mend and cure them, we are told where and how we may have all ſet right, and made fair again, and yet the moſt ſtir not, or not to purpoſe. God will not know any body at the laſt day, unleſs his ſoul be mended by Grace, and ſome do ſo mend their bodies by Art, that God will not know their ſouls at that day. Depart from me, I know you not (will be all their entertainment) ye have mended your bodies, till ye have mar'd your ſouls. Beſides, What can the man do that cometh after the King? ſaith Solomon (Eccleſ. 2. 12.) The work of the wiſeſt among men, is beyond the correction of an ordinary man. Much more may we ſay, What can the man do that cometh after God? The work of the moſt wiſe God is beyond the correction of the wiſeſt among men. They who thus come after God to mend his work, leſt they ſhould be deſpiſed, will but make themſelves more deſpicable. There is more worth in the very defect of Gods work, then in the perfection of mans. We may uſe means to help many bodily infirmities, but they who are diſcontent with Gods work, are quickly proud of their own, and will one day be aſhamed of their own.

Secondly, Conſider how Job argues, Is it good that thou ſhouldeſt deſpiſe the work of thy hands? Hence obſerve,

It is an argument moving the Lord to much compaſſion to tell him that we are his work, as we are creatures, and his work eſpecially as we are new creatures.

When we are under ſuch afflictions, as threaten to ruine us, 'tis ſeaſonable to tell the Lord he made us. David ſtrengthens prayer upon this argument (Pſal. 138. 8.) Forſake not the work of thine own hands; All men love their own works many dote upon them: Shall we think God will forſake his? See how the people of God plead with God in greateſt diſtreſs (Iſa. 64. 8.) But now O Lord, thou art our Father, we are the clay, and thou our Potter, and we all are the work of thine hand. Be not wroth very ſore, O Lord. Wilt thou be angry with thy work? Lord, be angry with the works of wicked men, and deſtroy the work of Satan; Do not deſtroy the work of thine own hands, thy people are thy work, Haſt thou not formed them for thy ſelf? They will ſhew forth thy praiſe. That invitation to prayer (Isa. 45. 11.) seems to intimate that this plea hath a kind of command upon God, Thus saith the holy One of Israel, and his Maker, Ask of me things to come concerning my sons, and concerning the work of my hands, command ye me: while ye come to me under that notion, that these are the work of my hands, I cannot deny you; Do but name this, and it is a law upon me; ye may have any thing of me, or do any thing with me, while ye speak for the work of mine hands. Hence when the Prophet had put the Jews from that plea, they were a lost people, and their case was desperate; This is a people of no understanding, therefore he that made them will not have mercy on them; and he that formed them will shew them no favour (Isa. 27. 11.) As if he had said, ye were wont (I know) to come to God with this motive of mercy, when he afflicted you; Lord, thou didst make and form us, therefore have mercy upon us; but this shall prevail no more: He that made you will not have mercy on you; He that formed you will shew you no favour. There is but one argument stronger then this among all the Topicks of prayer, and that never fails; namely that God hath redeemed us, or that we are his redeemed ones. God bestowed much cost upon us in the work of Creation, and therefore under that title he can hardly cast us off; but he hath bestowed so much cost upon us in the work of Redemption, that he will never cast us off.

Further, The Scripture makes frequent use of this argument to repress the pride and presumption of man, and to stop his mouth when he begins to question, and call God to account about any of his dealings, with, why is it thus? or, why am I thus? Thus the Prophet silences the murmurings both of mans heart and tongue (Isa. 45. 9, 10.) Wo unto him that striveth with his Maker, shall the clay say to him that fashioned it, Why hast thou made me thus? And when the Apostle found unquiet, and bold spirits busied in contesting with God about his eternal counsels, in chusing some and rejecting others; in shewing mercy to some, and hardening others; he stops them with, Who art thou, O man that replieſt against God? Shall the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? Remember thou art the clay, and he the Potter. That we are the work of Gods hand moveth his compassion towards us, and represseth our presumption against him. We must not proudly dispute it out with him, for we are the work of his hands, and we may humbly plead with him, not to despise the work of his hands, or to Shine upon the counsel of the wicked.

God is light and he hath light, but he hath none for wicked men or for their counsels.

To shine upon the counsel of the wicked.] Notes three things.

Impiorum consilia illustrare, idē est quod juvare, illorū cœptis ac conatibus favere.

First, To favour or delight in them.

Secondly, To succour or assist them.

Thirdly, To make them prosperous and successful.

David praying against his enemies, saith, Let their way be dark and slippery, Psal. 35. 6. And when the Lord answered Job out of the whirlwind, he questions, Who is this that darkneth counsel by words without knowledge? (Job 38. 2.) as to darken wayes, and to darken counsel is to hinder and trouble them: so to shine upon wayes and counsels is to help and favour them. The Sun is the candle of the world, and Sunshine is the comfort of the world. The Psalmist prayes in this language, Thou that dwellest between the Cherubims, shine forth; that is, help and favour us; so it is expounded in the next verse, Before Ephraim, Benjamin and Manasses, stir up thy strength, and come and save us (Psal. 80. 1, 2.) Thou wilt light my candle (was David's confidence) the Lord my God will enlighten my darkness: for by thee I have run thorow a troop, and by my God have I leaped over a wall (Psal. 18. 28, 29.) that is, I have done great things, and I have overcome the greatest difficulties through thine assistance. Will God shine thus upon the counsel of the wicked? Or will he help the evil-doer? Job denieth it, and therefore prayeth, Shew me why thou contendest with me. I know thou beareſt no good will to those who are wilful in doing evil, nor takeſt thou pleasure in iniquity.

But doth not the Lord give good success to those who are evil? Doth the way of the wicked never prosper? Prospereth it not so far sometime, that godly men stumble in their way, and are offended?

I answer, God maketh his Sun to shine upon the evil and the good, but himself never shineth upon the evil. Wicked men receive benefits from God, but they receive no blessings from God.

There is a two-fold light. First, The light of Gods Providence. Secondly, The light of Gods Countenance. The light of Gods Countenance never shines upon the counsel of the wicked, they have only the light of his Providence. He never shines upon them to favour them, though he often shines upon them to prosper them. A man may have much good shewed him, and yet no good will shewed him. The clouds and darkness, which at any time cover the counsels of the righteous, are clearer then all the light which shines upon the counsels of the wicked. God varies his dispensations often, but he never varies his affections; whatsoever he doth against the righteous, he never hates or dislikes them; and whatsoever he doth for the wicked, he never loves or likes them.

But who are the wicked intended in this Text, upon whose counsels God will not shine? There are four apprehensions about it: who are wicked all agree, but who these wicked are, is not agreed. Some refer the word to his friends, I know thou wilt not favour their sinful censures and rash judgments concerning me. Surely they shall receive little thanks and less reward for these discourtesies; thou wilt not go forth with them, or give witness to what they have done; thou wilt not confirm or attest what they have spoken.

Job (I grant) found little comfort from his friends: but I do not find that they gave him evil counsel, much less that they took wicked counsel against him. The Lord reproved them for the error of their speech, but he did not reprove them for the wickedness of their persons. Indeed Job charges them deeply (Chap. 13. 7.) Will you speak wickedly for God? Yet I do not believe that he judged them wicked. A thing in it self wicked may be spoken, and yet the speaker not be wicked. Therefore I would not think Job aims at his friends, or fastens so deep a charge on them, though they had charged him so deep.

Secondly, Others conceive Job means the Devil and his Angels, Wilt thou shine upon Satan's counsel? As when Ahasuerus (being enformed of that conspiracy against the Jews) enquired, who is he? and where is he that durst presume in his heart to do so? Queen Esther said, the adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman (Chap. 7. 5, 6.) So might Job have answered the Lord. My adversary and enemy is this wicked Satan. He laid the plot and hath stirred up all these evils against me: I know Lord, thou wilt not take Satans part: thou wilt not help him who would be the destroyer and murderer, who is the great malignant and projector against thy servant.

Thirdly, Others take the wicked here, for the Sabeans and Caldeans, who were the instruments of Satan, in spoiling and robbing Job of his goods and substance. That they were wicked, we need not question; yet

Fourthly, Take it rather in general, for all or any wicked men, upon whose wayes God seems to shine when he gives success to their works of darkness. Hence observe,

First, Wicked men are sometimes prospered in their counsels, and walk in pleasant (though evil) wayes.

God gives delight to those in whom he hath no delight. And they have many good things from him, who never had one good thought from him. Thousands are prospered and hated at the same time. When Dionysius (in the story) had rob'd an Idol-Temple, and at his return by Sea had a fair gail and pleasant weather to waft him home with the spoils; See (said he) how the heavens smile upon us, and how the gods are pleased with what we have done. The like conclusions many draw from the premises of outward prosperity: surely the true God is pleased with us: but there is a cloud upon this Sunshine, and darkness in all this light.

Secondly observe, The Lord hates the counsel of wicked men.

He is so far from shining upon, that he, indeed, darkens their counsels. He casts darkness upon them, even the darkness darkneſs of his heavieſt diſpleaſure, when themſelves think, and the world ſaith, all is light about them (Zech. 1. 15.) Thus ſaith the Lord, I am very ſore diſpleaſed with the Heathen that are at eaſe; They had their pleaſure, but God took no pleaſure in them; I am very ſore diſpleaſed with theſe Heathens that are at eaſe; that is, I approve not their courſes, yea my wrath is kindled againſt their perſons. The light which ſhines upon wicked men, turns all at laſt into heat; and they have alwayes the heat of Gods anger mixed with their light: a heat not to warm but to conſume and burn them up. As when the Lord ſends the clouds and darkneſs of outward affliction upon his own people, he ſends likewiſe the beams of his everlaſting love into the hearts: So he clouds and darkens wicked men, while his candle ſhineth upon their heads.

VERS. 4, 5, 6, 7.

Haſt thou eyes of fleſh? Or ſeeſt thou as man ſeeth?
Are thy dayes as the dayes of men? Are thy yeares as mans dayes?
That thou enquireſt after mine iniquity, and ſearcheſt after my ſin.
Thou knoweſt that I am not wicked, and there is none that can deliver out of thy hand.

JOB proceedeth upon the ſame Argument; and as in verſ. 3. he had removed three things inconſiſtent with, and diſhonorable to the juſtice of God: So in the two verſes following, he removeth two more. And as he thus acquits the Lord from injuſtice or unrighteous dealing with him: ſo he appeals to the Lord (who was able (he knew) to do it upon certain knowledge) to acquit him from all the unjuſt charges, with which his friends had burdened him, Thou knoweſt that I am not wicked, &c.

Haſt thou eyes of fleſh? Or ſeeſt thou as man ſeeth?

The Queſtion is to be reſolved into this negation, Lord, Thou haſt not eyes of fleſh; Lord, Thou ſeeſt not as man ſeeth; as if Job had thus ſpoken, Lord, I have been long afflicted with grievous pains, I am as a man hanging upon a rack, to draw out and force a confeſſion from him; Lord, why is it thus with me? Why am I brought to ſuch a trial? I am ſure it is not with thee as with mortal Judges, who having eyes of fleſh, can ſee no further then the out-ſide of things, and know no more then is told them; and therefore muſt fetch out what lies in the heart of man by examination, and if examination will not do it, they muſt do it by torture; Lord, there is no need thou ſhouldeſt take this courſe; Thou canſt enform thy ſelf fully how it is with me, though I ſhould not ſpeak a word; though I am ſilent, yet thine ear hears the voice and underſtands the language of my ſpirit. Though I hide or cover my ſelf, yet the eye of thy omniſcience looks quite thorow me; ſeeing then thou haſt not eyes like the eyes of men, wherefore is it that thou enquireſt by theſe afflictions after mine iniquity, and ſearcheſt (as men uſe to do) after my ſin?

Haſt thou eyes of fleſh? Or ſeeſt thou as man ſeeth?

God hath no eyes, much leſs eyes of fleſh; God is a Spirit, and therefore he cannot have eyes of fleſh; He is all eye, and therefore (properly) he hath no eyes. The eye is that ſpecial organ or member of the body into which the power of ſeeing is contracted, but God is all over a power of ſeeing. The body of man hath ſeveral parts, and ſeveral honours and offices are beſtowed upon every part. The eye hath the great office and honour of ſeeing committed to it. The eye is the light of the whole body, and knowledge is the eye of the ſoul. The eye of God is the knowledge of God. The Greeks expreſs God by a word which ſignifies to ſee: and he is therefore ſaid to have eyes, and to ſee, becauſe the eye is a principal inſtrument, and ſeeing a principal means by which man receives knowledge. Naturaliſts tell us, there is nothing in the underſtanding but that which is firſt in the ſenſe. The ſenſes are doors to the mind, the furniture and riches of that are conveyed in by the eyes or ears. Theſe bring informations to the underſtanding. Natural knowledge cannot have an immediate acceſs to man, and 'tis but ſeldom that ſpiritual hath: Both are commonly let in by ſenſe. The ſuperior powers muſt traffick with the inferior, otherwiſe they make no gain. Though God hath no need of any help to bring in or improve his knowledge, yet that is aſcribed to him by which knowledge is improved; He hath eyes, but not of fleſh; he ſeeth, but not as man.

Ipſum nomen Dei Græcum hanc videndi efficacitatem præ ſe fert, θεὸς nimirum à θεᾶν, ſpectare, contemplari dicitur. Nihil eſt in intellectu quod non prius fuit in ſenſu.

Haſt thou eyes of fleſh?] Fleſh by a Synechdoche is put for the whole nature of man. The Word as made fleſh, (Joh. 1. 14.) not body or ſoul, but Fleſh, that is, man conſiſting of ſoul and body. Thus here, eyes of fleſh, that is, mans eyes. And ſo the latter clauſe of the verſe is an expoſition of the former. When he ſaith, Haſt thou eyes of fleſh? It is no more then this, Doeſt thou ſee as man ſeeth? To have an eye of fleſh, is to judge according to the fleſh; and to ſee as man ſeeth, is to ſee no more then man.

Oculi carnei ſunt ſecundùm carnem judicantes.

When Samuel was ſent to anoint a King over Iſrael in the place of Saul (1 Sam. 16. 7.) the Lord ſaid concerning the firſt-born of Jeſſe, Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his ſtature, becauſe I have refuſed him; The reaſon added is this, For the Lord ſeeth not as man ſeeth; for man looks on the outward appearance, but the Lord looks on the heart. There we have Job's doctrine of Gods ſeeing, delivered by God himſelf. Samuel thought he who made the faireſt ſhew to the eye of man, muſt needs be the man who was faireſt in the eye of God; but the Lord ſeeth what is not ſeen, and often finds moſt reality in the leaſt appearance; he who hath not eyes of fleſh, ſees beyond the fleſh.

There are ſeven differences between the eye of fleſh or mans eye, and the eye of God.

First, Mans eye is but a means, or an inſtrument of knowledge: Gods eye is his knowledge. The act and the faculty are not diſtinct in God. All in God is act; neither is God another thing from his act: whatſoever is aſcribed to him, is himſelf. The eye of God is God ſeeing. The knowledge of God is God knowing. The love of God is God loving.

Secondly, Man muſt have a two-fold light to ſee by; an inward light, the light of the eye; and an outward light, the light in the air; without both he cannot ſee. Man doth not ſee (as Naturaliſts ſpeak) by ſending forth a beam or a ray from his eye to the object, but by receiving or taking in a beam or a ray from the object into his eye; The object iſſues it's ſpecies to the eye, which being joyned with the viſive power of the eye, man ſeeth: But God ſeeth in himſelf, of himſelf, and from himſelf, he needs no outward light. Chriſt is deſcribed having a fiery eye; His eyes were as a flame of fire (Revel. 1. 14. & 2. 18.) Even nature teacheth us that thoſe creatures which have fiery eyes, ſee in the dark, and ſee beſt when it is darkeſt; becauſe they ſee by ſending forth a beam or a flame from their eyes, which at once apprehends the object, and enlightens the paſſage to it. God who commanded light to come out of darkneſs for the uſe of man, commands light in darkneſs for his own. The darkneſs hideth not from thee (ſaith David) but the night ſhineth as the day. The darkneſs and the light are both alike to thee. There is no darkneſs nor ſhadow of death, where any of the workers of iniquity can hide themſelves, Job 34. 22. Thus God hath not eyes of fleſh; he ſeeth not as man ſeeth.

Thirdly, Man ſeeth one thing after another: his eye is not able to take in all objects at once; he views now one, and then another, to make his judgment of them. But God ſeeth all things together; he beholdeth all at one view; his eye takes and gathers in all objects, and all that is in every object by one act. The Lord looketh from heaven, and beholdeth all the ſons of men; from the place of his habitation he looks upon all the inhabitants of the earth (Pſal. 33. 13, 14.

Fourthly, An eye of fleſh ſeeth at a diſtance, and at ſuch a diſtance. Naturaliſts tell us, there muſt be a due diſtance between the eye and the object. If you put the object too near the eye, the eye cannot ſee it; That which is ſenſible put upon the ſenſe, takes away ſenſation. Again, if the object be very remote, the eye cannot make any diſcovery of it. The eye cannot ſee far, and it cannot diſcern ſo far as it can ſee. We may ſee a thing, and not know what we ſee. But the eye of the Lord ſeeth and diſcerneth at all diſtances. There are none ſo near him, but he knows what they are; nearneſs doth not hinder his ſight; and there are none ſo far from him, but he can diſcover what they are, remoteneſs doth not hinder his ſight. And indeed, all things are preſent with him, as in time, ſo in place; God is neareſt, even next to every object: He is in every place, yet not included by any; he is in every thing, yet not mixed with any (Prov. 15. 3.) The eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding the evil and the good. His eyes are upon the wayes of man, he ſeeth all his goings (Job 34.21.) and that this ſeeing is a diſtinguiſhing ſight, another Scripture clears to us; His eye-lids try the children of men (Pſal. 11. 5.) Let them be what they will, and where they will, his eye-lids do not only ſee, but try, that is, he hath a diſtinct, and a certain knowledge, or a critical ſight of the ſtate and condition of every man.

Deus non ſolum eſt proximus objecto, ſed eſt intimè cum illo conjunctus.

Fifthly, Man ſeeth but the colour and skin, the face and out-ſide of things or perſons, but God ſeeth the in-ſides, and looks into the very bowels of them. He is a ſearcher and diſcerner of the heart: He ſeeth the ſpirit as ſoon as the face. Our cloaths are not more open to him then our breſts and boſoms. An Heathen wiſhed for a window there, and if we had windows there, we could not ſee what's there. An eye of fleſh cannot read the meaning of our ſpirits; but the Lord can look into the heart without a window, yea, we are all window to him, and he at every turn looks not only upon us, but into us. It was prophecied of Chriſt, (Iſa. 11. 3.) He ſhall not judge after the ſight of his eyes; neither reprove after the hearing of his ears; that is, he ſhall not judge as a mear man, but as God; he ſhall not judge according to fair appearances, or flying reports; He ſhall judge with righteouſneſs, and reprove with equity. Man (whoſe eyes are of fleſh) ſhould not judge according to appearance; yet becauſe his eyes are of fleſh, he cannot judge of that which doth not appear. But God who calleth thoſe things which are not, as if they were, judgeth of thoſe things which appear not, as if they did appear.

Sixthly, An eye of fleſh may be deceived. The ſight of man is ſubject to manifold deceptions. Many things put a ſtop to the ſight of the eye. The eye of man is in danger of as many fallacies, as the underſtanding; and the underſtanding is entangled with many fallacies by the eye. But there is no error in the ſight of God, nor any deception of his eye; you cannot by any art or device, by any policy or hypocriſie, by any masks or diſguiſes, by any ſimulations or diſſimulations make that appear to him, which is not, or make it appear to him otherwiſe then it is. The heart of man (ſaith the Lord) is deceitful above all things, and deſperately wicked, who can know it? (only the Lord who makes, can anſwer this challenge, ſo he doth in the next words) I the Lord ſearch the heart, I try the reins, even to give every man according to his wayes, and according to the fruit of his doings. How can that which is deceitful receive according to its doings, but by knowing all it's doings and all it's deceits? As the tongue (the greateſt troubler of the world) no man can tame: ſo the heart (the greateſt impoſtor in the world) no man can diſcover but God, and he can do it eaſily, and doth it continually.

Seventhly, When it is ſaid, the Lord hath not eyes of fleſh, he ſeeth not as man ſeeth, the meaning is, his knowledge is not imperfect as the knowledge of man is. An eye of fleſh hath been but a while, and can be but a while, and therefore cannot attain much knowledge; We are but of yeſterday, and know nothing (ſaith Bildad, chap. 8.) He that hath but little experience, muſt needs have more then a little ignorance. Experience breeds knowledge, and brings to perfection in knowledge. The eye of God is from everlaſting. If he had not (as he hath) all knowledge in and from himſelf, he might have fetcht it in before this time, from what he hath ſeen. And he (having ſeen all things) muſt needs have perfect knowledge, whoſe knowledge had been perfect, though he had never ſeen any of theſe things.

Beſides, As this phraſe, an eye of fleſh, imports thinneſs of experience, and thence imperfection of knowledge, ſo groſneſs of ſpirit, and dimneſs of underſtanding to attain knowledge. When Peter made that gracious confeſſion (Matth. 16. 16.) Thou art Chriſt the Son of the living God; Chriſt anſwers, Bleſſed art thou Simon Bar-jona, for fleſh and blood (that is, man) hath not revealed this unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven. As if he had ſaid, All men are fleſh and blood, ſo dull-ſighted and blind, that they could never have perceived this truth by any ſtudy or obſervation, it comes only by gift and revelation.

Caro ſignificat aliquid pingue, ob-& tuſum, craſſu, minime ſubtile aut perſpicax.

The eye of God is not an eye of fleſh in this ſence neither. All ſpirits have much clearneſs of underſtanding, much ſharpneſs and quickneſs of apprehenſion. The Devil being a ſpirit, though now a wicked ſpirit, hath one name from knowledge. How much more knowing is he, who is The Spirit, the Creator of the ſpirits of all fleſh, and the Creator of thoſe ſpirits which ſubſiſt without fleſh?

Dæmon.

Further, Sight is put for judgment, and ſeeing for judging. Judging is an act beyond knowing. Judgment is the reſult of knowledge. So, Thou doeſt not ſee, is, Thou doeſt not judge as man judgeth.

Non vides more hominum, & ſicut illi ex facie judicas ut affectibus ducaris ſicut illi?

Firſt, Mans judgment is often hindered by his affections. His judgment is hindered by divers affections, eſpecially by love, and the nearneſs of relations; man can hardly ſee a fault and a friend, a ſin and a ſon together. Love makes knowledge as ignorance, and light as darkneſs. Chriſtian charity covers a multitude of ſins from private revenge, and harſh cenſures; But humane charity covers a multitude of ſins from publick juſtice, and wholſom admonitions. The former keeps from rigid ſeverity, this endangers to cockering flattery. It is not thus with God, He ſeeth not as man ſeeth. They who have the greateſt intereſt, the neareſt relation to God, are ſeen what they are, and ſhall be judged as they are. God hath (indeed) an infinite largeneſs of affection to poor ſinners, and the lap of his garment of love covers every day a multitude, yea, many multitudes of ſins. But he doth not this, becauſe his love to the perſons offending hinders his eye from ſeeing, but becauſe his Son having ſatisfied his juſtice for the perſons offending, he turns away his eye from ſeeing their ſins. God proclaims himſelf at once, The God pardoning iniquity, tranſgreſſion and ſin, and that will by no means acquit the guilty (Exod. 34. 7.) There is nothing but the Name of his Son, and of his Sons ſuffering, which turns his eye from ſin. He will eſpy, and puniſh, or eſpy to puniſh all our faults through all other titles and intereſts whatſoever.

Again, Mans judgment is clouded by wrath and malice. He cannot ſee the innocency of thoſe he hates, or do them juſtice to whom he bears no affection. The want of love hinders an eye of fleſh, as much as the inordinacy or exceſs of it. But though the Lord be angry and diſpleaſed with man, yet he wrongs no man; The wrath of man cannot work the righteouſneſs of God, but the wrath of God works righteouſneſs to man. He never gives more then right to thoſe he loves moſt, nor leſs then right to thoſe he hates moſt. That which we call paſſion in God, is acted with higheſt reaſon, his anger never errs.

Secondly, Man is much ſwayed in judgment by the power, pomp and ſplendor of men. We are apt to think they have moſt worth in them, who are worth moſt. And that they are good, with whom all's well. Even the Saints are toucht with this infirmity: The Apoſtle James (Chap. 2. 2, 3.) beſpeaks them thus, If there come into your Aſſembly a man with a gold ring in goodly apparel, and there come in a poor man in vile raiment, and ye have reſpect to him that that weareth the gay clothing, and ſay unto him, Come and ſit here by me in a good place; and ſay to the poor, Stand thou there, or ſit here under my foot-ſtool; are ye not partial in your ſelves, and Judges of evil thoughts? that is, Are ye not condemned in your ſelves and convinced in your own conſciences, that you do evil; and ſo that your thoughts have been evil, which moved you to do ſo? Can you chuſe but judge this an evil thought, to think him the beſt man that weareth the beſt cloaths, and him a vile perſon that is in vile apparel? Thus men, yea, good men may miſ-judge of men. But the Lord ſeeth not as man ſeeth, It is not good cloaths, but a good heart; it is not a gold ring, but a golden converſation which he accepts; wickedneſs is abominable in his eye, though it ſit upon a Throne; and holineſs ſhines in his eye, though it lie upon a dung-hill. Holineſs is not leſs lovely to him, becauſe cloathed with rags, nor unholineſs leſs loathſom to him, becauſe it goes in a gay coat. 'Tis well conceived, that Job had reference to his own condition when he ſpake thus; he lay in a woful plight, all over ſores, and boils, and filthineſs; yet (ſaith he) Lord, I know thou ſeeſt not as man ſeeſt; Thou doſt doſt not therefore think me the worſe, becauſe I am thus ill. I am even a loathing, not only to others, but to my ſelf, yet I know thou doſt not loath me; Thou haſt not a bad opinion of me, becauſe my condition is thus bad.

Thirdly, Man judgeth the cauſe by the effect, the tree by the fruit, the man by his actions; that's the way of mans judgment, and ſo man ought to judge. We ought to think well of them, who do well; and when the hand is clean, charity bids us ſay the heart is clean too. But the Lord ſeeth not as man ſeeth; he in judging men tranſcends the rule he gives men to judge by. He judgeth the fruit by the tree, the effect by the cauſe, and the action by the man; he had reſpect to Abel, and then to his offering. If the worker pleaſe him not, neither doth his work; as he makes, ſo he ſees the tree good, and then the fruit good. Till the man mends, his manners never mends in Gods eſteem. When a good tree brings forth evil fruit, or an evil tree good fruit, 'tis accidental to them both, not natural. God judgeth us by what we alwayes are, not by what we ſometimes act, either in good or evil.

In this alſo Job comforts himſelf, that whatſoever fruit he might ſeem to bring forth, yet the Lord judg'd him not (as his friends did) by ſome unſavoury ſpeeches that came from him, but by the ſavourineſs of that ſpirit which was in him. He knew God judged him by the ſetled temper of his inward man, and the ſoundneſs of his mind, not by the caſual diſtemper of his outward man, or the ſound of his tongue. Job was a good tree, and the root of the matter was in him. And Job was aſſured God would not condemn him for his fruit, if ſome of it were bitter and unpleaſant, while he ſaw his root was good.

Fourthly, Man muſt take time to hear and diſcuſs every caſe, to find and beat out the truth of every controverſie, but God judgeth all at an inſtant; the matter is no ſooner before him, but he knoweth it fully: indeed the matter was ever before him, and ever fully known, he knew it from eternity: Things are known to him before they are, by whom all things are. The Lord needeth not to put queſtions or to be informed by confeſſions. God is able to prevent our queſtions with reſolutions, and to give us anſwers before we give him our doubts (Joh. 16. 30.) Now are we ſure that thou knoweſt all things, and needeſt not that any man ſhould ask thee. He that is acquainted with our doubts before we propoſe them, can anſwer them as ſoon as we propoſe them. Seeing it is thus (ſaith Job) why am I held ſo long upon the rack to draw out the matter from me? I know thou doſt not judge as man judgeth, by enquiring into, or comparing circumſtances and actions, anſwers and queſtions. Thou art able to make out a judgment of me, and of my condition from thy own knowledge; without the contribution of my anſwers to thy queſtions, or of other mens teſtimonies concerning my actions; Thou ſeeſt not as man ſeeth.

Laſtly, To have eyes of fleſh, and to ſee as man, is to ſee with ſcorn, or with diſdain. The original word which we tranſlate to See, put alone, ſignifies ſometimes to deſpiſe. The Prince of Tyrus is threatned thus (Ezek. 28. 17.) I will lay thee before Kings that they may behold (that is, deſpiſe and deride) thee. And the Spouſe in the Canticles, (Chap. 1. 6.) deprecates, look not upon me, becauſe I am black, becauſe the Sun hath looked upon me; that is, God hath looked upon me with a ſcorching eye of diſpleaſure, and made me black with troubles; do not ye look upon me with a ſcornful eye of diſdain, becauſe of my blackneſs. Thus God ſeeth or looketh not as man ſeeth; he looketh not diſdainfully upon a poor afflicted ſoul, as men do upon their friends in their affliction, or as ye my friends do upon me in mine affliction.

This is the fourth diſhonourable thought, which Job removeth from God. His eyes are not eyes of fleſh, he ſeeth not as man ſeeth, either in reference to the truth or manner, the clearneſs or ſpeedineſs, the certainty or impartiality, the infallibility or charity of his judgment. Upon all which his former requeſt is again to be inferred, Shew me wherefore thou contendeſt with me.

He proceedeth to a fifth, which he alſo by way of interrogation removeth from God, and ſo virtually reneweth the ſame petition.

Verſ. 5. Are thy dayes as the dayes of men? Are thy years as mans dayes?

I know they are not.

Ponitur dies pro judicio ex Ciliçum idiotiſmo. Hier: Putarim Paulum potius diem maluiſſe dicere, quam judicium ut alluderet ad diem illum ſupremum in quo Dominus ipſe judex ſedebit. Bez.

Are thy dayes as mans dayes?] Some Interpreters take the word Day for Judgment. Are thy dayes as mans dayes? that is, Are thy judging dayes, or thy judgment given upon thoſe dayes, like mans dayes, or the judgment which man giveth? We have the word in that ſence (1 Cor. 4. 3.) where the Apoſtle concludes in his own caſe; It is a very ſmall thing of me to be judged of you, or of mans judgment, the Greek is, To be judged of mans day: and according to the idiom of that Language in ſome Countreys, the day of a man is put for the judgment of a man: Though others conceive Paul calls it a day rather then a judgment, in alluſion to that laſt day, wherein God will ſit in judgment upon the whole world. So the meaning of Job is plainly this, The Lords judgment is not like mans judgment. This Expoſition falls in with the ſence of the former verſe; men judge by outward proofs and probabilities, by queſtions and interrogatories, by teſtimonies and witneſſes: God needs none of theſe humane helps in his day of judgment; yet in Job's caſe, he carried it, as if he needed them. The Suit depending ſo long before him, and ſuch variety of experiments and trials, being put upon, or taken of him.

Enos cujus vita duratio breviſſima & penè nulla.

But, we may better interpret Dayes for a part of time; and ſo, Are thy dayes as mans dayes? is, Art thou ſhort liv'd as man is? The word [Man] ſignifies man in his worſt condition, Are thy dayes like the dayes of a weak man? of a miſerable ſickly man? Are they like the dayes of a man, whom we number among the dead, and who is giving up the ghoſt every hour? There are ſome men, whom we call long liv'd, that is, men who in probability may live very long: we ſay of a healthy ſtrong man, we would take a leaſe of his life, or if we were to take a leaſe for lives, we would put his life in for one: he is a man of a good complexion and conſtitution, a man like to live, and ſee many dayes. But, ſaith Job, Are thy dayes as the dayes of Enoſh? As the dayes of a weak ſickly man, as the dayes of one, who looks as if he would drop into the grave every day; as the dayes of a very borderer upon death, of the next neighbour, and heir apparent to the King of terrors? Lord, I am ſure thy dayes are not as the dayes of ſuch a weakling, of ſuch mouldring, ſickly clod of earth. This ſence may have a double reference.

First, To the knowledge of God concerning Job.

Secondly, To the manner of Gods dealing with Job.

Perſtat Job in excludenda ignorantia à Deo judice; Dies hominis ſignificant vitam breviſſimam, quæ cum multa ignorantia conjuncta eſt. Sanct: Ars longa, vita brevis. Hypocr.

First, Thy dayes are not as the dayes of man; thou haſt had, and haſt time enough to gather knowledge and experience, if thou didſt need ſuch help to make thee more knowing. It was the ancient complaint of that great Phyſitian, when he ſaw how much of his Art he had to learn, and how little time he had to learn it in, Art is long, and time is ſhort, what can I learn in ſuch a ſpan-long life as mine? Hence it is conceived, that though the Fathers before the flood (ſome of whoſe lives reached eight or nine Centuries) wanted the help of Libraries and Academies, which we enjoy; yet, that by the experience of ſo many years, they gathered a great ſtock of knowledge, and proved men of eminent Learning. Men whoſe dayes are not as the dayes of ordinary men, attain knowledge beyond ordinary men. How then can the Lord want any perfection of the moſt perfect knowledge, who numbereth not only by hundreds and thouſands of years, but by an eternity of years? His knowledge muſt needs be full, concerning the ſtate both of things and perſons, who not only hath Antiquity of dayes, but is the Ancient of dayes (Dan. 7. 9.) Many men have lived ſo many dayes, that they are juſtly called Ancient, but no man ever lived or ſhall live ſo long, as to deſerve this title, Ancient of dayes. God is called the Ancient of dayes, not only, becauſe he hath been many dayes, yea all the dayes that ever have been, but becauſe he is ancienter then dayes; He is the dayes ancient, for he made the day. His dayes cannot be like mans dayes, who made five dayes ancienter then man. God hath more then all dayes, therefore he hath all knowledge; he hath all experience, therefore he hath neither ignorance, nor neſcience. Upon this ground Job argues it out with God, that he muſt needs know all things, who was before all times; and that he was acquainted with him better then all men, who lived at that day, because he lived and was acquainted with what he would be, before man had a day, even from eternity.

These words, Thy dayes are not as mans dayes, may refer to the dealing of God with Job. As if he had said, Lord, why then doest thou make such haste to enquire after me? why doest thou so incessantly follow me with afflictions? why doest thou keep me upon the rack from day to day, night and day, and wilt give me no rest? Lord, thou needest not fear to loose time, for thou hast all time at thy command; thou canst not want opportunity, who hast eternity. The reason why man is called upon so earnestly to redeem the time, is, because he hath so little time given him, and no time at all but what is given him. His dayes are short dayes, and they are but few, and (which should provoke him for to make haste) he knows not how few: unless he lay hold upon the present day, he is not sure of any day. But Lord, thou art Lord of time, and Master not only over thy work, but also over thy dayes; thou canst allow thy self as many dayes as thou pleasest to do thy work in. Why then doest thou deal thus severely with me, as if thou wert afraid thou shouldest overslip thy day, or want a season to deal with me in?

Deo nihil affert novi cras tina dies.

Again, When he saith, Are thy dayes as mans dayes? it may refer to the changes which happen in the dayes of man: the dayes of man are sometimes fair, and sometimes cloudy, sometimes he hath good dayes, and sometimes he hath ill dayes, therefore he must take his time, and lay hold upon his opportunity. He must make his hay while the Sun shines, who cannot command the Sun to shine. But the dayes of the Lord are (like himself) alwayes the same, alwayes alike, There are no changes of time to him, who is himself unchangeable.

Aliam suarum miseriarum causã excludit à Deo, q. d. si non esset firma Dei voluntas, atq; benevolentia erga suos, sed innata illi esset inconstantia, nihil mirum esset si me, quẽ quondã ingentibus beneficiis cumulavit odio prosequatur. Bol.

Lastly, Are thy dayes as the dayes of man? may have reference to man himself; man is as mutable a creature, as his time is: and man is mutable, not only in his condition, but in his affection; now he loveth, anon he hateth; now he rejoyceth, anon he sorroweth; now he esteemeth, anon he rejecteth; now he imbraceth, anon he contemneth. Lord (saith Job) I know thou art not in thy dayes as man is in his: Where thou art once a friend, thou art alwayes a friend; whom thou lovest, thou lovest for ever. Thy affections are as unchangeable as thy nature.

There is a difference in the latter clause of the verse; for whereas he saith, in the first, Are thy dayes as the dayes of man? In the second he saith, Are thy years as mans dayes? The dayes of God in the first part, are the same with the years of God in the second. But man hath not years ascribed to him in the second. The time of man is so short, that it is reckoned by the shortest compleat time, a day. And when David computes the longest date of mans life, he doth not say, The years of man are threescore years and ten; but the dayes of our years are threescore years and ten (Psal. 90. 10.) There is yet another difference in the original about the word Man. In the first clause the Hebrew word for man was Enosh, here it is Geber, which signifies a strong man, a mighty man, a man of the most masculine spirit, and strongest body, of the most vigorous abilities, and greatest probabilities to live long; a man of brass, and heart of oak, rather then of clay, and dust of the earth. Lord, Thy dayes are not only not as the dayes of Enosh, a weak, sickly man; but, Thy years are not as the dayes of Geber, as the dayes of the mightiest and healthiest, of the strongest and stoutest among the sons of men.

Observe hence more distinctly the difference between the dayes of God, and the dayes of man.

First, Gods day is the day of eternity.

Mans dayes are but dayes of time. God is said, To inhabit eternity (Isa. 57. 15.) that is, he is fixed in eternity, he is without beginning, and without end, yea his dayes are without succession of dayes. All the dayes of God are but a day. Not only are a thousand years to him as one day, but eternity is to him as one day. All that God doth, is said to be done to day; Thou art my Son, to day have I begotten thee (Psal. 2. 7.) yet he speaks (say some) of the eternal generation of the Son: or as it referreth to the resurrection of Christ (so the Apostle expounds it, Act. 13. 33.) God calls that time, To day, though it came a long time after: all is present with God; Past and to come in relation to God, is neither past nor to come, all is now or to day. That was not past to God, which never had beginning, the eternal generation of his Son: nor was that to come to God which was alwayes before him: The temporal resurrection of his Son, To day have I begotten thee, is the most proper stile for God.

Tempus est mensura hominũ habens principiũ & finem; aviternitas est Angelorum, principium habens, sed non finem; æternitas est propria Deo, nec principium habens nec finem. Æternitas est quæ nihil habet mutabile, ibi nihil est præteritũ quasi jam non sit, nihil futurũ quasi nondũ sit, quia non est ibi nisi est. Aug. in Psal. 101. Erat & erit nostri temporis fluxaque naturæ segmenta sunt. Æternitas est semper & immutabile esse.

Some distinguish thus between these three, Eternity, Eviternity, and Time. Eternity is that which is peculiar unto God, his are the dayes of eternity. Eviternity is proper to Angels and Spirits, which have a beginning, but shall have no end. Time is the portion and lot of man, who hath had a beginning, and shall have an end. Time is the measure of those things, which actually corrupt and change. Eviternity is the measure of things incorruptible and unchangeable, not in themselves, but by the appointment of God. Eternity is peculiar to God, in whom it is absolutely impossible any change should be. Time hath continual successions, Eternity a constant permanency, Eviternity partakes of both. Hence the second difference, Mans dayes are moveable, the dayes of God move not.

Thirdly, Mans dayes being past cannot be recalled; Gods day is ever within his call.

For, that which is past is as much present to him, as that which is present; and that which is to come is as much present to him, as that which is. Mans day was, is, and shall be; Gods day alwayes is; his name is, I am: It was, and it will be, are divisions and fragments, morsels and bits of time; eternity is an It is. This teacheth us,

First, That God hath time enough to do his work in.

His dayes are not as mans dayes. He needs not hasten his work, lest he should lose his opportunity, who is possessed of eternity. And Secondly, This (by the way) shews us, The infinite happiness and unconceivable blessedness of God.

His dayes are not as mans dayes. One of mans dayes carrieth away one comfort, and the next a second. This day brings one comfort, and the next a second; and so he loseth or receiveth his comforts by dayes and by dayes, by the fluxes and refluxes of time. God hath all his happiness in eternity, that is, he hath all at once. Time neither bringeth nor carrieth away from God. He enjoyeth as much at this present, what ever he had, as what he hath at this present; and he enjoyes as much what shall be, as he doth what is present; he enjoyeth all at once, because he seeth all at once. God hath not one thing after another, but all together. Eternity is the longest and the shortest, it is longest in duration, and the shortest in fruition; not that the enjoyment of any thing there is short, but because in the shortest enjoyment there is all: Every moment of eternity being filled with all the blessedness of eternity.

Thirdly, This shews the reason why the Lord taketh such leisure to do his work; he doth not precipitate or thrust on his designs, because he may take what time he will.

God hath all time at his command.

Men bear sway and rule over persons and places: God only ruleth times. Man hath not one day in his power, not only not the day to come, but not the day present. Go to now (saith the Apostle James, Chap. 4. 13, 14.) ye that say to day, or to morrow we will go into such a City, and continue there a year, and buy, and sell, and get gain, whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow. Nor indeed doth any man know whether he shall be on the morrow, or on all the day wherein he is. God can boast of to morrow, that is, of eternity, or of all time to come. Man cannot boast of to morrow, that is, of the next day, no nor of the the next time to come of the same day. Hence it is that man must hasten lest he miss his season. When David had Saul at an advantage (1 Sam. 24. 5.) they about him advise him to make use of it, and not to let it slip, Behold the day of which the Lord said unto thee, &c. Sir having such a day, take hold of it; if you let this go, you may never see such another. Time is no part of the dominion of Kings. So likewise Abishai counsels David upon the same advantage (1 Sam. 26. 8.) God hath delivered thy enemy into thine hand this day (let him go this day, and probably thou shalt shalt never have the like day again) Now therefore let me smite him, I pray thee, with the spear, even to the earth at once, and I will not smite him the second time, I can dispatch him at one time, and possibly thou shalt not have a second time. In a good work, it is good, yea, it is best to do our work at once, and not to expect (what we may, or may never have) a second time, when we have a time: To day if ye will hear his voyce, harden not your hearts. He hath much hardness, but no wisdom in his heart, who hopes to do that good to morrow, which he resolves to neglect until to morrow, A wise man may hope to do that to morrow, which he cannot do to day; but it is highest folly to resolve upon a neglect of any duty this day upon a hope of doing it next day. It is said, Rev. 12. 6. Wo to the Inhabitants of the earth, because the Devil is come down, having great wrath; (why so angry?) because he knoweth that his time is but short. When the Devil knows he hath but a little time, he will do as much work as he can, and do it presently, he sees all will scape out of his hands else. Only the Lord hastens not, neither needeth he to hasten his work at any time upon this ground, because he hath but a short time. He can take what time he will, and make his day as long, and his dayes as many as himself pleaseth, for the acting of his counsels, whether to punish or to shew mercy. And hence it is that he delayeth till wicked prophane spirits wonder, yea, scoff at his delay, and think, surely the Lord will never do any such thing as he hath threatened or promised, because he stayeth so long before he doth it; whereas indeed to him that inhabiteth eternity, deferment is no delay, though to us it seem so, whose times are measured out by inches and hours, by moments and by minutes. Those prophane wretches (Isa. 5. 19.) call the Lord, and provoke him to action; Let him make speed and hasten his work, that we may see it. The Lord appears slow and slack to many men, but the Lord is not slack as some men count slackness (2 Pet. 3. 9.) Men think he is slack when he is only patient, and themselves ignorant, That a thousand years to the Lord are but as one day; God doth not measure time by our Pole, nor cast it up by our Arithmetick. Eternity doth not only like the unjust Steward, bid us write fifty for an hundred, but one for a thousand, and (which bears the disproportion of divers hundreds in every one of that thousand) one day for a thousand years. Time is not only a small thing, but nothing unto God. Mine age (saith David) is nothing unto thee (Psal. 39. 5.) And if all Nations before him are as nothing, if they are counted to him less then nothing (Isa. 40. 17.) Then not only the age of one man, but the ages of all men added together, are before him as nothing, and are counted to him less then nothing. Surely he cannot want time to do all things, before whom all times are nothing. He cannot want time to powr out his judgments, and to empty the Vials of his wrath upon wicked men, nor can he want time to fulfil his promises, and to make good every word of blessing which he hath spoken to, or concerning his own people. Wicked men! Do not ye hope? Godly men! Do not ye fear, God will not do what he hath said, because he hath not already done it? He hath not lost his time or season, because he hath not accepted that which ye thought to be the time or season. Christ warns his Disciples (John 9. 4.) to make haste about their work, for the night (namely of death) cometh, wherein no man can work; while you have the day, do your work, for I know what day yours is, your day will be gone, and the night will come, when you can work no more; but Gods day fears no night, whatever comes, he can do his work. The Preacher gives the same counsel upon the same ground (Eccles. 9.) Whatsoever thine hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might; lay hold upon the forelock of time, why? There is no wisdom or counsel in the grave whither thou goest: When thou diest, there is an end of all thy working-time; do thy work well, for thou canst not recall a day of thy life to mend thy work in, neither canst thou work at all in that night of death. The Lords day knows nothing of a grave, nor is his Sun acquainted with going down; if he seems slack to his work, or slack at his work this day and the next, &c. Yet he hath another day at his call, and after that another and another, all which are to him but one day. Therefore he takes or leaves, defers or hastens, comes or goes at pleasure, Are thy dayes, O Lord, as mans dayes? Are thy years as the dayes of man? I know they are not.

But why doth Job make so many of these negative Queries?

The next words will answer,

Verse 6. That thou enquirest after mine iniquity, and searchest after my sin.

Here's the reason of these former Questions, As if he had said, Lord, surely thou needest not search and examine me in this manner, seeing it is neither thus nor thus with thee; It is not good to thee to oppose or to despise the work of thy hands; thou hast not eyes of flesh or dayes of man.

That thou enquirest after mine iniquity.

The Original signifies an enquiry two wayes. First, By Word. Secondly, By Actions. By somewhat done, or by somewhat spoken. And it signifies both to do and speak with great attention and heat of spirit. The word is also applied to those enquiries which are made by torture, when the party is suspected for concealment of the matter under enquiry. Which way of examination is called by the Latines, a bringing of a man to question. That last Engine which was invented to support the tottering state of Rome, wherein poor souls are put to extream tortures, to force confession or self-accusations (that I say) is called the Inquisition, and the Judges Inquisitors; because inquisition or enquiry (according to the word of the Text) is there made after the iniquities of men, after their supposed heresies and heretical practices against the Romish Church. Job seems to allude to such wayes of examination, why doth the Lord enquire after mine iniquity by sore judgments and terrible afflictions, by strong pains and mighty terrors?

At lowest, the word signifieth a diligent search or scrutinie with utmost industry; industry, even such as they use, who maliciously hunt for the precious life. The Lord saith to Moses, return into Egypt, for all the men that sought thy life are dead (Exod. 4, 19.) It is this word. So (1 Sam. 22. 23.) Abide thou with me (saith David to Abiathar) fear not; for he that seeks my life, seeketh thy life. When revenge makes a search, it is a diligent search; malice hath a piercing eye, and enquires narrowly. That gracious promise is thus expressed (Jer. 50. 20.) In those dayes the iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, and there shall be none; and the sins of Judah, and they shall not be found. Job complains here, Thou enquirest after mine iniquity; there the promise is, In those dayes the iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, or, enquired after, and it shall not be found; that is, suppose the iniquity of Israel should be sought after, suppose there should be an Hue and Cry sent out after the sin of my people; yet, saith the Lord, it shall not be found: why? what hinders the finding of it, or where shall it be hid? The next words resolve the doubt; It shall be hid in the pardoning mercies of God. I the Lord will pardon those whom I reserve; The Lord would give such a full and free pardon of sin, that what search and enquiry soever should be made after it, there should not be so much as any scar or mark, not so much as any print or stain left to be a witness of their sin, or a plea for their condemnation. Answerable to that (Rom. 8. 1.) There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus. Job speaks as if God were so far from hiding his iniquity in a pardon, when it came to be searched for, that himself searched for it, as if he were resolved not to pardon it. Wherefore is it that thou enquirest after mine iniquity, and searchest after my sin?

דרש Est inquirere in peccatorem per testes & judiciariam questionem, Pined. Quærere ne tat scientiã Dei, & de nitat animadversionẽ & vindictam, Daresh & Bakash distinguit

Both parts of the Verse meet in the same sence. The word (Darash) in the latter, being often applied as the former, to a judiciary search. Yet some distinguish them strictly, thus; the former to signifie an enquiry by recalling to memory, or the examining of our selves; Thou enquirest after mine iniquity, that is, thou askest thy self whether thou hast not observed some iniquity in me; thou dost (as it were) rub thy memory, and take an account of what is laid up there concerning me. Memory is the store-house or treasury, the record or register of the soul. Books are a Memory without us, and Memory is a Book within us. Then the other word signifies searching by examination of the suspected party in either of those wayes before explained. The Lord tells the Jews (whose wickedness was grown immodest, and rose a step beyond hypocrisie) that he needed not search after their sins. In thy skirts is found the blood of the souls of poor innocents, I have not found it by secret search, Jer. 2. 34. As noting, that the Lord doth sometimes make a secret search, and that there are some who hide their sins, some who sit close upon, and cover them, as Rachel did the stoln Idols, when Laban came to search Jacob's stuff; that there are some who make excuses and Apologies for them; to these the Lord comes with a secret search for their iniquity. The word in Jeremy signifies digging; I have not found it by digging: Some put their sins under ground; only deep digging can find these out: Job enquires of the Lord why he made such a searching after his iniquities, why he was so curious in looking into every corner, and behind every door, to find out the rubbish of his life, seeing the closest sin is as open to his eye, as the Sun at noon-day; and besides, God knew that Job had no close sin, no darling beloved sin in his bosom, no sweet morsels of any forbidden fruit under his tongue. He tells the Lord as much in plain terms, in the next words; Thou knowest that I am not wicked. As we use to say to a man that makes a busie search after any thing, either in a place or about a person, where there is no probability that it should be found; or when we suppose the person searching cannot have the least ground of perswasion, that the thing is there, or with him; in such a case (I say) a man will answer, why do ye make such a search? ye know what ye look for, is not here; ye know well enough I have it not; ye have some other end in this. Thus Job speaks here: Lord, why dost thou search for mine iniquity? Thou knowest well enough that I am not wicked, There is certainly somewhat else in the wind. Shew me wherefore thou contendest with me.

Sententia plana est, non est necesse ut in peccata mea curiosius inquiras, cum Deus sis cui nota sunt & perspecta omnia, etiam interiora cordis. Bol.

Take a Note or two from these words, That thou enquirest after mine iniquity, &c.

First, God knoweth us before he searcheth us.

Job professes of himself as a Judge (chap. 29. 16.) The Cause which I knew not, I searched out; but God searches out those Causes which he knows. God doth not search us, that he may know us, or to inform himself, but to make us know him and our selves. There are not many who know themselves at all; there are none who know themselves enough. The Lord searches us, that we may search our selves. There are not many who know God at all; there are none who know God enough. God searches us, that we may seek after him. By every affliction the Lord would make us know our selves and Himself better. It is said of Manasseh, when he was in the Briars, That, then Manasseh knew the Lord; and then (doubtless) he began to know himself. The same light that brings us to the knowledge of what God is, brings us also to the knowledge of what our selves are. Secondly observe, Afflictions are Searchers.

Thou searchest for mine iniquity, saith Job. Job supposed that the Lord came to try him, and to find out the bottom of his heart: When God smites our Bodies or our Estates, he searcheth our hearts, and maketh enquiry in our lives. The Prophet threatens the Jews (Zeph. 1. 12.) That God would come and search Jerusalem with Candles; That is, as some interpret, he would cause the Chaldeans to search for their most hidden treasures, and find them out. Others understand it of God himself, searching Jerusalem. But God is not like the Woman in the Parable, who had lost her Groat, he needeth to Candle-light to find out the lost Groat, or to find out the filthiness that is in the most secret corners of the heart. The meaning then is, that God would search Jerusalem, that is, the people of Jerusalem, as exactly, as if they were searched with a Candle: he would bring forth their secret sins, and all their hidden abominations. This search was was made by those terrible and sore Judgments brought upon Jerusalem. God kindled a fire of affliction, and searched them by the light of that fire; Troubles are as so many Candles lighted up to search our selves by, and they will be as so many fires kindled to consume us with, if we search not our selves. At this time God is searching England with Candles. The Prophet describing the great sorrows of the Jews, in their Captivity, directs us what to do (Lam. 3. 40.) Let us search and try our wayes. When God is searching us, it is high time for us to search our selves. It is sad when God is searching for our sins, if we are not searching for them too; and it is more sad, if when God cometh to search for our sins, we be found hiding our sins. These are searching times; God is searching, let us search too; else we may be sure (as Moses (Numb. 32.) tells the people of Israel) our sins will find us out. They who endeavour not to find their sins, shall be found by their sins; Our iniquity will enquire after us, if we enquire not after it. But what if iniquity enquire after us? What? If iniquity enquire after us, it will find us; and if iniquity find us, trouble will find us; yea, if iniquity find us alone without Christ, Hell and Death will find us. If Iniquity find any man, he hath reason enough to say unto it (what Ahab said to Eliah without reason) Hast thou found me, O mine enemy? The best of men have reason to look what is evil in them, when God brings evil upon them, or wraps them up in common evils. They who have no wickedness in them to cast them under condemnation, have yet sin enough in them to make them smart under correction. Though Job could say from the testimony of a pure Conscience, Thou knowest I am not wicked; yet he durst not say, thou knowest I have not sinned. Job acknowledged he was sinful, and God knew he was not wicked. In searching after iniquity, he found not hypocrisie; yea, he knew he was not an hypocrite before he searched him; so it follows,

Quum minutatim agnoscam de peccatis populi, & cum eo inibo rationes mea accuratissimè, ut solent qui adhibitis lucernis perlustrant omnia. Jun.

Verse 7. Thou knowest that I am not wicked, and there is none that can deliver out of thine hand.

This seventh verse containeth one of the chiefest questions of that grand controversie handled in this Book, whether Job were a wicked man or no? Satan represented him for such to God; and therefore called that he might be tried; the Lord tried him upon that challenge, and he was brought to a grievous trial; Job appeals to the Lords own knowledge, and is contented to stand or fall according to his determination, being yet assured that he stood right in the thoughts of God. Thou knowest I am not wicked.

Continet versus septimus id quod præcipuè in hac causæ & disputatione spectandum est, sc. Jobū non esse improbum. Pin.

Thou knowest.] The Hebrew is rendered word for word, thus, It is upon thy knowledge; or, It is upon thy know that I am not wicked: As if he had said, Thou hast not this knowledge from without, thou dost not ground thy judgment concerning the state of any man upon what others say of him, upon reports or hear-sayes; no, thy knowledge is from thy self; thou knowest upon thine own knowledge, thine is an internal, an immediate, and so a perfect, an infallible knowledge, and that tells thee of me, I am not wicked.

לע רערך Apud scire tuum est. Multo plus dicit per hanc phrasin apud scire tuum est, quam si diceret, tu scis In scientia tua est, penes notitiam tuam est, non aliunde sed ex te optimè nosti me non esse improbum. Drus. Hæret in regenitu peccatum, improbi tamen dici nec possunt, nec debent. Merc.

That I am not wicked.] He doth not say, Thou knowest that I am not a sinner; or, Thou knowest that I have not sinned; Job had no such opinion of himself, and he knew God had no such knowledge of him. There is a great difference between being a sinner and a wicked man. The best of Saints while they are here upon the earth, are sinners, but the worst of Saints, even here upon earth, are not wicked; they have a new nature, they are new creatures, regenerate and born again by the Word and Spirit, therefore they are not wicked; though much sin be in them, yet no wickedness is in them; and they are denominated from their better part; not wicked from their remaining corruption, but holy from their received renovation. Thou knowest that I am not wicked.

כי לא ארשע Quod non impiè egerim. Mon.

Again, The word in the Original being in the Verb, we may translate (as many do) Thou knowest that I have not done wickedly. But the sence is the same; for every man is in doing as he is in being: He that is not wicked in his state, cannot act wickedly. So we must understand that of the Apostle (1 John 3. 8.) He that committeth sin, is of the Devil.

Thirdly, To be wicked, is ordinarily opposed to our being just; and so, Thou knowest that I am not wicked, is, Thou knowest that I am not condemned or cast at thy Bar for a wicked man. I am not condemned, but justified in thy sight. In which sence the word is used in that Prophetick curse against Judas, who betrayed Christ (Psal. 109. 7.) When he shall be judged, let him be condemned; so we render it: The Hebrew is elegantly translated thus, When he shall be judged, let him go out wicked; that is, let him go out from before the Bar and Tribunal of his Judges, a condemned man; or, Let him proceed wicked, let that be his title and his honour; nour; wicked and juſt are Judiciary or Court-terms, equivalent with juſtified and condemned.

Eveat improbus.

Improbus & juſtus verba ſunt forenſia. Druſ.

Some join theſe words with the Verſe going before; Doſt thou ſearch into mine iniquity that thou maiſt know whether I am wicked? As if he had ſaid, Lord, thou needeſt not make enquiry about this thing; for as I am not wicked, ſo thou art not ignorant: thou haſt not afflicted me, becauſe I am wicked; nor haſt thou ſearched me, becauſe thou art ignorant; Thou knoweſt that I am not wicked. Hence obſerve,

First, That, The Lord knows the ſtate of every man, and of every thing exactly.

The foundation of God ſtands ſure, having this ſeal, The Lord knoweth them that are his (2 Tim. 2. 19.) And he knoweth them that are not his; not his by the grace of election and regeneration: for all are his by the right of creation and dominion. Thus he knows all the fowls of the Mountains, and the beaſts of the field are his (Pſal. 50. 11.) David gives this glory to God in his own caſe (Pſal. 139. 11.) O Lord, thou haſt ſearched me and known me: God did not ſearch to know him, but he ſearched him and knew him. The knowledge of God was not a conſequent, but a concomitant of that ſearch; or it is ſpoken in oppoſition to man; a man may ſearch his neighbour, and yet not know him. There are depths and turnings in the heart of man, which no man can reach or find out; but God hath a thread which will lead him into all, and through all the Labyrinths, a Line which will ſound all the depths of man. Hence David makes a particular of the knowledge of God; God knew him in all that he was, and in all that he did. Thou knoweſt my down-lying and my upriſing, and thou art acquainted with all my wayes. God is the Judge of all men, therefore he knows all men, Heb. 4. 13. There is no creature which is not manifeſt in his ſight, all things are naked and open before him with whom we have to do. The Apoſtle by two Metaphors in theſe words, teaches us, that as the out-members and lineaments of the Body, together with their beauty or deformity, are clearly ſeen when the Body is naked and uncloathed; that as the bowels and entrals of the body, together with their ſoundneſs or diſeaſes are perfectly diſcovered, when the body is diſſected or cut up by the hand of a skilful Anatomiſt; even ſo are we in all we do, and in all we are perfectly known; or as the ſame Apoſtle ſpeaks (2 Cor. 5. 11.) manifeſt unto God, even manifeſt with as much clearneſs to the knowledge of God, as the light is to the eye of man. He knows 1. Our perſons. 2. Our actions. 3. He knoweth the manner of our actions. 4. He knoweth with what hearts we act. 5. He knoweth not only the means we uſe, but the ends we propoſe in every action. 6. He knoweth what we have been, as well as what we are. And, 7. He knoweth what we will be, as well as what we are or have been; he knoweth what we have done, as well as what we do; and he knoweth what we will do, as well as what we do or have already done. He ſeeth all creatures in the Glaſs of his own counſels through and through. His eye hath thorow-lights in all parts of the world, and in the hearts of all men in the world.

And ſeeing man cannot be hid from God, it is the vaineſt attempt for any man to think of hiding himſelf from God; yet that's not only the attempt, but the hope of many, who while they do what they would not have ſeen, pleaſe themſelves with this conceit, that they are not ſeen in doing it, or that they can ſecure what they have done from being ſeen. We learned this of our firſt Parents, in whom the firſt thing that appeared next their ſhame, after they had ſinned, was the hiding of their ſin. Man loveth to draw a curtain between God and himſelf, to raiſe up artificial darkneſs, and to walk in thick clouds (as he vainly hopes) undiſcovered.

Again, Doth God know us? Then let us labour to know our ſelves. God knows who are wicked, many are wicked, and know it not. It is a woful miſtake, when we think our ſelves to be in a good eſtate, and God knows us to be in a bad eſtate: It is a wrong to God and our ſelves, when God knows us to be in a good eſtate, and we think our ſelves to be in a bad eſtate; but it is far worſe, when we think our eſtate good, and God knows it to be bad. We ſhould be acquainted with our condition, leſt we (like Laodicea) flatter our ſelves into an opinion that we are rich and cloathed, and have need of nothing, when God knows we are poor and naked, and wanting all things.

Secondly, Obſerve from the elegancy of the Hebrew expreſſion, It is upon thy knowledge that I am not wicked.

God knoweth all things in and of himſelf

This gives glory to God, and liſteth him up above the Creature in the fulneſs of his knowledge. Men who have the greateſt knowledge, and vaſteſt comprehenſions of things, yet have not that knowledge in and from themſelves, they fetch it in by borrowed helps, and glad they can have it ſo too. It coſts man a great deal of travel and ſtudy to make himſelf maſter of a little knowledge (Job 12. 12.) With the ancient is wiſdom, and in length of dayes is underſtanding. Some indeed get wiſdom and underſtanding, and are owners of a vaſt ſtock and treaſure of knowledge; but when? but how? When they are old, when they have had long experience, and have ſtudied hard for it: With the ancient is wiſdom, and in length of dayes is underſtanding: Thus men get knowledge. But mark what is ſaid of God in the next words (verſ. 13.) But with him (meaning God) is wiſdom and ſtrength; he hath counſel and underſtanding. With him it is, and he hath it: The Lord doth not grow more knowing by years, nor doth his underſtanding mend by the multitude of dayes; though he be the Ancient of dayes, yet it is not his antiquity which hath got him this knowledge; his knowledge is in him, and with him, and from himſelf: he fetches not his knowledge from ſence, nor doth he take it up by information; he learns it not by demonſtration raiſed from the things themſelves, nor by the collation of one thing with another. He doth not know this to be ſo, becauſe that is ſo, but all things are ſo, becauſe he knows them. He knows all; 1. Fully, not to halves. 2. Certainly, not probably. 3. Actually, not poſſibly. 4. At once, not ſucceſſively; as not one thing by another, ſo not one thing after another. Such are the eminencies and tranſcendencies of the knowledge of God.

The Scripture ſpeaks ſometimes as if God derived his knowledge from report, or as if he did not know whether a people were wicked or no, till he had enquired. When the new world was building their Babel, the Lord ſaid, Let us go down to ſee the City (Gen. 11. 5.) And when Sodom was burning in luſt, the Lord reſolved, I will go down and ſee whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto me; and if not, I will know (Gen. 18. 21.)

In both thoſe places of Scripture God comes down to our capacity, but he comes not down to any place in the world. He needs not come any whither who is every where. God ſpeaks after the manner of men; but he acts not after the manner of men. God gives us an example what we ſhould do, he doth not work after our example. Leſt we ſhould judge before we ſee, God ſaith I will go down and ſee, before I judge; leſt we ſhould cenſure one another upon fames and common cries without further enquiry, whether it be ſo or no, therefore the Lord ſaith, I will go down and ſee whether they have done altogether according to the cry that is come unto me. God knew Sodom was wicked, before he came down, but he came down to make it known that he knew it.

As thoſe Scriptures ſeem to import that God knew not how wicked the Builders of Babel were, or the dwellers in Sodom, till he took pains to enquire; ſo another Scripture imports, that he did not know Abraham was a godly man, till he made an experiment of it, by putting him upon that hard piece of obedience, the offering up of his Son; Now I know thou feareſt me (Gen. 22. 12.) As if the Lord had collected his knowledge of what Abraham was, from what Abraham did. But that teſtimony of God, Now I know, is but now I have made it known; or, now I know that in the fruit, which I knew before in the root; now I ſee my fear in thy works, as before I ſaw it in thy faith. That place (Deut. 8. 2.) bears a like ſence; where Moſes beſpeaks Iſrael thus; Thou ſhalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee theſe forty years in the wilderneſs to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldeſt keep his Commandments or no.

The Lord needed not forty years, no, nor one minutes experience to make up his thoughts concerning that people; he knew what they were at first sight, and what they would prove (even a stubborn, an unbelieving, and a back-sliding people) before they were. God proved them, not to know what was in their hearts, but that we might know it; that, what he knew by his internal, immediate inspection, others also might know by external observation. It would not have been believed that they were so bad, if God had not drawn it out by that forty years variety of his dispensations towards them. Or Moses describes God after the manner of men, who prove things, that they may know them, whereas indeed God knows, and then proves them.

Thirdly, Considering how Job comes in with this assurance [Thou knowest that I am not wicked] to relieve himself in his distress, we may observe,

That, It is matter of highest consolation to the Saints, to know and remember that God knows them.

That God knows their hearts and lives, is the joy of their hearts and lives. How rejoycingly doth David speak (Psal. 139. 1,2.) O Lord, thou hast searched me and known me, thou knowest my down-sitting and mine up-rising, &c. He seems to be as glad that God knew him, as that God would save him. My witness is in heaven, and my record is on high, was Job's retort again, when his friends scorned him (chap. 16. 19.) There are no mistakes in God; he will give right evidence, as a witness; and a righteous sentence, as Judge.

Again, That God knows, assures us,

First, That what we have done, shall not be forgotten; God is not unrighteous to forget our work and labour of love, &c. Heb. 6. 10. It assures us,

Secondly, That we shall not be miss-interpreted for what we have done. The reason why many men have so ill an opinion of others, is, because they have so little knowledge of them. Ignorance makes as corrupt glosses, as unsound decisions upon persons and actions, as it doth up Texts or Questions. Some pervert knowingly and against light, but most pervert ignorantly and for want of light. God knows us perfectly, and he never acts against his knowledge. It assures us,

Thirdly, That we shall be well accepted and rewarded. Though men make ill requital, and pay in bad, yea, in base coyn; yet every man shall receive of God according to what he is, and what his works are (Gen. 4. 7.) If thou dost well, shalt thou not be accepted?

Lastly, It is a comfort to us, while we are uncertain about our own estates, to know that God knoweth us. God hath a better opinion of some men then they have of themselves. Some do not think, but judge and conclude themselves wicked, when God knoweth that they are not wicked. The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth who are his.

Fourthly, Thou knowest that I am not wicked. Hence observe,

To do wickedly, or to be wicked, is inconsistent with Grace.

If Job had been a wicked man, he had been a lost man. Sin is not inconsistent with Grace, but wickedness is.

But you will say, What is wickedness? And when is a man so sinful that he is to be numbred among the wicked? To clear that, because Job ventures all upon it.

I answer; First, In every wicked man sin reigneth, that is, sin hath not only a being in him, but dominion over him; he yieldeth ready and free obedience to it, as to his natural Lord: not a forced and involuntary obedience only, as to a Tyrant. Our committing of sin gives not the rule to sin; but our submitting to it. As a man may do many good things, and yet Grace not reign and rule in his heart; so it is possible for a man to do many evil things, and yet not have sin rule in his heart. A man may lay by the actings of a sin, and yet that be a reigning sin; and a man may fall into the act of sin, and yet that no reigning sin. The reign of sin or of grace are chiefly seen in that professed subjection or resignation of our selves to the dictates and commands of grace. No man can be at once Gods son, and sins servant; no, nor at once a servant to both.

A wicked man is a customary sinner, he driveth a trade in sin. A godly man (possibly) may commit the same sin again, yet the custom is broken, because he putteth in a plea against sin, and often moveth God for power, not only against, but over it; if he attain not this blessed victory, yet he ceaseth not to complain, and pray, O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from this body of death? When shall I be delivered from this burden and bondage of corruption? When shall it once be? O that it might once be! Wicked men are so far from pleading against, that they usually plead for their sins; and labour more to make excuses and apologies for them, then to get power and victory over them. They instead of making preparation to resist the lusts of the flesh, make provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof.

Thirdly, A wicked man preserves in himself a purpose to sin, while he seems to pray and protest against his sin. He is (as Augustine confessed of himself before his conversion) afraid God should grant his prayer, while he prayeth that his corruptions may be mortified. He may put up prayers against sin, but he puts up no desires against it. As custom is the rode of our lives, so purposes are the rode of our hearts. What a mans purposes are, such the movings of his heart are (Isa. 56. 12.) To morrow shall be as to day, and much more abundant, say they in their beastly abuse of the creatures; we have been drunk to day, and hope to be more to morrow. (Ezek. 11. 21.) Their heart doth go after the heart of their abominable things, that is, the inclinations and resolutions of their hearts go or walk after their abominations. A godly man sinneth, but he doth not purpose to sin; his purposes are not to sin, holiness is his way; and as sin is it self a by-way, so it is besides his way. The honest Traveller intends to keep straight on to his journeyes end; if he miss his way at any time, he misses his purpose. The Robber skulks about in by-wayes, and comes not into the Rode, but to find and seize upon his prey. Peter denied Christ, but did Peter purpose to deny Christ? No, Peter purposed not to deny Christ; yea, Peter promised not to deny Christ. Peter resolved that he would die rather then deny Christ, and yet he denied Christ; Peter did not go out and make a bargain with the Scribes and Pharisees, as Judas did, to betray his Master. Peter was betrayed when he denied his Master. Peter was suddenly attached with a violent temptation, and arrested with base fear. He did not deny Christ because he resolved to do it, but because he resolved so much not to do it, without due dependance upon Christ for power not to do it. A godly man may have some deliberations about sin, yet no resolutions. He may deliberate upon the acting of some sin, when the occasion is given, but he doth not deliberate upon the finding of occasions to provoke him to the acting of sin. David did not go up to his house-top to invite an incentive of Lust, though he there met with one.

Fourthly, Wickedness carrieth clearness, yea, fulness of consent in sin. A wicked man may have many checks at sin from his Conscience, but he hath none from his Will. And a wicked man may have some motions to good from his Conscience, but he hath none from his Will. When a wicked man abstains from doing evil he wills it; and when he doth good, he wills it not. In Nature, the act and the consent go both to evil; I do evil, and I will do it, is the stubborn voyce of corrupt Nature. In Grace, though the act goes sometimes to evil, yet the consent doth not. The evil which I would not, that I do, is the mournful voyce of Grace. In Glory, both act and consent go to good, and neither of them to any evil. The good which I will, I do; the evil which I would not, I do not; shall be for ever the triumphant voyce of Glory. When the Apostle Paul (Rom. 7.) bewailed his own bondage under corruption, he yet professed that whatever evil he did, he consented not to doit. And though there may be some kind of consent in the sinning of a godly man, yet it is not such a consent as is in a wicked man: For as a wicked man, though he may sometimes shew his willingness, and give his consent to do good, to hear the Word, to pray, &c. Yet it is not a clear, a full and free consent; the will never comes up heartily in it: so there may be some kind of consent, a negative consent in a godly man doing evil, he may not (as to that act) resist or deny; as when a Question is put to the vote, a man who doth not affirm, may be said to give some consent, when he suspends his voyce, and doth not openly oppose.

Thus

Thus a godly man when a temptation cometh, never gives a direct yea of conſent, yet ſometimes not giving his no, there is a kind of conſent, a middle act, not a clear or determinate act of conſent. Now a wicked man, as he is taken captive by the Devil at his will (2 Tim. 2. 26.) that is, at Satans will, the Devil takes him captive when he pleaſeth: ſo alſo at his own will; He is pleaſed to be taken captive by the Devil.

Veram gratis malus & inultiæ meæ cauſa nulla erat niſi malitia. Auguſt. l. 3. confeſſ. c. 4.

Fifthly, Where there is a wickedneſs in ſinning, there is delight in ſin. Pure delight in ſin is impureſt wickedneſs. To diſobey for nought is the moſt wicked diſobedience, as to ſerve God for nought is the moſt holy ſervice. What is it which ſheweth the eminency of grace? Is it not the joy which the ſoul finds in the wayes of grace? When we can delight in the Law of God, as his Law, abſtracted from ends and fruits. When it is meat and drink to us to do the will of God, though we ſuffer hunger, and are ready to ſtarve in doing it, here is godlineſs at the higheſt: and when any delight in ſin as ſin, as contrary to the will of God, abſtracted from ends and fruits, here is wickedneſs at the higheſt. To act in ſuch a degree of ſin, is inconſiſtent with any degree of grace.

Job appeals to the teſtimony of God, that he had not ſinned in any of theſe degrees, while he ſaith, Thou knoweſt that I am not wicked.

Fifthly obſerve, A godly man may know that he is ſo, and be confident of it.

He that ſaith, God knoweth he is not wicked, knoweth it himſelf. For though the Lord hath a knowledge of us beyond ours, though he knows us, better then we know our ſelves, yet no man can tell the Lord, Thou knoweſt that I am not wicked, but he who knows that he is not. The excellency of our condition conſiſts in being godly, the comfort of it conſiſts in knowing that we are godly. When David offers himſelf to the tryal (Pſal. 139. 24.) Search me, O Lord, and ſee if there be any way of wickedneſs in me; He ſpeaks not as doubting whether he were wicked or no, but as being aſſured that he was not. As if he had ſaid, There are many weakneſſes in me I know, but I know not of any wickedneſs. He that offers himſelf to Gods ſearch for his wickedneſs, gives a ſtrong argument of his own uprightneſs. The beſt of the Saints may be at a loſs ſometimes for their aſſurances, and not know they are good. They may ſtand ſometimes hovering between heaven and earth, yea, between heaven and hell, as uncertain to which they ſhall be accounted. Yet many of the Saints are fully perſwaded they are Saints, and ſit with Chriſt in heavenly places, while they are wandering here upon the earth. A godly man may know this two wayes;

Firſt, By the workings of Grace in his heart.

Secondly, By the teſtimony of the Spirit with his heart.

Firſt, By the workings of grace in his heart (1 Joh. 2. 3.) Hereby we know that we know him, if we keep his Commandments: and (Chap. 3. 14.) We know that we are paſſed from death to life, becauſe we love the brethren. There may be ſuch workings of grace in the heart, as may amount to an evidence of grace. What our being is, is diſcernable in our workings. The word is as clear as light, that our juſtification may have a light or evidence in our ſanctification, though no cauſe or foundation there. Grace is the image of Chriſt ſtamped upon the ſoul, and they who reflecting upon their ſouls, ſee the image of Chriſt there, may be ſure that Chriſt is theirs. Chriſt hath given all himſelf to thoſe to whom he hath given this part of himſelf.

Secondly, This may be known by the teſtimony of the Spirit with the heart (2 Cor. 5. 5.) He that hath wrought us for the ſelf ſame thing is God. God ſets up a frame of holineſs in every believer, He hath wrought us; and how are we aſſured that he hath? Who alſo hath given us the earneſt of his Spirit. The graces of the Spirit are a real earneſt of the Spirit, yet they are not alwayes an evidential earneſt; therefore an earneſt is often ſuperadded to our graces. There is a three-fold work of the Spirit.

Firſt, To conveigh and plant grace in the ſoul.

Secondly, To act and help us to exerciſe the graces, which are planted there.

Thirdly, To ſhine upon and enlighten thoſe graces, or to give an earneſt of thoſe graces; This laſt work the Spirit fulfils two wayes.

Firſt, By arguments and inferences, which is a mediate work.

Secondly, By preſence and influence, which is an immediate work. This the Apoſtle calls witneſs-bearing, (1 Joh. 5. 8.) There are three that bear witneſs in earth, The Spirit, and the Water, and the Blood. The Spirit brings in the witneſs of the Water and of the Blood, which is his mediate work; but beſides and above theſe he gives a diſtinct witneſs of his own, which is his immediate work, and is in a way of peculiarity and tranſcendency, called the witneſs of the Spirit. Hence that of the Apoſtle Paul, We have not received the ſpirit of the world, but we have received the Spirit which is of Chriſt, that we may know the things that are freely given us of God, 1 Cor. 2. 12. The things freely given may be received by us, and yet the receit of them not known to us, therefore we receive the Spirit, that we may know what is given us, and what we have received. The Spirit doth (as it were) put his hand to our receits, and his ſeal alſo, whence he is ſaid, To ſeal us up to the day of redemption, Epheſ. 4. 30.

Sixthly obſerve, A godly man dares appeal to God himſelf, that he is not wicked.

He dares ſtand before God to juſtifie his ſincerity, though he dares not ſtand to juſtifie himſelf before God: Job had often laid all thoughts of his own righteouſneſs in the duſt, but he alwayes ſtands up for his own uprightneſs. God is my witneſs (ſaith the Apoſtle Paul, Rom. 9. 1.) whom I ſerve in my ſpirit in the Goſpel of his Son; I ſerve God in my ſpirit, and God knows that I do ſo, I dare appeal unto him that it is ſo, God is my witneſs. When Chriſt put that queſtion, & drove it home upon Peter thrice, Simon, loveſt thou me? Lord, (ſaith he) Thou knoweſt all things, Thou knoweſt that I love thee (Joh. 21.) as if he had ſaid, I will not give teſtimony of my ſelf, thou ſhalt not have it upon my word, but upon thine own knowledge. It were eaſie for me to ſay, Maſter I love thee with all my heart, with all my ſoul; but I refer my ſelf to thy own boſom, Thou knoweſt I love thee. So when Hezekiah lay (as he thought) upon his death bed, he turned himſelf to the wall, deſiring God to look upon the integrity of his life, Lord, remember how I have walked before thee in truth (Iſa. 38. 3.) I do not go to the world for their good word of me, I reſt not in what my Subjects or Neighbor Princes ſay of me, Lord, it is enough for me, that what I have been, and what I am, is laid up ſafe in the treaſury of thy thoughts. This brings ſtrong conſolation, when we take not up the teſtimony of men, nor reſt in the good opinion of our brethren, but can have God himſelf to make affidavit, or bear witneſs with us and for us. That ſuch a man will ſay, I am an honeſt man, that ſuch a man will give his word for me, is cold comfort; but when the ſoul can ſay, God will give his word for me, The Lord knows that I am not wicked; here's enough to warm our hearts when the love of the world is waxen ſo cold, and their tongues ſo frozen with uncharitableneſs, that they will not ſpeak a good word of us, how much good ſoever they know by us.

Seventhly, Conſider the condition wherein Job was, when he ſpake this, he was upon the rack, and as it were, under an inquiſition, God laid his hand extream hard upon him, yet at that time, even then he ſaith, Lord, thou knoweſt that I am not wicked. Hence obſerve,

A man of an upright heart, and a good conſcience, will not be brought to think that God hath ill thoughts of him, how much evil ſo ever God brings upon him.

The actings of God toward us are often full of changes and turnings, but the thoughts of God never change. A ſoul may be afflicted till he is weary of himſelf, yet he knows God is not weary of him. Whomſoever he hath once made good, he cannot but for ever eſteem good; and all ſuch a mans afflictions, are either to ſhew how good God hath made him, or to make him better.

Eightly, Job was under as bad thoughts of man, as (almoſt) any man ever was, when he ſpake thus to God, Thou knoweſt that I am not wicked. Hence obſerve,

That all the hard cenſures and miſconſtructions of men, cannot beat an upright heart out of this hold, that God loveth him, and hath a good opinion of him.

Let men think what they will of him, and judge him as ſeverely as they pleaſe; this moves him not at all to think that God judges him ſo too. He can ſee the love of God through all the anger of the creatures. He likes not his condition the better, becauſe ſome men tell him it is good; nor the worſe, becauſe any man tells him it is ill, while he finds himſelf bottomed upon the free grace of God, and cheared with the clearneſs of his own integrity. The gates of Hell ſhall not (much leſs ſhall the uncharitableneſs of men) prevail againſt ſuch a man. Happy is he, who can ſay unto God, Thou knoweſt that I am not wicked, while men are ſaying, thou art wicked. And how miſerable is he, whoſe heart tells him he is wicked, though men ſay, ſurely thou art good. If our heart condemn us, God is greater then our heart, and knoweth all things (1 *Joh.*3.20.) Doth conſcience tell you that you are wicked? God can tell you ſo much more. It is a woful thing for any man to be under the juſt condemnation of his own heart, though it is more woful to be under the flatteries of his own heart. It is bad enough to be daubed by others with untempered morter, it is far worſe to be a ſelf-dauber; No man hath cauſe to rejoyce in what himſelf, or be troubled at what others ſay of him, unleſs God ſay ſo too.

Two things are further obſervable from theſe words;

First, There is no medium between a godly and a wicked man.

Every man is one of theſe two. Some are called civil honeſt men; many conceit that theſe are good men indeed, and not a few, that theſe are in a middle ſtate between good and evil: but the truth is, there is nothing between good and evil, light and darkneſs: there is no medium of participation between theſe extreams. Solomon (Eccleſ. 9. 2.) ſets all men in two orders, All things come alike unto all, there is one event to the righteous and to the wicked, to the good, to the clean, and to the unclean, to him that ſweareth, and to him that feareth an oath. Note by the way, he doth not put the diſtinction betwen him that ſweareth, and him that ſweareth not, but between him that ſweareth, and him that feareth an oath. There are many who are not ſwearers (ſwearing is deboyſery, and ſo inconſiſtent with civility) who yet do not fear an oath. It is better to fear to do evil, then not to do evil. This diviſion runs through the whole world. Good and evil (in a remiſs degree) mingle in the ſame perſon, but no mans perſon is in a middle ſtate between good and evil.

Secondly, God hath a certain knowledge concerning the ſtate of every man.

This is a tranſcendent, beyond any knowledge which man hath of man; God doth not only know what is in us, but what is not in us; not only what we are, but what we are not. Thou knoweſt that I am not wicked. The reaſon why a negative oath is not admitted among men, is, becauſe no man can ſwear ſo in knowledge. None can ſpeak negatively of another, knowingly, but God alone. We may ſay of a man, there is that in him for which it is meet for us to judge him godly. But it is impoſſible from any outward evidence to conclude peremptorily he is not wicked. It is more to ſay of a man, he is not wicked, then to ſay he is godly. It is eaſier to know what is, then what is not. As it is in voting, ſo in knowing: Negative votes are ſtrongeſt. To ſay ſuch a thing ſhall not paſs or be done, imports the greateſt power: ſo negative knowledge is the higheſt; to ſay ſuch a thing is not, or ſuch a man did it not, imports a certain knowledge, a knowledge ſo certain, as is appliable to none, but God himſelf, Thou knoweſt that I am not wicked.

And there is none that can deliver out of thine hand.

What none? Then were our condition ſad indeed? None excludes meer creatures onely; Chriſt can deliver us out of the hand of God; and Job believed Chriſt had delivered him, when he ſaid, There is none that can deliver:

The hand of God is the power of God; and to deliver out of his hand, is to fetch out or free from his power. The word which we tranſlate to deliver, notes delivering either by power or by policy, by ſtrength or by wit. A priſoner is delivered ſometimes by reſcue or open violence, ſometimes by ſtealth or ſecret conveyance; he picks a lock or breaks a door to deliver himſelf out of the hand of man. But neither of theſe wayes can any man deliver himſelf, or get deliverance out of the hand of God. There is no difficulty in the interpretation of theſe words, but there is ſome difference about the intent of them.

First, Some, for none tranſlate nothing, and ſo joyn theſe words with the former, as an argument of the inſufficiency of mans righteouſneſs; Thou knoweſt that I am not wicked, yet there is nothing (in my righteouſneſs) that can deliver me out of thine hand. As Paul ſaid (1 Cor. 4.4.) I know nothing by my ſelf; yet am I not hereby juſtified. So Job ſaith, Lord, Thou knoweſt nothing by me, yet hereby I cannot be delivered.

Ne mea quidē integritas, cujus tu mihi teſtis es, facit ut hac plaga liberer ut qui nihil ſcīto meo corā te promererī poſſim. Jun.

Secondly, Theſe words may be expounded as tending to move compaſſion, and to ſtir up bowels of pity in God toward Job; As if he had ſaid, Lord, why doeſt thou deal thus ſeverely with me, when there is none that can deliver me out of thine hand? who can reſcue me, while thou layeſt thine arreſt upon me? Thou maiſt keep me under reſtraint as long as thou wilt; I cannot be fetcht off, or out, and wilt thou deal thus hardly with me? Wilt thou puniſh me thus? Whom we cannot hold long in our hands, we are apt to deal more roughly with, while they are in our hands, and to take our peniworths out of them, while we have them. And 'tis uſual with great Princes ſpeedily to ſeal the Writ of execution againſt an eminent offender, when they hear or ſuſpect many potent ſuiters will move for his pardon, and ſolicite his deliverance out of the hand of juſtice. Job ſeems to ſpeak in alluſion to ſuch, If there were any who could deliver me out of thine hand, or pull me away from thee by ſtrength, or by entreaty, I ſhould wonder the leſs at thy ſeverity.

Non eſt qui clamat, Deus optime, ne ſtringas gladium, ne ſtrictum extendas in populū tuū.

God doth ſometimes even beſpeak the interceſſion of others, and complains that none come in to deliver a people or a perſon out of his hand. When he was about to deſtroy Sodome he tells it unto Abraham, probably, for that very end, that Abraham might intercede for Sodom, and (at leaſt) get Lot out of his hand. When God was about to execute his judgments upon Jeruſalem, He ſaw and there was no man, and wondred that there was no interceſſor, none to take him off from deſtroying that people (*Iſa.*59.16.) The Prophet complains in words of the ſame importance (*Chap.*64.7.) There is none that calleth upon thy name, that ſtirreth up himſelf to take hold of thee. Friends, ſeeing a father go out haſtily to correct his child, riſe preſently, or ſtir up themſelves to take hold of the father, or to mediate for the child, Pray ſpare him for this time, and hold your hand: but ſaith the Prophet, There is none that will ſtir up himſelf to take hold of God. He is going out in wrath, and no man puts him in mind of mercy, with that cry of another Prophet, O ſpare thy people, and give not thine heritage to reproach! When Abraham was ready to ſlay Iſaac upon the altar, when his hand was ſtretched out to fetch the fatal blow, juſt then, did the Angel take hold of his ſword, and delivered Iſaac out of his hand. God ſaith to Moſes (Exod. 32. 10.) Let me alone; God was about to deſtroy that People, Moſes would not permit him, he ſeeks to deliver Iſrael out of the revenging hand of God, by that holy violence of Prayer and ſupplication.

Laſtly, Others look upon Job, as breathing out a very heroick and magnanimous ſpirit in theſe words. As if he had ſaid, Lord, Thou knoweſt and thou ſhalt know, that I am not wicked, though none deliver or take me out of thine hand, Thou ſhalt find me holding mine integrity, as long as I hold my life, I am reſolved to honour thee, whatſoever thou doeſt with me. And ſo he refutes the charge of Satan: Satan ſaid, Touch his fleſh and his bone, and he will curſe thee to thy face: No, ſaith Job, though he take away my fleſh and my bones, yet I will not curſe him to his face, no, nor ſpeak an ill word of him behind his back. Though I ſhould never be delivered, yet God ſhall never be blaſphemed. Upon the whole, obſerve,

That, there is no means on earth can reſcue us out of the hands of God.

I kill and I make alive, I wound and I heal, neither is there any that can deliver out of my hand, Deut.32.39. Till God diſcharge us there's no eſcaping: none can force us out of his hand, whatsoever is in theirs; power cannot, policy cannot, riches cannot: we cannot bribe our selves out of the sight, or beyond the stroke of divine justice. A golden key will not open Gods prison door. Riches avail not in the day of wrath, and in some dayes of wrath, prayer it self cannot prevail. Then take heed how ye fall into the hands of God. No wise man will run into his displeasure, from whom there is no deliverance, but at his own pleasure. See more of this point, Chap. 9. 12.

VERS. 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13.

Thine hands have made me, and fashioned me together round about; and yet thou doest destroy me.
Remember I beseech thee, that thou hast made me as the clay, and wilt thou bring me into dust again?
Hast thou not poured me out like milk, and crudled me like cheese?
Thou hast cloathed me with skin and flesh, and hast fenced me with bones and sinews.
Thou hast granted me life and favour, and thy visitation hath preserved my spirit.
And these things hast thou hid in thine heart, I know that this is with thee,

AT Vers. 3. of this Chapter, we found Job questioning with the Lord, Is it good for thee that thou shouldest oppress, That thou shouldest despise the work of thine hands? In these words he insisteth upon, and illustrateth that argument, by fitting it to his own condition; as if he had said, Seeing thou wilt not despise the work of thy hands, Why shouldest thou despise me? Am not I the work of thy hands? Thine hands have made me, and fashioned me together round about, and yet thou doest destroy me. The whole context argues out this point: wherein we may observe,

First, His forming or making, set down in general at Vers. 8. Thine hands have made me, and fashoned me together round about.

Secondly, The matter out of which he was formed and made, at Vers. 9. Remember I beseech thee, that thou hast made me as the clay.

Thirdly, His forming is drawn out in particulars, Wherein we have,

First, His Conception at Vers. 10. Hast thou not poured me out as milk, and crudled me as cheese?

Secondly, The Conjunction or setting together of his parts, at Vers. 11. Thou hast clothed me with skin and flesh, and hast fenced me with bones and sinews.

Thirdly, The quickning of his parts thus joyned and set together, at Vers. 12. Thou hast granted me life.

Fourthly, The preservation of his life, in the same Verse, Thou hast given me life, and (not only so, but) favour, and thy visitation doth preserve my spirit.

Lastly, We have Job's strength of assurance, or his assertion concerning all this, at Vers. 13. These things hast thou hid in thine heart, I know that this is with thee; as if he had said, Lord, Thou knowest all is truth which I have spoken.

There are three opinions concerning the connection or tie of these words with those that went before.

First, Some conceive that Job persisteth in the same matter handled, in the words immediately foregoing, exalting the knowledge of God concerning man upon this ground, because God made man. Thou knowest that I am not wicked. How did Job know that? He must needs know what man is, who made man; Thine hands have made me and fashioned me together round about; forasmuch as I am thy work, a piece of thy framing, surely, thou knowest what thou hast framed: thou who hast knowledge enough to make me, hast a perfect knowledge of what thou hast made. We may joyn it also with the latter clause; None can deliver out of thy hand; Why? Thine hands have made me and fashioned me. Is it possible for the work to deliver it self out of the hand of him who wrought it? Is that which is formed too strong for him that formed it, when as the same hand which gave it form, gave it strength? We find this argument as to the former part (Psal. 94. 9.) where from the work of God in our natural constitution, the holy Pen-man proves the fulness of his knowledge concerning us in every condition; Understand ye brutish (he speaks to men, who acted more like beasts then men) He that planted the ear shall he not hear? He that formed the eye shall he not see? As if he had said, He that made the ear, is all hearing; and he who formed the eye, is all eye, all sight. The argument holds strong from Gods power in forming man, to his power of knowing man, and to his power of disposing man. That's the first way of dependance.

Secondly, Job may be conceived, as rendering an account of those things about which he had taken the boldness to interrogate the Lord, at Vers. 3. Here he answers his own question; as if he had said, now I see well enough why thou maist despise and destroy thy work, It is thy work; I will go no further for a reason to vindicate thee in breaking me to pieces then this, That thine hands have set me together: Thou hast made me, and thou mayest unmake me; thou hast raised me up, and thou mayest pull me down. So the copulative (Vau) in the original which we translate by the adversative, yet, is taken for a conjunction causal; and so it is frequently used in Scripture (Gen. 30. 20.) Dust thou art, and to dust thou shalt return; The sence is, Dust thou art, therefore to dust thou shalt return (Exod. 15. 23, 24.) The waters were bitter, and the people murmured; that is, The waters were bitter, therefore the people murmured; thus here, Thine hands have made me and fashioned me, therefore thou doest destroy me. He that builds the house at his own charge, and by his own power, may ruine it at his own pleasure.

Jam teneo hujus rei causam; cum enim manus illius me fecerint, jure suo potest Deus me destruere. Cajet.

Thirdly, The words may carry the sence of a strong motive to prevail with God, to handle Job more gently, or to deal more tenderly with him; Why? The Lord had bestowed much care and cost to make and fashion him: therefore he will surely pity and spare him. There is a natural motion of the heart in every agent, towards the preservation of that which proceedeth from it. Creation is followed with providence. If a speechless and liveless creature could speak and understand, it would argue with it's Maker (in Job's case) as Job doth, Doest thou yet destroy me? David strengthens his heart to ask good at the hands of God, because he had spoken good concerning him (2 Sam. 7. 27. Thou, O Lord of Hosts, God of Israel, hast revealed to thy servant, saying, I will build thee an house, therefore hath thy servant found in his heart to pray this prayer unto thee. Now, if David were not only emboldened to ask, but even assured to receive mercy, because God promised to build him a house, that is, to prosper his estate and family; how much more might Job be encouraged to pray for, and expect mercy from the hand of God, because God had already framed and built that natural house, his body? The Prophet Isaiah being about to plead with God for new mercies, presents him with a catalogue of his old mercies (Chap. 63. 7, 8, 9.) I will mention the loving kindnesses of the Lord, and the praises of the Lord, according to all that the Lord hath done unto us; and the great goodness towards the house of Israel, which he hath bestowed on them according to his mercies, and according to the multitude of his loving kindnesses, &c. Having thus at large told the Lord what he had done, the Prophet (in a holy zeal) contends with him about what he was doing (Vers. 15.) Look down from heaven, and behold from the habitation of thy holiness, and of thy glory; where is thy zeal, and thy strength, the sounding of thy bowels, and of thy mercies towards me, are they restrained? Doubtless thou art our Father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, &c. As if he had said, That great Sea of thy goodness, hath sent out abundant streams of good things heretofore, and are all those streams now dried up, and the springs exhausted? What's become of thy zeal and strength, and compassions? Are they all spent and gone? Thus Job seems to plead here, thine hands have made me, thou hast done thus and thus for me, and wilt thou now destroy me? According to this interpretation the latter clause of the verse is rendered by an interrogation, Thine hands have made me and fashioned me, and doest thou yet destroy me? What, thou my Maker destroy me! Remember, I beseech thee (so in the next verse) that thou hast made me as the clay, and wilt thou bring me into dust again? Thus by a specification of the great outward benefits which he had received from the hand of God, he seems to aggravate his present sorrows, and to sollicite future mercies.

Thine hands.] Hands are often ascribed to God, as was shewed, vers. 3. Many things are made with the hand; the maker of all things is without hands, and yet he is all hand. Hence all things that were made, are said to be made by the hands of God; not only the forming of man, but the forming of the Heavens and the Earth, is the work of his hand, Psal. 102. 25. Psal. 95. 5. Both are put together. (Isa. 48. 13.) Mine hand also hath laid the foundation of the earth, and my right hand hath spanned the heavens. Wheresoever the great works of God are exprest, a hand usually is exprest as the instrument working them, yet his hand wrought the least as well as the greatest, a worm of the earth, as well as man upon the earth, or the Angels in heaven.

The heads of men have run into great variety of opinion about these hands forming man.

Ambros. in Hexā. Hom. 11. Basil, &c.

First, Many of the Ancient understand by the hands of God, The Son of God, the second Person in the Trinity, and the holy Spirit of God, who is the third; Thine hands have made me, that is, the Son and the holy Spirit, who were assistant to, and of council with the Father of the Creation of man, And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our own likeness, Gen. 1. 26.

Others expound hands literally and formally, not as if God had hands (that's below their conceit) but thus, it hath been said of old, that when God at first formed man, the Son took upon him an outward shape, or the shape of a man; and so (say they) Christ (not made man, but) in the form of man, formed man.

Causis secundis veluti quibusdam manibus utitur Deus ad producendas res sublunares, Aquin.

Thirdly, The hands of God are all second causes, which God useth to the production of any effect. All hands work for God, they work for him, while they are set awork against him; and so may be call The hands of God. Mans making since the Creation, is not an immediate work; the Creation of the first man was. Yet it is so much the work of God still, that every man is the work of his hands, as well as the first man. All inferiour causes concurring to the making of man, are the hands by which God maketh man.

Fourthly, The hands of God, are generally taken for the power and wisdom of God. The hand of power acts, what the hand of wisdom doth contrive. As the hand is often put for power, so to put any thing into the hand of another, is to put it into his power. That grant which was made to Satan at the beginning of this book, runs in this strain, Behold, he (meaning Job) is in thine hand (that is, thou mayest do with them what thou wilt) only save his life. (Ch. 2. 6.)

The Schoolmen determine the hands of God to be the understanding and the will of God, which they call, the executive power of God; by these he determines what shall be done, and doth what he pre-determines. The very decree and purpose of God, is called the hand of God (Act. 4. 28.) Of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate with the Gentiles and people of Israel were gathered together for to do whatsoever thy hand, and thy counsel determined before to be done. Gods hand was the soveraign power of God over-ruling those evil instruments to fulfil his holy counsels, while they intended only to fulfil their own wicked counsels.

Tu pro tua potestate tuque jure. Bez.

We may best interpret Job in the fourth sense, thine hands have made me and fashioned me, that is, I am made and fashioned by thy power and wisdom, I am a piece of thy forming. None but the only wise, and all-powerful God could produce such an effect as I am.

Have made me and fashioned me.

Here are two words which some distinguish by referring the one to the body, the other to the soul. We need not be so accurate about these words. But thus much is plainly noted in them, that the Lord was exceeding accurate about this work, the fashioning of man. Both words have their special elegancies.

The first which we translate made, signifies more then to make, it signifies to make exactly and curiously. It is a word proper to Artificers who work, or should work with an equal mixture of diligence and knowledge, of pains and skill: Artificers mingle their heads and their hands in every thing they undertake, and bestow more study then toil upon their works.

This word is also translated to grieve, vex, or put one to trouble. The perverse carriage of the people of Israel toward the Spirit of God, is expressed by it (Isa. 63. 10.) They rebelled and vexed his holy Spirit. And that bread of sorrows, that is, bread gotten by sorrowful or hard labour is delivered in this term (Ps. 127. 2.) See a further explication of the word. Chap. 9. vers. 27.

God is not put to any pain at all in making man, he doth all his works with infinite delight and ease. Nothing is hard to him who can do all things: Omnipotency never meets with any difficulty. But God is exprest in making man by a word, signifying solicitousness and painful care, implying that man is made as those things are, upon which man bestows greatest pains and care. Man doth not look like a peice of work slubbred over slightly, or clapt up in haste, The most wise God, who shewed his manifold wisdom in the work of redemption, shewed much of his wisdom in the work of creation; he made man (as we speak) in Print.

Panis anxietate magnâ & labore partus. Deus non se fatigavit in homine condendo; sed de Deo Scriptura hominis more loquitur, quasi summa cura & anxietate ad eum formandum usus esset Deus, ut nihil ad ejus perfectionē deesset. Mer.

A learned translator renders, thy hands put me to pain, which have made me; as if Job had complained here of the pain which God put him to after he had made him, rather then exalted God for the pains he seemed to have taken, when he made him. But we may better keep to our rendering, Thine hands have made me, and,

Manus tuæ dolore afficiunt me, quæ fecerunt me. Jun.

Fashioned me.] The making of man importeth his being: The fashioning of him, the outward formality of his being. Man receives not only his nature, but his figure from God. The word signifies to trim or polish, to do a thing curiously and compleatly (Gen. 1. 31.) God saw all that he had made, and behold it was very good. He saw all with delight and highest content; for, he had put all into a composure of most exquisite comliness and perfect beauty. A due and proper fashion is the essence of comliness. Thine hands have not only made me, but fashioned me, and that not in part only, but as it followeth,

יחד כנוב Alludere videtur ad figuli rotam Pined.

Together round about.] This is no Pleonasme or superfluity of speech; for though when a thing is made and fashioned, it is supposed to be made round about, yet here to shew the exactness of God in making man, Job speaks as if God had resolved to have all of his own doing, and would not trust the least part of this work into the hand of any other, thine hands have made me and fashioned me together round about. Which words are say some,

Artifices opus pene absolutum curiosè circumspiciunt, ut si quid oculis ingratum deprehendant, corrigant. Sanct.

First, An allusion to the art of a Potter, who formeth and fashioneth earthen Vessels, turning them often about and about upon his wheel. Or it may be an allusion to a Statuary, or to a Painter, who having a curious costly peice in hand, goes about it, and views it round on every side: that if any thing sute not his eye, his fancy, or the rule of art, he may correct it.

Dicit in circuitu, quod corpus videtur animæ esse in circuitu, sicut vestimentum vestito, aut sicut domus habitatori. Aquin.

Secondly, Others conceive that this round about, is only a circumlocution for the body, because the body encompasseth the soul round about, as a garment doth the body, or a house the inhabitant.

Totum dicit ut ad singula corporis membra referatur.

Thirdly, Together round about, is (as was touched before) me in every part, or all me. When some took offence at Christs healing of a sick man upon the Sabbath-day, he answers, Are ye angry at me, because I have made a man every whit whole on the Sabbath-day? (Joh. 7. 23.) or that I have made the whole man whole, not leaving any unsound limb about him? There is a like phrase (Luk. 11. 40.) which may illustrate this; Ye fools, did not he that made that which is without, make that which is within also? That is, did not he that made man, make him together round about? Did not he make whatsoever is man? So Job's together round about, is, as if he had said, Thou hast made me within and without from head to foot; thou hast made me all that I am; how great, how good, how strong, how beautiful soever I am, I am made by thee. Thou (as David speaks (Psal. 139. 5.) hast beset or formed me (so the Hebrew) behind and before, and laid thy hand upon me.

Idem est quod Latinus dicit intus & extra, intus & in cute, à capite ad pedes.

Fourthly, By together round about, we may understand all without man, which man hath about him. Thou hast made and fashioned not only my body, but my estate, my honour, my friends, my children (children round about the Table, Psal. 128. 3.) Thou hast given me all that I have about me; whatsoever I am, I am made and fashioned by thine hands: So the phrase is used, Chap. 19. 9, 10. He hath stript me of my glory, and taken the crown from my head, he hath destroyed me on every side; or, he hath destroyed me round about, that is, all that he hath made round about me, he he hath taken away from me; he hath stript me of all he once cloathed me with. Mr. Broughton translates much to that sence; Thou hast fashioned me and made me in every point, that is, Look whatsoever I am considerable in, under what notion soever I may be taken, Thou hast made me and fashioned me in all. Hence observe,

First, The making of man now, is the work of God, as well as the making of the first man was.

Job doth not say, The Lord did once make and fashion man, but, thine hands have made me: He ascribeth his own making to God, as well as Adam's. The structure and frame of Nature is the work of God, not of Nature. Nature and natural causes are nothing but the order in which God worketh; God turneth or changeth, stops or sets them forward as he pleaseth. Second causes work purely at the will of God, though means be used by man, yet the effect is Gods. Corn groweth in the field by the hand of God. You will say, What then doth the husbandman? What doth the earth? What doth the Sun and Rain? Do not all these work? All these are nothing but the order wherein, and by which the hand of God makes the Corn to grow; for let all those second causes work as hard as they can, yet the Corn grows not unless God speak the word: His steps, not the husbandmans, drop fatness. It is he, not the Sun or the Rain, which makes the vallies stand thick with corn, to laugh and sing. As in spirituals, so in naturals, he that planteth, and he that watereth, is nothing, but God that giveth the encrease. The Psalmist speaks exclusively of man, as to the point of mans making, and he puts an emphasis upon it, as if a man did not take notice enough, if at all, of this, that in this man is nothing; Know ye, that the Lord he is God, it is he that hath made us, and not we our selves. There may be a great deal of Grace acted in acknowledging God to be the author of Nature; yet I conceive the Psalmist speaks there rather of Gods making us in Grace, then in Nature.

Natura nihil aliud est quam divinorum operum ordo. Brent.

Secondly, Observe, Job recounting what God had done for him, brings in, Thy hands have made me and fashioned me; then,

Our making and natural constitution are to be reckoned amongst the great benefits received from God.

Psal. 139. 14. I will praise thee, for I am fearfully and wonderfully made. The making of man is a wonder; though the frequency of it makes the wonder little observed, yet the wonder is not (in it self) the less. David, who had serious and holy thoughts about natural things, confesseth, I am fearfully and wonderfully made. A Heathen had three reasons for which he used especially to thank God. One of them was this, because he had made him a man. If men who have but the light of nature, can see so much of God in nature, how much of God should we see in nature, who have the light of Grace to see it by?

Thirdly, From the words put together, Thine hands have made me, and fashioned me together round about, observe,

The whole fashion and fabrick of man is from God.

From which General take these Consectaries.

See more of this point before at v. 3. of this Chapter.

First, Then do not undervalue the body, it is the work of God; He hath fashioned it round about. We alwayes look upon and value our bodies too much, when we are proud of them; but we can never look upon or value our bodies too much, while we are thankful for them; and that we may be so, we ought to view every room of this house of clay, from story to story, from the Garret to the Cellar, from the Crown of the head to the Sole of the foot, that we seeing the wonderful works of God, may have our hearts enlarged in his praises. Some have put ignoble titles upon the body of man, calling it a prison, or a shackle. The body is not a prison, it is a palace; it is not a shackle, it is an Organ, a fit instrument for the soul to use and act by. If at any time the body be unuseful to the soul, that proceeds from sinful corruption, not from its natural constitution.

To σῶμα τῆς ταπεινώσεως ἡμῶν.

But the Apostle (Phil. 3. 21.) calleth our body a vile body, or the body of our vileness. Mans body is not vile, as God made it (so it is a stately structure) but as sin hath made it. The Apostle calls it vile, not absolutely, and in it self, but relatively. The body cloathed with Mortality, is vile, compared with the body when it shall be cloathed with Glory, and that Glory like the Glory of the body of Christ, as is assured us; Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body. The words carry an allusion to those who changing old and broken vessels, desire to have them wrought in the best and newest fashion. The body of Christ is the richest piece of Gods work, and this shall be the pattern of ours; as here upon earth the spirits of Believers are of the same fashion with Christs (the same mind is in the Saints which was in Christ, there is but one draught of Grace (in the main) upon the souls of all holy men, and that is a copy of Christs, his being the original) so in heaven the bodies of all believers shall be of the same fashion with Christ. There shall be but one draught of Glory in the main (for degrees do not vary the kind) upon the body of Christ, and the bodies of all his members. In reference to this future change of the body, the body in its present state, is vile.

Secondly, Hence it follows, That as we must not undervalue the frame of mans body in general, as imperfect; so we may not despise any for their special bodily imperfections. It is God who hath made and fashioned them round about. It is said (2 Sam. 5. 8.) that the blind and the lame were hated of David's soul. Yet to hate any for defects in the body, is a very great defect in the soul; and to contemn any for natural blemishes, is a spiritual blemish. How then could David hate the blind and the lame, and not sin? or are we to number this among his sins? There are two expositions of those words, upon either of which we may clear the difficulty.

First, That when David sent to summon that Fort, the Jebusites, who were the Defendants, trusting in the strength of the place, told David in scorn, that he must first conquer the blind and the lame; as implying that blind and lame souldiers were Garrison good enough to deal with his great Army upon the advantage of such a Fortress.

Secondly, The blind and the lame may rather be the Idols and strange gods which the Jebusites worshipped, of whose protection they were not the less confident, because the Jews counted them blind and lame. As if they had said, even these gods, which you call blind and lame, see well enough what ye are doing, and will come fast enough, and too fast for your ease, to our aid and succour. These blind and lame gods were justly hated of David's soul, but he had learned better then to hate men who were made lame or blind by God.

Thirdly, Seeing all men are fashioned round about by the hands of God, then as we must not despise any for their bodily imperfection, so not envy any for their bodily perfections. Some are as much troubled to see another have a better body, or a more beautiful face, as many are (alike sinfully both) to see another have a better purse, or a more plentiful estate then themselves.

Fourthly, Let not the thing formed say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? If thy earthly Tabernacle be not so highly, so strongly built, if the Materials of it be not so pure, or not so exactly tempered, if thou hast not not so good a constitution, so elegant a composition, if thou art not so adorned and polished as some others are; yet be not discontented, the hands of God have made and fashioned thee round about. It is a great honour to a Vessel, that he made it, though he have made it (in this sence) a vessel of dishonour.

Fifthly, If God hath fashioned our bodies, then we must not put them out of fashion. It is dangerous to deface the work of God, to undo that which God hath done, to unmake that which God hath made; how sad is it that any should pull down a building of Gods own setting up, without warrant from God? Self-murder, or the murder of another, is an high affront to God, and should have a severe revenge from man. He that sheds his own blood, takes revenge upon himself: And whoso sheddeth mans blood, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God made he man (Gen. 9. 6.) As what God hath joyned by a civil, so by a natural band, let no man put asunder.

Lastly, If thou art made and fashioned by God, then let God have the use of all thou art. Let God dwell in the house which he hath set up. Let thy body be employed for God; he that made it, hath most right to it. Every thing in man shews forth the wisdom and goodness of God towards man, man, let every thing in man shew forth obedience and submission unto God. This was the ground of David's prayer (Psal. 119.73.) Thy hands have made me, and fashioned me, give me understanding, that I may learn thy commandments; as if he had said, Lord, I would use this body, this soul, this all, which thou hast made, for thy glory, therefore give me understanding that I may learn thy will; I would not do the will of another, while I dwell in thy house, and am thy tenant at will. I would not imploy those members which thou hast given me, to fulfil the Law of sin, or the commands of Satan. The Apostle is clear upon this argument in reference to redemption (1 *Cor.*6.19.) Ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price; therefore glorifie God with your bodies, and in your spirits, which are Gods; Now as in the work of redemption we are of God by Grace, so in the work of creation we are of God by Nature. The reason holds in both; glorifie God with your bodies, which are not your own, but Gods. It is usual in letting out of houses to put a clause in the Lease, that the house shall not be imployed to such and such uses, but only to such as are expressed in the Indenture. Surely the Lord who hath built and furnished these houses, hath taught us how to imploy them, and what trade to exercise in them, even the trade of holiness. Take heed you do not let out any room or corner of a room in this house for sin to trade in, or for the work of iniquity. This is to let out a house of Gods making to the Devils using.

Yet thou doest destroy me.

The word signifies to swallow up; and to swallow up with greedines, Psalm 52.4. Thou lovest all devouring (or swallowing) words; words which swallow down thy neighbours credit, and devour his good name, as one morsel. The Holy Ghost expresseth our final victory over death, by a word which reacheth this sence (1 *Cor.*15.54.) Death is swallowed up (or drunk down) in victory; death is drunk up at a draught. Christ called his sufferings (by which he got this victory) a cup. The Apostle uses the same word again (2 Cor. 5.4.) That mortality might be swallowed up of life. When this mortal shall have put on immortality, death shall be swallowed up in victory, that is, there shall be a compleat victory over death, and not only so, but mortality shall be swallowed up of life. In heaven there shall be no death, nor any thing like death, nothing bearing any the least resemblance of it's image, or letter of it's superscription, nothing of mortality shall be found or felt there: There mortality shall be swallowed up of life; here Job complains that his life was almost swallowed up of mortality. Yet thou doest destroy, or swallow me up: As thou hast already swallowed up my estate, so thou seemest resolved to swallow up my very breath. When Joab besieged Abel, a wise woman out of the City cryed unto him, Thou seekest to destroy a City in Israel, why wilt thou swallow up the inheritance of the Lord? 2 Sam. 20. 19. Job saw a great Army of afflictions encamping about him: and he seems to cry out to the Lord of those hoasts, why seekest thou to destroy thy servant? Why wilt thou swallow me, who am the work of thy hands?

Distinctio Hebræorum magis postulat, ut verba præcedentia, simul, circumquaq; cum his jungantur, & absorbisti me. Merc.

Grammarians observe from the exactest reading of the Hebrew, that the former words [Together round about] should be joyn'd with these [Thou doest destroy me] Thine hands have made me, and fashioned me, and yet thou doest destroy me together round about; that is, Thou makest an utter end, a total consumption of me.

Licet sensus non multum diversus sit, interrogatio tamen sensu reddit valde acrem, & incitatum. Merc.

Again, These words are read by some with an interrogation, Thine hands have made me and fashioned me, and doest thou yet destroy me? The question doth not alter, but quicken the sence, and render it more pressing and pathetical; Wilt thou destroy me thus exactly, whom thou hast made so exactly? The (yet) in the Text sounds out an admiration. As when God (Amos 4.) had brought many judgments upon Jerusalem, and found them still impenitent, he concludes the narrative of every one, with, Yet have they not returned unto me; As if he had said, What a wonder is here? So Job repeating the favours of God to him, concludes with a yet thou doest, or doest thou yet destroy me? As if he had said, What a wonder is here? How unsearchable are thy judgments, O God, and thy wayes past finding out? Thus he sets what God then did, in opposition to what he had done, that so the consideration of former mercies might provoke him to remove or mitigate present judgments. Doest thou destroy me who hast made me? Hence observe,

First, That to mind God of making us, is an argument to stay his hand from breaking us. See more of this point, v. 3.

It repented the Lord (saith Moses, Gen. 6. 6.) that he had made man, and it grieved him at the heart. This repentance and grief did not arise from his making of man; but from that necessity which his own justice and honour laid upon him to destroy man whom he had made; as it follows in the next words; And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created. The words shew the resolution of God, not his propension; it went to his heart to do it. If God repented and grieved (understand both by a figure) because he had made man, whom he must destroy, then it cannot but be a grief to him to destroy that which he hath made. It is as easie to the power of God to undo, as it is to do: but it is not so easie to his will to undo, as it is to do.

Secondly observe, Afflictions destructive to the outward man, may be the lot of the best men.

God never destroyes that spiritual creature, which the hand of his grace hath made and fashioned: but he doth sometimes destroy the natural creature of those who are spiritual.

Thirdly observe, A good man will make honourable mention of the goodness of God to him, while he is under greatest evils.

Job writes the natural history of Gods power and wisdom in his constitution, while destruction was knocking at his doors. Though God will destroy what he hath made, yet he ought to be glorified for what he hath made. The praise of God for fashioning us, is never so comely, as when he is putting us out of fashion.

Fourthly observe, God doth that sometimes which is most improbable he should do.

He acts strangely in wayes of mercy, and strangely in wayes of judgment. He saves those whom we expect he should destroy, and he destroyes those whom we expect he should save. The Kings of the earth, and all the inhabitants of the world would not have believed that the adversary and the enemy should have entred into the gates of Jerusalem, (Lam. 4. 12.) and who would have believed that the adversary and the enemy, sorrow and destruction should have entred into the gates of Job? God comes with such afflictions upon his people now, as make him to be admired by all the world. Christ will come with such mercies at the last, as will make him to be glorified in his Saints, and admired in all them that believe (2 Thes. 1. 10.) Christ will exceed, not only our unbelief, but our faith.

In the former verse Job pleaded with God, as his maker; he proceeds still in the same argument, and re-enforceth it from a special intimation of the matter out of which he was made, clay.

Vers. 9. Remember, I beseech thee, that thou hast made me as the clay, and wilt thou bring me into dust again?

זכר Recordatus est, memor fuit, odoratus fuit, quando de sacrificiis usurpatur. Odoretur omnia munera tua. Jun. Zachar, mas aut à memoria quia magis pollet quā mulier aut quia memoriam & nomen familiæ conservat. Buxtorf.

Remember, I beseech thee.] Job speaks heartily, his spirit was in a heat. Remember, I beseech thee. The original word is applied to a sensitive act, as well as to a rational (Psal. 20. 3.) The Lord remember, or smell all thy offerings. Memory is the savour or sent of things preserved in the mind. The Hebrews express man, or a male child, by a word of that root, and they give two reasons of it. Either, first, because man is of a stronger memory then the woman. Or, secondly, because the man-child preserveth the memory of the family, and is a monument of his fathers honour, his name being carried on from generation to generation; in opposition to which, women or females are called Nashim, which word implieth forgetfulness, because their names and titles are swallowed up in their husbands, and forgotten when they are married.

Memory or the act of remembring is improperly applyed to God. For remembrance is of things past, but to God all things are present. Memory is the store-house where-wherein we lay up several notions, and keep records of what hath been done, which by an act of the understanding we review and fetch out again. All things are ever open before God. He needs not turn leaves or search registers, he needs not so much as strain a thought to recal what is past; that which was from the beginning, and shall be to the end, yea, to that which hath no end, eternity, is alwayes before him. God is said to remember, or to forget, when he acts like a man, who remembers or forgets; but there is no act either of forgetfulness, or of remembrance in God.

Remembring implieth two things in God.

First, A serious attention to the person and consideration of the thing which he formerly seemed to slight, or lightly to pass by. We also remember by minding and thinking upon what is present, as well as by recalling what is past.

Secondly, To remember, notes a speedy supply of our wants, or actual deliverance out of dangers. God remembers us, when he favours us; he remembers us, when he pities us; he remembers us, when he relieves us; Who remembred us in our low estate, Psal. 136.23. that is, who brought us out of our low estate. The needy shall not alway be forgotten (Psal. 9. 18.) not alway, no nor at any time; the Lord doth not at all forget any, much less such needy ones, as that Scripture intends. The meaning is, they shall not alway be undelivered, their estate shall not lie for ever unconsidered, and their cry unattended to. God will not deal with them, nor suffer others to deal with them, as if he had forgotten them. Hannah was long under that affliction of barrenness, and when the Lord gave her conception, it is said, He remembred Hannah (1 Sam. 1. 19.) his thoughts were ever upon her, and upon her petition; but when he granted her petition, then he remembred her indeed. As we then remember God when we obey his commands: so God remembers us then, when he fulfils our requests. Remember, I beseech thee.

As it is our duty to remember the Lord: so it is our priviledge that we may put him in remembrance.

It is a priviledge, and a very great one to be a remembrancer to the King of heaven. The Prophet describes such an office (Isa. 62. 6.) Ye that make mention of the Lord, or nearer the Hebrew, Ye that are the Lords remembrancers, keep not silence, and give him no rest. Great Princes have an officer called their Remembrancer, and they need remembrancers. It is at once their honour and their weakness to have them. They cannot retain all businesses, and preserve a record within themselves of all affairs within their Kingdoms: It is an honour to God that he hath Remembrancers, but it is his greater honour that he hath no need of them. Himself is the living record of all that hath been done, or is to be done. Knowledge is above memory, and he that knows all things is above remembrancers. God is willing we should speak to him after the manner of men: but we must not conceive of him after the manner of men. We must not think he hath forgotten us, though we may beseech him to remember us.

There are four things which the Saints usually move the Lord to remember.

First, His own mercies; Remember, O Lord, thy tender mercies, was David's prayer (Psal. 25. 6.) Hath God forgotten to be gracious? was David's question and infirmity (Psal. 77. 9.) Yet God acts sometimes, as if he had forgot his nature, or had need to be minded to do what he is. God can no more forget himself, then deny himself; no more forget to be gracious then cease to be: yet he gives his people leave, yea a charge, to move him to do, what he cannot but do, what he is resolved, yea what he is ready to do. Mercy pleaseth God so much, that he often appears displeased on purpose, that we may remember him of his mercy. He delights we should desire, what he delights to grant.

Secondly, The Saints usually mind God of his Covenant. God is ever mindful of his Covenant (Psal. 111. 5.) yet he loves to be minded of it. His Royal title is, The God that keepeth Covenant for ever; yet he loves to be desired not to break it. Thus Jeremy begs for the Jews, the Covenant-people of God; Do not abhor us for thy name sake, Do not disgrace the throne of thy glory; remember, break not thy Covenant with us, Jer. 14. 21. The Psalmist prayes upon the same ground, Have respect to the Covenant; for the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty; As if he had said, Lord, Thou hast made a Covenant to preserve and protect thy people, but now they are oppressed; The dark places, that is, places full of ignorance and wickedness (which are spiritual darkness) are full of cruelty: Holy knowledge hath no such enemy as ignorance. Or, the dark places are full, &c. may be thus understood, there is no such obscure corner or by-place in the land, but their malice searcheth it out for the vexation of thy people. We are so far from having liberty to serve thee publickly in the light, that we feel the cruelty of bloody minded men, though we do it secretly or in the dark. Now Lord it is time for thee to remember thy Covenant.

Thirdly, The Saints use to put God in remembrance of the rage and blasphemies of his and their enemies. Thus the Church of the Jews cries unto the Lord (Psal. 137. 7.) Remember, O Lord, the children of Edom in the day of Jerusalem, who said, raze it, raze it, even to the foundation thereof. When a man is wrong'd who intends revenge, he will say to the party wronging him, well, Remember this, or, I shall remember you for this. Revengeful men have strong memories: so hath the God to whom vengeance belongeth. He will certainly remember the sinful, revengeful cry of Edom against Jerusalem, though the sins of Jerusalem did cry to him for vengeance. The Psalmist is as earnest in another place, urging the Lord to remember for his own interest, as here for the interest of his Sion (Psal. 74. 18.) Remember this, that the enemy hath reproached, O Lord, and that the foolish people have blasphemed thy Name. As if he had said, Pray, Lord, take a note of this, make a memorandum of this, That the enemy hath reproached thy Name; God will remember it, if any of his servants are reproached, much more when himself is.

Fourthly, The Saints remember God of their own frailty, and that two-fold. First, Natural; Secondly, Spiritual. Remember how short my time is, wherefore hast thou made all men in vain? (Psal. 89. 47.) Man is a frail short-liv'd creature, and it is some comfort to him, that God knows he is so. That which Job puts the Lord in remembrance of, is his natural frailty; some understand it also of his spiritual; Remember, I beseech thee.

That thou hast made me as the clay.

The LXX reads it, Thou hast made me clay. The word signifies cement or morter, which are mixt of earth and water, Thou hast made me as tempered clay. When the original of man is described, it is said, The Lord formed man dust out of the ground, or, of the dust of the ground, (Gen. 2. 7.) here Job saith, Thou hast made me as the clay, or, Thou hast made me of the clay; the sence is near the same, whether we take clay for the matter out of which man was made, or according to which man was made, or the similitude according to which man was made. Job speaks of himself with respect to creation: for, according to the ordinary course of generation, man is not made of clay. The first man was made of clay, and of him all men are. We derive our pedigree from the dirt, and are akin to clay. Job might say, and so may any man, Thou hast made me of the clay. However Job was, and man now is made as the clay; that is, frail, brittle and weak. We are composed of materials, which will quickly crack and break. When the Holy Ghost would describe how easily Christ can shatter to pieces all the opposites of his Kingdom; it is said, He shall dash them in pieces like a potters vessel: A potters vessel will not bear blows, especially not the blows of such an instrument, as is there spoken of, an iron rod: He shall break them with a rod of iron (Psal. 2. 9.) we may break a potters vessel with a little wand, or a weak reed, how then should it endure the weight and hardness of an iron rod? The Spirit of God seems to delight in this allusion, and therefore takes it up often. Read, Isa. 45. 9. Isa. 64. 8. Rom. 9. 21. We have the state of the Jews, described under this notion (Jer. 18. 4.) The Lord bids Jeremy go down to the potters house, he obeys, and found the potter working a work on the wheel, And the vessel that he made of clay, was marred in the hand of the potter, so he made it again another vessel, as seemed good to the potter

ὅτι πηλὸν με ἐποίησας. Sept. חמר

Propriè significat cementum, vel terram aquâ mixtam.

In memoriâ revoca, ut me è luto primum, i.e. primum hominem unde orti cæteri & formaris singuli more. Merc.

to make it. Then, the Word of the Lord came to him, saying, Cannot I do to you as this potter? saith the Lord, Behold, as the clay is in the hand of the potter, so are ye in my hand, O house of Israel. I can form you, and I can break you, I can put you into what condition I please, and ye ought not to be displeased at it. A potters vessel is an emblem of the strongest Kingdoms; How much more of the strongest men?

That we are made of clay, intimates three things, at all which Job seemeth to aim, when he saith, Thou hast made me as the clay.

First, The excellency of mans frame. He is not thrust together like a rude lump or mass of earth, but curiously wrought (Psal. 139. 15.) To make a vessel of clay is an artificial work, not a natural. It requireth much pains, but more skill. Whence Job argueth, Thou hast made me as the clay; Thou hast shewed thy heavenly wisdom in shaping and contriving me, as a vessel of honour for thy use; And wilt thou bring me into dust again? The remembrance of that love and care which God hath laid out upon us in our constitution, is an argument moving him to pity and compassion, as was shewed at vers. 3.

Secondly, That God hath made us of clay, shews our utter inability to contend with God, and to stand against his stroaks; It is, as if Job had said, Lord, Surely thou forgettest of what mettal I am made, thou thinkest I am made of a hard Rock, or of invincible Adamant, that I am compounded of Iron, and other the strongest materials; Alas, Lord, there is no such matter, I am made but as the clay; A great deal of power and wisdom appeared in making me, but a little power will serve to ruine me; I am no sooner touch't but crackt. Why then doest thou plant all thy Ordnance, and discharge so many volleys of shot against me? Lord, What am I? Am I a wall of brass, or a bulwark of stone? Thou knowest I am but a wall of clay, a paper wall, a potters vessel, a little moistened earth. Will any man prepare Cannon to batter a cottage, or a beetle to kill a flie? Thy providence needs not make such provision against me, or handle me so roughly: that which is weak calls for tender usage, and that which is weak may last long, if tenderly used; a glass with care will continue many ages. Deal gently with thy servant, Remember, I beseech thee, thou hast made me as the clay.

Thirdly, That we are made as the clay, shews our easiness to be overcome by temptation, and our obnoxiousness to sin. Sin is (in its kind) as spiritual, as grace is; yet our sinful corruption is figuratively called, the flesh. One reason (I conceive) of which may be this, because flesh, taken properly, is an occasion of sin. As the sensitive part is a servant, so a snare to the rational, much more to the spiritual. The flesh is at once the organ, and the burthen of the spirit. The Apostle calling Saints to run the race of holiness with patience, gives a very suitable advice, Let us lay aside every weight, that is, all carnal cumber; he that would shew himself light of foot, will not take a burden upon his back, he casts off his very garments; to which the next words of the Apostle seem to allude, Cast off every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us. So a garment doth, especially a long garment, which in running daggles and folds about our heels. The reason why our sinful corruption is compared to such a garment, is because it is so much assisted by this body of clay, the flesh which is as a long garment to the soul, hanging about it, and besetting it on every side.

ενσφιγξ & ad circumagendã proclivis: Metaphora ducta à lacinios & talaribus vestibus, quæ curentibus in stadio non sunt aptæ.

From which sence Job seems thus to move the Lord, Suppose I have sinned (he had said, Vers. 7. Thou knowest I am not wicked, but suppose I have sinned) and have had my failings, yet, Lord, Remember thou hast made me as the clay, I am not a pure spirit, as Angels are, I have a body of earth about me, which clogs and hinders me in every duty, which many wayes endangers me unto every sin. God himself takes up this as an argument to spare sinful man (Psal. 78. 39.) when the people of Israel rebelled against him, He many a time turned his anger away, and did not stir up all his wrath. What staid him? The next words give a reason; for he remembred that they were but flesh; that is, weak and very subject unto sin. This argument prevails again, (Psal. 103. 14.) Like as a father spareth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him; Why? For he knoweth their frame, he remembreth that they are dust. As if the very matter out of which man was first made, though without sin, were some disadvantage to him in the resisting of sin. It was a disadvantage before man had any sin in him, how much more is it now when most men have nothing at all in them but sin, and the best have very much. That which is born of the flesh (saith Christ, John 3. 6.) is flesh. His meaning is, corrupt nature can produce none but corrupt acts. It is a truth also, that our pure nature, because it was constituted (as of other parts, so) of flesh (the foul like a sparkling Diamond, being set in clay) was thereby rendered more prone to fleshly or sinful acts. Natural flesh (in its best state) is more apt to bring forth spiritual flesh (namely sin) then a spirit is. And that's a reason among others, which some give, why God was so irreconcilably angry with the Angels which fell, why he did never so much as mention them in a way of mercy, or discovered a thought of them for good since their fall (I say) one reason given is this, Because God could not remember that Angels were made as the clay, or formed out of the dust; They were created spirits, pure spirits, they had no clogs of flesh and blood about them, no fogs, no mists vapouring up from a sensitive part to cloud their intellectual. They had the more power to continue pure, because they were free from any earthly and elementary mixtures. Their sin was compound of more evils, because their nature was so simple. Angels having no tempter without them, no flesh about them, turned themselves away from God, meerly upon the freedom of their own wills. As every good action is by so much the better, by how much it hath the freer concurrence of our wills: so is every evil action so much the worse. The sin we commit is the greater, by how much we have had the less provocation to commit it. The sin of our first parents in eating the forbidden fruit, was aggravated in it self, because God gave them such plenty and variety of other fruits to eat: but it was lessened in comparison of the Angels sin, because they had more provocation to sin, then the Angels had. The bait of the temptation against our first Parents, was laid in their constitution, which being corporal and earthly, must needs be delighted with earthly objects. The forbidden fruit was pleasant to the eye, there the flesh took it; And it was pleasant to the taste, there the flesh took it again. Those provocations man had over and besides that of the Angels, a hope or a desire to mend his condition, and to become like unto God. A body of earth hath a sutableness to all earthly allurements. Every like hath a natural tendency and motion towards its like. This moves the Lord to pity sinful man, though man must not hence plead impunity for sin. The measure and degrees of sin upon such actings are abated, but the acts do not therefore put off the nature of sin. A sinner in dust and clay cannot be excused; yet is not so much polluted, and more to be pitied then a sinning spirit. And that's a third notion in which we may expound Job, beseeching God to remember, that he hath made him as the clay.

Angeli idcirco irremissibiliter peccaverunt, quia tanto robustius stare poterãt quanto eos carnis commixtio non tenebat. Greg. Moral. in loc.

I might write many things in this clay out of which man was made; but I have met with other passages already of the same subject, especially in Chap. 4. vers. 19. in those words, Whose foundation is in the dust; which Text being near of the same importance and interpretation with this in hand, I shall rather refer the Reader thither, then insist upon the same deduction and inferences a second time. Take only this in general. Our reflection upon the matter out of which we are extracted, should lessen us to low and modest thoughts of our selves: for what is lower then the earth. We say, He that lieth upon the earth, hath not whence to fall; It is as true, He that riseth out of the earth, hath nothing in himself whence he should be lifted up.

Materia ex qua orti sumus nobis ad modestiã magistra esse debet, quid enim luto sive argilla vilius? Sanct.

Remember that thou hast made me as the clay, and Wilt thou bring me into the dust again?

To be brought to the dust, is first a circumlocution or description of death, Psal. 30. 9. Shall the dust praise thee? shall it declare thy truth? That is, shall I praise thee when I am among the dead? What profit is there in my blood, when I go down to the pit? Not that profit sure; I cannot bring thee in the tribute of praise, when my life's gone out.

Secondly, To be brought to the dust, is a description of any low and poor condition, Psal. 22. 29. All they that be fat upon the earth (that is the great and mighty) shall eat and worship; All they that go down to the dust (that is, the mean and baſe) ſhall bow before him. As if he had ſaid, rich and poor, high and low, the King and the Beggar, have a like need of ſalvation by Jeſus Chriſt, and muſt ſubmit unto him, that they may be ſaved; for as it there follows, None can keep alive his own ſoul. The captivity of the Jews in Babylon, is expreſſed under thoſe notions of Death, and of dwellingin the duſt, Iſa. 26. 19. To ſhew how low they were brought; even ſo low, that no power but his who can raiſe the dead, could work their deliverance.

Job ſaw himſelf brought to the duſt of a low condition, of poverty and of diſgrace, and he feared he ſhould be brought to the duſt of death and of the grave. That's the meaning of this expoſtulating Query. And wilt thou bring me into the duſt again? He was not at all brought out of the duſt of his affliction, and therefore he could not ſay of that, Wilt thou bring me into the duſt again?

The words are read three wayes.

1. 2. 3. As an { Aſſertion. Interrogation. Admiration.

Firſt, Many Interpreters give them as a plain Aſſertion; Remember that thou haſt made me as the clay, and thou wilt bring me into the duſt again.

Secondly, Others read them (as we) with an interrogation; Remember that thou haſt made me as the clay, and wilt thou bring me into the duſt again?

Thirdly, Some heighten them into an admiration; Thou haſt made me as the clay, and (what?) wilt thou bring me into the duſt again! What a wonder is this? Could I have expected ſuch a ſudden change as this!

Quoad naturam vilisſimus ſum, quoad judicium tuum morti addictus, ut in pulverem revertar, utrumq; debet te commovere, ut parcas mihi in vita. Coc

Take the words as a direct aſſertion, Thou wilt bring me into the duſt again: So they may have reference to the Decree of God concerning man, as thoſe before had to the creation of man. As if he had ſaid, By creation and natural conſtitution, I am frail and weak, made of the clay; by thy purpoſe and decree I am appointed unto death; Thou wilt bring me into the duſt again, therefore ſpare me for the ſhort time I have to live.

Particula & pro ſic ſumenda eſt, & futurum potentiale eſt, decentiâ, vel debitu, vel jus, vel poteſtatem denotans, q. d. ſicut me tanquam cementum compegiſti, eadem poteſtate cum volueris, in terram reduces, nulla mihi illata injuria. Bold.

Some change the Conjunction [And] into the Adverb of Likeneſs [So] to note a right, power or priviledge; and the Text runs in this form, Remember, that as thou haſt made me of, or as the clay, ſo thou maiſt (it is thy priviledge, none can contradict thee in it, and thou doſt me no wrong in it, thou maiſt) as thou haſt purpoſed, bring me to the duſt again. Though it be common and natural to all creatures mixt of Elements, to be reſolved and turned back into that out of which they were made, that is, to die, yet to man it is more then natural; there is a decree upon it, beſides the naturality of it: Man dieth by a Statute-Law of Heaven. To die is a penalty inflicted upon man for ſin; for he had not been under a neceſſity of dying, if he had not ſinned. And therefore though God formed man (as the holy Story informs us, Gen. 2. 7.) out of the duſt of the earth; yet ſo long as man ſtood, he never ſaid to him, To duſt thou ſhalt return. God only put a ſuppoſition, that in caſe man did fall, he ſhould ſurely die. But when man had fallen by ſin, then he hears what he was, and what he muſt be; For duſt thou art, and unto duſt thou ſhalt return (Gen. 3. 19.) As if God had thus beſpoken ſinful man; Thy body was framed out of duſt, and now I charge this burden upon thee, thou ſhalt return to the duſt again.

It is a Queſtion (and I ſhall touch upon it) Whether death were natural to man or no? Whether man were made mortal, or whether he made himſelf mortal? Some affirm, That death was natural, not accidental or occaſional to mankind. They argue for this Opinion;

Firſt, thus; Adam died not the death of the body, or a natural death when he had ſinned; therefore the death of the body was not inflicted for ſin upon his perſon and his poſterity, but was ſeated in, or a conſequent of his nature.

I anſwer, Though Adam died not preſently a natural death, yet he was preſently made ſubject or liable unto death; the ſentence was paſt upon him, though the ſentence was not executed upon him. A Malefactor who is caſt at the Bar, is a dead man in Law, though he be repreived from the preſent ſtroke of death.

Again, Though death it ſelf did not inſtantly ſeize upon him, yet the ſymptoms of death, and tokens of mortality did. Fear and ſhame, pains and diſtempers, ſweat and weakneſs quickly ſhewed themſelves as ſo many harbingers or forerunnners of his approaching diſſolution: we ſee and feel death in theſe before we ſee or feel death it ſelf. Theſe bid us prepare our bodies for the grave, and our ſouls for heaven.

Secondly, Others reaſon thus, Chriſt hath delivered his people, the elect, from all that puniſhment which the ſin of Adam did contract and deſerve; but Chriſt hath not delivered his elect, his own people, from turning to the duſt. Godly men die as well as the ungodly, Believers as well as Infidels; therefore (ſay they) the death of the body was not procured by ſin.

I anſwer, Whatſoever is an evil in death, Chriſt hath delivered his people from; he hath taken away all that from death, which is puniſhment or annoyance, though death be not taken away. Chriſt hath freed us from the effects of ſin, as he hath freed us from ſin it ſelf, that is, from their prevalence and dominion over us, not from their preſence or being in and upon us. Hence the Apoſtle (1 Cor. 15.) triumpheth over death; O death, where is thy ſting? O grave, where is thy victory? As if he had ſaid, Death once had a power over man to ſting him to death; death once had a victorious power, and would have been the great conqueror, riding in triumph over all the poſterity of Adam; but now death had neither ſting nor ſword to uſe againſt Believers, it hath nothing of victory over the Saints: It is now but a ſleep, a ſleep in Chriſt, a reſt from labour, a putting off the rags, the worn rags of mortality, that we may be dreſſed in the robes of glory. The evil of death is removed, and that which remains of death (the ſeparation of ſoul and body) proves the greateſt good to both, it being but a preparatory to their everlaſting union.

Omne principatum ſe cipiatum ſequitur naturam principiorum.

Thirdly, It is argued, That death and corruption were natural to man, becauſe the matter out of which man was made, was dying and corruptible; for that which is made, muſt follow the nature of that Principle out of which it is made. The effect cannot be (ſay they) more noble then the cauſe; nor the ſubject conſtituted, more durable then that which goes into its conſtitution.

To clear up an anſwer to this, we muſt diſtinguiſh of a threefold immortality.

Firſt, A primitive, ſimple, independent, eſſential immortality; this is proper and peculiar to God; in which ſence the Apoſtle affirmeth, He only hath immortality (1 Tim. 6. 16.)

Secondly, There is a derivative, dependent, eſſential immortality. Some ſubſtances have no ſeed of corruptibility, nor of death in them: Being either ſeparate from all matter which is the ſeat and root of corruption, as the Angels; or united to matter, yet ſo as not being produced from it, or having any affinity with it, ſuch are the ſouls of men. Whole man in his creation was not immortal either of theſe wayes; a part of man was, but man was not created immortal. Man was of a middle ſtate and condition, neither altogether ſo mortal, nor altogether immortal, but capable of either.

Thirdly, There is an immortality by the power or gift, by the mercy or juſtice of God. The power and juſtice of God ſhall give an immortality to the bodies of the damned in hell, they ſhall ever live a dying life, who were dead all the while they lived. They who have ſlighted the mercy of God, ſhall be upheld by his power, to endure his juſtice to all eternity; wicked men would have ſinned with delight for ever upon the earth, if they could have lived for ever upon the earth; and they ſhall live for ever with pain in hell to ſuffer for their ſin.

The power, goodneſs and mercy of God ſhall much more give immortality to the bodies of the Saints in glory; they who have had a will to delight in obeying God that ſhort time they lived on earth, ſhall have a power to live for ever in delight, praiſing God in heaven.

Adamus habuit potentiam non moriendi, non impotentiam moriendi.

The body of man in the ſtate of innocency, had an immortality by the gift of God; yet with condition that he did ſubmit to that Rule which God gave him to live by. Do this and live, was the Law of Adam's life. Adam had not an impoſſibility to die, but a poſſibility not to die; this was the ſtate of immortality in the ſtate of innocency. Man had not fallen into the grave, if he had not fallen into tranſgreſſion. His life was made as long as his obedience; if he had not turned from God, he had not returned to the earth.

Adamus peccans non ſolum potuit mori, ſed non potuit non mori.

Death

Death was conveyed in by sin, and our possibility not to die, was not only lost, but changed into a necessity of dying. So then man is brought to dust, not because his nature was subject to corruption, but because sin hath corrupted his nature. When he abused the liberty of his will, he was subjected to this necessity against his will. By an irreversible ordinance of Heaven, It is appointed unto all men once to die, Heb. 9. 27. Job speaks to that point of Gods Law concerning man, Thou hast made me as the clay, and thou wilt bring me into the dust again.

Quicunque dicit Adamum primum hominem mortalem factum, sive peccaret, sive non peccavet, moreretur in corpore, hoc est, de corpore, exiret, non peccati merito, sed necessitate naturæ, Anathema sit. Conc. Mel. can. 1.

Thus the words are taken as an assertion of the power and priviledge of God, to unmake and pull down man, whom he had made and set up.

If we read the words by way of interrogation or admiration; so Job seems to intend them, as an allay to mitigate the present severity of the Lords proceeding with him; Thou hast made me of the clay but a while ago, and wilt thou bring me into the dust again? O spare me a little before I go hence, and shall be seen no more! It will not be long before there must be an end of me, O let me have a more comfortable being and breathing while I am here!

When Satan provoked the Lord against Jerusalem, to destroy it, the Lord answered (Zech. 3. 2.) Is not this a brand pluckt out of the fire? As if he had said unto Satan, Art thou moving me to throw this people into that fire of affliction out of which they were so lately snatcht? Jerusalem was in the fire but a while ago, and shall I cast it in again? Job pleads in the same form, though not in the same matter; I was clay but the other day, and Lord, shall I to dust again to day? Let me see some quiet dayes before I see the end of my dayes. Gild over this clay of mine with the shinings of thy face upon me, before thou rendereſt me dust again.

I have more then once had occasion to touch this Argument, and shall therefore pass it here.

Job having thus set forth his natural constitution, in the matter of it, as he made of clay, goeth on to describe himself more distinctly: First, In his conception of his whole body. Secondly, In the formation and delineation of his parts.

Verse 10. Hast thou not poured me out as milk, and crudled me like cheese?

Lacti simile infusio semen, postea admirabili Dei opere non secus ac caseus concrescit & consolidatur, ut membra paulatim conformari incipiant.

Under the modest shadow of this Verse, that great natural mystery of mans generation and conception is contained. The former word signifies not only the powring forth of Liquids, but the melting and dissolving of the hardest metals, Iron, Brass, &c. that they may be fitted to run, or be powred forth, Ezek. 22. 21, 22. And as this signifies the softning and melting of that which is hard, so the next word (which we translate crudled) signifies the hardning or thickning of that which is soft and fluid. Moses useth it in describing the miraculous dividing of the Red Sea, Ex. 15. 8. The floods stood upright as an heap, and the depths were congealed in the heart of the sea. The Prophet Zephany useth it for the setledness and resolvedness of a people in sin (chap. 1. 12.) The Lord (saith he) will punish the men that are setled (we put in the Margin curdled or thickned) on their Lees. I might from these proprieties of the original words, illustrate that secret of mans original. But forasmuch as the Spirit of God hath drawn a curtain, and cast a vail of Metaphors over it, therefore I intend not to open or discover it. Ancient Philosophors have spoken of these natural operations in a like Language, and under these similitudes: I shall only say in general, that these two expressions, First, Thou hast poured me out as milk. Secondly, And crudled me like cheese, are appliable to that special contribution which God hath charged upon each Parent; towards that great work, the continuation of their own kind, and the raising up of a posterity in their place, to serve himself, and their Generation. Hence learn,

Οἶον ἐκ τοῦ γάλακτος πῆξις, τὸ δὲ ὕσιμα τὸ γάλα ἔστιν, &c. Arist. De gen. Animal. c. 20.

First, That, Man hath reason to be humbled at the means and manner of his Original.

What hath he to be proud of in this world, who, that he might be prepared for his coming into the world, was powred out as milk, and curdled as cheese? Let not man be high-minded, whose beginning was so low and homely. Hence learn,

Secondly, Our natural conception is from God.

Men (in a strict sence) are called the fathers of our flesh, and God the father of Spirits (Heb. 12. 9.) Yet God hath the chief title to the fatherhood of our flesh, as well as the sole title to the fatherhood of our spirits. Thou hast powred me out as milk, and thou hast crudled me like cheese; here is no mention of his Father, none of his Mother; but as if the Lord had wrought all by an immediate power, he ascribes the whole effect to him. Thou hast powred me out as milk, &c. We are also his off-spring, as the Apostle tells the Athenians out of their own Poets, Acts 17. 28.

Nihil de genitoribus aut seminibus nascitur, si ea non operetur Deus. Aug. in Psal. 118.

Thirdly, This gives caution to all whom the Lord hath called, or shall call to the state of Marriage, to be holy in that estate. Marriage is honourable (Heb. 13. 4.) and the bed undefiled, but whoremongers and adulterers God will judge: No wonder if God have a respectful eye to the undefiled in that relation, and a revengeful eye upon the defilers of it; seeing as his own authority instituted it, so his own power acts so eminently in it. Our conception, our formation, our birth and production, are all ascribed to, yea, assumed by God himself. Of which second act the next verse gives us a noble and an elegant proof.

Verse 11. Thou hast cloathed me with skin and flesh, and fenced me with bones and sinews.

Semen in utero mulieris, primis septem diebus conglobatur, coagulatur, fitque ad capiendam figuram idoneū. Gel.

Job proceeds like a great Philosopher, about the production of man. For when by that former work of Nature, the matter is poured out and crudled, God by nature makes a further progress, and prepares for another work, the forming and fashioning of that unshapen lump, into the parts and lineaments of an organical body. Some Naturalists undertake to tell us exactly what is wrought the first seven dayes, and what the next, when the Brain, Heart and Liver are formed, and when the Flesh, the Bones and Sinews. The ancient and learned Physitians have distinguished this whole work of God, in perfecting mankind, into four periods. The first is, while the matter or principles out of which man is made, being mingled together, retain their own form. The second is, when those principles are grossed into a rude fleshly mass. These two periods Job hath taught us long before Galen and Hippocrates, in the former verse, under those notions of pouring out as milk, and crudling as cheese. The third period is, when a representation is made of those principal parts, the Brain, the Heart and the Liver, together with the threads, and (as some allude) the warp of mans constitution, or, as others, the lines and shadows of a man, such as a skilful Artisan makes with a ruder pencil, when he is about to draw a curious picture. The fourth period is, when both the similar and organical parts are compleated, and also beautified with proper and lively colours. These two latter periods are described by Job in this verse, and in the beginning of the next.

Gel. l. 7. de Sem. ex doctrina Hippocr.

Thou hast cloathed me with skin and flesh.

The original word for skin, comes from a root signifying naked. We commonly say he is naked, who hath nothing upon him but his skin. And Job, who here saith, Thou hast cloathed me with skin, said, chap. 1. 20. Naked came I out of my Mothers womb, and naked shall I return thither: That is, with nothing but my skin. He that wears only skin and flesh, hath no artificial cloathing, but he hath a natural cloathing. We are dreſt in garments taken out of the Wardrobe of God and Nature before the world puts a rag upon us. Thus man is born naked, yet cloathed; unarmed, yet fenced.

Thou hast cloathed me with skin and flesh, &c.] Which some interpret in reference to the soul, which is covered over, and enclosed with the skin and flesh:

But this cloathing of skin and flesh refers rather to those inward, more noble and tender parts, the Heart, Liver, Brain and Bowels; these are enclosed with skin and flesh, lest they should take cold: These are fenced with bones and sinews, lest they should take hurt. Hence death is called an uncloathing. Death strips us, not only to the skin, but of the skin. We that are in this Tabernacle, do groan, being burdened, not for that we would be uncloathed, 2 Cor. 5. 4. that is, not that we would put off this garment of skin and flesh, this natural cloathing, but we would have a supernatural cloathing upon it, even a vest of glory put upon these vests of frailty. This Scripture in Job is of the same language with that of Paul, Thou hast cloathed me with skin and flesh.

It is said of a virtuous woman (Prov. 31. 21.) That she is not afraid of the snow for her household, for all her household are all cloathed with Skarlet, or double garments. The great and most wise God hath prepared such cloathing for mans inward parts, that he nedes not fear snow or cold, he hath provided double garments, two suits, skin and flesh. Flesh is an under-garment, and skin is an upper garment; flesh covers the bones, and skin covers the flesh. Anatomists observe, That man hath two distinct coats of skin upon his flesh, or mans skin is a lined garment, yet differing from other garments; for here the lining is uppermost. This uppermost skin, or as some call it, the scarf-skin, is without sense, you may thrust a needle through it without pain. There was great reason it should be so, that it might defend the skin under it from external injuries, as also attemper the exquisite sense thereof, and so become the medium or mean of touching; for all sensation is made by some mean: and it is either altogether hindered, or much disturbed by the immediety of the Object and the Organ. Hence when this cuticle or scarf-skin is off or broken, the gentlest touch upon that bared part, breedeth much pain, but spoileth the true sensation. Under this curtain or scarf-skin, the true and proper skin lieth. The Greeks call it Δέρας, because it may be flayed off, or Δέρμα, quasi Δέμα, a band, because it compasseth or knitteth together the whole body. This skin is a seamless garment, yet it hath divers out-lets made for the relief and ease of Nature; some of which are obvious to sense, others called pores, are both innumerable and imperceptible.

To this double vesture of skin, flesh is added, as having according to Job's Philosophy, an immediate conjunction or contiguity with one another. But our Philosophers in their professed descriptions of mans Anatomy, place two parts between the skin and the flesh, namely, fat and the fleshly Membrane. Concerning which, they who please may consult the writings of learned Naturalists. I shall not step out into such digressions.

Further, As God hath given such a cloathing of skin and flesh, so he hath given us armour under that cloathing. Thou hast fenced me with bones and sinews.

The word which we translate fenced, is the same used (ch. 1. 10.) Where Satan tells the Lord that he had secured the state of Job, so that he could not come nigh it. Hast thou not made an hedge about him? The Devil made many assaults against Job, but he could not batter down that hedge, it was Cannon-proof. As the state, so the body of Job was fenced; if we look upon the Skeliton of a man, we shall see the proportion of an armour, brest and back formed up with bones and sinews.

Bones are for strength, and sinews for motion; bones being firm and stiff in themselves, are moveable by sinews. There are other parts of the Body which contur to the making up of this Armour, Gristles, Muscles, Ligaments, Membranes, all which serve for motion, fastening and defence, as well as Bones and Sinews: but these being the principal and most known, are here expressed for all the rest.

Ὀστέα τῷ σώματι στάσιν καὶ διάστημα καὶ σχῆμα παρέχοντα. Hip.

Bones give the body stability, straightness and form. They are as the carkas of a Ship, whereto the rest of the parts are fastened, and by which they are sustained. They are as the posts, pillars, beams and rafters of a house, by whose knittings and contignations the whole building is both proportioned and supported. And though the bones are for number very many, and in their forms exceeding various, some thick, some thin, some plain, some hollow, some of a greater, others of a lesser bore, yet are they so connect and fitted together by articulation or by coalition, by contiguity or continuity (as the Anatomists speak) that they all appear as one bone, or pack of bones.

Sinews or Nerves derive their pedigree from the Brain, and are the Organs by which the animal spirits are conveyed, and flow into the whole body, and with them both sense and motion. Sinews have so much of strength in them, that the same word is put to signifie both strength and sinews, and to do a thing strongly and vigorously, is to do it (nervose) sinewously. It is wonderful which Naturalists write of the conjugations and uses of the sinews; to whose Labours I refer the studious Reader for further satisfaction. I have given enough to shew what this Text calls me to, That God hath indeed cloathed man with skin and flesh, and fenced him with bones and sinews.

Some have quarrelled with the wisdom and goodness of God, for turning man altogether naked and unarmed into the world. This Scripture is enough to confute the unreasonableness of that quarrel. Job thankfully acknowledgeth that he was both cloathed and armed, though not in the sence of these complainers. It is more honourable for man to make himself artificial Cloathing and Arms, then to have had none but natural; God hath given man reason to invent, hands to prepare, and a tongue to call for those things which by a Law of Nature are imposed upon other creatures; the power of reason, and the skill of the hand are a better safeguard to man then any the beasts have, and can provide whatsoever man wants to secure him either from cold or danger. And though the body, as now it stands, be but (as it were) the Sepulcher of that which God at first created, though we lie open to so many diseases and deaths, that the soul may well be said to inhabit an unwalled and an unfortified City, yet man hath great cause for ever to extol the bounty of God in those still continued ennoblements of this earthly mansion, his mortal body. Yea, the noble structure and symmetry of our bodies invites our souls not only to thankfulness, but to admiration. One of the Ancients stileth man A great Miracle; Another, The Miracle of Miracles: A third, The measure of all things: A fourth, The pattern of the Universe, The worlds Epitome, The world in a small Volume, or, A little world. They also have distinguished the whole frame of the Body into three Stories, in allusion to a like frame observable in the world. First, The superior, which they call intellectual or Angelical, because they conceived it to be the habitation of Angels or Intelligences. The second or middle part they call Celestial or Heavenly, the seat of the Sun and Stars. The third, Elementary, in which all corporeal creatures are procreated and nourished. This division of the world is eminent in man, for he also is a building of three Stories. The Head, which is the Seat of Reason, the mansion, the Tower of wisdom and understanding, is placed highest: The Brest or middle venter is the Celestial part, wherein the Heart, like the Sun, is predominant; some have called the Sun The heart of the world, and the Heart, The Sun of mans Body, by whose lustre, beams and influences, all the other parts are quickned and refreshed; hence we say, when the heart holds, all holds. The third part of the Body, or the lower Venter, containing all parts necessary for the nutrition of individuals, or the propagation of the Species, carrieth a clear resemblance with the elementary or lowest parts of the Universe.

There are five things in particular, which as so many Rounds of a Ladder, may help us to raise our thoughts higher in the duty of holy admiration about this work of God.

First, That God frameth up this goodly and beautiful Fabrick out of such mean and improbable Materials. To consider out of what stuff our bodies are made, advanceth the honour of him who made us. Man can make his work (except the form) no better then the matter out of which he formeth it. But as the form of mans body is better then the matter, so the matter becomes better then it was before it received that form.

Secondly, The matter out of which God maketh man, is originally homogeneal, or but of one kind, yet there is a strange heterogeny or variety in the very substance, as well as in the shape of the several parts; which are therefore divided by the Surveyors of this Building into parts similar and dissimilar. Is it not incredible to meer Reason, that one Lump should be spread out into thin, tender skin, wrought into soft flesh, extended into tough sinews, hardened into strong bones; that one piece should make an outward Jerkin or Cassock of skin, an under garment of flesh, Columnes and Rafters of bones, Bands and ties of sinews; that the same should make veins, like channels, to carry, and blood like water, to be carried into every part, to moisten and refresh it? When an Artificer buildeth an house, he requires more materials then one, he must have

Quomodo ex re tantula & jui simili, tam varia & discrepantes partes extiterunt; hæc profecto est stupenda omnino opificis nostri sapientia & vis ad quicquid efficiendum. Merl

Stones and Timber, Iron, Lead, &c. to compleat his Fabrick; but the Lord frameth all the parts, rooms and contrivances of the Body out of one and the same Mass. Thou dost not know (saith Solomon) how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child (Eccles. 11. 5.) Who can know by a meer rational demonstration, how a solid substance should grow out of that which is so fluid? And that parts materially, as well as figuratively unlike, should arise out of a like matter?

Thirdly, The work of God in framing of man is internal, as well as external. A Statuary or an Engraver will make the Image or Pourtraiture of a man, but his work is all outward, he cannot make Bowels, or fashion a Heart within, he cannot cut out Veins, Bones and Sinews. The greatest wonders of Creation are unseen. God hath packt many Rarities, Mysteries, yea, Miracles together in mans Chest. All the vital Instruments and Wheels whereby the Watch of our life is perpetually moved from the first hour to the last, are locked up in a curious internal cabinet, where God himself prepared the pullies, hung on the weights, and wound up the Chime by the hand of his infinite power, without opening of any part; as our own learned Anatomist elegantly teacheth us in the Preface to his sixth Book.

Fourthly, The dimensions, proportions and poyse of mans body are so exact and due, that they are made the model of all structures and artificials. Castles, Houses, Ships, yea, the Ark of Noah was framed after the measure and plot of mans Body. In him is found a circulate Figure, and a perfect Quadrate, yea, the true quadrature of a Circle, whose imaginary Lines have so much troubled the Mathematicians of many Ages.

Fifthly, In every part usefulness and commodiousness, comliness and convenience meet together. What beauty is stampt upon the face? What Majesty in the eye? What strength is put in the arms? What activity into the hands? What musick and melody in the tongue? Nothing in this whole Fabrick could be well left out or better placed, either for ornament or for use. Some men make great houses which have many spare rooms, or rooms seldom used; but as in this house there is not any one room wanting, so every room is of continual use.

Was ever clay thus honoured, thus fashioned? Galen gave Epicurus an hundred years to imagine a more commodious situation, configuration or composition of any one part of the Body: And surely if all the Angels in Heaven had studied to this day, they could not have cast man into a more curious mould, or have given a fairer and more correct edition of man. Thie clay cannot say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou? Or this work, he hath no hands (Isa. 44. 9.) The Lord hath made man so well, that man cannot tell which way to be made better. This work cannot say, he that wrought me hath no hands, that is, I am ill wrought; as to say, you have no eyes, you have no ears, are reproofs of negligence and inadvertency, both in hearing and seeing: So when we say to a man, surely you have no hands, our meaning is, he hath done his work either sloathfully or unskilfully. But this work of mans body shall not need to say unto God, he hath no hands; he hath given proof enough, that hands and head too were employed about this work. Let us make it appear that we have hands and tongues, and hearts for him, that we have skin and flesh, bones and sinews for him, that we have strength, and health, and life, and all for him, seeing all these are also derived from him, as appears in the next words, Thou hast granted me life and favour.

Job having thus described the natural conception and formation of his body, descendeth to his quickning and preservation. When God had formed man out of the dust of the earth, he then breathed into him the breath of life, and man became a living soul; and thus when God had formed man in the womb, given him Skin and Flesh, Bones and Sinews, then he gives Life and Breath, and all things necessary to the continuation of what he hath wrought up to such excellent perfections. Our divine Philosopher teacheth us this Doctrine.

Verse 12. Thou hast granted me life and favour, and thy visitation hath preserved my spirit.

This Verse holds out to us the great Charter of God to man, consisting of three Royal Grants. First, Life. Secondly, Favour. Thirdly, Visitation. The bounty of God appears much in granting Life, more in granting Favour, most of all in his grant of gracious visitations. Thou hast granted me life, &c.

The Letter of the Hebrew is, Thou hast made or fitted for me life and favour. The Soul is the ornament of the Body, Life the lustre of our Clay. Thou hast not thrown or hudled my life into my body, thou hast put it in exquisitely and orderly. The frame of the body is an exquisite frame; but the frame, the faculties and powers, the actings and motions of the soul are far more exquisite: The Inhabitant is more noble the House, and the Jewel then the Cabinet. As the life is better then meat, and the body then (artificial) rayment (Mat. 6. 25.) So the life is better then the body, which is to it a natural rayment.

Thou hast granted me life.

Life is put Metonymically for the Soul, of which it is an effect, as the Soul is often put for the Life, whereof it is a cause.

We translate in the singular number, Life; the Hebrew is plural, Thou hast granted me lives. But hath a man more lives then one? Some understand Job speaking not only of corporal, but spiritual life; as our natural life is the salt of the body, to keep that from corrupting; so spiritual life, or the life of Grace, is the salt of the soul, to keep that from corrupting.

Secondly, Thou hast granted me lives, that is, say others, temporal life and eternal life.

Thirdly, Lives may be taken for the three great powers of life. Man hath one life consisting of three distinct lives: For whereas there is a life of vegetation and growth, such as is in Trees and Plants; and a life of sense and motion, such as is in the Beasts of the Earth, Fowls of the Air, and Fishes of the Sea; and a life of reason, such as is in Angels, whereby they understand and discourse; these three lives, which are divided and shared among all other living creatures, are brought together and compacted into the life of man. Whole man is the Epitome or sum of the whole Creation, being enriched and dignified with the powers of the invisible world and of the visible put together, under which notion we may expound this Text, Thou hast granted me lives; a threefold life, or a threefold acting or exercise of the same life. Thou hast granted me lives.

Hence observe, Life is the gift of God.

With thee is the fountain of lives, the well, or the vein of lives (Psal. 36. 9.) The Psalmist alludes, either first, to waters which flow from a fountain, and so doth life from God. Or secondly, To Metals; With thee is the vein of lives. As all mineral veins, the veins of Gold and Silver, of Lead and Iron, &c. lie (as it were) in the bosom and bowels of the earth; so doth life in God. There is not the least vein of this Quicksilver in all the world, but comes from him. Or thirdly, The Psalmist alludeth to the veins of the body, which as so many rivers and rivulets derive their blood from that Red Sea the Liver. God hath a Sea of life in himself, and all that live are fill'd with life from him. This is one of his royal titles, The living God; He is the living God, not only subjective, because he liveth; but effective, because he enliveneth and quickneth all living creatures; From him we receive life and breath (Acts 17. 25.) In him we live, and move, and have our being, vers. 28. In him we live, &c. that is, by him, or through him, as the same Apostle teacheth (Rom. 11. 36.) The same power giveth us being, and maintains it. This is true, yet the context carrieth the Preposition (In) further. For the Apostle having asserted, vers. 27. He is not far from every one of us; subjoynes this as a proof, For in him we live, &c. Implying that man is, in a sence, contained in, or invested with God. The divine nature cannot be circumscribed with any thing, yet circumscribeth all things: For which, Paul refers the Athenians to Heathen Poets, who spake this truth in a carnal language, yet such as might be spiritualiz'd by a sanctified understanding. The result of which is, That God is the author and conservator of our lives. This glory is given also unto Christ, who is called The Prince of life, because he hath life at command; The Son quickneth whom he will. Christ hath the power, not only of natural, but of spiritual and eternal life. He is the Prince of Lives.

Jovis omnia plena. Vulg. Jupiter est æther, est terra Jupiter cœlumque, & omnia Jupiter, & si quid supra. Æschyl.

Job

Job speaks in the language of Princes, Thou hast granted, &c. As they make our grants of Lands and Offices, so God makes a grant of life. The civil godship of Kings and Magistrates appears much in this, that they can grant a forfeited life, either by reprieve for a time, or by pardon for ever. It is ordinary with men, to grant others Leases for their lives, but they cannot grant them life. Princes can grant an offender a Lease of that life which he hath, but no Prince can grant life to those who have it not. That's Gods peculiar, Thou hast granted me life.

And favour.] The word signifieth the purest, sincerest, and most tender kindness, the fullest favour, the most courteous courtelie, Gen. 21. 23. & 24. 49. Exod. 15. 13. Ruth 1. 8. Hebricians tell us, That it noteth an exuberancy of kindness, such as breaks the bounds, and exceeds the ordinary laws of love. It is but a poor way of loving, to love only by rule and measure. There is no true love can act beyond the rule which God gives, but love quickly exceeds the rules of men. Hence the Jews call those Chasidem, who are not only just by stature, giving every man his right, paying every man his due, but noble, heroical, free-hearted and open-handed in their distribution of favours.

One Expositor by favour understands the seeds of grace and vertue, especially of charity and mercifulness, which (saith he) seem to have been connatural to Job.

Liberum arbitriũ tribuisti mihi. Cajet.

Another interprets favour by free-will. But I pass these as perversions, not expositions of Scripture: And shall represent what is both safe and sutable.

First, Some restrain this favour to that which he received in the womb before he was born, or the favour which he had to be born, which is to be reckoned among very valuable favours. Thou art he that took me out of the womb, was David's thankful acknowledgment, Psal. 22. 9. The womb is to all infants a temporary prison, and to some a grave. It is favour to have those gates unlockt, and the little prisoner set safe at liberty.

Hebraismus est quando ex dubus, simul positis substantivus unum adverbialiter sumitur alterumq; determinat. Bold.

Secondly, We may interpret it as an adjunct, or an adverb, shewing how the Lord granted him life. It is an usual Hebraism to put the latter of two Substantives adverbially, Josh. 2. 14. We will deal kindly and truly with thee, say the Spies to Rahab. The Original is, We will deal kindness and truth to thee; which is also rendered kindness in truth, or kindness truly, that is, thou mayest trust us: we do not flatter thee, and we will not deceive thee. So here, Thou hast granted me life and favour; That is, life by favour, or life favourably; importing, That the receit of life, is the receit of a great mercy; as if Job had said, I could not deserve that thou shouldest bestow life upon me: When I was formed and fashioned in the womb, it was thy favour to quicken me: Mercy put breath into those tender principles, and first rudiments of my body. And seeing not only sense and motion, are brought in by life, but reason also, and all the noble operations of it; Job had reason enough to say, Thou hast granted me life, as a great, or with abundant favour.

Hence observe, Life is a special favour of God.

There are divers sorts of creatures which have not the favour of life bestowed on them, no not the lowest degree of life. The Lord hath given man not only life, but the highest degree of life; that is a high favour. It was Satans argument (Chap. 2.) Skin for skin, and all that a man hath, will he give for his life; As if he had said, What is a mans body to his life? What are his estate, his lands, his gold and silver? What are all these dead commodities to his life? Life is the most precious of natural blessings. A worm (under this consideration) is a more noble creature then the Sun, because a worm hath life, which the Sun hath not. The lowest of a superior order, is better then the highest of an inferior; Though the Sun be the excellentest of all inanimate creatures, yet it moves (though in heaven) in a lower orb, then any thing that lives groveling on the earth. A Leaf is more excellent then a Pearl or a Diamond, because a Leaf hath a life in it, which these have not. That opinion of voluptuous Atheists or Epicures, delivered us by the Preacher, hath a truth in it; A living dog is better then a dead lion (Eccles. 9. 4.) For though (as that voice spake from heaven, Revel. 14. 13.) Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord, and though cursed are the living that live without the Lord: in which sence the pooreſt dead Dog is better then the proudest Lion alive; Yet, consider man only within the line and compass of natural life; then he that lives in the worst condition, is better then he that once was in highest dignity, but now is dead. It is usual in Scripture by a Dog to set forth the vilest estate of man, and the most excellent by a Lion. When Mephibosheth would shew how low he was in his own eyes, though the son of a noble Prince, he joyns these two, Dead and a Dog together, 2 Sam. 9. 8. What is thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead Dog as I am? He calls himself not only a Dog, as Christ did the Woman of Canaan, and as she acknowledged her self to be; but to lay himself as low as low es it self, he calls himself a dead Dog, implying, That life giveth some honour, and casteth lustre upon every subject, which it inhabits, though it be the meanest. When Esau was near perishing with hunger (Gen. 25. 32.) he resolves thus, I am at the point to die, and what profit shall this birthright do to us? As if he had said, shall I keep my birthright, and lose my life? My life is more precious. Thus he spake, and he spake profanely in it; yet there is some truth in what he spake; for if we take birth-right precisely in the notion of a civil priviledge, so life is better then a birth-right; but he is called prophane Esau, because there was a spiritual priviledge in his birth-right, which he ought to have valued above his life. Any spiritual good thing is better then natural life; but life is the best of natural, and better then all civil good things. When the Prophet would express how great a blessing a King was to his people, he called him, The breath of their nostrils, Lam. 4. 29. and live for ever, was the highest apprecation given the Babylonian Kings. The most noble imitations of Art are about this piece of Nature; it is the ambition of a Painter to draw to the life, or to shadow the motions and actings of life. When we would commend a picture, we say, It is done to the life; How precious a favour is real life, the very shadow of which is of so great a price? He that layeth down his life, payeth the greatest debt, whether to justice or to nature. Christ went to the highest price for, and shewed the greatest favour to sinners, when he parted, and pawned this jewel for them, his precious life.

This should mind Parents, as to pray for quickning after conceptions, so to give thanks when the embryon is quickned.

Now if this natural life be such a favour, What is spiritual and eternal life? Thou hast given me life and favour, or life as a favour.

Chesed omnia beneficia Dei promiscuè complectitur Coc. Non solum vitam dedisti, sed cumulasti bonis omnibus, quæ ad victũ, honorem, & rem vitæ necessariam pertinent. Hoc nomine complectitur etiam omnia beneficia quæ ultra vitam Deus homini concessit, dum educandum eum instituendum, & informandũ in lege sua & timore curat. Merc.

Thirdly, By favour in conjunction with life, we may understand the accidents of life; that is, those good things which accompany and accommodate our lives; Thou hast given me life, not a bare life, nor a mear subsistence or being in the world, but with life thou hast also given me favour, many mercies and comforts to make my life sweet and pleasant to me.

Besides, favour takes in not only those outward comforts of health, strength, liberty, plenty, but those inward ornaments of life also, good education, and instruction in knowledge both humane and divine. It appears Job had a fair portion of these favours. His was not a naked, but a clothed soul, a soul gilded and engraven all over with heavenly truths.

So that Job in this word reports the bounty and munificence of God towards him, in all the former additions and accomplishments of his life. Many have lives which they scarce look upon as a favour. Some accidents of life, are more worth then the substance of it. Our well-being is better then our being. It may prove a desirable favour to be rid of life. In which sence Job spake of himself at the first verse of this Chapter, My soul is weary of my life. His life was then a burden, but once a favour. Thou hast granted me life and favour.

Fourthly, Job may here intend spiritual and eternal favour. Chesed signifies the grace or favour of God in Christ (Psal. 89. 33.) My loving kindness will I not take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail. If he fail in duty I will chasten him in mercy, I will not remove mercy from him. The Vulgar translates, Thou hast given me life and mercy, which some expound of that special mercy, the pardon of his sin, and his washing from original corruption; As if Job had said, I partake not only of life, but also of that which is better then life it self, Thy favour or loving kindness, Psal. 63. 4. The favour of God in spiritual things, (in pardoning sin, in regenerating the soul, in sending the holy Spirit) is the perfection of his favour. What is man without that favour which makes him a son of God, but even a beautiful, or at most, a rational beast? as David calls him, Psal. 49. 21. And should a man give thanks for outward favours only, without any reflection upon spiritual; a beast, could he speak might give such thanks. The life of sense and growth is as a mercy, but beasts and plants live thus: The life of reason is a greater mercy, but wicked men live thus; many are in Hell, unto whom God granted this life, and they would be glad God would call in his grant, and take it from them: But unto these three lives God adds a fourth to his Elect, even a life of grace through Jesus Christ. This is the favour of favours, and the blessing of all our blessings; except this favour be granted with our lives, it were better for us never to have had a grant of our lives. It is more eligible not to have been born, then not to be born again.

Chesed sumitur pro vitâ ejusque ornatu. Coc.

There is a fifth Interpretation, taking the word Chesed for corporal favour, or the beauty of the body, we say, such an one is well favoured, he hath an excellent feature; the favour of man is seen in the feature of his face. Favour is the perfection of beauty. Some have a clear mixture of white and red, yet no favour. In this sence the word is used (Isa. 40. 6.) where the Lord makes a proclamation, The voice said Cry, and he said, What shall I cry? All flesh is grass, and the goodliness thereof as the flower of the field; The word which we translate goodliness, is Chesed, All flesh is grass (man withers quickly) and Chesed, the goodliness thereof; all of man, his favour, beauty, strength, all these are as the flower of the field. Some read goodness for goodliness; the sence holds, if we take it so: the natural, the moral goodness of man is but a flower. As no goodliness, so no goodness of man, except spiritual, lasteth long, and that lasteth long and long, even for ever. Grace is not as the flower of the field; that is, durable substance: that (as the Prophet speaks there of the Word of God in vers. 8.) shall stand for ever. The grace of God is as lasting as the Word of God, for his Word is the external seed or principle of grace. But all other goodness and goodliness of man how good, how goodly soever; his other beauty how beautiful soever; his strength, how strong; his favour, how well favoured so ever, is but as the flower of the field, which is either cut down while it is green, or soon fades while it stands.

Take favour in this sence, and the sence of the whole verse is harmonious and sound. Thou hast granted me life; my body is formed and quickned, and more then so, Thou hast given me favour, my body is full of beauty and comliness. The comliness of the body is a favour received, and many receive favour, because they are comly. From either of which considerations we may call the comliness of the body favour, and it is no common favour, God denies this to many; he grants them the life of Nature, but not favour; yea, he grants many the life of Grace, but not favour. Beautiful souls are often ill-housed; and filthy souls cleanly housed; 'tis admirable when both beauties meet in the same man; Moses was a goodly child (Exod. 2. 2.) and a good man. As grace in the inward man is the best favour, so favour is graceful to the outward man. Thou hast granted me life and favour,

And thy visitation hath preserved my spirit.

פקד. Inspectio in bonum vel malum. Sept. Visitatio. Vulg. Interdum de Deo ad Deum refertur, denotat providentiam. Pined.

Here is the third benefit of this Royal grant, The visitation of God. One reads, Thy presence. A second, Thy assistance. A third, Thy inspection, thy over-looking or superintendency hath preserved my spirit. The Hebrew word signifies, The visitation of a superior over an inferior, as when Masters enquire into their Families, or Governors into their Colledges and Hospitals, to see whether the Statutes and Orders appointed by the Founders and Benefactors be observed. There is a threefold visitation of God held forth in Scripture.

First, A visitation of condemnation. God visits to take vengeance by destructive punishments, when warning is not taken, nor repentance shewed after corrective punishments. Shall not I visit for these things, saith the Lord? Shall not my soul be avenged on such a Nation as this? Jer. 5. 9.

Secondly, A visitation of correction (Psal. 89. 32.) If thy children forsake my law, &c. then will I visit their transgression with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes: Nevertheless my loving kindness will I not utterly take from him, &c. Though they break my Laws, yet I will not break my Covenant, they shall smart for it, but they shall not perish for it. This is a fatherly visitation.

Thirdly, A visitation of consolation. And this two-fold, First, For deliverance out of an evil estate, and that either temporal; the Lord is said to visit his people Israel, when he delivered them out of Egypt (Exod. 4. 31.) or spiritual and eternal; God hath visited and redeemed his people, saith the blessed Virgin (Luke 1. 68.) that is, he hath visited his people, to redeem them from sin and Satan, death and hell, by Jesus Christ.

Secondly (Which is most proper to this Text) there is a visitation, for protection in a good estate. When God (having caused our line to fall in a fair place) draws his line of providential communication round about us; So Mr. Broughton translates, Life and loving kindness hast thou dealt to me, and thy providence preserveth my spirit. As if Job had said, Thou didst not only give me life and favour, but thou didst protect me for many years in the enjoyment of those favours. Providence was the hedge, not only of his outward, but of his inward estate, Thy visitation hath preserved my spirit.

The Verb which we translate, hath preserved, signifieth to preserve, both by strength and watchfulness. The Noun expresseth a Watch-tower, in Hebrew, because a watchman standeth upon his Tower, and looks round about him, to espy and give notice of approaching dangers. The Lord preserveth both wayes, by his watchfulness, and by his strength: his eye is wakeful enough, and his arm is powerful enough to preserve us. He that keepeth Israel doth neither slumber nor sleep (Psal. 121. 1.) the Creator of the ends of the earth fainteth not, neither is weary (Isa. 40. 28.) He that is thus wakeful can easily visit, and he that is thus powerful, can easily preserve those whom he visiteth.

Thy visitation hath preserved my spirit.

But how did the visitation of God, preserve the spirit of Job? Or what are we to understand by his spirit, which was thus preserved?

The spirit of man is taken three wayes;

First, For Life. Thus God keepeth us from death, while he preserves our spirits.

Secondly, For the Soul. Thus God preserveth our spirits, while he keeps us from falling into, or from falling in temptation; while he keeps our corruptions from prevailing, and our graces from decaying.

Thirdly, The spirit of man is taken for his Courage. Thus God preserveth our spirits, while he keeps us from needless fears, and cowardly despondencies. Doubtless Job had experience of the visitation of God preserving his spirit in all these sences; yet here he seems chiefly to intend the preservation of his life, which God had granted him with favour, or of those comforts which were granted him with his life. Hence observe, First in general,

That what God granteth, he preserveth.

It is a part of his grant, that he will preserve. Should the Lord bestow the greatest stock of mercy upon us, and leave us to the wide world, he should quickly lose all; God is not like the Carpenter or the Mason, who buildeth up a house, and then leaveth it to it self, or to the care of others. The Lord surveyes what he builds, and keeps up what he sets up; all would come down else. Providence succeedeth Creation, or Providence is a continued Creation. As soon as ever the Lord had made Man, and a Garden, He took the Man and put him in the Garden which he had made, to dress it, and to keep it (Gen. 2. 15.) God putteth the creatures under mans charge, yet he keepeth all creatures in his own charge, and especially man: A Garden without a man to visit it, would soon be a wilderness. And man without God to visit him would soon be, or be in a wilderness, either out of order, or in danger. Achish promiseth David, I will make thee a keeper of my head for ever (1 Sam.28.2.) His meaning was, he should be Captain of his guard. Great Princes have their guards, they have keepers of their heads. The great King of Heaven and earth is a guard to the meanest man, and the keeper of his head. God enquires of Cain for his brother Abel (Gen.4.) Where is Abel thy brother? What is become of him? Cain was angry at the question, Am I (saith he) my brothers keeper? We ought to be one anothers keepers; our mutual visitations should preserve one anothers spirits. Some are apt to think themselves too good for the work: others, that the work is too hard for them. It is our comfort, and it may be our assurance, that God hath neither of these thoughts; The Lord is thy keeper: the Lord is thy shade upon thy right hand. The Sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the Moon by night. The Lord shall preserve thee from all evil; He shall preserve thy soul: The Lord shall preserve thy going out, and thy coming in, from this time forth and for evermore (Psal. 121. 5.) How large a writ or patent of protection is granted here? No time shall be hurtful, neither day nor night; which includes all times. Nothing shall hurt, neither Sun nor Moon, nor heat nor cold: These include all annoyances. Nothing shall be hurt, Thy soul shall be preserved, thy outgoings and thy comings in shall be preserved: These include the whole person of man, and him in all his just affairs and actions. Nothing of man is safe without a guard, and nothing of man can be unsafe, which is thus guarded. They shall be kept, who can say, The Lord is our keeper. And they cannot be kept, no not by legions of Angels, who have not the Lord for their keeper. None can keep us, but he, and he hath promised to keep us for evermore. Some men are weary of their offices, and some are put out of office; God is neither. In that Prophetical curse against Judas, 'tis said, Let another take his office (Psal.109.8.) What office? It is this word, and notes there the office of looking to, or of preserving the souls of others, we commonly call it, The cure of souls. Such is the office of all the Ministers of Christ, That's Episcopacy by divine right; this in the Text is divine Episcopacy. That word which here in Job we translate visitation, and in the Psalm now cited, office, is called Episcopacy by the Apostle (*Act.*1.21.) Christ is the great Bishop or visitor both of our souls and bodies. He is the œcumenical Bishop. The whole world is his Dioceis. He preserveth man and beast. See more of this point, *Chap.*7.20.

Præfecturã ejus accipiat alter, id est, omnia quæ in ejus cura sunt quæ sub sua potestate habet.

Again, For as much as this visitation which extendeth to the whole man, is here in the letter determined upon the spirit, We may observe,

First, Taking Spirit for Life,

That as our well-being, so our being in the world is at the daily dispose of God.

The living God not only giveth, but maintaineth our lives. We live not by bread, while we are healthy, nor by medicines, when we are sick; but by the Word of God. His visitation doth all.

Secondly, Take Spirit for the Soul, then we are taught,

That our souls are not independently immortal or incorruptible.

As the life of the whole man is not, so neither is the life of the soul, of, or in it self, without support from God. The Angelical spirits who were never married to bodies of earth, stand not mearly by Creation, but by Providence. The visitation of God preserveth those spirits; how much more the spirits of men, which are espoused to dust and clay?

Thirdly, As spirit signifieth the soul, not only in it's natural, but in it's spiritual state, or in the state of grace; We learn,

That our spiritual stock and treasure are in danger, and would decay, if the power and care of God did not preserve our spirits.

Grace cannot keep it self, if left to its self. We should lose, not only degrees of grace, but all grace, were it left in our own hands. But because it is grace, therefore it is not left in our own hands, therefore it cannot be lost. So the Apostle clearly (1 *Pet.*1.4.) We are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. The word signifies to keep, as a City beleaguered without by a strong enemy, is kept by a Garison within. Man at the first had an excellent estate in spirituals; though it cannot be said (properly) that he had grace (for that is in the hand of a Mediator) yet he had the image of God, and perfect innocency; but because God did not visit his spirit by fresh assistances, he was stript of all, and fell from the throne of his created glory. As God visits our souls by preventing grace, to give us what we had not: so he visits us by his preserving and persevering grace, to continue what he hath given.

Lastly, Forasmuch as (though God createth and careth for the whole man, yet) the visitation of God is expressed only, as to the spirit; We may Observe,

That God doth chiefly take care of, and provide for the spirit or soul of man.

When God formed the body of man at first, out of the dust of the earth, and breathed into his nostrils, the breath of life, it is not said he became a living body, or a living man, But, man became a living soul. So here, the work of providence is not enlarged to the whole man, but restrained to his spirit; As if the Lord did scarce think our bodies either worth, or needing a visit in comparison of our spirits. And seeing God cares for nothing in us, so much, as for our spirits, should not our care be chiefly for our spirits? The soul is (upon the matter) all man; ought not man to be most of all for his soul? Shall the thoughts of God be most busied, his care and inspection most fixed upon our spirits, and shall not ours? While Christ in a manner dischargeth us for our outward man (*Matth.*6.25.) Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on; his meaning was, to charge us more deeply with the inward man; yet how many are there, whose outward man stands them in more cost and care, in more thoughts and visitations for one day, then their spirits or inward man doth for a whole year, yea, for their whole lives! Visitations are frequent and serious for the preserving of the body: but where shall we find serious thoughts of visiting the soul?

Take this word further, If it be the visitation of God which preserveth our spirits, we should often visit God with prayer, intreating him to continue these visitations. Prayer is our visiting God, as providence is Gods visiting of us, and we should visit God by prayer, not only (as they, *Isa.*26.) in trouble, but in our peace: we should desire him to visit our estates, our families, but especially our souls and spirits in their most flourishing condition. The Apostle useth it as an argument to keep us from distracting thoughts (*Phil.*4.2.) Let your moderation be known unto all men: The Lord is at hand. Be careful in nothing, but in every thing by prayer and supplication, let your requests be made known unto God. The Lord is at hand, let not your hearts be troubled. Visit God in duty, who is at hand to visit you in mercy. Though there be an infinite distance between God and man, yet God is not far from any man, and he is ever near some men; Let not us be strangers to God, when we hear he maketh continual visits to us. Thy visitation doth preserve my spirit.

Vers. 13. And these things hast thou hid in thine heart, I know that this is with thee.

Some read the first clause (which adds sharpness to it) with an interrogation. And hast thou hid these things in thine heart? Is it so with thee, or hast thou dealt so with me indeed?

The heart of God, is the will, purpose or decree of God; These are a vast repository, wherein all things are laid up.

And these things hast thou hid, &c. What things? what is the antecedent to these things?

First, Some say, His afflictions, These things, that is, these afflictions, which thou hast now laid upon me, were I hid in thine heart: thou hast shewed me many favours, while in secret thou didst prepare rods for me.

Secondly, The antecedent to these things in mercy, life, favour and visitation, spoken of before, say others; As if Job had spoken thus, This bill of blessings now read, these priviledges not reckoned up, were hidden in thine heart: thou hast had gracious intentions towards me, while thou hast been smiting me.

Scio quia universorum memineris Vulg.

Quasi hæc mala velut in animo recondita in tempus opportunum asservasset, ut nec opinantem opprimeret. Atrox querimonia. Merl

I know all this is with thee.] That is, Thou remembrest all this, and keepest a record of it by thee; The Vulgar makes this the Text, I know thou remembrest all things, or all men.

Some (supposing the antecedent to be his afflictions) make out this harsh and unbecoming sence; As if Job had thus uttered his mind to God, I now perceive thou hast had coals of anger raked up in the ashes, while those warm beams of love did shine upon me; Thou hast held out mercy in thy hand, but somewhat else lay in thine heart. This interpretation, in the common understanding of it, is most unworthy of God. It is the wickedness of men to speak fair, and to do some courtesies, while cruelty and revenges are hid in their hearts. When Esau (Gen. 27. 41,) saw himself defeated of the blessing by his brother, He said in his heart, the days of mourning for my father are at hand, then will I slay my brother Jacob: Here's the character of malice, he gave neither brother nor mother ill language, but he said in his heart. The holy God never speaks good to them, to whom he intends evil. The Creator needs not daub or pervaricate with his creatures.

I grant indeed that the Lord giveth wicked men many outward favours, and speaks them fair in his works, but he never speaks them fair in his word, Say, Woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with him, for the reward of his hand, shall be given him (Isa. 3. 11.) Men are apt to flatter, but flattery is much an abomination to the Lord, as it is below him.

I grant also, That the Lord giveth his own people many favours, and speaketh real kindnesses to them while he hides affliction in his heart. What evil soever he brings upon them, he hath thoughts to do them good, and hath nothing but good for them in his thoughts.

We understand by those hidden things, the mercies which Job with his last breath had enumerated: then the words import two things.

First, An argument to move the Lord not to destroy him, or to assure his own heart that he would not. As if he had said, Lord, I know thou remembrest well what thou hast done for me, what cost thou hast been at in making me at first, and in preserving me hitherto; surely then thou wilt not pull all down in a moment.

Secondly, The words may import that the Lord in afflicting Job had used only a kind of sacred dissimulation. A dissembler carrieth himself as if he had no intent to do what he is resolved to do: It is usual with men thus to dissemble hatred, and so have some their love. He that purposeth much good to another, hideth it sometimes under sowr language and unkindest usage. Joseph had most endeared affection towards his brethren, yet he put a disguise of anger upon it, acting the part of a severe man, who lieth at catch to find out advantages and pick quarrels. Joseph used many stratagems of love, to entangle his Brethren, and wrapt up his good will in hard speeches and rough carriages; nothing appearing less then what indeed he most was, a loving Brother, forgetful of nothing but injuries; Job seems to have had such a conception of God, while he saith, These things hast thou hid in thine heart; and then his sence riseth thus, Lord, I know thou beareſt favour and good will towards me still. The fire of thy love is not extinct, but covered. Thou dost but personate an enemy, thou art my friend; thou draweſt a cloud betwixt me and the light of thy countenance, but thy countenance is still as full of light towards me as ever; and though I see nothing but sorrows on every side, yet I know mercies are hid in thine heart. Thus the words are an assertion of Job's faith and assurance that God loved him, while his chastenings lay most heavy upon him. Hence observe,

> First, That, The Saints while they are strong in faith, are able to discern the favour of God through the clouds and coverings of his most angry dispensations.

This they can do, and when they can, they are arrived at a great height in Grace. To maintain our interest in Christ through disadvantages, is strong faith. The woman of Canaan (Mat. 15. 26.) knew her pardon and acceptance wer hid in the heart of Christ while he called her Dog, and would scarce vouchsafe to cast an eye upon her. Faith did this, and Faith can do the like at this day: But every true Faith will not do it. There is a kind of miracle wrought in such believing: So Christ concludes with that woman (ver. 28.) O woman, great is thy faith! Truth of grace is not enough for every work of grace; some works will not be done without strength as well as truth. Weak faith is ready to say, Mercy is lost, when it is but hidden, and that God means us no good, when we do not enjoy good. But the strong Faith speaketh on this wise, Lord, I know there is mercy in thine heart towards me, though I see nothing in thy face but frowns, and feel nothing from thy hand but blows. Let God do what he pleaseth with me, I will not have a jealous thought of him, or suspect his intentions towards me, whatsoever his actions be. Hence observe,

> Secondly, We may gather arguments of support in our greatest sufferings from the apprehension of concealed mercies.

The skill and holy subtilty of Faith can wind it self in Gods bosom; and from what it finds lying secretly there for us, encourages us to bear what is openly laid upon us. Observe,

> Lastly, A Believer looks upon all his receipts, as coming out of the heart of God.

As he can look into his own heart, and see all the Commandments and revealed Counsels of God hidden there, so he can look into the heart of God, and see all the comforts he wanteth hidden there. Men of the world take their comforts only from the hand of God, Saints take theirs from the heart of God. It putteth the price upon every blessing, when we can look upon special love as the spring of it. Look how much of the heart of our friend we can see in a courtesie, so much true value there is in it. Hence it is usual with man, when he would express his freeness to those who desire a favour at his hands, to say, Yes, Take it with heart and good will, you have it with all my heart. We read of one, who complained he had received but a Golden Cup, when he saw another receive a Kiss from a Noble Prince: A Kiss is a better gift then a Cup of Gold. Love is the richest present. How happy then are they, who have the golden Cup and a Kiss too? Much from the hand, and all from the heart, from the love of God.

Job having thus revised and read over the particulars of his former mercies received from the bounty and free love of God, revives his complaint about, and renews his desire of deliverance from present sorrows, in his next address to God.

VERS. 14, 15, 16, 17.

If I sin, then thou markest me, and thou wilt not acquit me from mine iniquity.
If I be wicked, wo unto me; if I be righteous, yet will I not lift up my head; I am full of confusion, therefore see thou mine affliction.
For it encreaseth; Thou huntest me as a fierce Lion, and again thou shewest thy self marvellous upon me.
Thou renewest thy witnesses against me, and encreasest thine indignation upon me, changes and war are against me.

THe connection of these words lieth somewhat in the dark, and this in evidence hath caused divers conjectures about it.

First, Some make the connection with the thirteenth Verse, I know (saith Job) that this is with thee; and here he declared what was with him, namely, that, If I sin, then thou markest me; and thou wilt not acquit me from mine iniquity.

Secondly, The connection is made by others with the twelfth Verse, Thou hast granted me life and favour, and thy visitation hath preserved my spirit; yet if I sin, thou markest me, &c. As if Job had said, Though thou hast been pleased to make so many grants of favour, and hast done all these things for me which were hidden in thine heart, yet I know thou wilt not bear with, or connive at me, if I sin against thee: Thou hast not given me these mercies, that I should be emboldened to transgress the rule of thy justice; no, though thou hast done much for me, Yet if I sin, thou markest me, and thou wilt not acquit me from mine iniquity.

Thirdly, A third goeth higher, and makes these words depend upon the third Verse; where Job puts three Queries to God; the last of which is, Is it good unto thee that thou shouldest shine upon the counsel of the wicked? I know it is not (for 'tis like I might escape as well as another, yet) if I sin, thou markest me, and thou wilt not acquit me from mine iniquity; if I be wicked, wo unto me. Mine own experience proves thee far enough from shining upon the counsel of the wicked. Behold clouds and darkness are upon me.

There is a fair sence in any of these connections; which to determine, is not easie; I shall leave all three before the Reader.

Verse 14. If I sin, then thou markest me.

If I sin.] Sin standeth here in opposition to wickedness; Thou wilt not shine upon the counsel of the wicked. And, vers. 15. If I be wicked, then wo unto me; for if I sin, then thou markest me. Sin is any transgression against, or deviation (though but an hairs breadth) from the rule; If I fail, be it never so little.

First, To preserve, and that two wayes; first, By protecting from those evils which others would bring upon us (Psal. 141. 9.) Keep me from the snare which they have laid: That is, protect me from the danger which their snares threaten me with. So at the twelfth verse of this Chapter, Thy visitation doth preserve my spirit. Secondly, It is rendered to preserve by sparing, or not bringing those evils upon us which our own sins have deserved. So the Vulgar here, who to make out his sence, puts the latter part into the form of an interrogation, If I have sinned, and thou hast spared me for a time, wherefore then dost thou not acquit me from mine iniquity? As if the meaning of Job were this, When in former times I sinned against thee, thou wast pleased to remit of thy severity, and deal gently with me, Thou didst spare me as a Father spareth his Son that serveth him. Why is the tenour of thy dispensations so much changed from what it was, seeing thou art a God that changeth not; and I am but what I was, a weak and changeable man? Why I am I now charged with sin, and not set free, as sometimes (I have been) from sorrow the fruit of it? Wilt thou deal with me, who sin out of infirmity, or against my will, as with those who are wicked, and have a will to sin?

Si peccavi & ad horã pepercisti mihi, &c. Vulg.

Secondly, To prevent others from doing what they desire, or our selves from what we fear (Psal. 18. 23.) I was upright before him, and kept my self from mine iniquity; as if he had said, I have maintained such strict watch over my own heart; that I have prevented my self from falling into that sin which I was most subject to and in danger of, both in regard of my constitution and temptation. Taking this meaning of the word, the whole verse is rendered thus, If, or, When I am ready to sin, thou (stoppest or) preventest me, why then dost then not acquit me from mine iniquity? As if he had said, Lord, wilt thou deal with me as with a wicked man? Thou knowest that I am not wicked, for by thy preventing grace, thou hast kept me from all wickedness, and stopt me from many sins. Hence note,

> That, The remembrance of the power of God in keeping us pure from greater sins, is an argument that he will spare us, though we have (through infirmity) fallen into sin.

He that holds us from iniquity, will not destroy us for iniquity. Some are stopt from sin, and storm when they are stopt; these have no reason to think God will spare them because he hath stopt them. Thousands are stopt from sin, who neither know what it is to sin, nor that they have been stopt from sin. These cannot plead this point: As it is no virtue to endure what is not grievous to us, so no grace not to do what is not joyous to us when we do it. But to know we are stopt from a pleasing sin, and rejoyce at it, to see how our corruptions have been prevented, and to bless God for it, this is a great degree of grace. As there is a preventing grace, which beginneth with us, while we are strangers from God, and are walking on in the wayes of sin; so there is a preventing grace, watching over us after we are turned to God, lest we fall into sin. Experience of this may be a sweet support unto the soul, under the saddest afflictions, and in the darkest night of spiritual desertions.

Thirdly, The word signifieth to keep in prison, or in safe custody. The Nown is a prison in Hebrew. And thus the sence is given three wayes, as an Assertion, as an Interrogation, as an Imprecation.

First, As an Assertion, If I have sinned, thou wilt, or, thou maist imprison me, and not acquit me from mine iniquity. Hence observe,

> That, The best and dearest of Gods servants may look for straights, if they walk loosly.

The Lord will shut them up, if they presume and take undue liberty, or grow licentious. They shall be either humbled or destroyed, who turn the grace of God (that is, the manifestation of his grace, either by his word or by his works) into wantonness. God will not cocker his own children, and dandle them so, as to forget to correct them, if they forget him and their own duty. If Israel sin, Israel shall smart for it; and if Job sin, Job must look to be laid in prison for it. Thus he speaks, acquitting God from shining upon the counsels of wicked men, seeing he will not spare, no not his own children, if they sin against him.

Secondly, The sence is given by an Interrogation; If I sin, wilt thou therefore shut me up in prison? Wilt thou not acquit me from mine iniquity? And so he pleadeth with God, as using too much severity and rashness against him; What, shall I be laid by the heels for every fault? Shall I be arrested and clapt up in Irons for every sin? Wilt thou imprison me, and not acquit me from mine iniquity? They who are most wicked, deserve no worse then this; and shall I, if I do but sin, receive such measure? Where are thy compassions, and the sounding of thy bowels? are they restrained? It should seem so, else thou wouldest not thus restrain and imprison me.

Valde durũ videtur, ut si quid peccaverim perpetuò me in carcere, custodiaq; arctissima detineas, neq; unquam peccati pœnas remittere velis. Pin. An simulac pecco observas me, &c. Jun.

Thirdly, As an Imprecation; If I have sinned, according as I am charged, imprison me as long as thou wilt, and do not acquit me from mine iniquity: If I am such a man as my friends judge me to be, I expect no favour: let me be poor and sick still, torture me, rack me, do what thou wilt with me. Like that of David, Psal. 7. 4, 5. If I have rewarded evil unto him that was at peace with me, &c. Let the enemy persecute my soul and take it; yea, let him tread down my life upon the earth, and lay mine honour in the dust. I ask no favour, if I am such a man as mine enemies have represented me; or if I have done that for which they chalenge me.

Verba juramenti & contestantis suam innocentiam; si peccavi, imprecor mihi durissimam custodiam. Bold.

Fourthly, To observe and mark; and it importeth a critical, a curious observation; to mark exactly (Psal. 130. 3.) If thou, Lord, shouldest mark iniquity who shall stand? But doth not the Lord mark iniquity? Doth not he take notice of every sin acted by any of the children of men, especially by his own children? Why then doth the Psalmist put it upon an If? If thou, Lord, shouldest mark iniquity. 'Tis true, the Lord marks all iniquity to know it, but he doth not mark any iniquity in his children to condemn them for it: So the meaning of the Psalm is, That, if the Lord should mark sin with a strict and severe eye, as a Judge, to charge it upon the sinning, no man could bear it. Mr. Broughton translates, When I sin, thou dost watch me; watching is more then marking; as if the Lord had taken up a stand upon a high place, and did there compose himself to see what's done, or to make annotations upon the whole Text of mens lives all the world over. Hence observe, Refertur ad exquisitam Dei observationem universarum humanæ vitæ actionũ. Rab. Abr. Tygur, Reg. 70.

> That, God takes notice of the sins and failings of his own people.

If I sin, then thou markest me; and in the fourteenth Chapter, verse 16. Thou numbrest my steps, dost thou not watch over my sin? Thou numbrest my steps; what steps? He meaneth not the steps of his outward, but of his inward man; or the steps of his outward man in order to the inward. There is a moral walking; Walk before me and be upright; walking is conversing or acting; so, Thou numbrest my steps, thou tellest my moral motions, the actings of my soul and body, what I do, and what I think;

Observas me ne unquam lateant peccata. Aug. Quoties peccavi id diligentissimè notasti. Mer.

Dost

Dost thou not watch over my sin? And again (Chap. 31.4.) Doth not he see my wayes, and count all my steps? That is, how my converſation is ordered, both toward himſelf, and toward my neighbour? Thus the Lord counteth all our ſteps, we cannot ſtep aſide, or tread awry, but he obſerves us. There are two that keep a record of our lives.

Firſt, God, he followeth us up and down, as with Pen, Ink, and Paper, to write our actings.

Secondly, Our own conſciences (which are as God within us) keep a record too, they write our lives, and count our ſteps. Many cannot read the book of conſcience, and ſo know little that is in it: But a time will come (if conſcience be not purged by the blood of Chriſt) when they ſhall perfectly read all their ſins in the book of conſcience. And if conſcience, which is Gods Deputy, then, much more God, who is the Judge of conſcience, marketh us if we ſin. God needs not judge upon information, but upon his own obſervation. He will reprove every man whom he doth not pardon; And is able to ſet before us in order, whatſoever any of us have done. How then do ſome ſay, That God ſeeth not ſin in his Children? Job ſaith, that God marked his ſin; but according to this doctrine, he ſhould rather have ſaid, if I ſin, thou doſt not mark me. Some through ignorance ſin, and ſee it not, ſin and perceive it not; but no man (among all the multitudes of men) can ſin unſeen, or unperceived by God. If I ſin, then thou markeſt me.

And thou wilt not acquit me from mine iniquity.

לא תנקני Non purges me ut ſim immunis ab omni peccato

Will not the Lord acquit? Why have we a Goſpel then? What's the buſineſs of mercy? And where's the efficacy of Chriſts blood? Doth not this purchaſe, and do not they offer acquittances from iniquity? The words are interpreted three wayes.

Firſt, That Job ſpeaks from his unbelief, as if he could not ſee pardon through the thick cloud of his troubles, or have any evidence, that God had mercy in ſtore for him, while he endured ſuch plenty of miſeries.

Secondly, That he ſpake thus, upon a ſuppoſition of impenitency; As if he had ſaid, If I ſin and humble not my ſelf, thou wilt not acquit me.

Thirdly, That by iniquity he means his affliction, putting the cauſe for the effect: So, Thou wilt not acquit me for mine iniquity, is, Thou wilt not take away theſe afflictions, which are counted as the proceed or iſſue of mine iniquity.

Hence obſerve, Firſt, Sin is a debt.

Every acquittance ſuppoſeth an obligation. All men, as creatures, are in a debt of duty to God; and when they fail in that, they are in a debt of penalty, as ſinners.

Secondly obſerve, When ſin is pardoned, the ſinner is acquitted, his debt is taken off, and his bonds are cancelled.

Pardon is our diſcharge, our quietus eſt, ſealed in the blood of Chriſt. All Proceſs at Law, or from the Law, is then prohibited: there's no more to be ſaid, or done againſt us.

Again, The word ſignifies to cleanſe and purge, as well as to acquit; Note from it,

That as ſin defileth the ſoul, ſo pardon cleanſeth it.

Purge me with Hyſop, and I ſhall be clean; waſh me, and I ſhall be whiter then Snow, was David's prayer for pardon after his great defilement, Pſal. 51.7. If we confeſs our ſins, he is faithful and juſt to forgive us our ſins, and to cleanſe us from all unrighteouſneſs, 1 Joh. 1.9.

Fourthly, Foraſmuch as Job groaning under burdens of ſorrow, ſpeaks ſo often about the pardon of ſin, We learn,

That while ſin remaineth (to our ſence) unpardoned, the ſoul ſeeth no way to get out of ſorrows.

The removing of affliction is a ſign that ſin is forgiven, and the ſenſe of our forgiveneſs, is an argument that affliction ſhall be removed.

Fifthly, Taking the former words in conjunction with theſe, If I ſin (knowingly and wickedly, as they charge me) Thou wilt not acquit me from mine iniquity. Obſerve,

That a perſiſting ſinner, is an unpardoned ſinner.

There is abundant mercy for returning ſinners, but I know of none for thoſe that reſolve to go on in ſin. There is a promiſe of repentance, and a promiſe to repentance, but there is no promiſe which doth not either offer or require repentance; Repent, and thou ſhalt be ſaved, is the tenor of the Goſpel, as well as believe, and thou ſhalt be ſaved. Though many who are going on in their ſins, are overtaken by grace, yet there is no grace promiſed to thoſe who go on in their ſins. The holieſt are threatned with wrath, if they do; ſurely then, none are put into an expectation of mercy, if they do. The promiſes either find us repenting, or they cauſe us to repent. No ſinner is pardoned for repentance, nor without it. Job ſpeaks that language more clearly in the words following, which ſome make an expoſition of theſe.

Verſ. 15. If I be wicked, Wo unto me.

If I be wicked.] What it is to be wicked, hath been ſhewed, and the difference between a wicked man and a ſinner diſcovered, at verſ. 7. upon thoſe words, Thou knoweſt that I am not wicked.

Wo unto me.] The word is derived (ſaith one of the Rabbins) from a root ſignifying to howl: Great mourning is a kind of howling: and they who are in wo, are bid to howl (Iſa. 13.6. & 23.1. &c.) Wicked men howl rather then pray in their diſtreſs, becauſe of their extream worldly wo; They have not cryed unto me with their hearts, when they howled upon their beds, Hoſ. 7.14.

There are legal woes, and there are evangelical woes. The Law cries wo, and ſo doth the Goſpel: Goſpel woes are the worſer of the two; for if the Law ſay wo to us, the Goſpel may ſay mercy to us; but if the Goſpel ſay, wo to us (as it doth to hypocrites, who abuſe, and to unbelievers, who refuſe mercy) where ſhall we have mercy? All woes may be underſtood in this place, Law woes and Goſpel woes, temporal woes and eternal woes, If I be wicked, then wo unto me.

Hence obſerve, Wo is the portion of wicked men.

Though they laugh, yet wo is their portion, yea they are therefore threatned with wo, becauſe they laugh (Luke 6.25.) Wo unto you that laugh now, for ye ſhall mourn and weep. Some wicked men are as merry, as if mercy were their peculiar. But we may ſay to their mirth, What doth it? Or if we ſhould ask them, What they do to make themſelves ſo merry: David will reſolve us what their courſe is (Pſal. 36.2.) The wicked flattereth himſelf in his own eyes, until his iniquity be found to be hateful. He that would be flattered, ſhall never want a flatterer; for if none will do it, he will do it himſelf. He ſpeaks well of himſelf, and therefore he thinks all's well. But uſually he hath ſome others ready enough to ſpeak well of him too. The true Prophets complained of the falſe for crying peace, peace, when there was no peace; for ſaying all is well, when they ſhould ſay all is wo. But though wicked men flatter themſelves, and though they get their neighbours to flatter them, yea though Miniſters flatter them, yet God will not flatter them; and at laſt their own conſciences will not flatter them neither. Conſcience will preach them a Sermon of woes at laſt, though poſſibly it hath been ſilent through ignorance, or ſilenc'd through malice for a long time.

As all the promiſes of grace and mercy, hang over the heads of the godly and ſincere; which way ſoever they go, a cloud of bleſſings drops and diſtils upon them. So clouds of wrath and blood hang over the heads of wicked men, dropping upon them, yea dropping upon them when they ſuppoſe the Sun ſhineth upon them.

Secondly, Conſider who ſpeaks this; If I (ſaith Job) be wicked, then wo unto me.

Hence obſerve, That, A godly man may put the worſt caſes to himſelf.

The Scripture puts ſuch caſes to godly men, therefore they may put ſuch to themſelves (Rom. 8.13.) If ye live after the fleſh, ye ſhall die, ſaith the Apoſtle, writing to the Saints.

Saints. Though such a supposition cannot be resolved into this position, A godly man shall die, yet the supposition is true, If he liveth after the flesh he shall die. So the Apostle of himself, and his fellow-Apostles, yea of the Angels; If we or an Angel from heaven, preach any other Gospel unto you, then that which we have preached, let him be accursed (Gal. 1.9.) And as Paul prophesied a curse upon any, either Apostle or Angel, who should preach a false Gospel; so a wo upon himself, if he should neglect to preach the true Gospel, 1 *Cor.*9.16. They who are above all curses, may be threatned with a curse. And they who shall certainly be preserved from doing that which inevitably brings the curse, may be told of a curse in case they should do it.

They put dangerous suppositions opposite to these, who say, Let a godly man be never so wicked, yet it shall be well with him; let him sin as much as he will, yet it shall be well with him. The Spirit of God never puts such suppositions. As the Scripture speaks often to perswade; so sometimes to terrifie the godly from sin, but never a tittle which may be an encouragement to sin. It speaks much to keep up their hearts in an assurance of pardon, in case they fall into sin, and much more to keep down their corruptions, and to preserve them from falling into sin. Though there be a truth in it, that how much so ever a godly man sinneth, he shall be pardoned; yet the Scripture useth no such language, and the form of wholsom words teacheth every man rather to speak thus, If I be wicked, then wo unto me.

If I be righteous, yet will I not lift up my head.

These words stand in an elegant opposition against the former. Here are persons and states opposite: persons, The wicked and the righteous; If I be wicked, if I be righteous: states, Wo, and lifting up the head; If I be wicked, then wo unto me; If I be righteous, then will I not lift up mine head. He doth not say, If I be righteous I shall be happy, though that be a truth, but (which was more sutable to his purpose) If I be righteous, yet will I not lift up my head.

Some put this into a dilemma, or double argument, by which Job would aggravate the greatness of his affliction; As if he had said, Let me look which way I will, my case is very sad, if I be wicked then wo be to me; If I be righteous, yet I am so full of sorrows, that I am not able to hold up my head; But I rather interpret this latter part of the verse, as a description of Job's humility, in the best of his spiritual estate, then as any aggravation of the ilness of his temporal estate.

If I be righteous.] He speaks not as if he doubted whether he were righteous or no. Job had shewed the setledness of his spirit in that assurance more then once before, but he puts the best of his case, to shew how low he was in his own thoughts, when he was at best. There is a twofold righteousness; First, Of Justification. Secondly, Of Sanctification, of sincerity or uprightness: and so his meaning is, Suppose I am such, as I have asserted my self to be, and as God himself hath testified me to be, perfect and upright, yet I will not lift up my head; Some read I cannot, others, I dare not lift up my head.

I will not lift up my head.] Not lift up thy head, man, if thou wert righteous? Why, who in the world shall lift up their heads if the righteous shall not? Are their any that have such cause to lift up their heads as they? He might say indeed, If I were rich, or if I were honourable, yet I will not lift up my head; these are things which cannot, and therefore should not lift up any mans spirit an inch from the ground: but to say, If I were righteous, I would not lift up my head, seems a degradation or an abasement of righteousness. To clear this, I shall open the phrase a little.

To lift up the head of another man, is to advance him. Thus Pharaoh lifted up the head of his chief Butler, Gen. 40.13. And the King of Babylon lifted up the head of Jehojakin King of Judah, and brought him forth out of prison, Jer. 52.21. In this sence David calls God, The lifter up of his head, Psal. 3.3.

To lift up our own heads, is to prevail, and to get above pressing evils victoriously, Judg. 8.28. Thus was Midian subdued before the children of Israel, so that they lifted up their heads no more; That is, Gideon routed and made so compleat a conquest over the Midianites, that they were totally broken, and could no more insult over Israel. The victory of Christ over all our spiritual enemies, is thus described, *Psal.*110.7. He shall drink of the brook in the way; that is, of the waters of affliction and sorrow, which either the wrath of God, or the rage of men gave him to drink, while he was in the way of perfecting the work of our Redemption; and because he shall do this, Therefore shall he lift up his head, that is, he shall prevail by his passion, and overcome by dying, yea, he shall overcome death by a triumphant Resurrection.

Again, There is a two-fold lifting up of the head; First, A lifting up of the head with joy and consolation (Luke 21. 28.) Secondly, A lifting up of the head with pride and ostentation, Psal. 83.2. Lo thine enemies make a tumult, and they that hate thee have lift up the head; that is, they have proudly boasted and vaunted themselves. The latter is Job's sence, If I be righteous, I will not lift up my head in pride; he might and he did lift up his head in joy, because he knew himself righteous.

Attollere caput notat gaudium & fiduciam. Coc.

Once more, There is a lifting up of our heads in our selves, and a lifting up of our heads in Christ. Job disclaims the former here, but he all along assumes the latter. We cannot lift up our heads too high, in the thoughts of Free Grace, nor hang them down too low, in the thought of our own Works.

Further, While Job saith, I will not lift up my head, he meaneth less then he speaketh. In Scripture there is sometimes less expressed then is intended, and sometimes more. That of the Apostle (1 Cor. 15.58.) Your labour shall not be in vain in the Lord, rises in sence higher then the expression; our labour in the Lord shall not only not be in vain, but abundantly advantageous. This of Job, I will not lift up my head, falls in sence below his expression, for his meaning is, I will abase my self before God, I will be so far from priding my self, or walking (as the daughters of Jerusalem are described by the Prophet, Isa. 3.16.) with a stretched forth neck; that I will rather hang down my head.

To hang or hold down the head, in Scripture noteth humbling and sorrow; when Christ bids his people lift up their heads, with joy, because the time of their Redemption was drawing nigh; it implied that their heads would hang down with sorrow, while that Redemption was further off. The Jewish fasts are described (in part) by this posture of sorrow (Isa. 58.5.) Is it such a fast that I have chosen? A day for a man to afflict his soul? Is it to bow down his head as a bull-rush? Times of fasting are times of mourning, and then (it seems) they used to hang down the head, as a sign of mourning.

Miseri & infœlices capite demisso, & in terram dejecto ambulant. Sanct.

Hence observe, That a godly man how upright and holy soever he is, walks humbly with God.

The more holiness any soul hath, the more humility it hath. Humility is a great part of our holiness; much more then is it an argument of holiness. The Pharisee (Luke 18.) who thought that he was righteous, lifted up his head full high, he would not lose an inch of his commendation, and therefore commends himself. He is his own reporter of what he had done, and who he was; but the poor Publican durst not lift up his eyes to heaven, his spirit hung down as well as his head, yet he was the righteous man, and went home justified rather then the other. It is the scope and design of the Gospel to make and keep us humble. God hath set up the way of saving us by faith, that he might take away boasting, and that no flesh might glory in his sight.

Secondly, If Job would not lift up his head, though righteous, what shall we judge of those, who lift up and carry their heads so high, though they are wicked? There is no reason any man should be proud of his goodness; what a madness then it is for wicked men to be proud of, or in their naughtiness!

Thirdly, Though Job was very thankful for, and joyful in, yet he durst not lift up his head, or be proud of the white robes and costly raiment of imputed righteousness: What then shall we say of them, who are proud of the dirty rags and filthy raiment of their own inherent righteousness? A godly man walketh tremblingly, lest he should offend, therefore he saith, If I am wicked wo unto me! and he walketh humbly, when he doth not offend, there-therefore he saith, though I am righteous, yet I will not hold up my head. Job hath often breathed out the humility of his soul in former passages, therefore I shall not insist upon it here.

I am full of confusion, therefore see thou mine affliction.

Saturitas hæc respicit animæ ventriculũ, qui tantã arumnarum copiã vix potuit concoquere. Pined.

I am full.] That is, my mind is full. The spirit hath a stomach, or a capacious vessel for the receiving either of good or evil, of joy or sorrow. Job's spirit had received in as much evil and sorrow as ever it could hold, and more then he could well digest.

קלון קלה Quod est cremare, ignominia enim efficit pudorem, qui est πύρωσις in corde, & in vultu sicut ignis. Erubescentes vultus habent flammantes. Sanct.

I am full of confusion.] The word signifies shame and burning heat, because shame appeareth with a burning heat or blush in the face, which is also called confusion of face. Blushing puts the face into a flame. Some take confusion here for shame, rendering the Text, I am full of shame, or of ignominy: which ignominy might arise two wayes; Either from that reproach which his friends cast upon him, while they branded him for a wicked man, and an hypocrite; I am full of reproach, so full, that I might justly be ashamed, yea confounded, if I were such as they describe me. Or from that reproach which his afflictions cast upon him. Poverty is no shame to a begger, who was born poor; but poverty is a shame to a man who hath been rich, and lived in honour. The original word holds this forth most properly, being opposed to that which signifies weightiness and honour, because honour is a weighty thing, as this signifies lightness and shame, because shame is a light thing, or a thing of nought.

Our Translators rendering the word confusion, seem to intend somewhat else besides shame.

Confusion notes a disorder, and an uncomposedness of spirit. When a man knows not what to do, or whose counsel to follow. When a man cannot make up his thoughts, or bring them to any issue: When the mind is like a skain of ravell'd silk which will neither wind nor draw, then we are in confusion. And this I conceive was it, which Job chiefly intends, when he saith, I am full of confusion.

Hence observe, Great sorrows distract the mind, and bring a man to his wits end.

While we suffer much, we scarce know what to do. Trouble upon the sensitive part, troubles the understanding. Confusion upon our estates, makes a confusion in our minds. It is very hard to keep our spirits in order, while our houses and business are out of order: every affliction makes some confusion without us: and it is exceeding rare if affliction make not much confusion within us. I (saith Job) am full of confusion.

See thou mine affliction.] There is a two-fold sight of affliction; First, by a bare intuition, discerning it. Secondly by a gracious compassion, delivering us from it. The former sight God always hath of all our afflictions; neither our sins, nor our sorrows can be hidden from him. The latter he sometimes suspends, and will not see, what he cannot but see. He will not see so as to relieve, what he cannot but see so as to observe. It is this second kind of sight, which Job entreats and prayes for here; See thou my affliction; that is, pity me in my affliction.

The word which we render affliction noteth weakness, and casting down, or that weakness which ariseth from casting down, an oppressing affliction, which like some great weight lies heavy upon us.

Videt vexationem homo qui vexatur videt Deus qui eam respicit & propitius est. Drus.

There are different readings; some thus, I am filled with affliction, and see my sorrows. The Chaldee thus, I will satiate my self with shame, and I will see my affliction. Man seeth his affliction by feeling it. Sight which is the chief sense, is put for any sense. And so the meaning is, Though I am righteous, yet I cannot hold up my head, or take any comfort, because I am so full of confusion, and see so much affliction; As if he had said, Can a man at the same time mourn and rejoyce? Can a man lift up his head, while he hath such a load upon his heart?

Hence observe, They who see much affliction, can hardly take in any consolation.

Come to a godly man, under great outward or inward troubles; tell him of the love of God, of the pardon of sin, of an inheritance among the Saints in light, as his portion; you can hardly fasten any of these things upon him: sorrow within, keeps comfort out. As till sin be cast out we cannot act holily: so till worldly sorrow, or the excess of godly sorrow be cast out, we cannot act joyfully. The Saints in a right posture of spirit, are joyous in all their tribulations; and Christ is able to make consolations abound, as tribulation doth abound; yet where there is abundance of tribulation, consolation is usually very scarce. Drops will hardly be received, where Rivers are offered and poured forth.

Satis habeat ignominiæ, & vide impotentiam meam. Coc.

Another reading of the word, representeth Job bespeaking God in prayer, mixed with complaining; If I were righteous, yet cannot I lift up my head: be thou satisfied with confusion, and behold my affliction. So Mr. Broughton. As if Job had said, Let it be enough, Lord, let it now suffice, give me some ease, that I may lift up my head a little before I lay it down for altogether. Thus David prayed (Psal. 39. 11, 12.) When thou with rebukes dost correct man for iniquity, thou makest his beauty to consume away like a moth; surely every man is vanity; O spare me, that I may recover strength, before I go hence, and be no more. When Nehemiah was humbling himself, and confessing his sin, and the sin of that people, he concludes according to this interpretation, (Chap. 9. 32.) Let not all the trouble seem little before thee that hath come upon us, on our Kings, on our Princes, and on our Priests, and on all thy People; as if he had said, Lord, consider that now we have been greatly punished, though we have been punished less then our sins deserve. Thou maist justly inflict more, but we are not able to endure more.

Thirdly, We read imperatively, Therefore see thou mine affliction: So his meaning is, Lord, take notice of my sad condition, I am full of trouble.

Rectius in imperativo, q. d. vide Domine quo sim statu, tũ cognosces ita esse ut dico. Merc.

Hence observe, That when sorrows are come to a great height it is time for us to pray, that God would cast a compassionate eye upon them.

When we are past the cure and help of man, we are fittest objects for God. When the pressures of the people of Israel were greatly encreased in Egypt, then the Lord himself saith, I have seen, I have seen (Exod. 3. 7.) and when affliction is boyl'd up to the height, then let us say, See Lord, see Lord. When the rage and blasphemy of Rabshakeh, both by speaking and writing, reached even unto heaven; Then Hezekiah went and spread the letter before the Lord, (2 King. 19. 14.) As if he had said, Lord, do thou read this letter, Lord, bow down thine ear and hear, Lord, behold and see, we are full of confusion, see thou our affliction. And when the enemies of the Jews in Nehemiah's time fell to scoffing and jearing the work they had in hand, and them in the work, then that zealous Governour puts it unto God, Hear, O our God, for we are despised.

Secondly, Note, That when our afflictions are at the highest and greatest, then the Lord is able to master and subdue them.

I am full of confusion, see thou mine affliction; As if he had said, It is in vain for me to shew my diseases and my wounds to creatures, but I know I am not past thy cure, though I come thus late; or thus, I have shewed my wounds and my diseases to the creature, I have made my moan to men, but they cannot help: Now I bring them unto thee, O see my affliction. All our ruines may be under the hand of God, he hath bread and cloathing for us, he can be our healer, when none can either in Heaven or Earth.

Lastly observe, When our afflictions are at the highest, then usually God comes to deliver.

When the waters of affliction swell over the banks, and threaten a deluge, then God turns the stream; when our sores fester and are ready to gangrene, then God applies his balsom. He seldom appears in a business which others can do, or undertakes that which is mans work. As in the sore travel of women in child-bearing, other helpers undertake it not, till (as they speak) it be past womans work; so God seldom meddles eminently (he acts alwayes concomitantly) till our deliverance is past mans work, that so the whole praise of the work may be his. When danger is upon the growing hand, then desire God to take deliverance rance in hand; then pray, and pray earnestly, that God would see your afflictions, when you perceive them to be increasing afflictions; so it follows in the next verse, See thou mine affliction.

Verse 16. For it increaseth; Thou huntest me as a fierce Lion, and again thou shewest thy self marvellous upon me.

This Verse with the next, are an elegant and pathetical description of Job's yet growing and prevailing sorrows; for having closed verse 15. with an Assertion and a Petition, I am full of confusion, therefore see thou mine affliction; he presseth and pursueth both in these words, For it increaseth; Thou huntest me as a fierce Lion.

גאה In bonum, elevatur, eminuit; in malum, intumuit, superbiit; de inanimatis, crevit, auctus fuit.

For it increaseth.] Mr. Broughton renders, How it fleeth up! The Hebrew word is taken sometimes in a good, and sometimes in an ill sence. In a good sence it signifies to be lifted up, or be eminent in excellency. In an ill sence, it signifies to be lifted up or exalted with pride. The word is applied also to things without life, and then it signifies to augment by addition or increase.

The Vulgar takes it in that ill sence, as noting pride and high-mindedness, translating by the Nown, thus, For pride thou dost catch me as a Lion; or thou dost hunt me as a Lion, because I am proud. A Lion is a stout creature, and may be an emblem of pride.

Another gives a sence near that. When it lifteth up it self, then thou huntest me as a fierce Lion. When what lifteth up it self? When my head lifteth up it self; he had said in the former verse, If I be righteous, yet will I not lift up my head; for if I do lift up my head in pride, then thou wilt hunt me as a fierce Lion; I shall be sure to smart for every proud thought and high imagination. Both these Translations render the meaning of Job thus, If I should plead my own righteousness and innocency before thee, as thinking therein to lift up my head, and so should wax confident in my self, I shall presently pay for it; for I perceive that thou art preparing thine instruments against me, as men do against fierce Lions and wild savage beasts, to hunt, catch and destroy me. Here is a truth in thesi, God doth resist the proud: If any head lifteth it self up against God, God can quickly lay such an head as low as the ground. But in Hypothesi, or in Job's case, I cannot consent to it, as a truth suting this Text.

A third Translation puts it by an Interrogation; I am full of confusion, see thou mine affliction; Can it be lifted up? That is, Can my head be lifted up, when I am so full of sorrow and confusion? Whatsoever my righteousness is, I am not in case now to stand upon it; 'tis no time for me to talk great words: Can I lift up mine head when thou pressest me with such a weight of affliction? Great afflictions will keep down the greatest spirits, or break them down. Affliction will make the stoutest heart stoop, and the highest head to bow.

But take the word according to our reading, as it refereth to his afflictions; it increaseth, that is my affliction increaseth, and so a double exposition is given.

First, As if Job had spoken his wish or his desire; I am (said he before) full of confusion, see thou mine affliction. O that mine affliction might increase, and that I might be fuller of confusion! O that my troubles might be strengthened upon me; and that I might be weak enough to see an end of my troubles! I am yet too strong for death; O that thou wouldest quickly dispatch me! more weight, deeper wounds, harder blows would be welcome. As if here again Job had assumed and renewed that complaining desire mentioned (chap. 6. 7, 8.) O that I might have my request! and that God would grant me the thing that I long for! (What was that?) Even that it would please God to destroy me, that he would let loose his hand, and cut me off. But I shall let this pass; Job hath spoken these wishes plainly, and in the Letter too often; I will not charge him with another from a questionable interpretation.

Rather take the words declaratively, not for a wish of greater future afflictions, but for a manifestation of the greatness of his present afflictions; so we express them; I am full of confusion, see thou mine affliction, for it increaseth. This is a clear and a fair sence: Job intending to describe his estate more fully, sheweth it still upon the encrease, waxing worse and worse, greater and greater. As if he had said, mine are a pile or heap of afflictions, and still more are piled up and heaped on.

There is an elegancy in it, as taken in the other sence, for pride or lifting up. See my affliction, it waxeth proud. For as the waves of the Sea are called proud waves, when they swell and encrease; so an affliction encreasing and swelling, may be called a proud affliction. Some afflictions, like a great Sea, rise above us, and stand over us; or like a cruel Master, domineer and insult upon us. Job's afflictions were proud ones, they came upon him with a kind of authority, as if they would lay him at their very feet. Hence observe,

Effert sese afflictio mea. Elegantiâ autem figura dicit, quod sese efferat. Elationem & superbiam morbo & dolori tribuit, cum totum hominẽ possideat. Mer

They who have endured very great afflictions, may yet find their afflictions greatning and encreasing.

He had said before, I am full of confusion; and yet here he saith, My affliction encreaseth. When we think we have as much as our backs can bear, yet (possibly) more weight may be laid on. When we hope our affliction is upon the declining hand, that those waters are upon an ebb, and the fire slacking, then they may flow higher, and the furnace may be heated seven times hotter then before. The Lord threatneth obstinate and rebellious sinners (Lev. 26.) I will punish you yet seven times more for your sins. Though I have brought such calamities upon you, that ye have been ready to say, surely now God hath done his worst, we are in as bad a case as we can be; no, saith the Lord (who hath infinite wisdom to find out wayes of afflicting, as well as of shewing mercy) I will punish you yet seven times more for your sins; no man knows how much more God can punish him: His judgments in the executing of them, as well as in the laying of them, are past finding out. We know not the beginning of them, neither do we know when they will end. Now as the Lord afflicteth some seven times more for the punishment of their sins, so others seven times more for the trial of their Graces. Sufferings are sent in perfection, to make us more perfect through sufferings. Afflictions swell with pride, to abate the swelling of our pride, or to shew how those swellings are abated into humility. God hath unsearchable riches and treasures of chastenings, as well as of wrath or of love. And as when we think we have received as much mercy as God can give us, he can yet give us more, and make our mercies sevenfold greater to our apprehensions then before; so also he can dispense himself in the matter of affliction.

For it increaseth.] This increase is set forth by an elegant similitude. Though similitudes prove nothing, yet they much illustrate what is already proved.

Thou huntest me as a fierce Lion.

Thou huntest me as the ramping Shakal: So Mr. Broughton. The word Shakal, signifies a fierce assaulting Lion; or, as we speak, a Lion rampant. Some translate a Lioness, others a Leopard, spoken of in the fourth Chapter. We may take it in general for any fierce, cruel and savage beast, of the one kind or of the other.

Thou huntest me as a fierce Lion.] For Thou, some render (It) referring to his affliction; For it increaseth, and it hunts me (my affliction hunteth me) as a fierce Lion. Sorrows are compared to a fierce Lion. Afflictions hunt and follow, they tear and destroy like a wild beast. Like a Lion, or like the young Lion, roaring on his prey (as the Prophet speaks, Isa. 45.) when a multitude of shepherds is called out against him (Christ is compared to such a Lion there) will not be afraid of their voyce, nor abase himself for the noise of them. Such were the afflictions of distressed, despised Job, they braved him to his very face, and would not withdraw or turn away from him, notwithstanding all the outcries and loudest lamentations which he made against them.

Effert se dolor meus ut Leo, nequaquam cedens. Merc.

Secondly, The comparison is laid between the Lion and Job; Thou huntest me as if I were a Lion: So divers of the Ancients, and the Septuagint understand it: I am taken or catched like a Lion: As if Job had said, Lord, thou usest me as a wild beast, thou huntest me as thou wouldest hunt a Lion or a Bear, thou settest thy nets and toils, thou makest snares and pits (as Nimrods do in the hunting of Lions and other wild beasts) Thou dealest with me as if there were no taking, no taming of me, but by severest and roughest wayes: Thou dealest with me, as if in my prosperity I had been

like a fierce Lion, oppressing and preying upon the poor; or, as if in my affliction I had provoked thee to resolve, that thou wilt never leave off to afflict me, till thou hast destroyed me; Thou hunteſt me as a fierce Lion: How are they hunted? Lions are not usually hunted to be preserved, 'tis rare to hunt Lions so, but because they are hurtful and destroying creatures, therefore they are hunted that they may be destroyed, and do no more hurt; as if he had thus expressed himself, Thou, Lord, seemest to adjudge me not only as an unuseful and unserviceable creature, but also as a dangerous and a noxious creature, as a natural brute beast made to be taken and destroyed (2 Pet. 2. 12.) yet I cannot assent that Job (though under the darkness of a sore temptation) had such dark thoughts of God, as if he had no other end in afflicting him, but to make an end of him.

Non caplor ad vitam, ut animalia quæ ſolent haberi in deliciis. Bold.

I rather expound him in a third sence, that the comparison is made between God and the Lion; Thou, O God, like a Lion, dost hunt me. Consent of Scripture is clearest for this interpretation, which often represents God in afflicting his people, under the notion of a Lion, as will appear in the proof of the observation arising from it; which is,

That, The Lord seemeth sometimes to put off all his pity and compassion towards his people.

So the Church complains (Lam. 3. 10.) He was unto me as a Bear lying in wait, and as a Lion in secret places. God threatned by the Prophet Hosea (chap. 5. 14.) I will be unto Ephraim as a Lion, and as a young Lion to the house of Judah; I, even I will tear and go away. I will afflict them fiercely and terribly. Again (Hos. 13. 7.) I will be unto them as a Lion, as a Leopard by the way, will I observe them. Hezekiah speaks the same Language (Isa. 38. 13.) I reckoned till morning, that as a Lion, so will he break all my bones. As when man dealeth cruelly with his brother, he is a Wolf to him, or a Lion to him (Psal. 17. 12.) Man acting of beastly lusts, is all the metamorphosis or change of men into beasts, which Heathen Poets have so much fancied, or the Holy Scriptures so often mentioned. Now, I say, as man acting cruelly upon man, is called a Lion, so also is God. When God would shew the abatements of his wrath, then he saith, I am God, and not man (Hos. 11. 89) How shall I give thee up Ephraim? &c. Thus he debates, by and by he votes and resolves negatively, I will not execute the fierceneſs of mine anger; I will not return to destroy Ephraim; for I am God, and not man. But when he would shew the highest workings of his wrath, then he denies to shew himself so much as man: Thus old Babylon and Chaldea are terrified (Isa. 47. 1.) Come down and sit in the dust, O virgin Daughter of Babylon, &c. Why so? Babylon had set so long upon the Throne, that she knew not how to think of sitting in the dust; yet she must: for (verſ. 3.) I will take vengeance, and will not meet thee as a man. How then? I will meet thee as if I were a beast, or a Lion; Thou shalt find no kind of humanity at all from me, not only not the kindnesses and mercies of a God, but not so much as the kindness and mercy of a man. Thus the Lord met with that Literal Babylon, and so at last he will meet with Mystical Babylon. And as he will be to all his proud enemies, a destroying and devouring Lion; so he appeareth often to his own people; he saith even to Jeruſalem, and to Zion, I will not meet you as a man, when you are carnal and walk as men. The usual dealings of God with his people are full of compassion; In measure (peck-peck) when it ſhooteth (or when thou ſendeſt it) forth, thou wilt debate with it; He ſtayeth his rough wind in the day of the Eaſt-wind (Isa. 27. 8.) He will not bluster against and storm his people, when their enemies storm against them; he also measures out their afflictions, and marks what is fit and proportionate to their strength, and for their good, as a Physitian measures and weighs all the ingredients which he mingles in a potion for his sick Patient: so the next words intimate; By this therefore shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged, and this is all the fruit to take away his sin. Yet at another time he afflicteth without measure, as if he intended to kill rather then to cure, and to take away their lives, rather then to take away their sins. I grant his greatest afflictions are as exactly measured and weighed as the least. God knows to an hairs breadth, the length and breadth, and to a grain, the weight and burden of the longest, broadest and weightiest affliction; but when he afflicts greatly, he is said to afflict without measure, because things unmeasurable, or which cannot easily be measured, are very great. And if ever the Lord afflicted any of his (in this sence) without measure, surely he afflicted Job so, who thus cries out, Thou hunteſt me like a fierce Lion.

And again thou ſheweſt thy ſelf marvellous (or wonderful) upon me.

Again.] We render it as an Adverb; others, as a Verb, Thou returneſt, and ſheweſt thy ſelf wonderful upon me. The sence is the same in both, noting the continued or repeated acts of his affliction. Thou art still wonderful against me. As if Job had said, Lord, thou no sooner ceaſeſt, but thou beginneſt again; thou no sooner takeſt off thy hand, but I feel it again; if thou graunteſt me a little breathing, and withdraweſt from me, thou returneſt again; if thou giveſt over the chaſe a while, thou purſueſt it again with as loud a cry, with as fierce aſſaults as ever; my sorrows know no intermiſſion, my pains know not only no period, but no pauſe, I have ſtorm upon ſtorm, grief upon grief, here much and there much, I am alwayes and every where again afflicted, though already half-dead with affliction. Hence observe, וחשב Et rediis, licet aliquantiſper remittas, tamen ſtatim redis, &c. Una vice poſt aliam. Ab. Ezr. Iterum iterumque oſtendis miranda tua facta in me. Druſ. In me non caret emphaſi, q. d. in me jam ſemel, mortuo & pene confecto. Merc.

God doth often renew the ſame, or ſend new afflictions upon his choiceſt ſervants.

One would think that light should follow darkness, and day succeed the night, that though sorrow continue all the night, yet joy should come in the morning, that after wounding; we should have healing, and after sickness, health. So they promised themselves (Hos. 6. 1.) Come, and let us return unto the Lord, for he hath torn, and he will heal us; he hath ſmitten, and he will bind us up. Yet many have felt wounding after wounds, and smiting after blows; darkness hath went after darkness, and their sorrow hath had a succession of greater sorrows. It was a special favour to Paul, when Epaphroditus was restored (Phil. 2. 27.) He was ſick nigh unto death, but (saith he) God had mercy on him, and not on him only, but on me alſo; and why? Leſt I ſhould have ſorrow upon ſorrow. God would not do what some of his enemies thought to do, add affliction to his bonds; therefore he healed Paul's helper, and kept him alive, in whom he so much delighted. Sorrow upon ſorrow is a mournful bearing, and yet many a precious Saint hath born that coat. The promise to the Church is, That her peace ſhall be as a River, and her proſperity as the waves of the Sea (Isa. 66. 12.) When the Church shall come to her full beauty, and attain a perfect restauration, then her peace shall be a continued peace, she shall have peace upon peace, everlasting successions of peace; a River being supplied and fed with a constant stream, the waters that flow to day, will flow again to morrow; peace like a river is peace, peace, or perpetual peace. Sions peace shall not be as a Land-flood, soon up, and as soon down again; but as a River: and (which yet heightens it) her proſperity ſhall be as the waves of the Sea. If the wind do but stir upon the face of the Sea, you shall have wave upon wave, waves rolling and riding one upon the back of another. Such shall be the prosperity of Zion on earth for a time, and such it will be for ever in heaven; there peace shall be as a river to eternity, and prosperity as the waves of the Sea, joy upon joy, and comfort upon comfort, riding and rolling one upon the back of another. As it shall be thus with the peace of the Church at last, so it may be with the afflictions of the Church or of any member of the Church at present. Their afflictions may be as a river, and their sorrows as the waves of the Sea, coming on again and again, renewed as often as abated.

Again thou ſheweſt thy ſelf wonderful, or marvellous againſt or upon me. Both rendrings are consistent with the Original.

Marvellous upon me.] That is, Thou dost not punish or afflict me in an ordinary way. Marvels are not every dayes work, thou takest a new, a strange course to try me; such afflictions as mine have no parallel, such have scarce been heard of, or recorded in the history of any Age. Who hath heard of such a thing as this? Thou seemest to design me as a president to posterity, or to shew in my example what thou canst do upon a creature; Thou ſheweſt thy ſelf marvellous upon me. As Moses saith concerning Korah, Dathan and Abiram, when they murmured and murinied against against him and against Aaron, If these men die the common death of all men, or if they be visited after the visitation of all men, then the Lord hath not sent me; but if the Lord make a new thing, and the earth open her mouth, and swallow them up, then, &c. The Lord to manifest his extream displeasure against those mutiniers, did (as it were) devise a new kind of death for them; If these men die the common or the ordinary death of all men, then the Lord hath not sent me. These men have given a new example of sin, and surely God will make them a new example of punishment. Job speaks the same sence, Thou shewest thy self marvellous upon me, thou wilt not be satisfied in afflicting me after the rate or measure of other men: All the Saints should do some singular thing, and many of them suffer some singular thing. The Apostle assures his Corinthians (1 Cor. 10. 13.) There hath no temptation taken you, but that which is common to man. Job seems to speak the contrary. A temptation hath taken me, which is not common to man.

Further, These words, Thou art marvellous upon me, have reference to God who sent those afflictions, as well as unto the afflictions which he sent: As if he had said, Lord, thou actest now besides thy nature and thy custom: thou art merciful, and thou delightest in mercy; thou art good, and thou dost good; how or whence is it then, that thou art so fierce against me, and pourest out so many evils upon me? I could (not knowing thee as I do) have believed, though it had been told me, that thou wouldest have been so rigorous and incompassionate; if a professed enemy had done this, he had done like himself, and had been no wonder unto me; but now as thou hast afflicted me, till I am become a wonder unto many; so thou, O Lord, art become a wonder unto me, and to all who hear how thou hast afflicted me. Meek Moses made himself a wonder, when he broke out in anger. Every man is wondered at, when he doth that which he is not enclined to do, or not used to do. Is it not a wonder to see the patient God angry, the merciful God severe, the compassionate God inexorable? Thus, saith Job, Thou shewest thy self marvellous upon me. Hence observe,

First, That, Some afflictions of the Saints are wonderful afflictions.

As God doth not often send his people strange deliverances, and work wonders to preserve them, so he sends them many strange afflictions, and works wonders to trouble them. And as many punishments of sin upon wicked men, so some trials of Grace upon godly men, are very wonderful. The Lord threatneth the Jews (Deut. 28. 59.) That he would make their plagues wonderful, he would make strange work among them. And he saith of Jerusalem, I will wipe it as a man wipeth a Dish, wiping it, and turning it upside down, or wiping it, and turning it upon the face thereof (2 Kings 21. 13.) To see a great City handled like a little dish, or a strong Nation turned topsie-turvy (as we say) or the bottom upwards, is a strange thing. It is an ordinary thing to see Cups and Platters turned upside down, but it is not ordinary to see Kingdoms and Nations turned upside down. To wipe Jerusalem as a dish, was to do that which was never done before. Some expound that place of the frequency of affliction, that God would smite them again and again; as they that make clean a dish, wipe it over and over, that no filth may stay in it. The Seventy and the Vulgar translate, I will blot out Jerusalem as they use to blot out a Table-book that is written all over: He that hath a Table-book full of writing, and would write more, takes a cloth or a spunge, and blotteth out what was written; and that he may throughly wipe his Table-book, he rubs it often with his spunge, to get the Letter clear out. Thus God threatned to do with Jerusalem, He would wipe or blot out her golden Characters and honourable inscriptions, till nothing of Jerusalem, but her shame and her sin, should remain unblotted out. Was not the judgment brought upon Jerusalem a wonder? when the Prophet saith (Lam. 4. 12.) The Kings of the earth, and all the inhabitants of the world would not have believed it. The Apostle speaks thus of his own, and of his fellow-Apostles afflictions (1 Cor. 4. 9.) We are made a spectacle (as upon a Theater) unto the world, and to Angels, and to men. All begin to wonder at us, what the matter is, what strange creatures we are, whom the Lord suffers to be thus used. The people of God are often a gazing-stock to the world, in regard of what they do, and not seldom in regard of what they suffer.

Θαῦμα ἐγένετο.

Secondly observe, That, When God doth greatly afflict his own people, he goes out of his ordinary way.

He shews himself marvellous or wonderful; a man is never marvelled at, when he goes his old pace in his old path. God loves to have his hand in the honey-pot, therefore it is strange to see him give his people a bitter cup to drink, or feeding them with wormwood or with gall. Judgment is the strange work of God (Isa. 28. 21.) The Lord shall be wrath in the valley of Gibeon, that he may do his work, his strange work; and bring to pass his act, his strange act. And if every work of judgment be his strange work, a work he delighteth not to be conversant in, what then are great and sore judgments? Though the Lord be infinitely pleased in the executions of judgment, yet because (if a more may be conceived in infinity) he is more pleased with mercy; therefore judgment is called his strange work, his strange act. To see a Prince renowned for clemency and pity, passing a severe sentence, is a strange sight. We say he hath shewed himself marvellous, he hath gone both against his practice and his nature, his custom and his inclination. To see any man do what he useth not, hath somewhat of wonder in it; much more, to see God do so. When he taketh up his Rod, we begin to start; how much more, when he taketh up his sword, when he hunts those like a Lion, whom he dearly loveth, and uses those as wild beasts, who are his precious children? When he smites them with rigor, whom he carrieth in his own bosom? These, these are acts which represent him to admiration; as many acts of his power and mercy cause the Saints to cry out admiringly, yet joyfully, Who is a God like unto thee? So some acts of his visible severity cause others of them to cry out admiringly, yet sorrowfully, Why, O God, dost thou in appearance so unlike thy self?

Verse 17. Thou renewest thy witnesses against me (or, thou bringest new witnesses against me) and increasest thine indignation upon me; changes and war are against me.

This seventeenth verse is but a further amplification of what he had spoken before, setting forth the greatness and frequent returns of his trouble.

Thou renewest.] The first day of the Month is called Chodesh in the Hebrew, from the word here used, because then there was a New Moon, or a change of the Moon; so, Thou renewest, thou makest a change; I have many new Moons, but they are all and alwayes at full in sorrow; Thou renewest

Chodesh, Novilunium primus dies mensis, quo quasi Luna innovatur.

Thy witnesses.] The Septuagint saith, thy examinations; so it is an allusion to the trial of a Malefactor, who is examined by the Judge, and if he deals not plainly in confession, then his examination is renewed. Thus saith Job, Thou sendest (as it were) new examiners with more Articles and additional Interrogatories, as if I had concealed somewhat, and had not told thee my whole heart.

We translate (and so the word most properly beareth) witnesses; the sence is the same. As some Malefactors are often examined, so more evidence, and new witnesses are brought against them; though in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall be established, yet where there are more witnesses then two or three, there is more establishment.

Again, As they who are of a wrangling and unquiet disposition, will never sit down in a Suit, when by the examination of some witnesses, they have brought the matter to a trial, and are cast; yet this doth not satisfie them, they will have their Writ of Errour, and bring the matter about in another Court. Thus (saith Job) as if the Lord were resolved this Suit should never have an end, He renewes his witnesses against me. When I think all is concluded and agreed between us, I am as much to seek as ever; he brings all about again. So that after all my travel, I am as far from an end, as I was at the beginning; I am where I was, and am like to continue there; for I see the Lord renewing his witness against me.

Non tam videtur de instauratione plurium testium queri, quam de sententiæ ferendæ dilatione & mora. Pin.

The doubt is, what or whom he meaneth by these Witnesses?

Philippus à Lo.

One saith, These witnesses were Devils. Satan accused him at first, and he is not alone either in tempting or accusing, he can soon have a Legion to joyn with him in any design of wickedness. But I pass that opinion.

Secondly, Others say, The Witnesses were Job's three Friends; they all testifie against him; Eliphaz began, and Bildad was his second, Zophar stood ready to follow; all against Job.

Pœna unius pœnitentiæ, quasi de statim decedente, aliam quasi secuturam tam efficaciter es. Coc.

Thirdly, By Witnesses, most (and they most clearly) understand his afflictions; Thou reneweſt thy witneſſes, that is, thou bringest new troubles to testifie against me. When one affliction hath spoken at thy Bar against me, thou callest for the testimony of another, and of another, and when there will not be another, I know not, unless it be when I am not. When Naomi was become Marah (her former pleasures being turned into bitterness) she saith (Ruth 1. 21.) The Lord hath teſtified againſt me. Job is very expres in the point, at the sixteenth Chapter of this Book, verse 8. Which may be a Commentary upon this; Thou haſt filled me with wrinkles, which is a witneſs againſt me; and my leanneſs riſing up in me, beareth witneſs to my face. Afflictions bring in evidence, and testifie many wayes.

They sometimes witness for us, evidencing our Graces, our Faith, Patience, Sincerity and Submission to the hand of God; they are witnesses also of our Adoption or spiritual Sonship (Heb. 12. 8,) If you be without chaſtiſement, whereof all are partakers, then are ye Baſtards, and not Sons. It is no good sign to be free from sufferings. Hear ye the Rod, saith the Prophet Micah; as we ought to hear it, calling us from sin; so we may hear it calling us as Sons. Chastenings speak our Priviledges, as well as our Duties.

They often witness against us;

First, That sin is seated in us, and hath been acted by us. If we had no sin, we should know no sorrow. Though some afflictions are not sent out directly against sin, yet every affliction is both a consequent and a testimony of remaining sin. The bundle of Rods at our backs, saith, there is folly and sin bound up in our hearts; and when once we are purged from sin, we shall hear no more of any affliction, of any rod. We shall be past suffering, as soon as we are past sinning.

Secondly, They are witnesses in special, of that great sin, the pride of our hearts and lives. If there were not swellings and impostumations of pride in our spirits, we should not feel such lancings. Paul himself acknowledges that they were growing upon him, if God had not taken a severe course to keep them down: Leſt I ſhould be exalted above meaſure through the abundance of revelations, there was given to me a thorn in the fleſh, the meſſenger of Satan to buffet me (2 Cor. 12. 7.) Hence afflictions are called humiliations, both because an afflicted person is humbled or laid low by the hand of God; as also, because afflictions are sent to humble and lay us low in our selves. Now, if one special business which affliction hath with us, be to humble us, then doubtless affliction witnesseth that there is pride in us. That which is sent to remove an evil, shews the presence of it.

Thirdly, They are witnesses, by bringing to our remembrance the acting of forgotten sins. Affliction is a help to memory. That which we forget we have done or spoken, witnesses coming in, make us remember; so also do our troubles. When the Brethren of Joſeph had been put in ward three dayes, and heard him demand one of them to be left as an hostage in prison till they brought Benjamin, this distress caused them to say, We are very guilty concerning our Brother, in that we ſaw the anguiſh of his ſoul, when he beſought us, and we would not hear, therefore is this diſtreſs come upon us (Gen. 42. 21.) The guilt of that sin was about twenty years old, but they felt not the smart of it till themselves smarted for it; their imprisonment set their memories at liberty, and when they saw themselves in danger to become bondmen to the Egyptians, they had witness enough of their selling Joseph for a captive to the Ishmaelites.

Fourthly, Afflictions witness obstinacy and resolvedness in the wayes of sin, or that afflicted persons or Nations turn not for sin. Every wound will open its mouth as a witness, and every stroak will bring an evidence against the impenitent. The troubles which God brought upon Ahaz, witnessed emphatically (2 Chron. 28. 23.) This is that King Ahaz, who in the time of his diſtreſs, did treſpaſs yet more againſt the Lord. If we are not bettered by our distresses, our distresses testifie that we are naught; how much more when we are worse in our distress? As all good things which we have received, so all evils which we have suffered, will rise up in judgment against those who still continue evil.

Fifthly, Afflictions witness two things concerning God. First, That he hath an eye upon us, and care of us. He will not let us want any thing that is needful for us, no, not affliction. Due chastisement given a child, is an argument that his Father loveth him, and looks to him. Secondly, They are witnesses of Gods fatherly displeasure. Some say, God cannot be displeased with his Children, because his love is everlasting. But will any man say, A Father doth not love his Child because he corrects him? Yet a Father never correcteth his Child but when he is displeased with him: Parents may not strike unprovoked, and 'tis rare that God doth so. A man may be much displeased with, and much love the same person at the same time; and 'tis very usual for God to do so. Afflictions never testifie any the least hatred of God against his people, but they often testifie some, and sometimes great displeasure against his people.

Lastly, Afflictions upon the godly, are reckoned very sufficient and credible witnesses by the world, that either they are not godly, or that surely some great ungodliness hath been acted by them. How many precious men have been cast upon this evidence, for traytors and rebels against God? Job's friends took this for proof enough that he was wicked. They could not be perswaded he was good, because he endured so many evils. As the High Priest cried out against Christ, What further need have we of witneſſes? Behold now ye have heard his blaſphemy: So said Job's friends concerning him; What need have we of further witness? Behold we have seen his misery. What do these losses in his estate, and ruines upon his family? What do these sores upon his body, and sorrows upon his soul, but publish unto us (what he hath kept close and concealed) the prophaneness of his spirit, and the hypocrisie of his former profession? Job perceiving his friends making use all along of this proof, as of their chiefest and strongest Medium, might well complain to God, upon the renewal of every dayes affliction, Thou reneweſt thy witneſſes againſt me.

And encreaſeth thine indignation upon me, or, Thy indignation encreaſeth upon me.

In the beginning of the Verse, his own afflictions did increase, but here the indignation of God. Indignation is more grievous then affliction, and the indignation of God is the most grievous indignation.

The word signifies wrath, displeasure, fierce, fiery wrath, hot consuming displeasure. כעס

Increaſeth.] There is a double increase here noted. First, Extensive. Secondly, Intensive; an increase both in multitude and maghitude: As if he had said, I have more troubles in number, and more in weight. רב

Indignation is here put for the effects of indignation; neither the wrath, nor the love of God do ever encrease in him, but in their exertions, or in putting them forth towards us. Hence observe,

First, That, A godly man may conceive himſelf under the indignation of God.

The Church stoops to it (Micah 7. 9.) I will bear the indignation of the Lord, becauſe I have ſinned againſt him.

Secondly observe, That, The more we ſee of the indignation of God in any affliction, the ſorer is the affliction.

As the love and smiles of God comfort the Saints more then all the outward comforts he heaps upon them; a little with much sensible love, is to us a huge mercy: So the disfavour and frowns of God troubles the Saints more then all the troubles which he heaps upon them. A little with much sensible disfavour, is to us a heavy cross. Let trouble increase, yet if displeasure abate, the spirit of man will bear and stand under it, though his flesh and outward man fall under it. Though the Furnace should be heated seven times hotter, yet if the Lord do do but let down one beam or ray of his love into the ſoul, all that burning fire will be but like a warm Sun. But when the ſcorchings of indignation mingle with affliction, this is dreadful. The anger of a fool (ſaith Solomon) is very heavy; yet that is not ſo much as a feather to a milſtone, or a mountain, compared with the anger of God. And though believers are freed from that anger and indignation which he darts upon his enemies, yet they to ſenſe, yea and to their preſent opinion, may be dealt with as enemies. And though the indignation which God pours upon his own people, and that upon the wicked, be as different as their ſtates are; yet the one may be under as much temporary pain and ſorrow as the other is. For as an hypocrite may for a time taſte as much of the goodneſs of God, and feel as much joy in his ſervice, and ſometimes more, then a man who is godly and ſincere; ſo alſo may one who is godly and ſincere taſte more of the diſpleaſure of God for a time, and feel as much ſorrow in his ſufferings, and ſometimes more, then a wicked man.

Pœne militant in me. Vulg.

Job concludes with the ſame thing, in a different habit of words. Changes and war are againſt me. I have variety of afflictions, a multitude of afflictions, and afflictions in their ſtrength, theſe three things are implied in thoſe two words, Changes and war; he had variety of afflictions, for changes were upon him. He had many and ſtrong afflictions, For war was upon him. One ſtrong man cannot make a war, nor many weak ones. And it is as ſtrange that this ſhould be called a war, which was but againſt one weak man. The Roman ſtories cry up the honour of a man, who alone upon a narrow paſs made a ſtand againſt a whole army, till ſupplies came; what ſhall we ſay then of Job, who ſingle and alone maintained his ſtanding againſt many armies, and held out a long war? Changes and war are upon me.

The firſt word which ſignifies Changes, ſignifies alſo deſtruction or cutting off. Some render it ſo here, exciſion or cutting off (by which he meaneth death) is upon me. The other word which we tranſlate War, noteth alſo a ſet or an appointed time, as was ſhewed at Chap. 7. verſ. 1. Is there not an appointed time to man upon earth? So ſome tranſlate it here, putting all together thus, Exciſion (or death, the cauſe being put for the effect) is upon me, and a determined time of my life.

צרא Eſt tempus quo quis in ſtatione aut militari officio eſt. Circa hos tantos dolores, mihi certum tempus eſt præſcriptum, intra quod ſum moriturus. Merc.

Mr. Broughton tranſlates, Changes and ſtayed army have I. Taking in both interpretations of the word, ſo his ſence may be expreſſed in this tenor, Lord have not I a ſetled and determined time to die? Why then are ſuch extream afflictions prepared againſt, and charged upon me, as if by thoſe thou wouldeſt haſten my death, and bring me to my grave ſooner then thou thy ſelf haſt appointed? I ſhall die at the time thou haſt determined, though thou ſhouldeſt not diſtreſs my life, and even force out my breath with ſuch preſſing extremities.

Hunc ſenſum amplectuntur Aben-Ezra. Rab. Sal.

Further, taking the latter word for a preſcribed time: ſome conceive Job carrying an alluſion to thoſe who are ſurprized with Fevers and Agues: they have changes, ſome well dayes, and ſome ſick dayes, yet the Fever returns upon a ſet time, or in a conſtant recourſe, till the diſtemper is checked; As if he had ſaid, My afflictions are like Fever fits; though I have ſome intermiſſion, yet I find a regreſſion, the fit comes upon me again; Changes, at ſet times are upon me.

Exercitor contrariis & interſe compugnantibus malis, vel potius variis & ſibi invicem ſuccedentibus malorũ agminibus. Merc.

But rather, according to the letter of our tranſlation, Changes and war are againſt me; that is, I am exerciſed with variety of wars. The word imports any kind of change, change of times, or change of things; it ſignifies alſo change of garments (Judg. 14. 12.) That notion of the word, hath an elegancy in it in reference to Job's condition. He was a man cloathed with affliction, ſorrow encompaſſed him as a long mourning cloak; and Job had changes of his rayment, he went not alwayes in one ſuit, though his ſuits were ſtill of one colour, for he went alwayes in blacks.

Again, We may interpret this change, of his change from one eſtate to another, from joy to ſorrows, from peace to trouble, from plenty to want, from coſtly robes to filthy rags. Time was when Job went in ſcarlet and fine linnen, and, if he pleaſed, might have fared deliciouſly every day; but when he ſpake this, he was in another ſtate and habit, cloathed with ſackcloth, and lying in the duſt. It is ſaid of wicked men (Pſal. 55. 9.) Becauſe they have no changes, therefore they fear not God. Every creature is ſubject to change, and have ſome changes every day; God only is unchangable. Yet ſome men ſeem to have no changes, and though they cannot be free from natural changes one moment, yet they may be free from many years civil changes: they may be ſo far from ſuch changes as Job felt, from good to evil, that all the changes they are acquainted with, may be only from good to better, from ſtrong to ſtronger, from rich to richer: that's the intent of the Pſalm; They have no changes from joy to ſorrow, from health to ſickneſs, from riches to poverty, from honour to diſgrace, therefore they fear not God; their hearts were hardned, becauſe their eſtates proſpered.

Agmen quoddam malorum, u etiã dicitu lerna vel Ilias malor Merc.

So then, theſe changes import, either divers ſorts of afflictions, or divers returns and charges of the ſame afflictions. The ſecond word carrieth that alluſion, Changes and war are upon me; that is, ſuch changes as there is in war, when firſt one Regiment charges, and another ſeconds, and ſo Regiment after Regiment, Company after Company, File after File, now the right Wing, and then the left, at laſt the Reſerve. Thus the Lord ſeemed to bring up his Bands and Troops of afflictions to aſſault Job in turns and changes, till his whole Army had aſſaulted and skirmiſhed with him. Thoſe Military terms of ſhooting and warring are frequent figures in Scripture, ſhewing how God conflicts with ſinful, weak man, after the manner of men. Obſerve hence, Vexationes turmatim me invadunt. Drus. Sagittandi & militandi verba ſæpè & elegantèr in ſcripturis declarant Dei contrà impios pœ flagella conſtitutum.

First, That afflictions are at the command of God.

He marſhals and diſpoſes them, as Armies are by their Generals in times of war. He can ſay to one affliction, as the Centurion to his Souldiers, Go, and it goeth; to another, Come, and it cometh; to a third, Do this, and it doth it. All Armies of ſorrow are led by God in chief: They charge whom he pleaſeth, and where he pleaſeth, high or low, Perſon or Nation: if he gives the word, they fall on preſently, nor will they return till he orders their retreat.

Secondly note, That the Lord hath variety of wayes and means to afflict and try his people.

Changes and war are againſt me. The Phyſitian hath variety of medicines for his ſick patient; if one removes not the diſtemper, he changes and tries a ſecond. There is nothing ſo full of changes, as war, not only in regard of the uncertainty of events, but variety of means, new forces being raiſed, and new ſtratagems uſed, from day to day. Haſt thou but one bleſſing? ſaid Eſau to his Father Iſaac. The hand of man may be ſtraitned to one bleſſing, or one blow; but the hand of God is never ſtraightned. As he hath ſtore of bleſſings, ſo of blows, and can give both out, both in degree and kind diverſified; if one Army of evils doth not humble and conquer us to his obedience, he can quickly leavy a new one. All creatures will come in to his help, if he do but ſet up his ſtandard, or give command to beat his drum. He changed his Armies ten times againſt Pharaoh: Pharaoh had indeed changes and war upon him, yet no change wrought in him: therefore the war was changed, till he was deſtroyed. This war with Job was not a deſtroying one, but it was a terrible one, ſo terrible that he cries out in the language of his former complaints, Wherefore then haſt thou brought me forth out of the womb?

VERS. 18, 19, 20, 21, 22.

Wherefore then haſt thou brought me forth out of the womb? O that I had given up the ghoſt, and no eye had ſeen me!
I ſhould have been as though I had not been, I ſhould have been carried from the womb to the grave.
Are not my dayes few? Ceaſe then, let me alone, that I may take comfort a little.
Before I go whence I ſhall not return, even to the land of darkneſs, and the ſhadow of death;
A land of darkneſs, as darkneſs it ſelf; and of the ſhadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkneſs.

THeſe five verſes are the concluſion of Job's reply to Bildad; there are four things remarkable in them.

First, He complaineth that ever he lived a day or an hour in the world, at the beginning of vers. 18. Wherefore then hast thou brought me forth of the womb?

Secondly, He wisheth that he had died speedily: seeing he could not have that (supposed) happiness not to be born into the world, his next request is, that he might not have stayed long in the world; he would not have appeared as a man, no nor as a child, but that birth and burial might have been contiguous, not knowing the distance of a day, Vers. 18, 19. O that I had given up the Ghost, and no eye had seen me! I should have been as though I had not been, I should have been carried from the womb to the grave.

Thirdly, He sheweth that however he had been disappointed of both those votes, yet he could not live long; As if he had said, Though I have found much trouble in the world, yet I shall not much trouble the world, the time of my departure is at hand, I have lived most of my dayes already, and all my dayes are not many, Vers. 20. Are not my dayes few?

Fourthly, He entreateth and sueth that the few dayes (of those few dayes which he had to live) might be good dayes, Are not my dayes few? Cease then, and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little, before I go whence I shall not return, &c.

Sui oblivisci-tur ut superâ, ut doloris. Merc.

The eighteenth and nineteenth verses carry a sence very like to that which hath been opened at Chap. 3. of this Book, where Job complained of his birth, and was troubled that he had the favour of a being (because he found such an ill being) in the world. His passion runneth out here into a vehement expostulation, Wherefore hast thou brought me forth out of the womb? As there, Why died I not from the womb? Vers. 11.

Job puts the Question, and demanded an account of God, Why he came out of the Womb? There are three sorts of questions.

First, Such as arise from a desire of necessary information: 'Tis good to ask that we may learn.

Secondly, Such as arise from a needless curiosity: 'Tis not good to ask what no duty enjoyns us to learn.

Thirdly, Such as arise from pure passion, or rather, from mudded perturbation, not so much desiring information from others, as to vent our selves. 'Tis very ill to ask when we care not to learn. Such is the question here put (say some) a passionate question, arising from the fume and vapors of a distempered mind, desiring to ask, rather then to be answered, Wherefore hast thou brought me forth out of the womb? As if he had said, Was I born only to be an object of evil? Came I into the world to be made a sad spectacle to the world, to Angels and to Men? Have my dayes been lengthened out on purpose, that my troubles might be lengthened? Such a troubled sence there is in these words. The complaints of Saints may sometimes look like the blasphemies of wicked men.

Job complaineth of his birth, and seems forgetful of all former benefits.

Hence observe, When we want the mercies we would have, we grow angry with the mercies which we have had.

un ita is mecum, ex bene-cio tuo non neficium. cc.

David speaks it to the praise of God, Thou art he that tookest me out of my mothers womb (Psal. 22.) Job speaks it as a dammage to himself, Wherefore hast thou brought me forth out of the womb?

Secondly observe, We are ready to think we live to no end, if we have not our own ends.

That's the voice of nature, and so far as nature prevails in us, it speaks in us.

Thirdly, Man is apt to say, there is no reason for that, of which he seeth not the reason.

When we are at our wits end, and at our reasons end, we think there is an end of all wisdom and reason, as if neither God nor man could give an account beyond ours, or answer, when we are non-pluste.

Yet we may conceive Job had a further sence, which yields a more mollifying meaning of these words; for though he (as all the Saints in the Old Testament) was much in the dark about the benefit of sufferings, which the Gospel hath now more clearly revealed to us, and called us unto; yet he might have some other intendment in these expostulations: We may charitably suppose him troubled that he was in a condition of life, which (as he conceived) hindered the main end of his life, the glorifying of God; Wherefore hast thou brought me forth out of the womb? As if he had said, Lord, I am in a state, wherein I know not how to honour thee, and then what is my life worth unto me? Thy justice is greatly obscured towards me; many are ready to say, for my sake, that surely thou art a hard Master, leaving them to reap evil who have sowed good, and paying thy faithful and most active servants their wages in sufferings. And as for mercy, I taste little of that; comforts are dainties with me: my cup is bitter, my sorrows are multiplyed: Now when neither justice nor mercy move visibly towards me, how shall I glorifie thee? And wherein can my life be useful or advantagious to thee? Am I not like a broken vessel, a vessel wherein there is no pleasure? Wherefore then was I brought forth out of the womb?

Nunc in me justitia tua obscuratur, & ego non sentio fructus gratiæ tuæ; quâ in re ergo gloriæ tuæ inservire potest vita mea? Coc.

This Exposition teacheth us, That,

A godly man thinks he liveth to no purpose, if he do not live to the praise and glory of God.

God hath made all things for himself, and it is the design of the Saints to be for him. While that end is attained they can easily part with all their own; and where that is crossed, they cannot be pleased in the attainment of any of their own. The interest of Christ is not only their greatest, but all their interest. Any stop of, much more a disservice to this, causeth an honest heart to cry out with Job, and ('tis easie to conceive) it causeth Job to cry out, Wherefore then hast thou brought me forth out of the womb?

O that I had given up the Ghost, and no eye had seen me!

O that I had given up the Ghost!] The original signifies usually a gentle and an easie kind of death. Giving up the Ghost, is not a pulling or a violent rending of life away from us, but our laying it down, our surrender or willing resignation of it. Some read this clause, not as we Optatively, O that I had given up the Ghost! but declaratively, Wherefore hast thou brought me out of the womb? for then I had quickly given up the Ghost. But rather take it as a wish, O that I had given up the Ghost!

And no eye had seen me.] That is (say some) I would I had died before I had been born, for then no eye had seen me. Or more generally thus, O that I had died speedily, so speedily that I might have gone out of the world, before I was observed to have been there: Who delights to see the dead? Especially a child dead-born, or dying as soon as born? Sarah was the delight of Abraham's eyes, whilst she lived, and yet assoon as she was dead, he gives any money for a sepulchre to bury her out of his sight. Or again, Job that he might shew how little he regarded life, disregards that which is most desirable in life. Man naturally desires, To see, and to be seen; to know, and to be known. That which carries a great part of the world, is an affectation to be pointed at, and taken notice of, as Som-bodies in the world. He that liveth unseen in the world, is as a man out of the world, or as one buried alive. To be in prison is a great punishment, because a prisoner liveth out of view; he cannot freely see or be seen. Job wishes no eye had seen him, rather then his eyes should have seen so much evil, or that others should have seen him in the midst of so many evils. Hence observe, Innatum est omnibus ut cognosci se velint, & studio teneantur res alias cognoscendi.

First, That undue and unreasonable questions, are usually followed and fruited with undue and unreasonable wishes.

Having put the question, Wherefore hast thou brought me forth out of the womb? See what a wish comes upon it, O that I had given up the Ghost, and no eye had seen me! He that takes undue liberty to speak or do, knows not where he shall restrain himself. They who alwayes act as far as they may, shall often act beyond what they ought. And they who act at all beyond what they are directed, are often carried beyond what themselves intended.

Secondly observe, Man had rather not be seen at all, then to be seen miserable.

To be seen, is a great part of the comfort of this life; but who would not gladly exchange it for ease in obscurity? It is an honour to be seen, but who would be seen cloathed with with dishonour? When Christ is propheſied of, as the great pattern of patience and ſelf-denial, it's ſaid, He hid not his face from ſhame and ſpitting, Iſa. 50. 6. To be a ſpectacle of miſery, is to ſome worſe then their being miſerable. They would count it a piece of their happineſs, to be unhappy in a corner; and their troubles half removed, if they might ſteal their troubles. As to be in a good eſtate, and to know that we are ſo, makes our eſtate better to us: So to be in an ill eſtate, and to be known that we are ſo, makes it to ſome tempers a great deal worſe. As the hypocrite hopes when he ſins, that no eye ſees him: ſo many wiſh when they ſuffer, O that no eye had ſeen me!

Verſ. 19. I ſhould have been, as though I had not been, I ſhould have been carried from the womb to the grave.

Some read this verſe alſo as a wiſh; O that I had been, as though I had never been! O that I had been carried from the womb to the grave.

He confirms what he had ſaid, by a further declaration of his condition, in caſe he had not been brought forth out of the womb, or had died before he had been ſeen in the throng of the world; Why, what then Job? Then, I ſhould have been as though I had not been, and my afflictions ſhould never have had any being: ſo ſpeedy a death had quitted me of all the evils of my life. I ſhould not have ſipt or taſted, much leſs have drunk ſo deep of this cup of ſufferings. It is ſaid of Abortives who die in the womb, and of ſuch as die immediately after they are born, They are, and they are not; they who live but a moment in nature, ſhall live for ever. A life here leſs then a ſpan long, will be eternity long: yet as to the world, ſuch a life is no life, ſuch a being no being. Lawyers ſay, They who die before, or as ſoon as they are born, are reckoned as unborn; they make no change in ſtates, they never had a name, or an intereſt in the world, and ſo they go for nothing in the world. The Prophet Obadia (verſ. 16.) threatens Edom, That they ſhall be as though they had not been; that is, they muſt periſh, and their memorial with them. Some are ſo thruſt out of the world, that they ſhall be, as if they had never been; and ſome come into the world ſo, that their being was, as if they had never been.

A ſhort life is by common eſtimation no life.

As in heaven, where we ſhall live for ever, we ſhall be, as if we had ever been: So on earth, ſome live ſo little, that they are as if they never were: That which hath an eternal duration and ſhall never end, is as if it had ever begun; and that which is but of a ſhort duration and ends quickly, is as if it had never begun. The reaſon why the fruit of ſin goes for nothing, is, becauſe the pleaſure of ſin is but for a ſeaſon, and that a very little ſeaſon; What fruit have ye of thoſe things, whereof ye are now aſhamed? That is, Ye have no fruit, or your fruit was nothing: we may ſay of all the pleaſures of ſin, their cradle is their grave, or more near Job's language, they are carried from the womb to the grave. So he ſpeaks next of himſelf,

I ſhould have been carried from the womb to the grave.

I ſhould have paſſed without noiſe or notice. There would have been little trouble with me in the world, I ſhould have made but one journey, and that a ſhort one. The ſpeech is proverbial: From the womb to the grave, is the motto of Infant-death. The Septuagint read it as an expoſtulation; Wherefore was I not carried out from the womb to the grave? It would have been a happineſs to me, either not to have been at all, or to have had a being but equivalent (in common account) to a not being. And thus it had been with me, if my firſt ſtep out of my mothers womb, had been into the womb of that grand mother the earth. Job is often upon the ſame point, renewing his deſires after death: he did ſo (as hath been toucht) at the third Chapter, and at the ſixth, and now he is as fierce and freſh upon it as ever.

Whilſt the ſame ſtock of corruption remains in us, it is productive of the ſame corrupt fruit. There is a ſeminal vertue in the earth, look how often it is plowed and ſowed, ſo often it ſends forth a crop; there is a ſeminal vertue in the earthly part of man, which makes him to put forth evil, as often as occaſion plows, and temptation ſoweth his heart.

Verſ. 20. Are not my dayes few? Ceaſe then, and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little.

יחדל Primo adjungunt colo. Numquid non pauciras dierum meorum finiatur brevi? Vulg. An non pauci dies mei ceſſantes, ſc. deficientes? Targ. Annon pauliſper diebus meis ceſſabit? Jun.

Are not my dayes few?] There is a difference in the reading: Many tranſlators joyn the Verb Ceaſe, with this clauſe: ſo that whereas we read, Are not my dayes few? Ceaſe then, and let me alone; they read, Will not my few dayes ceaſe? Then let me alone that I may take comfort a little. Mr. Broughton, and he hath a ſecond, varieth yet further, Will not he leave off a little in my dayes? Inſtead of applying the word few unto dayes, Are not my dayes few? They (taking in the Verb) joyn it to the act of God, Will not he leave off a little in my dayes? That is, Will not God forbear a little to trouble me? Will not he give me a breathing time in my dayes, which are but few? Surely he will, he will not be ſo ſtrict with me, I doubt not of a gracious anſwer to this humble petition.

But rather follow our ſence, and let the firſt clauſe be a queſtion, Are not my dayes few? And then the next words are an inference or uſe which he makes from it; Ceaſe then, and let me alone, &c.

Are not my dayes few?] The queſtion doth affirm, Yes, my dayes are few. The ſence may be made out one of theſe three wayes, and not unprofitably by all three.

Firſt thus, As a juſtification of his former wiſhes and deſires to die: Have I not upon good reaſon wiſhed that I had never lived? Who can be in love with a ſhort life, and a long trouble? Are not my dayes few? Or,

Secondly, As an anſwer to ſuch as objected againſt him for wiſhing he had not lived: Do you know (ſaid they) what you have ſaid? Is life ſuch a ſmall matter with you? Or, do you underſtand what you deſire, when you deſire death? Is deformed death become a beauty in your eye? What ever you think of it, life is a precious Jewel; Yes (ſaith Job) I know very well what life is, and I know if I had died before I was born, I had loſt much life; What's the life of a few dayes? The life of eternity is worth the having and eſteeming; but why ſhould you think I have wiſhed away a matter of moment, when I wiſhed away this life? For are not my dayes few?

Whence obſerve, The loſs of a whole life in the world, is no great loſs.

We cannot loſe a great deal, when all is but a little; nor many, when we have but a few in all. He looſeth but a few dayes, who dieth the firſt day; then, what have we got, when we have lived according to the calculation of nature, many dayes? Job makes this an argument to ſatisfie others about his wiſh, that all his dayes had been cut off. May not we ſatisfie our ſelves by it, when a piece, or a part, an end, the worſt end of our dayes is cut off? What if we have abated ten or twenty of thoſe years which poſſibly we might have lived? Twenty years are but a few dayes; for, a whole life, conſiſting of three twenties and ten, is but a few dayes. This we are ſure of, that the few dayes we loſe on earth, ſhall never be miſſed in heaven; it will be no abatement to our comfort there, to think we lived but a little here; all the ſorrows of this life will be ſwallowed up in the next, and ſo will our ſudden parting with this life.

Thirdly, The cleareſt ſence of theſe words [Are not my dayes few?] is, that they are the ground of a petition for the mitigation of his troubles; As if he had ſaid, Lord, I have but a while to live in the world, my dayes are few, therefore do not think much that I ſhould have a little comfort and refreſhing in theſe my dayes; Conſider my life is ſhort, O that thou wouldeſt ſlack thy hand, and yield me ſome eaſe and comfort in this ſhort life. He had uſed this argument at Chap. 7. verſ. 16. Let me alone, for my dayes are vanity; here, Let me alone, for my dayes are few. The fewneſs of our dayes is one of the vanities of our dayes.

Are not my dayes few?] The Hebrew is, Is not fewneſs of dayes mine? Yes, That's my portion. Abſtracts often encreaſe, and ſometimes they diminiſh the ſence. Here the ſence is diminutive; as if he had ſaid, My dayes are ſo far from many, that they are fewneſs it ſelf: Mine are not encreaſing and growing, but declining and abating dayes. My dayes are going down, they are brought into a leſſer and a narrower compaſs every day. The Chaldee renders, Are not my dayes ceaſing? My dayes fade and wear out every day; Shew me how ſhort my life is (cloſer to the Original) how ſoon ceaſing I am; or, as others, What, or of what quantity mine age is, how tranſient, how temporary I am.

Ceaſe then, and let me alone.] Some read it in the third perſon, Therefore let him ceaſe from me, and let me alone; we in the ſecond, Ceaſe then, and let me alone. Job looks upon himſelf as one beſieged and ſtraitned with afflictions: Now (ſaith he) I beſeech thee raiſe thy ſiege, and draw off thy force from me; or if thou wilt not make a final peace with me, yet grant me a ceſſation, let me have a truce for a limited time, let me not have ſuch continual Alarms, or be forced to ſtand armed continually; let me reſt, ſaith the Septuagint: Iſſachar ſtooped to burdens, becauſe he deſired reſt. Some are ſo burdened, that they cannot reſt, how much ſoever they deſire it. Job deſires God to give him reſt, becauſe his dayes were few.

Hence obſerve, Firſt, It is an argument moving the Lord to forbear ſending us many troubles, becauſe we have but few days.

Thus David prayes (Pſal. 89.47.) Remember how ſhort my time is; wherefore haſt thou made all men in vain? Lord, I have but a few dayes, and ſhall my dayes be nothing but clouds and darkneſs? The ſame argument is uſed, Pſal. 39. ult. O ſpare me, that I may recover ſtrength, before I go hence, and be no more. I ſhall ſoon be gone, let me have ſome eaſe while I ſtay here.

Secondly obſerve, That, Except the Lord withdraw his hand, nothing in the world can give us eaſe.

Ceaſe then, and let me alone that I may take comfort; as if he had ſaid, If thine hand be upon me, in vain do friends comfort me; creatures offer me their help in vain. Ceaſe then, and let me alone.

From the matter of his Argument, obſerve,

The Life of man is ſhort.

It is a common Theme, and every man thinks he can declaim upon it, and ſpeak to it; but there are very few can live to, or act by it. A multitude of inſtructions ariſe to us from the fewneſs of our dayes: And did men know indeed that their dayes are few, their evil deeds would not be ſo many, and their good would be more.

Again, That mans dayes are ſo few, yields us not only many inſtructions, but many wonders. Is it not ſtrange that we who have but a few dayes in our lives, ſhould have ſo many afflictions in our lives? That we ſhould have few dayes, and many ſorrows? Is it not ſtrange that we ſhould have few dayes in our lives, and many cares about our lives: Many cares and few dayes, yea, many cares upon one day? Thou art careful about many things, ſaith Chriſt to Martha. Is it not ſtrange that we ſhould have ſo few dayes, and ſo many ſins? Few dayes, and innumerable ſins; ſo many ſins as no man can number them, and ſo few dayes, that a Child may number them? And is not this a wonder above all the reſt, that we ſhould have but a few dayes, and yet be graveli'd and puzl'd ſo as we are in numbring them? A little humane learning will ſerve to number our dayes, but we need a great deal of ſpiritual learning to number them. A little ſtudy in the Mathematicks will do it, but we need more then ſtudy, experience in Divinity before we can do it, unleſs God himſelf be our Tutor; He only can teach us ſo to number our dayes that we may apply our hearts unto wiſdom. We ſhall commence fools at laſt, if we have not one wiſer then the wiſeſt upon earth, to teach us this truth.

Roboravit, confortavit reſpiravit, vires collegit.

That I may take comfort a little.] The word which we tranſlate to take comfort, ſignifies ſuch comfort as they find, who being heated extreamly, and extream thirſty, come to drink at a fountain of ſweet waters. The Vulgar readeth it, Let me alone that I may mourn a little; yet taking in the former ſence, he ſeems thus to explain himſelf; If the Lord would let me alone, I would go and eaſe my ſelf with complaining; the waters of my head, the fountain of mine eyes would be a refreſhing to my wearied ſoul. Sorrows are ſometimes joyous, and moderate mourning gives the mind a reviving.

But rather, Take it in the general, Let me alone that I may comfort my ſelf, and that theſe ſorrows may abate; I deſire to rally, and recollect my ſcattered thoughts a while, and ſo take in ſomewhat of the ſweetneſs of this life before I die. Ceaſe from me for ſome refreſhing (ſaith Mr. Broughton) I do not expect much, Lord, let me have ſome before I go whence I ſhall not return.

Si dolorem amovere non vult, reſpirandi locum aliquem & ſpatium concedat. Mer.

Here obſerve one common principle of Nature,

Man deſireth his own good.

A well-being as well as a being. What is there in life for Nature to prize, if there be nothing but ſorrow in it?

Secondly obſerve, That, Great ſufferings make us very modeſt in our demands.

Job was in great affliction, and now a little comfort would go a great way with him. When the people of Iſrael were in bondage under Pharaoh and task-maſters, and had heavier burdens laid upon them, they do not ſo much as move for a total releaſe from their task, but modeſtly complain, There is no ſtraw given unto thy ſervants, and they ſay to us, Make Brick; as if they had ſaid, Let us have ſtraw, and we are willing to make brick. A poor man cries out for a halfpeny, for a farthing, not for hundreds or thouſands. He that is ready to ſtarve, will not ask good chear, or a plentiful feaſt, but let me have a cruſt of bread, or a little water. When Dives was in hell, what did he deſire of Abraham? Did he beg to come into his boſom? Doth he ſay, Lazarus is in a good place, let me come too; No, he deſired but a drop of water; and what was a drop of water to flames of fire? O how would it delight the damned in hell to think of a ceſſation but for one hour from their pain! What a joy would it be unto them, if it ſhould be told them, that a thouſand or ten thouſand years hence they ſhould have one good day, or that they might be let alone to take comfort a little! They who are low, make low demands. Think of this, ye that enjoy much comfort, and ſwim in rivers of pleaſure. Let not the great conſolations of God be ſmall to you, when you hear Job thus inſtant and importunate for the ſmalleſt; Let me alone, that I may take comfort a little.

But why is he in ſuch haſte for a little comfort? One ground is, in the former words, My dayes are few; and he backs it with a ſecond in the next; If it come not quickly, it will come too late. I am ready to take my laſt journey, Therefore let me take a little comfort.

Verſe 21. Before I go whence I ſhall not return, even to the Land of darkneſs, and the ſhadow of death.

Before I go.] That is, before I die. Death is a going out of the world: Chriſt intimates his death under this notion (John 16.7.) If I go, the Comforter will come. And I go from you, &c. Dying is a journeying from one Region to another. Death is a changing of our place, though not of our company. Before I go. Whither?

Periphraſis moriendi, qui moritur dicitur abire; unde abitionem pro morte veteres uſurparunt. Dr.

Whence I ſhall not return.] That's a ſtrange journey indeed. That which pleaſeth us in our longeſt journeys while we live, is a hope of returning to our own homes again. But when we die, we take a journey from whence there is no returning. Not return? Shall not man return when he dieth? Is death an everlaſting departure, an eternal night? No, Man ſhall return, but he ſhall not return to ſuch a life or ſtate as he had before. He is gone for ever out of this world, and out of all worldly intereſts. Job believed a reſurrection or a returning from the grave by the power of God, and he knew there was no returning by the power of Nature, or by the help of any creature, in that reference, we go whence we ſhall not return. So David ſpeaks of his dead Infant, I ſhall go to him, but he ſhall not return to me, 2 Sam. 12. 25. When once we are ſhut up in thoſe Chambers of death, and made priſoners in the grave, though all the Princes in the world ſend warrants for our releaſe, we cannot get releaſed. The pertinacy and ſtiffneſs of the grave is ſuch as yields to none. We are faſt ſhut up, when we are ſhut up there. Love and the grave will hardly part with that which they have cloſed with, and are poſſeſſed of. The grave is one of thoſe three things which are never ſatisfied, or ſay it is enough, Prov. 30. 15.

And

And as it is insatiable in receiving, so it is as close in keeping; it will part with nothing. A grave is the Parable of a covetous man, he is greedy to get, and watchful to hold; when his money goes into his purse, he saith, it shall not return: The grave hath a strong appetite to take down, and as strong a stomack to digest. Till God (as I may so speak) by his mighty power gives the grave a vomit, and makes the earth stomack-sick with eating mans flesh, it will not return one morsel. At the Resurrection this great Eater shall cast up all again. And as they who take strong vomits, are put into a kind of trembling convulsion, all the powers of the body being shaken; such will the Prognosticks be of the Resurrection; there was an Earthquake when Christ arose, God made the Earth shake, and commanded it to give back the prisoner, because it was not possible that he should be holden of it. And when God speaks the word, it will not be possible for the grave to hold us prisoners: till then it will. It was usual among the Ancients, to say of a dead friend, He is gone, and he will come again; intimating a Resurrection. Heathens not knowing nor believing it, call death, An eternal leave-taking or farewel, never to meet again.

Veteres Romani dicere solebant, abiit & reversurus est, resurrectionem carnis haud obscurè innuentes. Ter. Salve æternum mihi maximè Palla. Æternumq; vale. Virg. Æneid. Valeant qui inter nos dissidium volunt. Ter.

Observe from this description of the grave,

That, The statutes of death are unrepealable.

Death is an everlasting banishment from the world; I shall go whence I shall not return. This may lie very sad upon their spirits, who have not a better place then the world to go to, when they go from the world: To go whence we shall never return, and yet where we cannot endure to be a moment, is deepest misery: Such a man cannot chuse but set out with a sad heart. And that's the reason why wicked men, whose consciences are awakened, go so unwillingly to this sleep, they know whither they are going, only they know they cannot return. Make ye friends ('tis Christ's counsel) of the Mammon of unrighteousness, that when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations (Luk. 10. 9.) Mammon of unrighteousness, that is, say most Interpreters, Mammon gotten unrighteously; but surely Christ would not teach any to make men our friends, by that which makes God our enemy. They translate better, who render it, Make ye friends of the false or unfaithful Mammon, that is, of that Mammon which will deceive and leave you shortly; therefore make you friends of it while you have it; that when ye fail, that is, when ye die, or go out of the world, they may receive you, that is, ye may be received into everlasting habitations: leave not this habitation till ye have got interest in a better. The Saints arm themselves against death by this argument; We know that if our earthly house of this Tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens (2 Cor. 5. 1.) We know there is no return to buildings made with hands; we must leave our Houses for ever, our Lands for ever, and our Relations for ever; but we are assured of a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. This supported their hearts, when their earthly houses were falling.

Job having thus described death it self, proceeds to describe the grave, which is the place of death, or the Black Hall of the King of Terrors. Would you know what this place is, from whence there is no returning? It is, saith he (in the close of this Verse) even the Land of darkness and the shadow of death. And in the last Verse, Verse 22. A Land of darkness, as darkness it self, and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness.

This is the place where death dwells, or the seat of death; and here's a description of it, which exceeds the Fancy of Poets, and the Rhetorick of all Heathen Orators. The Spirit of God riseth to the height of eloquence, in discovering that unpleasant Region.

This subterranean Geography gives a double character of it. 1. A Land of darkness. 2. A Land of the shadow of death; both which are aggravated by their additions. It is a Land of darkness, but not of any ordinary darkness; It is a Land of darkness, as darkness it self. It is a Land of the shadow of death, not of an ordinary shadow of death, but of the shadow of death, 1. Without any order. 2. Where the light is as darkness.

A Land of darkness,] That is, abounding with darkness, a Land where darkness is the staple, and the only commodity to be had. Darkness is the hangings and ornament of the house of death. The grave is elsewhere called A Land of forgetfulness (Psal. 88. 11.) Because there all things are forgotten. We read (Jer. 12. 5.) of a Land of peace, that is a land where peace abounds, a land in every corner whereof peace springs and groweth up. Canaan (Deut. 8. 8.) was called A good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths, that spring out of the valleys and hills, a land of wheat and barley, and vines, and fig-trees, pomegranates; a land of oyl-olive, and of honey: That is, a land where these good things were natural and plentiful: A land where Neighbour-Nations might furnish themselves, and fraight their ships with those commodities. In such a sence Job calls the grave a land of darkness; as if he had said, Would you know what the merchandize of the grave is? I will tell you, it is darkness, there you may have darkness as much as you desire, and besides that, nothing, how much soever you desire it.

Cum sepulchrum dicitur terra tenebrarum, ibi tanquã in nativo solo obscuritas intelligitur provenire.

This shews the terror of death to a meer natural understanding. Many are afraid to be at all in the dark, how much more to be alwayes in darkness: As light is put for joy, so darkness for sorrow. Darkness, whether spiritual or natural, is afflictive. Dark houses are unpleasant, what then is a land of darkness? The face of a man is darkened with sorrow, and joy is the light of it. It hath been observed that some Great Princes have had light beaming out from their eyes. Augustus had so sparkling an eye, that few could look upon him; his eyes cast forth rayes like the Sun, dazling the beholders. Good, gracious Princes cast out beams of favour upon their people, which refresh them as the light. Death and the grave have no light in their face. Death looks black and grim, Hell is extreameſt darkness, and the pains of hell are chains of darkness.

Suetonius in Augusto. c. 79.

And the shadow of death.

There is more then the shadow of death in the grave, death it self dwells there. The words sound an abatement of the sence, but indeed they heighten it. The shadow of death is thick darkness, thickest darkness, the very strength of darkness. This shadow is the substance of death, or death with addition of greatest deadliness.

Terra cujus palpebræ sunt sicut caligo umbrarum mortis. Targ.

Job having given the land this dreadful name, A land of darkness, and of the shadow of death, makes it yet more dreadful by this further explication.

A Land of darkness, as darkness it self.] Or, A Land of darkness, which looks like darkness. The word signifies wearisness, restlesness, and vexation of spirit. To be in a dark condition, is to be in a wearisom condition. The Vulgar reads it; A Land of misery. Some darkness hath a degree of light mingled with it, but this is pure or unmixed darkness, darkness in its proper hue, darkness it self. When a man of skill acts skilfully, we say, he acts like himself; and when a wicked man doth very wickedly, we say, he doth like himself. The darkness of the grave looks like nothing but it self.

Every evil the more like it is to it self, the worse it is. When the Apostle would shew sin in its colours, he calleth it sinful sin (Rom. 7. 12.) Sin by the Commandment became exceeding sinful; the commandment caused it to look like it self. Sorrowful sorrow, and painful pain are the worst of pains and sorrows. There is sorrow which may consist with some joy, and pain, which may cohabit with some ease; but he that hath sorrow like sorrow it self, and pain like pain it self, hath the extremity of both. Thus also every good, the more like it is to it self, the better it is; holiness like it self, is the purest holiness; grace like it self, is the sweetest grace. When a holy man works like himself, his work is best. God is ever like himself in all he doth; and every thing we do, is then best, when it is done most like to what God doth.

And of the shadow of death, without any order; or, The shadow of death, and not orders.

The word which we translate order, is frequent in the Rabbins; the holy Text hath it only in this place, and here, in the plural number, A Land of darkness, and the shadow of death, and without any orders, a land unordered. There's no government, no method in the grave. And if it hath no order, then it hath nothing in it but confusion, nothing but diſorder. That the grave, or the ſtate of death is without any order, may be underſtood two wayes.

Hebræi ad vices diti & noctis, æſtatis & hyemis, &c. referunt. Experiem viciſſitudinum. Jun.

First, Without order, becauſe it hath no changes, or viciſſitudes in it, there is no difference in the grave between night and day, Winter and Summer, hot and cold, wet and dry, between the riſing and ſetting of the Sun: This is the the order which God hath ſet in Nature; and when the flood had put all things into a kind of confuſion, God promiſed, That ſeed time and harveſt, and cold and heat, ſummer and winter, day and night ſhould not ceaſe; that is, there ſhould be an everlaſting order continued in the creature. The dead know none of thoſe changes and viciſſitudes; as much of the vanity, ſo ſome of the comforts of this life conſiſt in changes; but all is alike in death.

Secondly, There is no order in going to the grave; men do not keep to a rule in dying, nor obſerve their ranks. The old go not always firſt, and then the young; the great before, and the mean following after. Death hath no maſter of the Ceremonies; but takes promiſcuouſly, here a child, and there a man; here a rich man, and there a beggar. And as there is no order in going thither, ſo none when we are there: the grave mingleth the duſt, and bones of one with another. We cannot diſtinguiſh the rich mans duſt from the duſt of the poor, nor the bones of Kings from thoſe of the loweſt ſubject. Though rich men are buried in more eminent places, and Kings under ſtately Monuments, though their Tombs differ from their inferiors, yet their bones do not. An old Philoſopher was obſerved ſearching a Cæmitery, and prying buſily among the Tombs, and being asked, what he looked for, anſwered, I come to ſee if I can find the duſt of rich men, and the bones of Princes, but I cannot ſee which is which; the duſt of the rich and of the poor, of Princes and peaſants, are all alike to my eye.

And ſeeing Job makes this an aggravation of the miſery of death that it is without order; We may obſerve,

That order hath an excellency, and a beauty in it.

The leſs order there is in any place or State, the worſe it is; and where is no order, there it is worſt of all. Civil order is the beauty of Common-wealths, and ſpiritual order is the beauty of the Church. The Apoſtle rejoyced to behold the order of the Coloſſians, as well as their faith, (Col. 2. 5.) His charge to the Corinthians is, Let all things be done decently and in order (1 Cor. 14. 40.) He had warned them (verſ. 33.) to take heed of diſorder, becauſe God is not the God of confuſion, but of peace. Where order is not kept, the peace cannot be kept. Death is evil, and that is without order; hell is worſt of all, and there is no order at all. It is a kind of death to ſee any diſorder, and a very hell to ſee all in diſorder.

And where the light is as darkneſs.] Some read by the Verb, where it ſhineth like darkneſs, or thus, where it lighteth like darkneſs. The Vulgar paraphraſes rather then tranſlates, Where there is everlaſting horror. Job ſaid before, it was a land of darkneſs, and like darkneſs it ſelf: yet now he ſeemeth to affirm, that there is light in the grave: and if there be, how is that darkneſs like darkneſs it ſelf? His meaning is, that which looks moſt like to light in the grave, is darkneſs; and it is therefore darkneſs like darkneſs it ſelf, becauſe if you can imagine any thing to have a ſhew of light in the grave, that very light is as darkneſs. When the Apoſtle would invincibly argue the infinite wiſdom and ſtrength of God, he ſaith, The fooliſhneſs of God is wiſer then men, and the weakneſs of God is ſtronger then men (1 Cor. 1. 25.) God is only wiſe, only ſtrong; how then ſpeaks this Apoſtle of the fooliſhneſs or weakneſs of God? His meaning is, look what act ſoever of God appears to man, as having fooliſhneſs or weakneſs in it, even that fooliſhneſs is wiſer, and that weakneſs ſtronger then men. In what ſence Paul ſaith, The fooliſhneſs of God is wiſdom, the weakneſs of God is ſtrength, or (which is all one) the darkneſs of God is light; in the ſame Job ſaith, The light of the grave is darkneſs. For as God is wiſdom, and in him there is no fooliſhneſs at all; ſtrength, and in him there is no weakneſs at all; light, and in him there is no darkneſs at all: So Job ſuppoſeth of the grave, that in it there is darkneſs, and no light at all, while he affirms, the light found there is as darkneſs. Chriſt ſpeaks near this language of Job (Matth. 6. 23.) If therefore the light that is in thee be darkneſs, how great is that darkneſs! He had ſaid before, The light of the body is the eye; and if the eye be ſingle, the whole body is light; that is, if a man have right aims and pure ends, theſe will keep him right in all his courſe; but if his eye be dark, his ends baſe, how baſe will his actions be, how great his darkneſs? We may argue thus to the point in hand, if the light of the grave be darkneſs, how great is that darkneſs? The Prophet Amos ſets forth great changes in States and Kingdoms by prodigious changes in the Air, Lo, he makes the morning darkneſs, Chap. 4. 15. Again, He turneth the ſhadow of death into the morning, and maketh the day dark with night, Chap. 5. 8.

When either civil or moral good is turned into evil, we are paſt all hope of good; if once our light be dark, we muſt expect nothing but darkneſs. The beſt works of hypocrites will be found wickedneſs; how wicked then will they be in their worſt? If their holineſs be unclean, how unclean is their unholineſs? All their moral light is as darkneſs, and all their civil light ſhall be turned into darkneſs.

Some (eſpecially Popiſh) Interpreters underſtand this deſcription, not of the grave, but of hell. The ſame word in the Hebrew ſerves both hell and the grave. Death looks like hell, and bears much of it's image. What is there in hell, but the agonies and ſweat of death, the pangs and paleneſs of death, the chains and bonds of death? The ſtate of the damned in hell, is an eternal act of dying: And all that Job ſpeaks of the grave, is fulfilled there to the utmoſt. There is darkneſs, like darkneſs it ſelf, called therefore utter darkneſs; there is the ſhadow of death without any order, there the light is as darkneſs. But though the Text be true of hell, yet Job had nothing to do or ſuffer beyond the grave, and I ſhall carry his diſcourſe no further, keeping within thoſe confines: We may learn,

That death in it ſelf is no way deſirable.

Is there any beauty in darkneſs, in thick darkneſs, where there is no order, in darkneſs, where the very light is darkneſs? One of the greateſt plagues upon Egypt, was three dayes darkneſs; what then is there in death (naturally conſidered) but a plague, ſeeing it is perpetual darkneſs?

Noſtri theologizantes ad infernũ referunt, ſed Job ad ſepulchrum reſpexit. Merc.

If death be ſuch in it ſelf, and ſuch to thoſe who die in ſin, how ſhould our hearts be raiſed up in thankfulneſs to Chriſt, who hath put other terms upon death and the grave by dying for our ſins! Chriſt hath made the grave look like a heaven to his. Chriſt hath aboliſhed death, not death it ſelf (for even believers die) but all the trouble and terror of death, the darkneſs and the diſorder of it, are taken away. Chriſt hath mortified death, killed death, ſo that now death is not ſo much an opening of the door of the grave, as it is an opening of the door of heaven. Chriſt, who is the Sun of righteouſneſs, lay in the grave, and hath left perpetual beams of light there for his purchaſed people. The way to the grave is very dark, but Chriſt hath ſet up lights for us, or cauſed light to ſhine into the way. Chriſt hath put death into a method, yea Chriſt hath put death into a kind of life, or he hath put life into death of believers. All the gaſtlineſs, horror, yea the darkneſs and death of death is removed. The Saints may look upon the grave as a land of light, like light it ſelf; yea as a land of life, like life it ſelf, where there is nothing but order, and where the darkneſs is as light.

Job's reply to Bildad and complaints to God have carried his diſcourſe as far as death and the grave, he gives over in a dark diſordered place; God ſtill leaving him under much darkneſs, and many diſorders of ſpirit. As his great afflictions are yet continued, ſo his weakneſſes continue too. His graces break forth many times, and ſometimes his corruption: Both are coming to a further diſcovery, while his third friend Zophar takes up the bucklers, and renews the battel: upon what terms he engages with Job, how Job acquits himſelf, and comes off from that engagement, is the ſum of the four ſucceeding Chapters.

AN EXPOSITION

To the CHRISTIAN READER; To those chiefly of this City, who have been the movers, and continue the promoters of this Work.

IN this Fourth Part I present you with Job's third Dispute: Eliphaz and Bildad having given their judgment upon his Case, Zophar undertakes him: How he mannaged his Arguments, and what answer he received, are (according to the measure of received light) discovered in this expository Discourse; I shall here only (by way of preface) propose a question, and offer my apprehensions towards the resolution of it.

Whether Job and his friends, who were the interlocutors at this conference, spake (as the holy Prophets and other penmen of the holy Scriptures did) by inspiration of God, 1 Tim. 3. 16. or, as they were moved by the holy Ghost, 2 Pet. 1. 21.

That the Book of Job is a part (as the Apostle phraseth it, Rom. 15. 4.) of those things which were written aforetime for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures, might have hope, is testified not only by the divine grandeur and majesty of the stile, together with the intrinsecal excellency and efficacy of the matter, (in both which it declares it self a glorious beam of his wisdome, who is light and the Father of lights) but also by the concurrent Testimony of, not a few, other Scriptures.

For, as the History of it (that such a man was) hath a full Prophetical testimony by Ezekiel (ch. 14. 14.) and an Apostolical one by S. James (ch. 5. 11.) Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord: So the authentity and authority of it is clearly asserted by S. Paul, calling in and associating the testimony of this Book with David's Psalms, to that great Truth, that, The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God.

For, Though it doth not argue a Book purely divine, because some sentence of it is quoted in Scripture (for so the Books of Aratus, Menander and Epimenides, Heathen Poets are) yet such a manner of quotation as the Book of Job is honoured with, is an undoubted argument of it. While Paul quotes the writings of the Heathen, he slights those Heathen writers, with, As certain also of your own Poets have said; for we are also his offspring, Act. 17. 28. And again, One of themselves, even a Prophet of their own, said, The Cretians are alwayes liars, evil beasts, slow-bellies, Tit. 1. 12. He makes use of what another of them said, without saying any thing at all of him, Evil communications corrupt good manners (1 Cor. 15. 33.) But when he cites this Book, he doth it in the same form wherein most of the Books of the Old Testament are cited in the New, giving his citation the value of a reason, in reference to the point he was upon, with an emphatical causal particle, For it is written, he taketh the wise in their own craftiness, 1 Cor. 3. 19. Which are the words of Eliphaz, Job 5. 13. Now, as when God took the first-fruits, he consecrated and sanctified the whole kind of which those first-fruits were a part; so where he takes any part of a Book as an authoritative Scripture-proof, he confirms that whole Book for Scripture.

And as this Book is there authoritatively cited by the Apostle Paul, so divers sentences and branches of it are transplanted and engrafted by the penmen of other Scriptures into the body of those Scriptures which God appointed and called them to pen. Psal. 8. 5. & 144. 3. Lord, what is man, that thou takest knowledge of him, or the son of man, that thou makest account of him? are fully the same in sence, and near the same in the letter with that of Job 7. 17. And the comparison of man to a shadow (Psal. 144. 4.) seems to be transcribed from the words of Bildad, chap. 8. 8. That also of Ps. 107. 4. He powreth contempt upon Princes, and causeth them to wander in a wilderness where there is no way, fell first from the mouth of Job, chap. 12. 21, 24. And the words of v. 42. of the same Psalm, The righteous shall see it and rejoyce, and iniquity shall stop her mouth, were spoken by Eliphaz, Job 5. 16. & 22. 19. The like observations may be made between Lev. 26. 5. & Job 11. 19. between Deut. 10. 17. & Job 34. 19. between Ps. 7. 15. & Isa. 59. 15. compared with Job 15. 35. Now, as the calling out of some one sentence of this Book for a Scripture-proof, so the frequent mixing of the language and phrase of it in the Scripture, is a convincing argument that the whole Book is of God.

But doth not Job charge his friends as forgers of lies? chap. 13. 4. If they were so indeed, how can we assert their discourses for divine truths? For no lie is of the truth, 1 Joh. 2. 21. If they were not, how can we assert the discourse of Job for truth, who was thus mistaken? I answer,

First, Job spake rather passionately then positively.

Secondly, The lies he charged them with, were not erroneous assertions against the truth, but unkind aspersions (flowing from a zeal for God) upon his person.

Thirdly, Job doth not charge his friends with lies strictly taken, as if they had knowingly spoken any thing which was false, or as if they had spoken at any time purposely to ensnare him: his friends supposed and were confident that they spake truth not only in it self (as indeed they did) but also to his state, and their aim was to instruct or reclaim him, not to ensnare or entangle him by what they had spoken.

Lastly, They spake no doctrinal untruths, though some of their applications were (as to this case) untrue.

And thus even the Apostles themselves did fail sometimes; for as Jobs friends applied their Doctrine to a Saint, as if he had been an hypocrite, so did they in their Epistolical writings apply their Doctrines to some hypocrites, as if they had been Saints.

But doth not God himself in the conclusion and determination of this dispute, say expresly to Eliphaz the Temanite, My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends, for ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath (ch. 42. 7.) If they did not speak right of God, how then were they taught of God what to speak? I answer,

First, Some expound those words (as the letter also seems to carry it) comparatively, not as if they had not spoken right of God, but not so right as Job had.

Secondly, That which they spake of God in his Nature, Properties and Works, was all right, only they had not spoken right of God about the intendment of his works and dispensations towards Job; they did not hit the meaning of God in that so clearly as God did; though (I conceive) Job himself was much in the dark about that point too, as Elihu laboured to convince him

It may be again objected, That Job and his three friends oppose each other, and maintain different opinions, how then can all be true? Must not one side be out, he or they? I answer,

First, Job and his friends did agree in many points (as was shewed in the Preface to the second part of these Expositions) and all those principles wherein they agreed, are the undoubted truths of God. I know it to be so of a truth (saith he, ch. 9. 2.) And again, My eye hath seen all this, and mine ear hath heard and understood it, *chap.*13.1. In both these passages Job votes with his friends, and seals to the truth of many things which they had spoken; as if he had said, Though I cannot agree with you in all, yet I will agree as far as I can: In these points you and I have no quarrel.

Secondly, Where they disagreed, the difference was not thus wide, that his friends maintained an errour, and he a truth; but only thus, he maintained more truth, or truth more clearly then they did. They taught truth in all they spake, but not all the truth: As for instance, That, God afflicts for sin, or, that sin is the cause of affliction, is a truth, but not all the truth; or, not absolutely and universally true; for some afflictions are not sent for chastening and correction, but meerly for trial and probation: Again, they teach, that, God doth severely punish wicked men in this life. This is true, but not universally and absolutely true; for, as some godly men are troubled, so some wicked men prosper all their dayes.

Thirdly, Though the opinion which Job's friends held in opposition to him, was not throughout sound and orthodox, yet their way of expressing it was. Remember, I pray thee (saith Eliphaz, *c.*4.7.) Who ever perished being innocent? or, where were the righteous cut off? Here Job opposed him, c. 9.22. This is one thing, therefore I said it, he destroyeth the perfect and the wicked. Eliphaz guided by the experience of Gods usual administrations in those times, held, that God doth not greatly afflict (for that he means by perishing and cutting off) any godly man in this life. This was his mistake; yet the words with which this Opinion is cloathed, contain a clear truth; and being an appeal to experience (Remember I pray thee) are very parallel to that of David (*Ps.*37.25.) I have been young, and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread.

Fourthly, Job's friends spake truth in these, or in the position all along, they only fail'd in hypothesi, or in the application: yea, all their applications and inferences might have fitted some men in such an outward condition as they saw Job in, but they did not fit Job, because his inward condition was not such as they censured it to be; and God left them under those misapprehensions of his inward condition for the promoting of his own holy design in the full trial of Job's patience, while his friends wounded him deeper by these continual reflections upon his spiritual condition, then Satan or the Sabeans did by the breaches and irruptions they made upon his outward condition.

But doth it not abate the divine authority of this Book, if any thing in it be unduly stated and applied?

The Scripture reports many things, even of those who wrote or spoke it historically, which are against the Scripture doctrinally. All that Moses spake, was not right; for he once spake unadvisedly with his lips (Ps. 106. 33.) And so did David, when he said in his heart all men are liars, *Ps.*116.11. And again (Ps.73.13.) Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency. The Prophet Jeremy doth not only write a curse upon his birth-day, but he curses the man who brought tidings to his Father, saying, a man-child is born (*Jer.*20.14,15.) Jonah prayed, take my life from me, when he saw that God spared the lives of the Ninevites: he was also angry for the death of a gourd, and said, I do well to be angry even unto death (*Jon.*4.3,9.) These things are written in Scripture for our caution, not for our imitation; and they are discoveries, not of the wisdom and holiness of God, but of the folly and sinfulness of man. Some such sad discoveries Job made in this Book, and some such his friends made. ¶ But if some passages in this Book discover the weakness and mistakes of the speakers, how can we raise Doctrines and Observations from them? ¶ Every speech and passage which the infinite wisdom of God hath thought fit to put into this or any other Book of Scripture, hath in it somewhat for our instruction. That blasphemy of the fool, which contradicts not only the truth, but the very being of God (Ps.14.1.) The fool hath said in his heart there is no God, teacheth us this divine truth, that there are seven (that is, all manner of) abominations in the heart of man. We may draw useful instructions from the words of Judas the traytor, after Satan had entred into him, and filled his heart; yea, from the words of Satan in his temptations and proposals unto Christ; much more may we from the sayings of holy men, which are true for the matter (as all the sayings of Job and his friends are) though there be a failing in the manner of speaking, or in their references to a particular case. ¶ Nor is it unsafe to affirm, that even such sayings are from the inspiration of God, which have an infallible truth in them, though they who said so, did not understand them so. When the chief Priests and Pharisees sate in Council, and debated the destruction of Christ the Saviour of the world, fearing the Romans would destroy them, and take away both their name and nation, Caiphas, who was high Priest that same year, said unto them, ye know nothing at all, nor consider that it is expedient that one man die for the people, and that the whole Nation perish not, Joh.11.49,50. This was wicked and bloody counsel, according to his intendment and meaning in giving it (for we must not condemn the innocent, though but one man, upon politick respects to preserve the greatest multitude or a whole Nation of men) yet there was a great truth of God in it, even the sum and substance of the whole Gospel; for it was not only expedient, but also necessary, that one man (Jesus Christ the only Son of God) should be put to death, that the whole Nation of the Jews, and all the Gentile Nations might not perish eternally. Thus the Evangelist explains the cruel advice of Caiphas, in the next words v.51,52. This he spake not of himself: but being high-Priest that year, he prophesied that Christ should die for that Nation, and not for that Nation only, but that also he should gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad. This sence was far from the heart of Caiphas, though the words which bear it were uttered with his tongue. And thus if we (in some places) pass by the particular meaning of the speakers, and keep to the general meaning of what is spoken, we may make a savoury and an edifying construction of every passage in this Book; in which, as there are abundance of holy truths, and as it were, a compendium both of Law and Gospel, so (upon this account) there is no one sentence in opposing any one truth contained and held forth in either. And therefore from all these premises I conclude the question first proposed affirmatively, That Job and his friends spake by the inspiration of God, or as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.

I shall not entertain the Reader any longer at the Door or in the Entry of the Book; but commending this brief excercitation with the following expositions to the blessing of God, for a fruitful improvement of these and all other helps, which his gracious bounty continues or renews upon us for the furtherance of our faith and knowledge in, and of our obedience to the whole mystery of his will revealed in his Word, I subscribe my self,

March 20. 1648. Your affectionate Friend to love and serve you in the Lord,

JOSEPH CARYL.

AN EXPOSITION WITH Practical Obſervations UPON THE ELEVENTH, TWELFTH, THIRTEENTH AND FOURTEENTH CHAPTERS Of the Book of JOB.

CHAP. 11. Verſ. 1, 2, 3.

Then anſwered Zophar the Naamathite, and ſaid,
Should not the multitude of words be anſwered? and ſhould a man full of talk be juſtified?
Should thy lies make men hold their peace? and when thou mockeſt, ſhall no man make thee aſhamed?

Sophar ſonat idem quod ſpeculator, & Naamathites pulchrum & jucundum. Greg. Phil.

JOB hath already ſtood two charges; the firſt from Eliphaz, the ſecond from Bildad. Here a third begins.

Then anſwered Zophar the Naamathite, and ſaid.

Who Zophar was, hath been ſhewed at the eleventh verſe of the ſecond Chapter. His name Zophar imports a Watchman, and his additional title Naamathite, pleaſant or beautiful in the Original.

The matter of his anſwer may be conſidered;
Firſt, In the Preface,
Secondly, In the body of it.

The exordium or preface is contained in the three firſt verſes. The body of his anſwer in the following parts of the Chapter: wherein three things are cleare;

First, A general propoſition, containing the matter in debate, or the poſition which Zophar puts upon Job, as his, and takes upon himſelf to confute, as erroneous. This he layes down in the fourth verſe, Thou haſt ſaid, My doctrine is pure, and I am clean in thine eyes.

Secondly, We have the confutation of this poſition enlarged, from the 5. verſ. to the 12.

Thirdly, Zophar having ſhewed Job his errour, and, as he hoped, convinced him of it, proceeds to give him counſel, and cloſeth the Chapter with inſtruction. He inſiſteth in the ſame method, and treads the ſame path that Eliphaz and Bildad had done before; firſt, chiding and reproving Job, then counſelling and adviſing him.

Zophars preface preſents us with a three-fold neceſſity, engaging him to this reply.

Quòd verboſus ad ſucandam malam cauſam.

First, From that multitude of words which Job had already heaped together for the colouring (as he judged it) of a bad cauſe, verſ. 2. Should not the multitude of words be anſwered? and ſhould a man full of talk be juſtified? Is it not high time that I ſhould ſpeak a little, when thou haſt had time to ſpeak ſo much?

Quòd mendax ad obſtinatè tuendam malam cauſam.

Secondly, He argues this neceſſity from the falſity of what Job had ſpoken, in the firſt clauſe of the third verſe, Should thy lies make men hold their peace? It is thy ſin, that thou haſt ſpoken lies; and it would be mine, if I ſhould not ſpeak againſt them.

Quòd irriſor ad contemnendas veras admonitiones illudendum Deo & hominibus.

Thirdly, From the ſcorn and levity of ſpirit, which Zophar ſuppoſed he ſaw frothing at the lips of Job, When thou mockeſt, ſhall no man make thee aſhamed? It were the ſhame of all men, if none ſhould. Thou art ſitting in the ſcorners chair, Shall I be afraid to raiſe thee up, or pull thee down?

So then, The preface may be formed up into this Argument;

Many words, and those full of lies and scorn, must be undertaken and answered; no man can or ought to hold his peace, when he heareth such discourses:

But thy answer is full of words, and as full of lies and scorn;

Therefore I must undertake thee, I must answer.

Paulo amarulentius agit & aculeatius. Coc. Zophar Jobum reprehendit atrius quam cæteri incalescente ut fit in certamine animo, ita ut à conviciis non abstineat. Meri.

Thus Zophar presseth upon his friend with violence, if not with virulence and fourness of spirit: handling him more roughly, and pouring more gall and vineger into his wounds, then his former Antagonists had done. As his spirit grew warmer, so did his words; and in heat of arguing, he comes very near unto reviling.

Vers. 2. Should not the multitude of words be answered?

The multitude of words] Zophar taxeth Job, as overcopious in language, as a man given to talk, and affecting to hear himself speak. Eloquence of speech, or elocution, is an excellent gift of God; but verbosity, and a love to flow out continually at the tongue, is the vanity of man; at once, a sin in the speaker, and a burden to the hearers. Paul was taxed for this at Athens, Act. 17. The Athenians were the great wits of the world, masters of eloquence; and when Paul came amongst them, they encountred him, and some said, What will this babler, this sower of words say? vers. 18. So some give the notation of the Greek word, though others, with better reason, take it, as an allusion to little birds, which pick up the seed sown, and being of no great use, either for meat or musick, are yet troublesome enough with unceasant, immelodious chirpings. Such an one those Philosophers censured Paul, This man speaks many words, but he makes no musick, no ear is taken with him, nor understanding enriched by him. Though all we speak is in words, yet we must speak more then words.

σπερμολόγος vel ἀπὸ τῶν σπείρειν τὰς λόγους, vel potius, ἀπὸ τὸ λέγειν, σπέρματα, quasi seminilegas dicas, quod fata in agris depascantur, metaphora ab aviculis sumpta, quæ neq; magnopere sunt esui, neq; cantu delectant, sed garritu perpetuo sunt molestæ. Beza.

I shall lay down five particulars, whereby we may discern, when a multitude of words are sinful, or when there is a multitude of sins in a multitude of words: It is possible to speak many words, and all few enough, and no sin at all in them. They are sinful,

1. When words are unprofitable, light, vain, frothy, words that have no nourishment in them: for as meat is to the palate, so are words to the ear, to the understanding. Words are the bread of the mind. Some words are nothing but wind, there's no food, no tack in them; you cannot pick one good bit out of a whole discourse. He that hath spoken one such word hath spoken too many: how much more when a multitude of them are spoken together? As it shews the nobleness of action, to do what is worthy to be spoken of, so of elocution to speak what is worthy to be done.

Secondly, When words are beside the matter, beside the business in hand; when we shoot out arrows not eying the mark, arrow after arrow, and all from the mark, this is reprovable. If we speak not to the point, we speak to no purpose. Be clear to that, and the fewest words will make the fullest answer. Be off from that, and many words make not a word of answer.

Thirdly, When there is but a little matter in a great many words, when plenty of words have a scarcity, a dearth of matter in them. Some contract (as it were) the spirits of a point into a few words, and can give you much in a little, a large matter in a narrow compass. This is an excellent skill, though not alwayes fit: because all are not able to apprehend what is couched and drawn up so close together; all are not able to drink spirits, but must have them infused into, and incorporated with larger discourses, and particular demonstrations; they must have line upon line, and precept upon precept, that is a multitude of lines and precepts. Yet matterless words are reprovable, how many soever they be, and the more they be, the more reprovable they are, Shall not such a multitude of words be reproved?

Fourthly, A multitude of words are sinful, when they are affected; when a man delights to speak much. A man may be that to himself, which Ezekiel was to his hearers, as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument (Ezek. 33.32.) Such will speak often and long, not that they care to profit others, but for their own applause, or to please themselves.

Fifthly, And lastly, When we think to carry it by the multitude of words: 1. In reference unto man, to speak a man or his cause down, to over-bear him with a croud or throng of words. Or secondly, in reference unto God (Eccl. 5. 2.) Be not hasty to utter a thing before God, or concerning God, Why? For God is in heaven, and thou upon earth, therefore let thy words be few. There is an infinite distance between God and man. We are not able to comprehend, Who, or what God is; we cannot reach God, and therefore we should be very careful and deliberate in speaking to and of God, or about the things of God. The Apostle (Rom. 8.31.) having set forth the great mystery of the love of God to us in Christ, concludeth (as some conceive) like an Orator, What shall we say then to these things? As if he had said, Here is a subject about which much might be said, but we had need be very careful how and what we say about it, What shall we say to these things? No man, no not the tongue of an Angel is sufficient to deliver and unfold these secrets: such love, such goodness are beyond words. The Moralist hath a grave and serious passage to this purpose, while he was falling upon a discourse about the heavens, stars, and superiour motions. When we enter into our Temples, we compose our selves to reverence; we look even to our garments, that they sit comely about us; we (as it were) fashion and shape every member into an argument of modesty. How much more should we do this, when we come to speak of the stars, and heavens, but most of all, when we speak of the nature of the gods, (The best Heathen Catechisms speak no better) Lest we speak any thing rashly, or affirm any thing that is untrue. If an Heathen was thus taken up with the thought of heavenly bodies, and strucken with a reverential awe, when he was to speak about Idol-gods, how much more ought we to come to the Apostles stand, about the Divine things of the great and only wise God? What shall we say to these things? It is good for us to avoid a multitude of words in all things, especially in things which are so high, so much above us. The Apostle admonisheth (1 Tim. 6.20.) Avoid prophane and vain bablings; There may be profane and vain bablings about holy and sacred things: And that not only when we argue about them, but when we pray about them.

In omne argumentum modestiæ fingimur.

This excess Christ reproveth in the prayer of the Pharisees, Mat. 6. 4. They think they shall be heard for their much speaking, and that they must prevail with God for the things they desire, because they utter many words to manifest their desires. Thus to use many words in prayer is babling, not praying: And thus to use many words in preaching, is the uncomeliness, if not the sinfulness of preaching.

Paul, Acts 20. preached until midnight. There was a multitude of words, yet not too many words; his discourse had not one of these evil ingredients; he did not speak unprofitable things, or things beside the matter, or a little matter in many words; he did not speak, because he affected to speak, or because he thought to carry it by speaking. Thus, to pray long, or to preach long, is no fault: The greatest multitude of such words, is not one too many.

Numquid qui multa loquitur non & audiet? Vulg.

The Vulgar varieth from our reading, Shall not he that speaketh much hear also? The Original will bear it: As if he had said, Thou hast spoken a great while, wilt thou not have the patience to hear thy friend? Wilt thou have all the talk thy self? Thou hast uttered a multitude of words, be content to receive a few. They who have spoken, should be willing to hear and receive an answer. Much speaking is then most offensive, when we will not take our turns to hear. Some will have all the discourse, all the argument themselves, and when they have spoken long, will hardly endure another to reply a little. See how God hath disposed the organs of the body: he hath given two ears, and but one tongue, which speaks thus much, That a man should be more ready to hear, then to speak; and that's the Apostle James his rule, Chap. 1. 19. Let every man be swift to hear, and slow to speak: not that he doth positively commend slowness of speech, that is not his meaning; heaviness of speech is no vertue, nor any mans commendation: but he speaks comparatively, Be swift to hear, and slow to speak; that is, Be ye more nimble with your ears, then with your tongues; be rather willing to receive instruction, then forward to give it, rather attend the mind of others, then open your own. There is a time to keep silence, and and a time to speak, Eccles. 3. 7. Every thing is comely in its season.

Observe, From the whole reason, That

It is a duty to answer, when much hath been spoken.

Especially, when we conceive any thing spoken against the truth. Solomons seeming contradiction asserts this duty, Prov. 26. 4, 5. Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest thou also be like unto him. Answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit. One rule saith, Answer him not; and the other saith, Answer him. The meaning is plain to the point in hand; Answer not a fool according to his folly, lest thou also be like unto him, that is, if he speak foolishly and passionately, do not thou answer him passionately and foolishly too, for then thou shalt be as foolish as he, thou shalt be like or equal to him, as if thy spirit and his were cast in the same mould. For the answer which a man giveth another is the measure of himself, the image of our minds is drawn with the tongue. But answer a fool according to his folly, lest he be wise in his own conceit, that is, If he have spoken foolishly, do thou answer him wisely and discreetly; let thine answer be according to his folly, but in thine own wisdom. Thus to answer a fool according to his folly, is indeed to answer him contrary to his folly. Thus he must be answered, or else he is not answered: and if he have no answer, he will think that he is unanswerable; that, all is oracle which he hath uttered, he will grow into proud and high conceits of himself, that surely he is a conquerour and invincible, because no man takes up the bucklers, or appears in the field against him. Therefore answer him, Lest he (whom all that know him, know to be a fool) be wise in his own conceit. Should not the multitude of words be answered?

And should a man full of talk be justified?

This latter branch is of the same strain with the former, and what I have observed there answers both, yet I shall open the letter of the Text, and shew the elegancy of the Original.

אִישׁ שִׂפְתַיִם Notat non loquacem modo, sed etiam facundum. Merc.

Should a man full of talk?] The Hebrew is, A man of lips. Mr. Broughton translates it, Shall the lips-man be justified? He speaks of Job, as if he were composed and made all of lips. When a man useth one member inordinately, he may be said to have but one member. Denomination is given from that which is most, or acts most. Thus as he that is a great fighter, is called, A man of his hands: so he that is a great talker, is called, A man of the tongue, or a man of lips: as if he laid by the use of all the other parts of his body to imploy his lips, or were active only with his tongue. The Apostle speaking of the variety of Church-members, under the notion of a natural body, subjoyns (1 Cor. 12. 17.) If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole were hearing, where were the smelling? In like manner if the whole were lip and tongue, where were the eye, where the ear? As we may be said not to have that which we use not; so to have only that, which we use too much.

Si labium valdè deductum sit, atq; etiam tenue loquacitatis atq; eloquentiæ signum est; sicut etiam crassiora labia loquendi ineptiam & difficultatem indicant.

Or secondly, The lips being a special instrument of speech, and a help to pronunciation, are here put for speech it self, and so we explain it in our translation, Should a man full of talk? A man of lips, is a man full of talk. And there is a natural reason for it too. As Physiognomists gather conjectures from the frame of the whole body, from the lines and lineaments of the face about the habits and dispositions of the mind; So they draw arguments from the lips, whether a man be quick or slow of speech. Some mens lips have a stamp of talkativeness upon them, and others of silence. Thus we may understand that of Moses (Exod. 6. 12.) When God was about to send him to Pharaoh, about the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, he made many excuses, and at last falls upon this, How shall Pharaoh hear me that am of uncircumcised lips? But was Moses of uncircumcised lips? as to be of an uncircumcised heart, so to be of uncircumcised lips may intimate spiritual pollution and uncleanness. When the Prophet Isaiah cried out at the vision of the glory of God, Woe is me, I am a man of unclean lips (Isa. 6. 5.) it is, as if he had said, I am a man of uncircumcised lips. But though Moses was humble enough in the acknowledgement of his own sinfulness, yet his aim was to note the unfiledness of his speech, not the filedness of his nature. For as among the Jews, uncircumcision was a sign of all the natural uncleannesses of the soul, so of some imperfections upon, or belonging to the body. Thus Moses called himself a man of uncircumcised lips, because he was not eloquent, but slow of speech, and slow of tongue, (Exod. 4. 10.) He was (according to the letter of the Hebrew) heavy-mouthed, or as we say, meal-mouthed; and this according to that idiom was to be of uncircumcised lips, as if Moses had pleaded thus, I have not a polite and curious language to win upon Pharaoh, My tongue has not been pared and smoothed for the Court-dialect, I that have kept sheep so long, and have conversed with clowns and shepherds, How shall I speak to a King? Pharaoh useth to have accurate Orators about him, men of lips, but I am none. So then, according to this second sense, a man of lips is an eloquent man, a man ready, very ready and apt to speak; a man whose tongue is the pen, that is, like the pen of a ready writer.

Crassiora habeo labia, quam ut coram rege expeditè & facundè loqui possim: circumcisionis, i.e. extenuatione & expolitione labiorum indigeo. Pined.

Further, when Zophar calls Job a man of lips, he implyeth, That Job had carried himself in that disputation, as if every member of his body had been a lip, or as if he had a lip in every member, that is, as if every member had spoken. According to that of Solomon (Prov. 6. 13.) He speaketh with his feet, he teacheth with his fingers; his carriage, his posture, his action, speak and proclaim what is in his heart, or what his mind is, He speaketh with his feet. When violent and passionate persons are speaking, you shall see, as it were, a lip in their feet, a lip upon their hands, a lip in their eyes, a lip in their brows, a lip in their arms, that is, they speak with all these, they move their hands at you, and their heads at you, and their eyes at you, as if all spake. These are men of lips.

Toti veluti linguæ sunt, oculis, naso, fronte, ore, manibus, cubitis, pedibus colloquuntur. Bold.

Should a man of lips be justified?] He speaks not of that great work of grace, the justification of a sinner before God; to be justified here is to be approved, to carry the cause, or prevail in arguing. He that prevaileth in any controversie should be justified: But shall a man of lips be justified? Must he needs be thought to speak truth, because he speaks much, or in greatest weight because in greatest number, Shall he be justified? We have the word in that sense (Psa. 51. 4.) I will confess, &c. that thou mightest be justified, when thou speakest, and be clear when thou judgest: That, when thou shalt judge and pronounce sentence upon me, thou mayest appear in the opinion and esteem of all the world to have done me right, or not to have wronged me at all; I aforehand confess my sin, and condemn my self. So we may interpret that (Job 13. 18.) Behold now, I have ordered my cause, I know that I shall be justified, that is, I have laid my matters so well, and put my business into such a fair state, that I know I shall come off with credit, I know I shall be justified. And this is it which Zophar seems especially to charge Job with, That he hoped to get the Garland, and beat all down before him with his lips, with the multitude of his words; as if he had said, Thou hast placed thy defence in windy words, and not in substantial truths; but this noise, this talk will stand thee in little stead, thou shalt find that the day will not be won with words.

Vincet causa, ut necessario habeatur verídicus quia multíloquus? Janson.

Hence observe,

Good words cannot make a bad cause good.

Plerumq; pro differentium viribus & eloquentiæ potestate etiam perpetuæ veritatis conditio mutatur. Min. Octavio. In multíloquio non deest peccatum.

Words sometimes makes a good cause appear bad, and a bad cause appear good; but when the rubbish maliciously or ignorantly cast upon the one, and the varnish cunningly laid upon the other, are taken off, both will appear as they are, the one as good as it is, and the other as bad as it is.

Again, Shall a man of words be justified? He that speaks much may sooner ensnare then clear himself. In many words there are usually many errours. Silence seldom brings repentance; and it is but seldom that much speaking calls not for much repentance. They that speak much, are in danger to offend much. To be sure, He that hath nothing but words to hold him up, must needs fall. You cannot blow away, either a mans assertion or objection with your breath, but with your reason and authority.

Vers. 3. Should thy lies make men hold their peace? and when thou mockest shall no man make thee ashamed?

Zophar riseth higher in language still, reproving Job, not only for the multitude, but for the falseness of his words.

Should thy lies?] The Hebrew word is of a large extent, signifying in the verb, to frame, fashion, and form a thing out of a mans own mind; and so Zophar would fasten this upon Job, That the words which he had spoken were only shap't and wrought in his own spirit, he had received no such thing from God, no such thing was ever approved by God; the birth of all was but his own fleeting fancie, and sickly imagination. So the word is used (*Nehem.*6.8.) There are no such things done, as thou sayest, but thou feignest them out of thine own heart; Thou wouldest put me in fear, and bear me in hand (saith that worthy of Israel to his enemy suborning false fears against him) that there are strange plots laid, and many adversaries combined against me: but I perceive it is thy plot to tell me of a plot. Thy information is but to make me afraid of that which is not, not to secure me from that which is. We read of the moneth which Jeroboam had devised of his own heart (1 Kings 12.33.) It is the word of the Text. Lies are framed and fashioned out of our own hearts, there is the shop wherein they are wrought. The heart is deceitful above all things; A deceitful heart is a fit shop to frame lies in, which are deceitful ware. Such Zophar supposed Jobs to be.

Secondly, Some read, Should thy toyes, thy trifling discourses make men hold their peace? Should thy tatling, thy idle tales impose silence upon thy hearers?

Thirdly, The word signifies the members of the body, and the boughs of a tree, and by a trope the thoughts and abilities of the mind, which are to the mind, as limbs to the body, and as boughs shooting from a tree. I will not conceal his parts, saith God of Leviathan, Job 41.12. that is, What mighty members he is made up of. Some read the word so here, Should thy parts be conceal'd, or, Should men hold their peace at thy parts? As if he had said, Thou thinkest that thou hast mighty parts, that, thou putt'st such Leviathan-like members, such Goliah-like limbs of wit and knowledge, of judgement and eloquence, that all the host of learned men needs must be afraid and tremble to deal with thee, or accept thy challenge. The weapons of the mind are more powerful, and sometimes more terrible then the members of the body. An ignorant or slow-witted man, is no more able to argue with one that is quick and judicious, then a child is able to wrestle with a Giant.

But the word is most usually taken in the sense we render it, for lies or falshoods; So (*Isa.*44.25.) He frustrateth the tokens of the liars, namely, of those that tell lies of the stars, and say, The constellations have reported events to them, of which indeed there is not a letter written, nor a word to be spelled out of those heavenly characters. Should thy lies make men hold their peace?

Make men.] The word may be limited to great and wise men, Should thy lies make wise men hold their peace? So some restrain it here; As if Zophar had said, Indeed thy lies may cause ignorant men to hold their peace, they may deceive the simple, and catch the weak; but should thy lies make men of parts and abilities, men of experience and understanding hold their peace? Thus the word is used (*Deut.*2.34. Psal. 17.14. *Isa.*3.24.) to note illustrious and wise men, men of more then an ordinary pitch and measure in dignity, or in wisdom.

מתים Est generale comprehendens viros, mulieres & parvulos. Hæc vox (à מות mors) ex eo nata videtur, quod omnes sinus morti subjecti, ita à Græcis βρότοι, & à latinis mortalis usurpatur. Mar.

Others take the word indifferently for any rank or sort of men, one or other: or as we commonly speak, for any mortal man. For it cometh from a root which signifies death, which is the last debt of all mankind; as the Greeks have a word for man in general noting his mortality, so have the Hebrews: because all men carry about them the ensigns or symptoms of death continually, therefore they are called Mortals. So here, Should thy lies make any mortal man, or any man alive hold his peace? Be he high or low, knowing or ignorant, I tell thee the most simple man that goes upon the ground cannot hold his peace, when thou speakest, and may well enough answer all that thou hast spoken. Thus you see the sense is heightned by the lowness of the persons, who are supposed match enough for Job in this controversie. What thou hast argued, a woman, even the weakest among women, a child, even a little child, may confute and answer. We need not send for the great Rabbies and Doctors of the Law to deal with thee. Who can be silent, or speak without success? Should thy lies make men hold their peace?

Hold their peace?] No, They should not: Should what thou hast spoken falsly be received like an oracle of truth, against which no man may open his mouth or mutter? Should it be received as some Divine Revelation which all must admire, none question? Must all the world of reasonable men stand mute at these thy reasonings? Hast thou any hope that thy lies shall find such entertainment, and go off at such a rate of belief or admiration?

Holding the peace importeth greatest reverence both to speakers and actours, as also greatest worth or weight in what is spoken or done. When the Lord slew the two sons of Aaron by fire from heaven, Aaron held his peace, in token of submission, *Levit.*10.3.

הס Quam vocem Hieronymus interjectionem esse docet imperantis silentium. Vel est imperativum per apocopen ab הסה tacuit reverentiæ causa. Buxt.

And when providential actings spake aloud the deliverance of the Jews out of Babylon, the Prophet like a crier in a court, commands or proclaims silence (*Zech.*2.13.) Be silent, O all flesh, before the Lord, for he is raised up out of his holy habitation. The Hebrew word Has (saith one of the Ancients) is an interjection, or rather a verb of the imperative mood, enjoyning silence or inhibiting speech: we in our language use a word near that in sound, when we would have any, or all, hold their peace, we say, Husht: So saith the Prophet, Husht, not a word, For the Lord is raised up out of his holy habitation; his meaning is, Yield all reverence, respect and fear, stand in awe, budge not, let the wicked silence their vain boasts, and the godly their vain fears: Let neither the one or the other utter a word before the Lord.

Job describing himself in his former flourishing estate, saith, Unto me men gave ear and waited, and kept silence at my counsel; after my words they spake not again (Chap.29. 21.) that is, I was a man of so much authority and veneration, that when I spake, no man would offer to speak after me, much less contradict what I had spoken; Thus it was once with Job: Now Zophar puts it as a matter of reproof. What? dost thou think thy words, yea thy lies such, as no man may examine, much less gain-say? Should thy lies make men hold their peace?

Again, As holding the peace, notes reverence, so favour and connivence. When we are willing to let an ill word spoken, or a thing ill done pass, as if we saw or heard it not, we hold our peace at it. When the children of Belial said of Saul, How shall this man save us? and they despised him, and brought him no presents, the Text saith, But he held his peace, He was as if he had been deaf, 1 Sam.10.27. It is wisdom not to see or hear, what we are not in a condition to redress. Connivence is better then complaint, when we cannot mend our selves, nor reduce others. In this sense we may also take, Holding the peace here. Should any man favour or wink at thee? Should any man be afraid to speak truth, when thou speakest lies? Hence observe,

First thus, It is a duty to vindicate, or to be an advocate for oppressed truth.

Zophar spake true in the general, Lies must not make us hold our peace. It is a duty to plead the cause of truth, yea to be valiant for the truth. We must know no relations in truths case. Socrates is my friend, Plato is my friend, but truth is a better friend then both. Whosoever dares speak against truth, we must dare to speak for it. 'Tis noble to shew our selves friends to truth, though we lose friends by it; and enemies to errour, though we get enemies by it. There is a three-fold lie which we must not hold our peace at.

First, There is a verbal lie, when a man tells a false tale, or bringeth up a false report, which is the lie of the ninth Commandment, Thou shalt not bear false witness: Hold not thy peace at such a lie.

Secondly, There is a doctrinal lie, when a false position is averred to be the truth of God, and stampt with divine authority. Any erroneous Doctrine is comprehended under, and branded with this title, A lie; For this cause (saith Paul) namely, because they received not the love of the truth, God shall send them strong delusion, that they shall believe a lie, (2 Thess.2.11.) He means a doctrinal lie, all the doctrine of that man of sin, with which he hath deceived the world under the notion of truth, is but one great lie. We must contend earnestly, even wrestle for the the faith once committed to the Saints against all those lies.

Thirdly, There is a practical lie, of which the Apostle speaks (1 Joh. 2. 4, 5.) He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his Commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him. This is a lie, not spoken, but done, when a mans actions contradict his profession, or when his works unteach what he hath taught by word. The whole life of an hypocrite is but one continued lie. The first of these is a lie told, the second is a lie taught, the third is a lie acted; and all of them are not only to be abhorred in our selves, but opposed in others. All lying is hateful to God, being most opposite unto God, who is the true God, and the God of truth. Lying makes us like the Devil, who was a liar as well as a murtherer from the beginning; the Devil told the first false tale, and preached the first false Doctrine; he is therefore justly called, A liar from the beginning. We may sometimes forbear to speak the truth, but we must never forbear to speak against a lie, whether verbal, doctrinal, or practical. Should thy lies make men hold their peace?

And when thou mockest, shall no man make thee ashamed?

This is the third charge, and it is higher then the former two: Multitude of words is ill enough; and lies are far worse; but to mock is worst of all. And which is yet more, The word which is here used signifieth the worst kind of mocking, even that which is joyned with scorn and extream derision: it notes mocking not only with the tongue by uncomely speeches, but mocking by the eye or hand with uncivil gestures, or by the affected mimical postures of the whole body. The enemies of Christ are so described in that noble prophesie (Psalm 22. 6.) I am a worm and no man, a reproach of men, and despised of the people; all they that see me laugh me to scorn, they shoot out the lip, they shake the head. The event fulfilled this at the death of Christ, Matth. 27. Such mocking Zophar chargeth Job with; thou dost not only speak lies, but thou settest them off with scornful gestures.

21. Quid potest esse tam ridiculum, quam sannio est, qui ore vultu imitandis moribus, denique corpore videtur? Cic. l. 2. de Orat.

Again, This word signifieth not only a light jeast, or a merriment, but that which hath virulency, and wears a sting; not only that which hath ridiculousnes in it, but that which hath cruelty in it. That's the Apostles Epithete (Heb. 11. 36.) They had trials of cruel mockings.

Thus he reproves Job, as if while he lay in the dust, and was groveling on the ground, he had like a mad man cast fire-brands, arrows and death; or had behaved himself more like a fool in a play, then a mirror of patience; Deceiving his neighbour, and saying, Am not I in sport? Prov. 26. 18, 19.

There is much labour among Interpreters, to find out what gave Zophar occasion to break out in so much bitternes upon Job. I shall touch that in the close. When thou mockest, Shall no man make thee ashamed?] Some render, Shall no man confute thee? We may put both together. Shall no man by confuting thee put thee to shame? When a confident man is thorowly answered, he is ashamed.

Ignominioso pudore suffundor gravius significat quam בוש quod est in bonum aliquando, hoc semper in malum. R. D. Kimchi. Buxtorf. Significat eum qui conscientia turpitudinis hominum oculos fugit, ut profligati milites, qui sine Ovat. one, taciti & clanculò redeunt Domum. Coc.

The word which we translate, Make ashamed, signifies the greatest shame, as that before did the greatest mocking. Highest shame is but a fit reward for highest scorn. Some Criticks in that language have observed, that the word is never taken, but in an ill sence, for the most shameful shame, when a person is so ashamed that he is confounded, and dares not lift up his head, or look another in the face. The Lord saith to Moses in the case of Miriam, If her Father had but spit in her face, should she not be ashamed seven dayes? (Numb. 12. 14.) The face is the table of beauty and honour; but when it is spit upon, it is made a sink of shame. God did more then spit in the face of his undutiful Daughter Miriam, when he filled her face with the filthy spots of leprosie: Miriam must be greatly ashamed, when shut out of the Camp and society of Israel seven dayes. When David, over-passionately lamenting the death of Absalom, blemished the victory of that day, and soiled the beauty of that great deliverance; the Text saith (2 Sam. 19. 3.) that the Souldiery went home, as men ashamed? Souldiers after a battel won are wont to come home gallantly, and in a triumph; but these victors gat them by stealth that day into the City, as people being ashamed steal away when they flee in battel; they went sneaking, as we say, home to their dwellings, scarce a man durst lift up his head. Such a sence is here intended, Shouldst not thou be made to hold down thy head, and cover thy face for shame, who hast opened thy mouth in scorn, and in discovering thy own shame? Note from it,

First, Scornful gestures and mockings are the height of sinnings.

Zophar put this in the third place, as the highest step in the gradation of Job's sin. There is a walking in the counsel of the ungodly, and a standing in the way of sinners, before we sit down in the chair of the scorners (Psal. 1. 1.) The Vulgar reads it, In the chair of the malignants. When men once arrive at scorning and mocking, they are come to the uppermost form of sinners. The chair of mocking, is the chair of malignity. That which is said of a woman in a peculiar sence, is true of any man in this sence, When he hath lost his modesty, he hath nothing else to lose. The Apostle Peter being about to shew the utmost evil of the worlds old-age or dotage in sin, saith, There shall come in the last dayes scoffers (2 Pet. 3. 3.) There have ever been deceivers, but at last there shall come scoffers, saying, Where is the promise of his coming? For since the Fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation. Julian was in his time counted, and stands upon record to this day among the greatest of sinners, An apostate from Christ; and did not the apostasie of his heart break out chiefly at his lips? Did not the very spirit of malignity against the Gospel of Christ, appear in mocking the Christians? When he had taken away their estates, he said, It should not trouble you to be poor, your Master was poor, and he said, Blessed are the poor. And when he had caused them to be smitten, Your Master (saith he) hath taught you, That whosoever shall smite you on the right cheek, you must turn to him the other also. Thus he turned the holy counsels of Christ into prophane jests. The vilest wickedness of the Jewish state is expresst thus, They mocked the messengers of God, and misused the Prophets (2 Chron. 36. 16.) It is a great sin not to hear the messengers of God, not to obey the truth that is brought in his name; but to mock his messengers is the dregs of sin. When upon the ascent of Christ into Heaven, many had received such abundant inundation of the Spirit, That they spake with divers tongues the wonderful works of God; Some (saith the Text) were in doubt, saying one to another, what meaneth this? Others mocking, said, These men are full of new wine, (Act. 2. 13.) Others mocking, &c. Mockers must stand by themselves, they are marked for wrath: We may warn all such, as the Prophet doth (Isa. 28. 22.) Now therefore be ye not mockers, lest your bands be made strong. If God make the bands of affliction and wrath strong upon any, it will be upon mockers. They break the strongest bands of duty, therefore their bands of misery shall be stronger then they can break.

Reditus ecclesiis eripuit Sarcasmis additis, se Christianos expeditiores facere ad regnum Cœlorum, quia Galilæus magister ipsorum dixerit, beatos esse pauperes, &c. Pezel. in Sleid.

Secondly, Observe, We should not forbear to own, no not a mockt and a derided truth.

Christ will be ashamed of that man, who shall be ashamed of him, and of his words, in an adulterous and sinful generation. When truth is honoured and applauded, it is easie to own it, but it is our greatest honour to own a dishonoured and a despised truth.

Thirdly, Mockers should be put to shame.

Yea, Mockers shall be put to shame. They who cast shame upon the truth, shall have shame cast upon themselves, they shall be buried in shame. They that lift up their heads against Christ, against the people and wayes of Christ, shall be made to hold down their heads, to hold them down for ever. When thou mockest, shall no man make thee ashamed? If man do not, God will.

It is here enquired, why Zophar imputes these three faults. First, Multiloquy. Secondly, Lying. Thirdly, and mocking unto Job. What occasion had this poor man given for this accusation?

For the first, nothing appears but this, which comes to nothing: Job spake a little more then his friend Eliphaz, and not much more then Bildad. The discourse of Bildad is contained in one short Chapter; Job lengthened out his answer in two, except this will make it out (which must be very poorly) I see not how he over-acted with his tongue, or failed in speaking too much.

For the second, Some fasten Zophars suspition of a lie upon that in Chap. 10. vers. 7. Thou knowest that I am not wicked. As if he had obtruded that upon the knowledge of God, which was not, and therefore was not to be known.

Thirdly, He is judged mocking at Chap. 10. vers. 3. Is it good unto thee that thou shouldest oppress, that thou shouldest despise the work of thine hands, and shine upon the counsel of the wicked? But besides these conjectures, Zophar himself gives the reason expressly in the next words, For, Thou hast said, My doctrine is pure, and I am clean in thine eyes: As if he had said, If thou thinkest that I charge thee unjustly, in saying that thou hast scattered lies, and art a mocker; I will tell thee plainly, what renders thee guilty in my thoughts, Thou hast said, My doctrine is pure, and I am clean in his sight. But how slender a foundation this position yields, to support so heavy a charge (were it Job's (in terminis) in down-right words, which yet hath not appeared) I shall clear in the opening of those words. But before I come so far, take two or three Observations, upon the Preface in general, as it contains this three-fold accusation already opened.

First, That it is no new thing for him that speaks truth to be counted a lier, nor for him that speaks seriously to be counted a mocker.

It was so with Job, There were some slips of passion in Job, but no error in his opinion, and yet he is called a lier; poor Job who lay upon the dunghil full of sores, and bodily distempers, full of sorrow and inward temptations, had little leisure to mock and jear, his very wounds might speak his denial of such behaviour; yet he is judged a mocker. The Apostles were sometimes counted mad men, besides themselves, and out of their wits; sometimes cunning and crafty men, who went about to out-wit others. Paul is put to his plea in that common case (2 Cor. 6. 4.) as deceivers, yet true; we are lookt upon as a company of Mountebanks, as if our design were to cheat the people at once, of their purses, and of their souls: We are esteemed deceivers, as if we were hired to cry up an Impostor, rather then a Saviour, and to fill the world with fables, rather then sollid truths; but truth of understanding is the commodity we deal in, and we deal in it with truth of heart. Again (2 Cor. 2. 17.) We are not as many, which corrupt the word of God. Even they who received the Word by immediate revelation, were suspected of corrupting the Word, of mixing and mingling it with their own inventions, to serve turns, or to make it comply with their own interests. But (saith he) we are no corrupters, we make not our own markets of the Word, we do not put it off for worldly advantages or gain, we only make this advantage and merchandise of it, the gaining of your souls.

Secondly, Observe, A good man may causlesly charge those that are innocent.

As we must not at all judge a man to be wicked, who is falsly charged, so we should be very cautious how we judge a man wicked, who chargeth another falsly. This age is a charging age, The Tongue and Pen have made as hot charges as the Sword. Lier, Heretick, Schismatick, Deceiver, Hypocrite, are the common weapons of our paper war. It is a duty to give a meek interpretation of rigid censures, much more to be sparing in our judgments upon rigid censures. A good man may pass an ill sentence upon those who are and do good. So did Zophar upon Job, and yet upright in the main.

Prima simplicium irarum tela sunt maledicta. Sal.

Thirdly, Observe, It is a dangerous thing to say that is a lie or false, which we are not able to make out for truth.

That was Zophar case, he could not bring both ends of Job's speech together; he suspects all was nought, because he could not find what was good. Job was neither babler, nor lier, nor mocker, though Zophar thought him all these. We through the glass of our own notions, and especially thorow that of our own prejudices, see things in strange colours. We should look upon every thing in its own likeness; we should prove and try every thing to the bottom before we censure, as well as before we approve. That may be found serious, which at first weighs but light, and that a truth which we called a lie. Such caution was never more needed, nor less used then at this day.

VERS. 4, 5, 6.

For thou hast said, My doctrine is pure, and I am clean in thine eyes.

But, O that God would speak, and open his lips against thee.

And that he would shew thee the secrets of wisdom, that they are double to that which is: know therefore that God exacteth of thee less then thine iniquity deserveth.

IN the three former verses we had the Preface of Zophars speech.

In this fourth, He layes down the opinion or position, which he opposeth and speaks against in the fifth and sixth, Thou hast said, My doctrine is pure, and I am clean in thine eyes. This Zophar interpreted as carrying a secret accusation, and reflection upon the justice of God. In saying, Thou art innocent, thou saiest, God is unrighteous. He that (being punished) acquitteth himself, condemneth his Judge.

Thou hast said.] Or, Thou hast confidently affirmed: The words imports more then a bare say-so; Thou hast strongly testified for thy self, My doctrine is pure, and I am clean. That's the force of David's infirmity (Psal. 116. 11.) I said in my haste, All men are liars. I said, is, more then a conjecture, and more then a naked affirmation, even an assertion, and a confident assertion too. So is, Thou hast said. If another had said it, we should sooner have believed it. A modest submission of thy doctrine to the judgment of thy superiors, or of thy friends and equals, would become thee better. We have reason to doubt thy doctrine more, because we see thy own hand writes the approbation, and thou art not only a witness, but the only witness in thy own cause. Hence Note, Dicere est affirmare & pro certo asserere.

When a man bears witness of himself, he layes himself open to jealousies and suspition.

Thou hast said, My doctrine is pure.] Thou shouldst have expected the testimony of another. What do thy neighbours say of thee? What do thy friends say of thee? Do they subscribe this certificate, That thy doctrine is pure, and thy life clean? Christ holds forth a divine prerogative, when he saith (Joh. 8. 14.) Though I bear record of my self, yet my record is true. God may give testimony to himself, and Christ there speaks in reference to his Godhead, as his next words intimate, I know whence I came, and whither I go. It is the priviledge of God alone to be a self-witness. Hence that of Christ (Joh. 5. 31.) If I bear witness of my self, my witness is not true. How shall we pacifie and reconcile these two Texts? In one Christ saith, Though I bear record of my self, yet my record is true; and in another, If I bear witness of my self, my witness is not true.

I answer first, Christ speaks either by way of concession; though I should grant thus much to you, that if I bear witness of my self, my witness is not true, yet I have further testimony (as he shews in the following verse) There is another beareth witness of me, and so I can easily spare my own. Or,

Concessio Rhetorica. Bez.

Secondly, If I should barely assert for my self, I give you an occasion to suspect whether my assertion be true.

Thirdly, The word which we translate true, is well rendred firm, If I bear witness to my self, my witness is not valid or authentical; for another man may bear witness to his neighbour, and his witness not be true; but that which ratifieth a testimony (foro humano) is when it comes from a second, or a third, In the mouth of two or three witnesses, shall every word be established, Deut. 19. 15.

But

But may we not bear witneſs to our ſelves?

In ſome caſes we may, in moſt we may not, eſpecially in theſe two.

Firſt, When we teſtifie for our ſelves out of an ambition to commend our ſelves, to ſpread our own plumes, and to grow up into the applauſe of the world: This is phariſaical boaſting of, rather then witneſs-bearing to our ſelves.

Secondly, When what we ſay or teſtifie is untrue. We muſt not bear falſe-witneſs, either for or againſt our ſelves. Zophar ſuſpects Job's ſelf-witneſs of both theſe errors, as aiming at ſelf-applauſe, and that by arrogating more to himſelf, then he was able to make out. He offends who affects to blazon himſelf by a worth which is really his; but he that blazons himſelf by a worth which is not his, multiplies offences. Some ſay they are Jews, and are not, but are the Synagogue of Satan, (Revel. 2. 9.) A Jew may offend, in ſaying, he is a Jew; but he that ſaith he is a Jew, that is, a true believer (for under thoſe old Teſtament terms, Goſpel-profeſſors are expreſt in the Revelation) and is not, that is, hath neither the inward power, nor the outward evidence of a Saint, his pretended piety is double iniquity. A Jew of Satans Synagogue, is the worſt Diſciple of his Synagogue, None are ſo bad as they, who only ſeem to be good. They are twice dead, who have but a name to be alive. The Apoſtle chides thoſe bitterly, who were Jews only in the letter, and in the fleſh (Rom. 2. 17, 19.) Behold, thou art called a Jew, and reſteſt in the law, and makeſt thy boaſt of God, and art confident that thou thy ſelf art a guide of the blind, &c. Thou that teacheſt another, teacheſt thou not thy ſelf? Thou who makeſt thy boaſt of the law, through breaking the law, diſhonoureſt thou God? To ſay our doctrine is pure, when it is defiled with error; to ſay our ſelves are clean, when we are either openly prophane, or cloſely hypocritical, adds to the impurity of our doctrine, and to the uncleanneſs of our lives. Moſt appear too too bad; but they are worſt, who would appear better then they are.

But do we not find Paul more then once maintaining his own integrity? Saith he not, I have lived in all good Conſcience before God untill this day, Act. 23. 1. Saith he not? I am not mad, moſt noble Feſtus, but ſpeak forth the words of truth and ſoberneſs, Act. 26. 25. When we are accuſed and called to anſwer, we may ſay, Our doctrine is pure, when it is; and that we are clean, when we are.

In ſuch a caſe, not to teſtifie the truth for our ſelves, is near as bad as to teſtifie a falſhood againſt another. And in any caſe to give a wrong teſtimony of our ſelves, is worſe then to give it of another. The ſin is the greater, by how much the perſon againſt whom we ſin is nearer to us: and every man is neareſt to himſelf.

Calumniatoris hæc verba ſunt, non veritatem & juſtitiam proſequentis. Beda. Non ita dixit, tantum dixit nihil impium feci. Hieron. In eadem ſententia ſunt Gregorius & Chryſ.

Thou haſt ſaid; And what ſaid he? My doctrine is pure, and I am clean in thy ſight. Divers of the Ancients upon this place challenge Zophar of ſlander and calumniation, for faſtning this report or fame upon Job. One is very angry with him, How is it poſſible (ſaith he) that Job ſhould be imagined to riſe to ſuch a pitch of ſelf-confidence, or to ſpeak at ſuch a rate of ſpiritual pride, when he teſtifies (Chap. 9. 20.) If I juſtifie my ſelf, mine own mouth ſhall condemn me; if I ſay I am perfect, it ſhall alſo prove me perverſe. And though Job ſaid, I am not wicked, ye he ſaid not, I am clean. The difference is great between a denial of wickedneſs, and a preſumption of cleanneſs. Theſe two cannot expound each other: He that preſumes he is clean, denies he is wicked: Yet he that denies he is wicked, may be far enough from affirming, that he is clean. Such conſequences have more uncharitableneſs then logick in them, and can hardly expect ſo much charity, as to acquit them from ſlander.

But I dare not put an intendment of ſlander upon Zophars account; that's too deep, and more then can be juſtified. For, though Job ſpake not thus, in ſo many ſyllables, yet to that effect he had ſpoken; words had paſt from him, which might give, at leaſt a colourable pretence for ſuch a charge. And Zophar ſeems (in one reſpect) to deal better with Job then his other friends; for he collects the matter upon which he minded to debate with him, and layeth it down in an entire propoſition, This is the thing thou haſt ſaid, My doctrine is pure, and I am clean in his ſight. When or where ſaid he ſo? Some ſettle it upon that (Chap. 6. v. 10.) I have not concealed the words of the holy One; that is, (as theſe expound) I have ſpoken truth, and all the truth. Others put it upon that (Chap. 10. 2.) Shew me wherefore thou contendeſt with me; which hath (ſay they) this ſecret intimation in it, That Job did not ſee any ſin in himſelf, and that he thought God himſelf could hardly ſhew him one, for which he contended with him. Thoſe words alſo at verſ. 7. of the ſame Chapter, Thou knoweſt that I am not wicked, are ſuppoſed an appeal to God himſelf to give teſtimony againſt him, if he could; Thou knoweſt, and I will ſtand to thy judgment, that I am not wicked. Theſe paſſages Zophar might conſtrue to the ſence given, As if he had ſaid, I am clean in thy ſight. And we find Job in his following diſcourſe (Chap. 31. 7.) ſpeaking out plainly, If my ſtep hath turned out of the way, and mine heart walked after mine eyes, and if any blot hath cleaved to my hands; then let me ſow, and let another eat, &c. If any blot hath cleaved to my hands; amounts to as much as this in the letter, I am clean in thy ſight. And as Zophar here, ſo Elihu taxeth him with it elſewhere (Chap. 33. 8, 9.) Surely thou haſt ſpoken in mine hearing, and I have heard the voice of thy words, ſaying, I am clean without tranſgreſſion, I am innocent, neither is there iniquity in me.

What then was faulty in Zophar?

This. He managed his diſcourſe more like an Accuſer, then a Comforter. He amplified and ſtrained the words of Job to a ſence which he intended not. He ſpake what might be cloathed with ſuch an interpretation; But, Charity thinketh no evil, and love would have made a better Comment. He never meant to raiſe himſelf upon his own innocency, or to ſtand upon his terms with God: How often had he diſclaimed and even proteſted againſt ſuch overweenings? Yet his friends impoſe that ſence upon him all along; and will make him ſay, what he never thought, and own what his ſoul abhorred.

Accuſatorum more amplificat, & interpretatione parum benevola, eo rem adducit, ut talia cenſeretur locutus Job. Sanct. Neceſſe eſt contentioſius loquaris, quod probare non poſſis. Quintil. Dedam. 18.

Take one Note from their miſtake, and then I ſhall give the ſence of the poſition more diſtinctly.

Words are often miſconſtrued, and reckoned for more then the ſpeaker meant them.

We are apt to put unſound gloſſes upon the Word both of God and man. Many report the matter ſpoken, falſly, and very few report the meaning of the ſpeaker truly. More quarrels and controverſies ariſe from the miſtake of words, then from difference of judgments. There is ſcarce a book written about any Tenet which is oppoſed, but the Author is forced to a great expence of time and pains for the clearing of his meaning from the miſtakes of oppoſites. Yea a man can hardly let a word fall in ordinary conference, but ſome miſ-improvement is made of it. When Peter asked Chriſt concerning John, Lord, and what ſhall this man do? Jeſus ſaith unto him, if I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Joh. 21. 22. Then went this ſaying abroad among the brethren, that that Diſciple ſhould not die; Howbeit Jeſus ſaid unto them, He ſhall not die; but if I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Falſe-witneſſes come againſt Chriſt, and what is their teſtimony? This fellow ſaid, I am able to deſtroy the temple of God, and to build it in three dayes, Mat. 26. 61. This was a mere miſtake of the words of Chriſt, Joh. 2. 19. where when he was demanded by the Jews, What ſign ſheweſt thou unto us, ſeeing that thou doeſt theſe things? He anſwered, Deſtroy this Temple, and in three days I will raiſe it up. How groſly did they corrupt this Text by their expoſition of it! Chriſt ſaid, Deſtroy ye, they made it, I am able to deſtroy; he ſaid, This Temple, meaning his own body; they ſay, the material Temple, or place of publick worſhip: So the Jews ſtumbled at his words, when they fell firſt from his lips, as their reply telleth us, Fourty and ſix years was this Temple in building, and wilt thou rear it up in three days? The Evangeliſt explains him right in the next line, But he ſpake of the Temple of his body. It is to be bewail'd how ſuch miſ-underſtandings have troubled the Church and ſervants of God; and that ſo many have ſuffered upon ſuch miſ-underſtandings. The Wiſeman hath a Proverb, which reacheth this abuſe, though it be not direct to the point in hand, He that covereth a tranſgreſſion ſeeketh love; but he that repeateth a matter, ſeparateth very friends (Prov. 17. 9.) He aims at tale-bearers, who repeat what they hear upon deſign to breed jealouſies, and heart-burning among friends, or, according to the language of the times, to cajole the neareſt and the ſtrongeſt confidents. But we may apply it to the ſence before us, That uſually they who repeat a matter, ſeparate very friends; for who is it almoſt that repeateth the diſcourſe of another (eſpecially if he hath any prejudice againſt the party, or doth not meet fully in opinion with him) but he ſpoils it in repeating, and ſo ſeparates very friends? This was the fault of Job's friends, they repeated his words, but moſt of their repetitions, were perverſions or unkind Criticiſmes upon, rather then charitable reports of what he ſpake. And therefore he was forced (Chap. 23. 3.) to appeal unto God with whom he knew himſelf ſhould find candid dealing, and his words receive a genuine interpretation, O that I knew where I might find him, that I might come even to his ſeat; I would order my cauſe before him, and fill my mouth with arguments. As if he had ſaid, I have been often wronged by my friends in miſconceiving what I have argued, but were I to argue and plead it with God himſelf, I know he would deal fairly with me, and put a right ſence upon every word, he would make the beſt of what is not ſo well ſpoken, and nothing but good of what is well ſpoken; He would receive what is right, and rectifie what is amiſs. Let us now examine what Zophar judged Job to have ſpoken amiſs.

Thou haſt ſaid, My Doctrine is pure, and I am clean in thy ſight.

His ſuppoſed error was, that he thought his doctrine true, and this was his blot, That he thought himſelf clean. This thou haſt ſaid,

My Doctrine is pure.] That is, I am orthodox or ſound in judgment, both in my general tenets, and in what I have particularly maintained in the preſent diſputation concerning the providence of God in afflicting godly men, and in diſpenſing outward comforts to the wicked. Thou haſt ſaid thy doctrine, delivered upon both or either of theſe ſubjects, is pure.

לקח Accipere, doctrina dicitur ab accipiendo, i.e. diſcendo, nam diſcere eſt accipere. Druſ.

The original word which we render Doctrine, is derived from a root which ſignifies to take, or to receive. And that upon a threefold ground.

First, Becauſe ſuch Doctrines are delivered upon the taking of mature deliberation, or gained by taking much pains for them.

Secondly, Becauſe ſuch Doctrines are in their own right to be received. Sound Doctrine is worthy to be received, it is worthy of all reverence and ready acceptation.

Thirdly, Becauſe there is a power in ſuch Doctrines to take or catch thoſe unto whom they are ſpoken. Truth is full, not only of ſtrength, but of ſubtilty. Hence ſome conceive that the alluſion is to Hunters and Fowlers, who lay baits, and ſet traps to catch birds, or other game. So (in a good ſence) a man of wiſdom and underſtanding, publiſhing ſound Doctrine, layes a bait, with holy craft to enſnare and catch his auditors (Prov. 11. 30.) He that winneth ſouls is wiſe; it is this word. They who are godly and judicious catch ſouls, as a fowler catcheth birds: by laying out ſound, wiſe and faithful arguments, they take and ſnap men; they hold their ſpirits faſt, till they overcome and win them, even as the ſnare of the fowler takes the bird: Such are wiſe men indeed. The whoriſh woman (Prov. 7. 13, 21.) is ſaid, to catch or gain the young man (the word is the ſame in the original) by her fair ſpeech, her taking language. A whores doctrine is very taking, her lips drop enſnaring eloquence. As there is a power in ſinful counſel to take and enſnare; ſo much more in holy and wholſom counſel. The Apoſtle was a Craftsmaſter in this ſoul-trade (2 Cor. 12. 16.) Being crafty (ſaith he) I caught you with guile; I plaid the cunning mate with you, I laid a ſnare, and ſet a trap, but all for your good.

Metaphora ſumpta à venatione. Piſc.

Further, The word ſignifies pleaſure and ſweetneſs, noting thus much, That purity of Doctrine is pleaſant, and gives much delight. As meats are to the taſte, ſo are truths to the underſtanding; nothing brings in greater contentment to any faculty, then a clear apprehenſion of the proper object. Suitableneſs is the ground of pleaſure. And the pleaſures of the intellectual part, are as much above thoſe of the ſenſitive, as the underſtanding it ſelf is above the ſenſes. A Philoſopher having found out a true and rational concluſion in Geometry, ran about the City, where he lived, as if he had been diſtracted with joy, ſaying, I have found it, I have found it. When God gives, and we by ſtudy and prayer find out the treaſures of divine truth, it is as the beginning of Heaven (Matth. 13. 44.) The Kingdom of Heaven is like unto a treaſure hid in a field, the which when a man hath found, he hideth, and for joy thereof, goeth and ſelleth all that he hath, and buyeth that field. The ſtatutes of the Lord are right, rejoycing the heart, Pſal. 19. 8. To receive pure Doctrine is as much a pleaſure, as it is an honour; as much the delight, as the ornament of the mind.

My doctrine is pure.

Pure.] The word ſignifies pellucid or clear, that which a man may look thorow as Glaſs, or to the bottom of it, as a Cryſtal fountain. Pure doctrine is like Glaſs or a Cryſtal ſtream, upon which you may not only look, but look thorow it, and to the bottom of it, and find all clear. Such a purity is here meant, My doctrine is pure. Purity of doctrine imports two things,

First, The preciouſneſs of doctrine; for that which is pure is precious, and every thing the more pure it is, the more precious it is in its kind.

Secondly, The unmixedneſs, the uncompoundedneſs of doctrine. Purity is oppoſed to mixture; pure is as much as ſimple or uncompounded; we read of the ſimplicity of the Goſpel (2 Cor. 11. 3.) which is nothing elſe but the purity of the Goſpel. The contrary whereof is corrupting or adulterating the word of God, by the addition of humane inventions, and our own fancies.

My Doctrine is pure.] Pure in both theſe ſences. It is precious and worth much: it is unmixed, nothing but it ſelf. I have not feigned and coyned it out of mine own brain. I have not embaſed it with an allay of inferior mettal; it is the ſincere ſimple Word of God.

Whence Note, True doctrine is pure doctrine.

True doctrine is pure two wayes. It is pure ſubjectively, and it is pure effectively. It is pure in it ſelf, and purifies us, Joh. 17. 17. Sanctifie them through thy truth, thy word is truth. Pure doctrine will purifie. Falſe principles breed falſe practices; crooked rules make crooked lives: That which is polluted is as apt to pollute, as that which is pure to purifie. The nature of things is ſtampt upon their effects. Truth is compared to the moſt excellent metals, and it excels them. The Apoſtle ſpeaking of all ſorts of doctrines built upon Chriſt the foundation, calls ſome gold, ſilver, precious ſtones: others, wood, hay, ſtubble (1 Cor. 3. 12.) The difference of doctrine is ſet forth under theſe Metaphors: Pure doctrine is gold, ſilver, precious ſtones: Falſe doctrine is wood, hay, ſtubble, theſe are combuſtible matter, they will burn, they will not bear the trial; whereas the Word of God, and ſo the truths that are bottomed upon that, are (Pſal. 12. 6.) Pure: How pure? As ſilver tried in a furnace of earth, purified ſeven times; that is, it is altogether pure, having not the leaſt droſs in it. My doctrine is pure,

And I am clean.] The word [Bar] undergoeth a three-fold interpretation among the Rabbins.

כר ג בדר Mundum reddidit, terſit, politvit, diſcrevit, elegit. Hæc vox ch filium ſignificat, chaldaica eſt, & in ea ſignificatione tantum, Pſal. 2. 12. Prov. 31. 2. reperitur. Piſc.

First, It ſignifies clean or pure. So we tranſlate.

Secondly, It ſignifies a Son or man-child (ſo it is rather a Chaldee word) Prov. 31. 2. Pſal. 2. 12. Kiſs the Son: and from this word Bar, a Son, it is conceived that in our Northern parts, a child is called a barn; in the Latin, the ſame word denotes a young child, and pure or clean, and ſo it bears fair to the interpretation of the Text: becauſe howſoever a child is naturally all filthy and unclean, in regard of the guilt and pollution of original ſin; yet in regard of acts, a child is clean, he is white paper, as he hath no fair letters, ſo no blots upon him.

Thirdly, It ſignifies elect, choſen or preferred before others (Cant. 6. 9.) She is the only one of her mother, ſhe is (Bar, the word of the Text, the clean one, or) the choice one of her that bare her. But how is ſhe called the only one of her mother, and yet the choice one of her that bare her? if there be but one, how can there be any choice? The original is, She is the one of her mother, and ſuch an one, as if ſhe had ten thouſand to chuſe out of, ſhe could not chuſe a better; this would be her only child, her flower, how many ſoever ſhe might be ſuppoſed to have. If a man who hath many children likes one more then the reſt, he uſeth to ſay, There is my only Son, that's he. One as good as can be, is a choice one, though we have no more; yet properly perly a choice one, is the beſt among many. In this ſence the word is uſed (Nehem. 5. 18.) where the bill of fare for Nehemiah his Table is thus drawn up, He had ſix choice ſheep, &c. They did not take the flock as they came, but picked the beſt for the Governours Table. Thus the word carries a comparative ſence in it, pointing out not only one that is clean, but one elect before others for his cleanneſs, I am clean,

Te, O Deus, judice & teſte, tè bene conſcio.

In thine eyes.] That is, Thou, O God, conſidering, trying and judging me, I ſhall yet be found clean. It is an high challenge, but we are not to take it ſtrictly; Job was no legal Juſticiary, he ſought not righteouſneſs in the works of the Law, but through faith in the Meſſiah: He ſpeaks here, as in other like places, one or all of theſe three wayes.

Firſt, In oppoſition to the opinion which men had of him: As if he had ſaid, In the ſight of men I am filthy and unclean, an hypocrite and wicked: my friends judge me ſo, but, I am clean in thine eyes.

Secondly, I am clean in thine eyes; that is, in the general bent of my ſpirit, in the common tenor of my heart and life; though I have my failings, yet my courſe is holy. Denomination is taken from the better and greater part.

Thirdly, I am clean, &c. that is, in reference to the ſpecial charge, which my friends lay upon me; they ſay I am an hypocrite, Lord, I am clean from that in thine eyes. Thus David (Pſal. 18. 24.) Therefore hath the Lord recompenſed me according to my righteouſneſs, according to the cleanneſs of my hands in his eye-ſight. The ſame Comment will ſerve David's Text and Job's. David was not in a conteſtation with the juſtice of God upon his own integrity, but upon a vindication of his integrity from the injuſtice and jealouſies of men.

Hence we may obſerve (which is a ſeeming contradiction)

No man is clean in God ſight: Some men are clean in Gods ſight.

No man is clean in Gods ſight, that is, in himſelf or of himſelf, Job 14.4. Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Every man is hewen from a corrupt ſtock, and therefore is corrupt; Behold the heavens are not clean in his ſight, Job 15. 15. Yea he chargeth his Angels with folly, (Chap. 4. 18.) How great then is the folly of that man, who upon his own account diſchargeth himſelf of folly in the ſight of God?

Yet a believer may ſay he is clean in the ſight of God.

Firſt, Clean perfectly by the grace of juſtification. So believers in this life are, as having no ſpot or wrinkle imputed to them, though many ſpots and wrinkles remaining on them. The cleanneſs of Chriſt, is clean in the eyes of God; and that is the Saints cleanneſs. 'Tis theirs for their uſe, though not in their propriety,

Secondly, Clean alſo in the ſight of God through the grace of ſanctification; God gives and ſees, as a deſire of, ſo an endeavour after univerſal, practical cleanneſs, in them that are juſtified. A believers way in this world is clean from crimes, though not from ſins. If any man ſay he hath no ſin, truth is not in him; and if any man commit ſin, grace is not in him, 1 Joh. 3. 8, 9. Sin lives in a clean perſon; but he that is clean lives not in any ſin. And this is a cleanneſs in the ſight of God.

In the conjunction of theſe two, My doctrine is pure, and I am clean in thy ſight; we ſee the two heads of religion, or the two main hinges upon which all religion turneth. Firſt, Purity of doctrine. Secondly, Cleanneſs of practice. Holineſs of life and ſoundneſs of opinion, conſtitute a perfect man; Here's the character of a Chriſtian, in his compleatneſs. This was typified in the Old Law, by the Urim and the Thummim, ſet in the breſt-plate of the High Prieſt. Urim typed purity of doctrine; Thummim, cleanneſs of life. This Motto fitted not only the Prieſts of the Old Teſtament, or the Miniſters of the New, but befits every Chriſtian: Every believer ſhould bear this upon his breſt, Purity of doctrine, and cleanneſs of life. Chriſt checks the Phariſees (Matth. 23. 2, 3.) who had the former, but not the latter; they had purity of doctrine, but they wanted integrity and holineſs of life: they ſate in Moſes chair, and therefore he biddeth his Diſciples and the people, That all whatſoever they bad them obſerve, that they ſhould obſerve and do; but (ſaith he) do not ye after their works; take heed of treading in their ſteps: you may do their words, but not their works; why? for they ſay and do not; though they have purity of doctrine, they have not cleanneſs of life. It is an ill hearing, and a ſad ſpectacle, when theſe two are ſeparated. When purity of doctrine, and cleanneſs of life appear together in one perſon, happy is that man; and he is a fit inſtrument to make others happy: but where either of theſe appears alone, or with its contrary, as a companion, purity of doctrine with uncleanneſs of life, or cleanneſs of life with error and unſoundneſs of doctrine; it is dangerous to embark with, or come near ſuch; for themſelves are in great danger: Themſelves are in an ill condition, and they are fit inſtruments to make others worſe. Unſound doctrine frets like a Canker, and an unclean life is catching like a Leproſie. We are apteſt to take an unſound doctrine from thoſe whoſe lives are clean; and we are apteſt to imitate their unclean lives, whoſe doctrine is ſound.

From the latter branch, I am clean in thine eyes, Note,

Firſt, It ſhould not ſatisfie us that we are clean in the eyes of men, unleſs we can approve our ſelves to God alſo.

For as not he that commendeth himſelf, ſo not he that is commended by others is approved; but whom the Lord commendeth, 2 Cor. 10. 18. It is but cold comfort to be clean in the eye of our neighbours, that they give us a fair teſtimony; if in the mean time our own heart condemn us. Yea, what though we are (like that generation ſpoken of by Solomon) Pure in our own eyes, and have a plaudite in our own hearts, if we are impure in Gods eye. It is moſt deſirable to be a white in the eye of God: while we are white in his eye, we need not trouble our ſelves much, though we are black in the eyes of all the world. It is a ſmall thing with me (ſaith Paul, 1 Cor. 4. 3.) that I ſhould be judged of you, or of mans judgment; yea I judge not my own ſelf, but he that judgeth me is the Lord.

Secondly, Obſerve, What we are, and what we do, is all before the eye of God.

It is a common doctrine, that God ſees and takes notice of us. But as common as the doctrine is in the mouths of men, the uſe is rare in the hearts of men; yet there is no man ſo heightned in grace, but may make uſe of it. Chriſt himſelf made uſe of it, Pſal. 16. 8. (The words were ſpoken by David his figure, and applied to Chriſt, Act. 2. 25.) I fore-ſaw the Lord always before my face. Chriſt did not uſe this doctrine to keep or over-awe his heart from ſin (he was infinitely above that) but to ſupport his heart in ſuffering, as appears in the latter part of the verſe, he is on my right hand, that I ſhould not be moved. But to us it is uſeful both theſe wayes, and many other wayes. The neglect of this doctrine leaves us under the neglect of many duties, and opens a gap, yea floud-gate unto every ſin. Durſt any mock God with out-ſide and bare profeſſion, if the heart had fed upon, and thorowly digeſted this truth; cleanneſs and uncleanneſs, ſincerity and hypocriſie are in the ſight of God? How often do men flatter themſelves with this vain hope, that their work is in the dark, and no eye ſees them? How often doth the Church-Atheiſt queſtion, like thoſe (Job 22. 13.) How doth God know? Can he judge thorow the dark cloud? Thick clouds are a covering to him that he ſeeth not, and he walketh in the circuit of Heaven. Sure he troubles not himſelf with what we do; and though moſt are ready to acknowledge in words, that God ſeeth them, they act as if God (like the Heathen Idols) had eyes, but could not ſee. It was that which Melanthon obſerved of the Italians, You (ſaith he) are very zealous to believe that God is in the bread, but you walk as if you did not believe God to be in Heaven. Bleſſed is he that condemneth not himſelf by the truths which he alloweth.

Thirdly, Foraſmuch as the original [bar] ſignifies not only purity, but elect and choſen, Obſerve, Clean and holy perſons, juſt and upright perſons, are fit for choice and election.

Men may not chooſe, as God chooſeth. God chooſeth out of a common maſs without reſpect to good or evil, as the motive of his election; he did not look upon mankind, and ſee one pure, and another impure; one clean, and another another unclean; and then chuse the clean, and leave the unclean; No: (Rom. 9. 11.) before Jacob and Esau were born, before they had done either good or evil; That the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth; it was said, Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated; Gods election is not upon actions. He found them both in a like state, yet he chose Jacob: The reason of it is, because he hath power, and a purpose to make them clean, whom he chuseth. God elects to cleanness, but he doth not elect any, because they are clean, or cleaner then others. The grace of election is not directed by, but directs and leads to the grace of sanctification. But when men go to chooſing, they must not take this course, because they have not this power: when men choose, they must choose upon fore-seen, or rather present works of holiness and righteousness. They must chuse men fearing God, and hating covetousness, for Magistrates. They must chuse men apt to teach, sober and blameless, for Ministers. They who cannot make men fit, whom they have elected; must consider who are fit, and then elect them.

Zophar having laid down Jobs opinion of himself, My doctrine is pure, and I am clean in thine eyes, (vers. 4.) proceeds to the confutation of it in vers. 5, 6. which we may give you in this argumentative form.

That person is not pure in doctrine, and clean in the sight of God, whom though God hath greatly afflicted; yet he might justly afflict more:

But though God hath greatly afflicted thee, yet he might justly afflict thee more;

Therefore thou art not pure in thy doctrine, nor clean in his sight.

The assumption is given in the close of the sixth verse, Know therefore that God exacteth of thee less then thine iniquity deserveth: and is prefac'd or led in by a wish, in vers. 5. and part of vers. 6. a wish that God himself would undertake Job, and dispute with him.

Vers. 5. But O that God would speak, and open his lips against thee!

As if Zophar had said, While I am about to speak; I almost think it will be but lost labour for me to speak; yea, I think thou art beyond the speaking of any man: thou art so obdurate and hardened in thy way, so wise in thine own conceit, so stiff to thine own principles, so unyielding to those better counsels which have already been given thee, by thy grave, learned and godly friends, that I am much (and I conceive any man would be) discouraged to argue and debate the matter further with thee. And therefore I would willingly quit my hands of this task, and leave thee to God, I would gladly be eased of this burden, and turn thee over (as a man past cure by man) to the hand of Heaven. O that God would speak, and open his lips against thee!

Or secondly, This Preface may have relation to those secret hints, yea sometimes explicite wishes of Job (declining the sentence and censure of his friends) that God and he might speak together. He only desired the Lord to abate the dreadful splendor of his Majesty, or not to clothe himself with dazling light, and amazing glory in that congress. And, Then (saith he) let him speak and I would answer (Chap. 9. 15.) Again (Chap. 10. 2.) I will say unto God, Do not condemn me, shew me wherefore thou contendest with me? In both which passages Job seems to petition and press the Lord for a personal treaty; in answer to which request, possibly Zophar might thus begin, My friend Job, It falleth now to my lot to speak unto thee, but I should (with all my heart) rejoyce, if God would grant the wish which thou hast so often presented to him, even vouchsafe to speak unto thee himself. We have often heard thee appealing from earth to heaven, calling God to witness, that such and such is thine integrity. O that God would answer thee, and give thee a meeting! O that he would condescend so far as to confer immediately with thee! How glad should we be of this? and we believe thou wouldst be as sorry; it will be little to thy ease, if God once take thee to task, thou shalt quickly find it otherwise with thee then thou dreamest or presumest; he would soon cool these heats, and asswage the swellings of thy spirit, by discovering himself in holiness, and thy self in sinfulness. Thy crest will fall, and thy courage come down as soon as ever he enters the list with thee, and doth but shew thee who he is, and what thou art. Either of these wayes the connexion lies fair, O that God would speak and open his lips against thee!

The Hebrew is, Who would give, or, O that some body would get God to speak? The phrase is optative, including an ardent desire of obtaining, and therefore we translate not, Who would give? but, O that God! As implying the great and instant importunity of Zophar to speed his sute, That God would speak and open his lips against him.

Quis det Deum loqui?

Some too critically and over-curiously distinguish between the speaking of God, and his opening of his lips. As if the one, namely speaking, did import an immediate voice, when God reveals himself without the intervention of any instrument or second cause: but the opening of his lips, a mediate voice, when God speaks (though in an extraordinary manner, yet) by man or Angel, or any other creature, whose service he is pleased to design for such a manifestation of himself. God can give a lip to liveless creatures, and make any thing his tongue. He that made mans mouth to speak, can make that speak which hath no mouth; and so, may be said to open his lips in whatsoever he useth to demonstrate or discover his mind to us by. But I pass this as a nicity, especially because Zophar imploring God to deal with Job immediately, and not by the service of any creature, yet calls it, The opening of his lips.

Loquitur Deus per semet-ipsum, aperit vero labia cum vel hominum vel aliarum rerum opera tanquam instrumento utitur ad aliquid manifestandum. Aquin.

Speaking and opening the lips, are the same thing under different expressions, or the latter is but an exposition of the former. Opening of the lips is speaking, we speak by opening the lips; only here is an hysteroſis, a figure frequent in Scripture, when that which is first in nature, is put last in order, for opening of the lips precedes speaking; here the method is inverted, O that God would speak, and that he would open his lips against thee!

O that God would speak!] The word carries more then common talking, it is here restrained to speech in judgment, or to an exact discussion of the cause preceding judgment. Such is the meaning of that heavenly summons (Psal. 50. 7.) Hear, O my people, and I will speak (I will debate the matter, and plead with thee) O Israel, I will testifie against thee. Zophar prays for a day of trial, for a little day of judgment. O that God would speak, דבר Non ad quemlibet sermonem, sed ad eum qui in judicio habetur, vel ad disceptationem spectat. Bold.

And open his lips.] To open the lips implieth grave and deliberate speaking. The Hebraisme is very frequent, Psal. 78. 2. I will open my mouth in a parable. Parables are sententious speeches, speeches filled with weight of wisdom. To open the mouth in a parable is to have an active intension of the spirit, preparing and fitting the mouth to open. The mouth of a wise man is under custody, least the treasures of his mind should steal out, or be stoln out unobserved. Precious things are not left open, they are under lock and key. He is a wise man that keeps a lock and a key at his lips: the lock of silence, and the key of speech; or the key of discretion to shut and open the lock according to the true occasions of speech and silence. David prayeth, Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth, and keep the door of my lips (Psal. 141. 3.) As we should desire the Lord to keep or watch the door of our lips, least we speak sinfully; so we should keep or watch our own lips, that we may speak fruitfully and seasonably. The Scribe which is instructed to the Kingdom of Heaven, is like unto a man which is an housholder, bringing forth out of his treasure things both new and old (Matth. 13. 52.) He hath a store, a stock of knowledge laid up there, and he openeth not his mouth, or vents it, till occasion speaks. That counsel (Prov. 22. 17, 18.) fully reacheth this Hebraism of opening the mouth. Bow down thine ear, and hear the words of the wise; (what to do?) and apply thine heart unto my knowledge; (let thine heart draw in knowledge) let it be as a bed, or a repository for the words of the wise to rest on, or to be laid up in; for, it is a pleasant thing (there's the treasure) if thou keep them within thee, they shall withal be fitted in thy lips. If thou keep them within thee: As if he had said, When thou hast been a learner, and hast gained a stock of knowledge, then, they shall be fitted for thy lips; that is, thy lips shall bring forth, shape and form, those notions of truth into profitable and savoury discourses, They shall be fitted to thy lips. Some speak the words of wisdom, but such words are not fitted to their lips: It is (as the Proverb teacheth) The Ass to the harp, or the Cat to the lute.

Aperire labia est sapienter & cum pondere loqui; quasi thesaurus effet in corde, cujus os & labia sint velut ostium sub clave vel sigillo, &c. Bold.

Words

Sane aliter rem habere intelligeres quam putas, non ita jubus apparebis, ut tibi persuades. Merc.

Words must be seated in the heart before they are fitted to the lips. Davids mouth did not speak of wisdom, till the meditation of his heart had been of understanding. Out of the abundance of the heart, the mouth speaketh, both good and evil. And as a good man speaks evil, so an evil man speaks good unhandsomely, because it is not in, nor with his heart.

Sincerius erit si in simplici fandi notione sumatur hoc verbum quasi Jobi dulciloquio simplex Dei loquela opponatur, ut hac illud facillimè confundi dicat.

Further, To open the lips is no more in ordinary acceptation, then to speak plainly: and then it stands in opposition to those eloquent orations, which (as Zophar supposed) Job had studied to defend and secure himself against God; as if he had said, If God would but open his lips, and speak unto thee, one plain word might be enough to overthrow all the curious discourses and set speeches, enough to answer, and cut the sinews of all the fine spun orations, and cunning sophistry which thou hast used in this cause. Let God arise (saith Moses) and his enemies shall be scattered. Let God open his lips, saith Zophar, and thy mouth shall be stopt.

His verbis habita personæ & temporis ratione non leviter pungitat Job. Bold.

Thirdly, The words may carry a redargution of Job, as a man whom God did so far neglect, that he would not afford him a word; As if his friend Zophar had thus reproved him, Thou hast been calling upon God to speak, and shew thee why he contendeth with thee, yet thou hast not prevailed in thy sute, he vouchsafeth thee never a word, but leaves thee still to us. This (some conceive) hath a reproof in it, considering the times wherein Job lived; for then it was no very strange thing (though it was an high favour) for God himself to speak to the Saints his special favourites. God at sundry times, and in divers manners, spake in time past unto the fathers by the Prophets (Heb. 1. 1.) And as he spake by the Prophets, so he spake by himself; God spake nine times unto Abraham, as you may observe upon diligent reading from Gen. 12. to 22. He spake also to others of the Ancients. And when God refused to open his lips and speak to Saul, how pitifully doth he complain, I am sore distressed, for the Philistims make war upon me, and God is departed from me, and answereth me no more, neither by Prophets, nor by dreams (1 Sam. 28. 15.) Saul took it not only as his disparagement, but as his undoing, that God refused him conference. This refusal (according to the present interpretation) Zophar layes in Jobs dish, Thou hast prayed that God would manifest himself to thee, and that's an honour which he hath done to many of his servants, in the Catalogue of whom thou writest thy name, and pretendest thy self for one, but he hearkens not unto thee, though I wish he would. O that God would speak, and open his lips against thee!

Gen. 12. 1, 7, 13. c. 15. 1 c. 17. 1. c. 18 1. c. 21. 12. & 22. 1. 11.

But what is the manner of Gods speaking, and how doth he open his lips?

It is an allusion unto men. Man is not able to understand the way of a spirit, but by what is common to man. A spirit hath no lips to open, nor any instruments of speech: And to speak strictly, a spirit doth not speak at all. God is said to speak, Formatas à Deo sensibiles & externas voces negare videtur. Basil. in Isa. 7. Quod non ausim admittere. Bold.

First, When by his mighty power he forms and frames a voice, which is audible and perceptible by the ear, as unto Samuel, The Lord called Samuel, Samuel, at the last Samuel answers, Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth.

Secondly, God spake to Moses, Face to face, that is, familiarly and clearly. This was the highest degree of revelation, and drew nearest to that which the Saints shall have in glory.

Thirdly, He spake also by many signs, especially by Urim and by Thummim.

Fourthly, God spake when he intimated or hinted his mind to the spirit of man, by the instinct of his own Spirit. Most of the Prophets heard only an inward word, which is called, The coming of the word of the Lord unto them. As God only speaks to the heart, while the word soundeth in the ear; So he often speaks to the heart, when the ear hears no sound. I will hear what God the Lord will speak, for he will speak peace unto his people, and to his Saints. (Psal. 85. 8.) God speaks peace when he sends or gives peace, that is, all good things. God speaks peace also, when he (as it were) by a secret Eccho, returns a word of assurance to the petitioners heart, that he will give peace. When Zophar wishes, that God would speak, he means it of speaking by audible voice, or face to face, not by signs or secret intimations.

Zophar being thus instant, That God would speak, and open his lips against Job, teacheth us,

First, Some men are beyond the conviction of man.

O that God would speak. We say of a sick man, whose disease is desperate, as in the plague, &c. The Lord look upon you, the Physicians have given you over, they can do no more, we leave you to the prayers of the faithful, and to the compassions of God: Some in spiritual distempers are so extreamly diseased, that the soul Physician can do nothing upon them, they are past all his medicines and preparations, these we give up to the cure of God, who raiseth the dead, and calleth those things which are not, as if they were. I grant, that whatsoever healing or cure is wrought upon the soul of man by men, is from the Lord. Man and man stand upon even ground; Humane reason and humane reason are equal; and he that speaks is often upon a lower ground (though he stand higher) then he to whom he speaks, and is sometimes weaker in humane reason: Now that which overcometh and convinceth must have an advantage, and come in power, else there can be no victory. An equal (in all points) cannot be a conquerour. Hence when the Prophets delivered their messages, they put Gods authority to the word, Thus saith the Lord: They knew all they spake could prevail nothing. But though God give the effect of mans word to every man, yet some men appear more untractable and unteachable by the Ministery of man then others, they fit under it, and (possibly) have sate under it long, yet nothing's done, their mindes are as blind, their wills as stubborn, their wayes as crooked as ever. Man is not any thing in the conversion of any man without God (1 Cor. 3. 7.) but some we refer wholly to God, having spent much strength and time upon them in vain. Some men have out-stood, and are the reproach of all the prayers and tears, of all the counsels and admonitions of man: What can we do more or less then give up such (as neer lost men) to the work of God. O that God would speak.

Secondly, Observe, which Zophar chiefly intends,

That if God once open his lips, and deal with a soul, he will quickly bring down his spirit and convince him.

Man cannot hold out against the speakings of God. Man is not able to withstand the immediate, no nor the mediate speakings of God, 1 Cor. 10. 4. The weapons of our warfare are mighty through God; it is our warfare, but the conquest is from God. When he cloathes the word with his own power, and bids it go in his might, the strongest holds of ignorance and unbelief, of obstinacy and rebellion fall to the ground, like the first ripe figs shaken with the wind. When the unlearned or idiot comes into the assembly of the Saints, He is convinced of all, and is judged of all; for the secrets of his heart are made manifest, and so falling down on his face, he will worship God, 1 Cor. 14. 24, 25. What wrought this sudden change? Was it the power of men? No, He will report that God is in you of a truth. The man perceived God was there, and upon that apprehension his heart was subdued, he falls down on his face and worships. When God works, the work is done. He works for us, and none can hinder; He works in us, and we cannot hinder. The arm of grace in the word of God is invincible. O that God would speak.

Vers. 6. And that he would shew thee the secrets of wisdom, &c.

As if he had said, 'Tis but reason that I should call God to speak unto thee, for the secrets and depths of wisdom are hidden from and above our reason. The natural man perceiveth not any thing of God, and the spiritual man may be yet unable to perceive many of the things of God. O that God would shew thee the secrets of wisdom.

Videtur Jobo impingere quasi illi abstrusam Dei sapientiam se assequi gloriatus fuisset. Merc.

Zophar seems to meet with Job's seeming boast, that he was one of Gods familiars, and well acquainted with his will. The conviction riseth thus, Thou hast carried it as if thou wert of the Cabinet-councel in heaven, as if thou hadst stood at Gods side, when he gave his orders and dispatches concerning the affairs and motions of the whole world; thou takest upon thee, as if thou wert the favourite of the great King, and knowest his heart; But if God speak to thee indeed, he will shew thee other manner of secrets then thou art yet acquainted with, thou shalt at once see that thou mistakest much, and knowest little.

O that

O that he would shew thee the secrets.] Or, The hidden things [of wisdom.] Here we have Zophars argument distinct from his two friends. He deals with Job, not so much to convince him of his own sinfulness, as of the mysteriousness of divine wisdom. Thou complainest and crvest out of the hand of God, of thy great afflictions: I tell thee there is a secret of wisdom in this dispensation, I will plead no other justification of Gods proceedings, but only this, God is infinite in wisdom; O that God would shew thee the secrets of wisdom.

Every word, and all the works of God are full of wisdom, and yet many of them are so plain and easie, that he that runs may read them: So plain and easie, that an Adonibezeck may run, ye fall and read them (Judg. 1.7.) As I have done, so God hath requited me. There was no mystery at all in that. Sense and reason have their lessons, as well as grace and faith. But as there are some lessons easie enough for sense; so there are not a few hard enough for faith. And as some sins of men are plain, very sinful, yet very plain, while other sins lie close in the heart, and are not only an iniquity, but a mystery of iniquity, or iniquity wrapt up in a mystery (the whole body of Antichristian iniquity is a mystery): So some lessons of the wisdom of God are plain, full of wisdom, and full of plainness; we may read wisdom upon the very letter of some words, and in the face of some works of God, while other lessons of wisdom are hard, so hard to be understood, that none can unriddle the meaning of them. And in this the Lord maintaineth his own honour, and keepeth state; he will not have all he doth, or all he speaks lie level to every apprehension, or to be a Text for every mans interpretation; he hath some knotty ænigma's and obscure riddles to exercise the holiest wits, the highest parts, the choisest gifts of his people, yea and their patience too: they must stand waiting and expecting, yea admiring and wondering what God meaneth. 'Tis learned nescience willingly not to know, what God is unwilling we should know. They are as good Scholars who endeavour not to learn what he is not pleased to teach them, as they who have learned what he teacheth them. Though his secrets be with those that fear him, yet we must fear to be among his secrets.

Sunt quædam abyssi de quibus disputare, quas scrutari, est seipsum præcipitare. San. Erudita insciti a est, non scire velle quæ magister maximus nos voluit nescire.

The secrets of wisdom here especially meant, are (I conceive) the secrets of providence; That's the subject upon which the dispute runs: God in his actings toward mankind, hath many reserves in his own breast and bosome, which no man is able, or should adventure to give any reason or account of, besides the dictate and meer good pleasure of his own good will.

Once more, O that he would shew thee the secrets of wisdom, is, as if Zophar had said, Thou judgest upon the out-side, thou dwellest in the bark and rinde of divine dispensations, thou canst not look into their heart, God alone can shew that to thee. The word which we translate [Shew] signifies to interpret and expound that which is dark, mysterious and ænigmatical.

Hence observe, First, Wisdom is a secret, or hath a secret in it.

1. Then it is precious. That which is very common may be very good (as air and water) but it cannot bear any great price. 2. Then wisdom must be sought for, and sought with diligence; If thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasures, (Prov. 2.4.) Wisdom lies deep, as the veins of gold silver in the earth. Wisdom is to be sought as silver. Silver is not to be had upon the surface of the earth there you may find pibbles and flints, but if you would have silver, you must dig and Mine for it. Secrets are not seen at first sight, nor found out upon the first search; we must enquire and enquire, look and look, enquire and look often, and long for the secrets of wisdom. We may buy gold too dear, and be at more charge to seek for silver, then the silver will be worth when it is found. But we cannot buy wisdom too dear; and the least vein of divine secrets, which we find, will not only bear all our charges in the search, but enrich us also.

Again, The word is in the plural, O that God would shew thee the secrets of wisdom. Hence note,

There are many secrets in wisdom.

The Apostle (Ephes. 3.10.) speaks of the manifold wisdom of God. His wisdom is full of variety, it is of many sorts and forms, of many folds and plights. The wisdom of God is simple and uncompounded, it is pure and unmixed with any thing but it self, yet it is manifold in degrees, kindes and administrations, There are secrets of wisdom; when you have learned one secret, there are more to be learned. As there is not only a secret, but secrets, many secrets of iniquity lie in the heart of man; we may go from one room of the heart unto another (as the Prophet Ezekiel was carried from one place to another about the house of the Lord, Chap. 8.) to see greater and greater abominations. Thus you may go from secret to secret, from one secret of wisdom to another, and when you have seen both, there are yet greater secrets to be seen, besides those which shall never be seen. Some works of wisdom are unsearchable, and past finding out; they are also innumerable and past reckoning up. Some things are called secrets, because they can hardly be known; other things are called secrets, because they cannot at all be known. A third sort are so secret, that it is our sin to attempt, yea to desire to know them. All the secrets of wisdom are in God, yet some belong unto us; and they are called secrets, not because they are not at all revealed, but because they are obscurely revealed. Some secrets in God belong to God alone; and they are called secrets, because they are not at all revealed. That's the meaning of Moses, Deut. 29. 29. Secret things belong unto the Lord our God; but things revealed unto us, and our children for ever.

Thirdly, The special secrets of wisdom here spoken of, being seated in providence, Observe,

The works of God are full of secret wisdom.

As there are mysteries in the Word, so in the works of God. There are mysteries in the work of redemption, the whole Gospel is a mystery. The great mystery of godliness, 1 Tim. 3. 16. Now as the work of redemption is full of mysteries, so are the works of providence; How many hath God posed and put to a stand to read and pick out the meaning of his providential motions? why he afflicteth this man, why he prospereth that; why affairs go sometimes forward, and why at any time backward; why the deliverance of the Church proceeds no faster, and why deliverance makes so many stops and stands, why such instruments are laid aside, and such imployed, these pose and gravel the understanding of man: nor can we give any account of them till we go into the Sanctuary, and inform our selves from the oracle of the Word about the order of the works of God.

Fourthly, Observe, God only can shew and teach us effectually the secret wisdom of his works and of his word.

As we learned from the former clause, That a word of Gods speaking humbles the soul: so here we learn, That a word of Gods speaking enlightens the soul. God is the revealer of secrets, There is a God in heaven (saith Daniel, chap. 2. 28.) that revealeth secrets. I cannot interpret the Kings dream, or spell the meaning of it, but there is one in heaven that can, his name is the revealer of secrets. If he shew them, we shall surely see them. Thou hast corrected me (saith repenting Ephraim) and I was corrected; and if God instruct us, we shall be instructed. The dullest Scholar cannot but learn, if God vouchsafe to be his Tutour. He that made the understanding can make us understand. This is one of the articles of the new Covenant, Heb. 8. 11. In those dayes I will put my lawes into their minds, and write them in their hearts, and they shall not teach every man his neighbour, saying, Know the Lord, for all shall know me from the least to the greatest: God himself hath undertaken to be our teacher: though we are unapt, dull and indocible, yet, he hath promised to be at the pains to teach us. His teaching doth not acquit us from our attendance upon the teaching of man, but assures us that he will teach his, if man doth not: and that while man teacheth, he will make that teaching effectual and successful. When he gives us the candle or light of his Spirit to read his Word by, we read and understand: And unless he give us the candle or light of his Spirit to read his works by, we cannot read them with understanding. We are as ignorant in the book of the creatures, as in the book of Scripture, until God instruct us; and if he instruct us, we prove knowing knowing in both. What I do (saith Christ, John 13.7.) thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter: And what was the date of this hereafter? even the day of the Spirits operation in him. Ye have an unction (as the beloved Disciple writes, 1 John 2.20.) from the holy one, and ye know all things. When the anointing teacheth, we have a qualified, a moderated Omniscience. He knows all things (in this sence) who knows as much as concerns him to know; and except the anointing teacheth us, we know never a Letter, either of what God hath written, or of what he is doing, as we ought to know. His ancient people the Jews, (Psal. 106.7.) understood not his works; and he reproves them by the Stork in the heavens, by the Turtle, Crane, and Swallow, by all the fowls of the air, as more learned and sagacious in his works and providences, then the men of Israel, The stork in the heavens knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow observe the time of their coming, but my people know not the judgment of the Lord (Jer. 8.7.) My people do not understand when it is winter, and when it is summer; when it is a season of mercy, and when of judgment. Some are sick, their bodies are smitten; others are poor, their estates are smitten; a third sort are disgraced, their names are smitten; but they have neither ears to hear, nor hearts to understand unto this day. How sensless are thousands at this day about the great things which God is doing among us? He works terrible things in righteousnes, but few learn either the righteousnes of their own wayes, or the righteousnes of Gods wayes. Few learn either what God hath done, or what themselves ought to do. O that God would teach such the secrets of his wisdom!

That they are double to that which is.

כפלים Dualis numeri propriè significat duplicia. Linguæ sanctæ mos est ea duplicia vocare, quæ aliqua dignitate, virtute, aut numero excellunt; sicut apud Latinos res hujusmodi Decimanæ vel Decumanæ vocari solent.

The word double, is not here taken arithmetically or strictly, as noting just two for one; but by double, is meant much or manifold; a certain excess being put for an uncertain: it is frequent, in the language of Scripture, to call those things which exceed much, double; and but double, though they exceed very much, though they exceed seven fold, yea an hundred fold, Isa. 40.2. Speak comfortably to Jerusalem, &c. for she hath received of the Lords hand double for all her sins. But doth it suit with the goodnes of God, or his sparing mercy, to punish his people much for sin, or double for their sin? Doth not Zophar in this verse, argue Job into patience, and redargue his impatience, by telling him, That God exacted of him les then his iniquity deserved; and did he exact of Jerusalem double for all her iniquities?

I answer, God is so far from exacting double of his people for sin in a way of satisfaction, that he taketh nothing of them, not a penny of them upon that account. Christ is the only pay-master for believers to the justice of God, and he hath paid double, yea, an hundred fold, in sufficiency, for all their sins. When the Church receives double, it is double, that is, full chastisement for all her sins, but she makes no payment for any one of her sins. So double destruction threatned upon the enemy, is full destruction, (Jer. 17.17.) And when the Church is promised double honour for her shame, Isa. 61.7. and double liberty for her restraint and imprisonment, (Zech. 9.12.) the Prophets give her assurance of compleat honour and perfect liberty.

In spelunca duplici, i. e. excellenti, pulchra & eximia. Bol.

Again, The word double is put also for that which is in any kind choice and excellent. The burying place which Abraham bought of Ephron, is called (from this word) the Cave of Machpelah; that is, say some, a double Cave, one for men, another for women, one within another; or, as others, a fair, beautiful Cave; to which sence, the words of the children of Heth, at the sixth verse, seem to lead us: In the choice of our sepulchers bury thy dead. That which is best or most, is double at least. Thus the secrets of God, being very excellent, are double,

To that which is.] The word which we translate, that which is, beareth a very various sence, and so renders the Text very difficult.

Secundum legem. Pag. Et quod multiplex esset lex ejus Vulg.

First, It signifies a Law or Rule prescribed to live and walk by; Hence some translate, They are double according to the Law. O that he would shew thee, that his Law is double, or that there is a great deal more in the Law, then thou apprehendest. Some restrain this to the Law given Noah, the seven precepts whereof are famous among the ancient traditions of the Jews. The first whereof, forbad the worship of strange gods. The second commanded to bless the Name of the true God. The third prohibited the shedding of innocent blood. The fourth was against the defilements of filthy lusts. The fifth against Theft. The sixth concerned judgment and justice. The seventh said, Thou shalt not pull a member from a living creature, and eat it.

Intellige legem Noæ datam. Hug. Grot. in loc.

But we need not reduce Zophar's text to these straights; but enlarge it to the whole revealed will of God, which is often called the Law of God. The Hebrew particle affixed, noteth a relation; double according to, or, by the measure of the Law. As if he had said, Thou hast narrow thoughts of God, and of his secret wisdom in afflicting thee; but according to law, thy afflictions might be double upon thee, God might make his little finger heavier then his loyns have been. To this sence Mr. Broughton translates; And that thou shouldest have double by justice.

Duplicia tibi conveniunt, i. e. duplo majora supplicia quam patiaris, juxta æquitatis normam. Merc.

Hence observe, There is more righteousnes in the law of God then man is able to comprehend.

As there is more mercy in the Gospel then we are able to comprehend (no man ever saw into the depths of that mercy) so there is more holiness in the Law, then we are able to comprehend: No man ever saw into the depths of that righteousnes. There is an infinite holiness in the Law, (Psal. 119.96.) I have seen an end of all perfection, but thy Commandment is exceeding broad: He speaks not in the concrete, I have seen an end of perfect things; but in the abstract, an end of perfection, and of all perfection; I have come to the outside, or to the very bottom of all (a man may soon travel through all the perfections that are in the world, and either see their end, or see that they must end.) But thy commandment is exceeding broad; that is, it is exceedingly broader then any of these perfections, I cannot see the end of it, and I know it shall never have an end. There is a vastness of purity and spiritualness in the Law. Some narrow it up into a small compass; the Pharisees of old, with their poor impure spirits and gross imaginations, straightned the Law into their model, and made it very narrow: They thought no man brake the Law, which saith, Thou shalt do no murder, but he that cut his brothers throat: That no man brake the Law that forbiddeth Adultery, but he that actually defiled his neighbours wife, &c. But when Christ opened the mysteries of the Law, he shewed secrets of wisdom there. His Doctrine assureth, That a lustful thought is a violation of that Commandment, Thou shalt not commit Adultery: That an angry thought is a breach of that Commandment, Thou shalt not kill. Thus the Law is of a vast compass. I (saith Paul) was once alive without the Law (Rom. 7.9.) I thought my self a brave man, I was some body, my Conscience never troubled me, I knew not my disease, while the Law stood aloof off, and I was without the Law, (Not that Paul had not the Law both written in his heart, and in his book; for as a Pharisee, he was brought up among the Commentators of the Law) but he was without it, or, he was but at the outside of it (though I give it not for the proper meaning of the place, yet in that sence also) he was without the Law; he had not travelled through the length and breadth of it: But (saith he) when the Commandment came, when it came in the spiritualness of it, and I saw, in some measure, what holiness was couched there, I was then in a woful condition, I saw my self a lost man; then sin revived, and I died; and (ver. 13.) Sin by the Commandment became exceeding sinful; that is, when the Commandment was cleared to me, then I saw that I was extream sinful, or felt the violent motions of my sin. My sin being discovered by that light, began to spit out its venom, either provoking me with fresh and unwearied assaults to commit it, or terrifying and vexing me for what I had committed. There is a multiplicity of purities in the Law, reaching the multiplicity of impurities and sinful imaginations in us. The Law of God doth, though the Laws of men do not, nor can, take notice of, and descend to the least Items and punctilio's. A man cannot so much as go a hairs breadth beyond that which is right, but the Law is upon his back; a man cannot have a wry thought, but the Law meets with it; and a godly man (who is spiritual, and hath a new nature in him) seldom hath a wrong thought, but he takes himself tardy in it, and finds somewhat in that holy and righteous will of Divinæ legis multiplicatio in eo consistit, quod ad minima quæque se extendit. Aquinas. Lex Dei curat de minimis.

God, by which he can charge himself a sinner. Whereas, they that are carnal, and ignorant of the Law, can run on in a thousand sins, and never tell themselves of one, nor will they be convinced, when another tells them. A godly man hath a Preacher in his own bosom; if he do but step aside, or do amiss, somewhat within will shew him a rule, and bring him a light to take measure of, and see his failings by. He (as the Apostle hath it, 2 Cor. 10. 6.) hath in a readiness to revenge every disobedience. He finds a weapon ready to his hand, in the Magazin of the word of God, to avenge every disobedience of his heart; if but a vain thought arise, he hath somewhat ready to check it; such is the variety and largeness of the Law, that it discovers and controlls every aberration. If God shew a Soul the secrets of wisdom in the glass of the Law, he must confess that it is double to all he knew before, from the light of nature, or from the dictates of humane reason.

Præscriptum rationis quod sequi oportet in pœnis irrogandis Rab. Levi.

Secondly, The word signifies an inward Law, as well as an outward; yea, the height and spirit, the extractions and quintessence of reason come under this notion. There is a reason, a prescript of reason in God. He acteth by a rule within himself, his righteous will is his rule. He gives us a law to regulate our wills, but his own will is his law. We need give no other reason, that what he hath done is right, but this, that he hath done it. We have received one law from the mind of God, but there are infinite laws in the mind of God. Thus the sence runs very clear; O that God would shew thee the secrets of wisdom, that they are double (to what thou thinkest) according to the internal, eternal movings and thoughts of his own heart. Hence David's holy rapture (Psal. 40. 5.) Many, O Lord my God, are thy wonderful works, and thy thoughts which are to us-ward, they cannot be reckoned up in order to thee: If I would declare and speak of them, they are more then can be numbred. The works of God toward his people are many and wonderful, but his thoughts are more. The thoughts of God are the eternal purposes of his heart. He doth not think and then resolve, but his thoughts are his resolutions. His thoughts stand, he never lost or laid aside any one of them.

Infinitæ sunt in mente Dei leges, rationes, & modi quibus utitur in mortalium regimine; qui sensus leviſſimus est. Bold.

Duplo majora esse iis quæ existunt Jun. Vox Thusiah complectitur omnes virtutes Dei, ejus sapientiam & justitiam, quæ duplo, i. e. multo major & illustrior est quam nobis videatur, vel nostra ratio capere possit.

We translate, That they are double to that which is: the word signifieth being, or the existence of a thing; and so others render, O that he would shew thee the secrets of wisdom, that they are double to those things which exist: As if he had said, The Lord hath revealed and made many things apparent, but the things which appear not, are far more then those which do appear; the secret wisdom of God exceeds what he hath revealed; he afflicteth thee according to what he hath revealed, but he might afflict thee more; if he should proceed with thee according to the height of his secret wisdom. Hence observe,

> That, The wisdom of God which appeareth to us, is not half, or is but little in comparison of that which is in God.

The Lord hath not brought forth all the treasures of his wisdom; he hath not stamped all his wisdom upon any thing which he hath done, no nor upon any thing he hath spoken: It is not possible that a finite nature should receive the whole impression of an infinite wisdom. Our receipts are but drops, he hath an Ocean of wisdom in himself. We are narrow-mouth'd vessels, we take in by little and little. We are vessels of a small and narrow gage; when we have taken in all we can, we have taken in but little. God gives us more then we receive, and he hath more then he hath given. As the secrets of sin in man are double to those which appear; no man ever sinned out all the sinfulness of his heart. Though thousands have brought forth abundance, though they have acted many abominations, yet as Solomon speaks, there are still seven abominations in their hearts. Monsters and Prodigies of wickedness lie in those dens and dark chambers, which the world never saw. Now as the secrets of sin in man are double to those which appear; so much more are the secrets of wisdom in God. The great God of heaven and earth hath a stock, a store of wisdom by him, which no creature ever saw or looked into, or is indeed capable of. No man, but the Man-Christ, hath known so much as is possible to be known of God, and most of God is impossible to be known by man. We should be ashamed, that we know no more of what is revealed; and we should adore what is not revealed to our knowledge. The wisdom of God is divided into secret and revealed: mans portion is in things revealed; Gods portion is in secret things: God hath reserved a far greater portion for himself then he hath given unto man; that which will serve man, will not serve the Lord; his portion is as much above mans, as himself is above man. This Zophar layes before Job, that he might convince and humble him. Why dost thou cavil or fret thy self through with impatience, at what God doth, seeing thou canst not found the reason of what he doth? thou hast not fathomed God; thou hast not reported all that God is, or hath, The secrets of wisdom are double to that which is.

His next words are an inference upon, or the use of this Doctrine.

Know therefore that God exacteth of thee less then thine iniquity deserveth.

Thus he applies what he had spoken in general. God hath secrets of wisdom, and they are double; What then? I infer this upon it, Know therefore (O Job) that God exacteth of thee less then thine iniquity deserveth. Observe from Zophar's method,

> That, Truths are to be applied and brought home to the Conscience of the hearer, or to the business under debate.

Possibly Job might not have known the meaning of Zophar's discourse, That God had secrets of wisdom, and that the secret wisdom of God is double to his revealed; he might be to seek what use to make of this: Therefore (saith he) know (here is the application) God exacteth of thee less then thine iniquity deserveth.

Exacteth of thee.] The Hebrew Nashah, signifies, to forget, to lend, and to exact what is lent; and from this fruitfulness of the Original, there arise sundry interpretations of the Text. Many take the former sence; as Nashah, signifies, to forget, and they differ yet much in giving the meaning of the whole Sentence.

Oblivisci, & in suo Hiphil non tam oblivisci facere, quam notitiam auferre significat.

First thus, Know therefore that God maketh or causeth thee to forget thine iniquity; as if he had said, There is infinite wisdom in God, and if he should break forth upon thee in the full lustre of his holiness, and make thee remember all thy sins, thou wouldest be swallowed up in the gulf of thy own sinfulness. As no man can see the face of God and live, it is so glorious; so a sinner cannot see his own face and live, it is so odious. As God in condescention to our weakness, shews us but the back-parts of his glorious self, so but the back-parts of our sinful selves. It is alwayes our sin to forget our sins, but it is often mercy in God to make us forget them. Know therefore that God makes thee to forget thine iniquity; that is, the Lord doth not set them in the eye of thy Conscience, nor deals he with thee as if thou hadst committed such sins, which yet he could bring to thy remembrance, and set them in order before thine eyes. So the interlineal gives it, Know that God doth cause somewhat of thine iniquity to be hidden from thee, or, to be a secret to thee. God doth not open the pack of thine iniquity, and shew thee all the wickedness that is in thine heart and life; God lets some of it lie hid, and be as a thing forgot, or a secret to thy self.

Stito quod Deus latere facit aliquid de iniquitate tua. Ar. Mont.

Secondly, Others refer this forgetfulness to God himself, who is said to forget the fault, when he remits the punishment. This comes up to the sense of our Translators; for when a thing is forgotten, then it is not exacted, or called for (Act. 17. 30.) The times of this ignorance God winked at; he regarded not, he looked not after what was done; (that's the common exposition of the Text) God did (as it were) forget the sinfulness of those times. As God is said to forget sin, or to remember it no more, when he fully pardons it; so he may be said to forget sin, when he doth not fully punish it. When meer ignorance hinders man from seeing, meer mercy hinders God from seeing. He is pleased to wink, when we cannot see. When men have not much understanding what to do, God hath not much memory of what they do; that is, he doth not strictly reckon with them, or bring them to an account for what they have done. Though a sin of ignorance is damnable in it self, and may condemn the sinner, yet the Lord puts a difference between sins committed ignorantly and knowingly, in the dark and in the light; between those which are committed against the light of nature only, and those committed against Gospel-light. Thus the present exposition carries it;

Know,

Scito quod Deus remisit tibi partem iniquitatum tuarum. Vatabl.

Know, O Job, that God handles thee, as if he had forgotten or were ignorant of thine iniquity. Which interpretation a learned Writer makes his translation of the Text; Know therefore, that God hath remitted part of thine iniquity.

Oblitus, i.e. pœnam iniquitatis tuæ debitam distulit. Tyg.

A third renders, Know therefore that God hath deferred thine iniquity, he hath put it aside for a time, and hath not called thee to a present answer. Deferring is a temporary forgetting; when a man doth willingly forget a thing, he intends not to take a strict or sudden account of it; as when he forgets unwillingly or through infirmity, he cannot take any account of it at all.

Scito quod oblitus est tui Deus propter iniquitatem.

There is yet a fourth interpretation given from this sense of the word, Know therefore that God hath forgotten thee, because of thine iniquity; and so the forgetfulness lies upon Job's person, and not upon Job's sin; Thou complainest that God regards thee not, hears not thy cry, attends not to thy prayer, hastens not in with relief and succour in this thy sad condition, Know that God forgets thee, and he hath reason to do so; He forgets thee because of thine iniquity. God forgets those who have forgotten him, Prov. 1. 28. Then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer; they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me. But hath not the Lord promised to answer when we call, yea to answer before we call? Hath he not promised to be found of those that seek him? yea to be found of those who seek him not? Why then are these earnest suitors rejected, unanswered? The cause was in themselves; They hated knowledge: therefore God would not know them: They would none of his counsels, therefore he would none of their prayers. God put them in mind, but they forgot him; therefore they put God in mind, and he forgot them. Know therefore that God hath forgotten thee, because of thine iniquity. To obey God is to remember him, and none are so much remembred by God, as they who obey him; to sin against God is to forget him, and none are forgotten of God, but for their sin.

Significat mutuo dare & exigere, more fœneratoris.

We translate, God exacteth of thee [less then thine iniquity deserveth.] The word signifies also to lend (as was toucht before) so we read (Deut. 15. 2. Deut. 24. 10.) in the Laws given to the Jews about releasing; to exact less then due, is, to release somewhat of what is lent. The Adverb less is not in the Original, no nor the verb deserveth; our Translators have added both in a different letter, to supply and clear their sence upon the place, the words being only thus, Know that God exacteth of thee for thine iniquity. Mr. Broughton renders it roundly so, Know that the Puissant will call thee to an account for thine iniquity. Another learned Translator gives it thus, Acknowledge at least that God exacteth somewhat of thee for thine iniquity; as if he had said, Do not think that all this evil is come upon thee without cause; for shame submit, and confess that thy sin hath deserved some of it. Our rendring alludes to the dealing of a merciful Creditor with his Debtor, who is willing to be compounded with, for what is justly owing him; or, to the dealing of a merciful Magistrate towards a Malefactor, when he layes not the rigor of the Law upon him. Thus the Jews would not exact so much punishment of Paul, as they supposed his iniquity deserved. The Law admitted forty stripes; they would not go to the utmost line of justice; they, to do him a courtesie, or to avoid the suspition of cruelty (though this mercy was cruel) abated him an ace, and therefore gave him only forty stripes save one. The mercy of God to man, runs not like this, or any other mercy of man to man. When we say, God exacteth less then iniquity deserveth, we mean, God hath not exacted half, no nor a tenth of what our iniquity deserveth. He sets down but fifty in his Bill of chastnings, for an hundred, which he finds in our Bill of transgressings: And this half which he exacteth, is not taken, either to satisfie himself, or properly to punish us, but to purifie us, that we may glorifie him. God exacteth so little, that he indeed exacteth nothing. The word is harsh, and hears ill among men; but God is so good to Israel, that we know not how to call him an exacter, but because he doth not exact.

Agnosce saltem exigere abs te Deum aliquid de iniquitate tua. Jun.

2 Cor. 11. 24.

Hence observe, First, Every sin makes us debtors to God.

We are in his books, and in his bonds for every transgression. All men are in a debt of duty to God (as creatures) which if they pay not, they sin, and so run into a double debt; a debt of duty, which they should have performed, and a debt of penalty, because they have not performed it. Tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doth evil; there is the penalty. Creatures owe God a duty, which they ought to pay; and sinners owe him him a penalty, which must be paid, either by themselves, or by their Surety. The Apostle useth that phrase (Gal. 5. 3.) Every man that is circumcised, is a debtor to the whole Law. He is a debtor in regard of duty, because he that thinks himself bound to keep one part of the Ceremonial Law, doth thereby binde himself to keep it all; where the parts are inseparably united, we pull all upon us by engaging or medling with any one. And he that is a debtor in duty to keep the whole Law, must needs be a debtor in regard of the penalty; because he is not able to keep any part of it. And that's the reason why Christ (who stood in the place of sinners) was put to pay both these debts, that so he might fully cut scores with the Law. He paid the debt of duty, by fulfilling all righteousness. He also paid the debt of penalty, by enduring all sorrows; even the sorrows of death it self. We do but confess the debt, and God crosseth the book, and cancelleth all our bonds. If we confess our sins, he is faithful to forgive us our sins, and the bloud of Christ cleanseth us from all sins, 1 Joh. 1. 9. The red lines of his bloud are drawn over the black and abominable lines of our transgressions, and so the debt is discharged.

Secondly, Observe, If God exact not the whole debt of sinners, it is mercy.

Zophar would have Job to know this, Thou hast spoken hardly of God, because he hath smitten and afflicted thee; but God doth not exact of thee what thine iniquity deserveth; Is not this mercy? It is of the Lords mercies that we are not consumed, Lam. 3. 22. and vers. 39. Wherefore doth a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins? It is mercy if life be spared. Though a man be not left a rich man, a strong man, yet if he be left a living man, yea though but a man, he hath no reason to complain, while he remembers he is a sinful man, and is punished for his sin. It is mercy that we have not the whole debt laid upon us: If God defer any time, or remit any part, it is a favour; As Christ paid, so he paid all for believers: and the damned shall pay all in hell; there shall be no releasing, no compounding of their debts. And because they are not able to pay down the full summe at once, therefore they shall alwayes be paying. How rich is the grace which we have by Jesus Christ, through whom God releaseth all our debts! We must have paid all, if Christ had not paid all: Now he hath paid all, and we pay none at all. Christ having paid all for his redeemed ones, God doth not exact one farthing from them, much less the utmost farthing, as he will from the impenitent and unbelievers.

Thirdly, Observe, Afflictions are the desert of sin.

God exacteth of thee less then thy iniquity, or then thine iniquity deserveth. Most are afflicted for their sin; none had ever been afflicted, if they had not sinned. The doctrine is true, though Zophar failed in his application. Job was a sinner (the best of Saints on earth are sinners) yet God afflicted Job for the trial and improvement of Grace, not for the purging or correcting of his iniquity, as hath been observed from those words in the second Chapter, Thou provokest me to afflict him without cause; that is, without such cause as thou suggestest, his iniquity or hypocrisie.

Fourthly, Observe, That, All the afflictions of this life are less then our sins.

That's Ezra's confession (Ezra 9. 13.) After all that is come upon us for our evil deeds, and for our great trespass, seeing that thou our God hast punished us less then our iniquities deserve. Was it a touch, or some light stroke which God gave Jerusalem? Was their wound but a scratch, or their affliction little? Read the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and you shall find how doleful, how sad, how terrible a judgment was brought upon Jerusalem; even such, as was not done under the whole heaven: and yet Ezra saith, Thou hast punished us less then our iniquities deserve. As all the good which we do in this life, is less then the least of the mercies of God; so the least evil of sin which we commit, is greater then all the evils of punishment in this life. In the life to come God will make even with sinners and with saints. These shall receive as much good as Christ hath deserved for them, and they shall receive as much evil as themselves have deserved: Both are here short of their due, yea, and uncapable of their due. The Saints in this life, cannot hold so much glory as Christ hath purchased, (1 Cor. 15. 50.) Flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of God. The frame of nature, though purified and purged, is not receptive of heavenly glory. Thus also the frame of mans nature unpurified, is not receptive of so much punishment as sin deserveth. This flesh and blood cannot enter into the Kingdom of hell. Therefore as the Saints shall have spiritual bodies, that they may be fit vessels for the glory of heaven; so the wicked shall (in a sence) have spiritual bodies too, that they may be fit vessels for the misery of hell. Their bodies shall not die, their bodies shall live without the supports of nature, meat and drink, sleep or refreshing. Thus they shall have an Angelical life; and all to this end, that they may be capable subjects of the fury and wrath of God, even of all that vengeance, which he hath prepared, and will powr out upon those who disobey the Gospel, and come not in to receive Jesus Christ. We may say of wicked men, in this life, Verily they have their reward; they have seen the best of their dayes, the best of their state; but how much so ever any wicked man is punished, though he spend all his dayes groaning and sighing, though he be poor and sick, weak and pained, though he lie upon the rack of the most torturing diseases, the Stone, Gout, &c. yet it cannot be said of this man, He hath had his punishment. A miserable ignorant man is ready to say, I hope I have had my punishment, my hell in this life: Alas! poor soul, thou maist be pained here and in hell too; thou maist go from rack to rack, from torture to torture; present punishments are but as a sip of that cup, which shall be drunk to the bottom in hell; they are but as sports to the pains there, and as painted fire to real fire. As the best of the Saints portion is behind, their works follow them, their reward waits for them; so the worst of a wicked mans portion is behind; his sins follow him, his works of spiritual darkness follow him into eternal darkness, his punishment waits for him; though his judgment be now asleep, yet it will be awake, and never sleep, no, nor slumber any more.

VERS. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11.

Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?
It is as high as heaven, what canst thou do? deeper then hell, what canst thou know?
The measure thereof is longer then the earth, and broader then the Sea.
If he cut off, and shut up, or gather together, then who can hinder him?
For he knoweth vain man, he seeth wickedness also; will he not consider it?
For vain man would be wise, though man is born like a wild asses colt.

THe three first Verses of this context are an illustration, or a comment upon the sixth. Zophar having breathed out his wish, O that God would speak, and that he would shew thee the secrets of wisdom, that they are double to that which is; proceeds to prove, that it is but need he should; those secrets being such, as none can see, till they are shewed. This he sets on rhetorically, with a vehemently negative expostulation.

Verse 7. Canst thou by searching find out God? Thou canst not. Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is impossible. In the two following verses, the eighth and the ninth, he pursues the same argument; advancing the wisdom of God above the highest heavens, and carrying it below the lowest parts of the earth: The utmost extent of things created is too narrow for the Creator. Mans natural wisdom reacheth at the most, but to the utmost bounds of nature. But Gods wisdom is as high as (that is, higher then) heaven, yea deeper then hell; the measure thereof is longer then the earth, and broader then the Sea.

From the vastness of Gods wisdom, he descends to the absoluteness of his soveraignty, at the tenth verse, and gives an account, or an argument of both in the eleventh and twelfth.

Verse 7. Canst thou by searching find out God?

The word implies exactest diligence to find. Canst thou by searching find? that is, Canst thou find by all thy studies and endeavours? There is a finding by chance or accident, as well as a finding by search. Some cannot find what they search for; others find what they search not for; (Psal. 116. 3). The sorrows of death compassed me, and the pains of hell gat hold upon me, I found trouble and sorrow: I found trouble which I look'd not for; I was not searching after sorrow, but I found it. There is an elegancy in the Original (note that by the way) The pains of hell gat hold upon me, so we read; the Hebrew is, The pains of hell found me (one word signifies both) they found me, I did not find them. But no sooner had the pains of hell found me, but I found trouble and sorrow enough, and soon enough.

But usually the word noteth a finding (as here) upon enquiring; Canst thou by searching find? Canst thou find out God by thy exactest scrutiny, by the trial of all thy wits, or by the improvement of all thy abilities? That which is easie, is found with little search; that which is hardest cannot be found with all our search. When God would shew the obviousness and openness of the sin of man, he saith, I have not found it by secret search, but upon all these, Jer. 2. 34. Their sins are evident to every eye. Here when Zophar would shew the mysteriousness of the wisdom of God, he saith, Thou canst not find it by the most secret search.

But you will say, Cannot God be found by searching? God is every where; the invisible God is every where visible. Sense sees somewhat of him; though Faith sees most, (By faith moses saw him that is invisible, Heb. 11.) Sense shews somewhat of him to those who have no faith. You might read much of God in the Book of Nature, if you had not the Book of Scripture to read. Thus the Apostle convinceth the Gentiles, (Rom. 1. 20. The invisible things of God, to wit, his eternal power and Godhead, are seen in things that are made: And how are they seen? What! by opening their bowels, or by looking into their heart? No, If you look but upon the face, the surface of the Creature, if but upon the rind, the outside of the things that are made, even their external form and fashion, their beauty and order draw goodly lines, and make fair representations of God himself; even of his eternal power and Godhead. Do but pull up a grass from the earth, or crop off a leaf from a tree, and you may see God upon it. How is it then said, that you cannot find out God, no not by searching?

Præsentemque refert quælibet herba Deum.

I answer, First, We may find God by searching, but we cannot find him out; that is, we cannot find the utmost of God; as the next clause seems to explain: Canst thou find out the Almighty to perfection?

Secondly, God may be considered, either in his being, or in the manner of his being; in his working, or in the manner of his working.

In his being, God is easily found out: This notion lies uppermost, or riseth up in every heart; it is a principle that lives in, and cannot be blotted out of a natural Conscience: Thousands deny God, but all (who have not quite put out the very light of nature) acknowledge there is a God. A Heathen said, There is no Nation so barbarous, so untaught and ignorant, but confesseth there is a God. When man fell from God, this truth stood; as when Cities and great Buildings are overthrown by war, some Towers, some Pinacles survive the violence; so amongst the ruines and decayes of that perfect nature, which God made at first, the notions of a God remained. Atheists, who would not find God, find him against their wills, even whether they will or no. While they thrust God out of their Conversations, he continues in their Consciences. That God is, is so easily found, that it can hardly be lost; it is found with so little study, that many who study much to lose it, cannot.

But you cannot find out God in the manner of his being, or what a God he is: you cannot find out his power and wisdom, his holiness and his justice, his faithfulness and unchangeableness, with all your search; you cannot find these distinctly in the book of Nature, nor understand them easily when you find them plainly described, and highly magnified in the book of Scripture.

Again,

Again, We may find out God in his working, or in his works; we may see such works done, as speak a God, such, as all must say with the Magicians of Egypt, The finger of God is here: We may find this with a little searching, possibly without searching; we can hardly hide this from our eyes; yea, if we shut our eyes, we have much ado not to see it. Some cannot see, though their eyes are open; others shut their eyes, lest they should see (Isa. 26. 11.) Lord, when thine hand is lift up, they will not see. Some workings of God are so eminent and evident, that if men were not wilfully blind, they must needs see them. That God works, that there is a divine power, carrying on the affairs of the world, is written as with a beam of the Sun. But if we consider the manner of his working, there's a secret, that's mysterious: Providence hath such various wayes, such intricate turnings, that a searching man may be to seek about them. God doth not always leave the Print of his footsteps, where he goeth. The way of an Eagle in the air, the way of a Ship in the midst of the Sea, the way of a Serpent upon a Rock, are not so untraceable as many of the wayes of God.

Now forasmuch as Zophar treating of the wisdom of God, concludeth, That God cannot be found out. Having wished, O that he would shew thee the secrets of wisdom, he puts not the Question thus, Canst thou by searching find out the wisdom of God? But, Canst thou by searching find out God?

Hence observe, The wisdom of God is God.

So also the power of God is God, and the holiness of God is God. The attributes and qualities of God, are essential to God; there is no distinction between substance and quality in God. Man and his qualities are two things, man and his wisdom, man and his holiness are distinct. Many men are neither wise nor holy, yet men still. But God and his wisdom, God and his holiness are the same; He could not be God, if he were either unwise or unholy. Once have I sworn by my holiness, saith God, Psal. 89. 36. that is, I have sworn by my self, as the Apostle explains it, Heb. 6. 13. Because he could swear by no greater, he sware by himself.

Secondly, Observe, The wisdom of God is unsearchable.

As they said in the book of Judges, As the man is, so is his might; so we may say much more, As God is, so is his wisdom. There is more wisdom of God in making the least thing, then we can make out. Then, what is there in God himself? If a man should be examined about the meanest Creature, can he resolve fully, why it is made of such matter, why in such a form? Can he tell why the colour is such, or such the qualities? why for such uses, and why unto such ends? God hath bestowed great skill upon smallest works.

Thirdly, Observe, God is unsearchable.

Canst thou by searching find out God? It is not in vain to see God, but it is in vain to search him. God is not far from any man (Acts 17. 27.) but he is far above all men. When a Philosopher was asked by Hiero, What God was? I cannot answer suddenly (said he) pray give me a day's time to consider of it; when that day was ended, and the King demanded an answer, he desired a second day, and after that a third, till at last he gave it over, professing he could not find out God. God exceeds and swallows up, not only the reason of natural men, but of spiritual. They who are enlightened by the grace of God, cannot see all the light that is in God, or all of God, who is light.

Fourthly, When Zophar saith, Canst thou by searching find out God? He seems to imply,

That, There is a way to find out much of God, though we cannot find him by searching.

The best knowledge of God is from his own revelation, not by our study. Would you find out God? Do not think to do it by beating your brains, but by beating the Heavens. The knowledge of God cometh down from God; we know him when he makes himself known to us. And usually he doth not make his fulness known to us, till we make our emptiness known to him. We cannot find out God by reading, but we may by praying. If any man lack wisdom (especially this wisdom to know God) let him ask of God, who giveth liberally, and upbraideth not. It was a good speech of Luther, He hath studied well, who hath prayed well: Prayer attains the key of mysteries, and faith enters into them. Hence, when Zophar had prayed, O that God would speak, and that he would open his lips, and shew thee the secrets of wisdom; he presently concludes all searches about him successless, without him, Canst thou by searching find out God?

Bene orasse est bene studuisse. Luth.

Fifthly, If by searching we cannot find out God, then we must not boldly pry and press into the secrets of God.

Yet this should not quench endeavour, but regulate it, and keep it in compass: This should make us humble, but it must not make us idle. Though we cannot know all of God, yet we are bound to learn all that may be known. It will be as much our sin not to desire to know what we may, as to desire to know what we may not. It is our duty to enquire and travel to the utmost of our line; we must not sit down where we are, because we cannot go as far as we would. As we must aim at, and labour after perfection in holiness, though we cannot reach it; so also in knowledge. We must not rest in any imperfect knowledge of God, because we cannot know him perfectly. Which Zophar teacheth us in the next words;

Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection?

This latter clause gives light to the former: For some may observe: Cannot we find out God by searching? Great difficulties whet and quicken industry, but a total impossibility not only dulls, but deads it: If we cannot find out God, why then do we search? Yes, you must search, and you may find; but you cannot find him out unto perfection by all your searchings.

The word, Perfection, in the Original, signifies the height, strength, or utmost accomplishment of a thing. A learned Author translates it, the parts about the heart, or the closest lodges of the heart; which by a metaphor signifies our inward thoughts and most retired imaginations. As if he had said, Canst thou find out the inmost recesses or secrets of Gods heart? Hast thou seen what is laid up in the inner chambers of his Spirit? The heart of man is deep, only God can search it; but O how deep is the heart of God? no man can search it.

תכר significat ultimum summumque. Coc.

I find a like interpretation given of the former clause, in answer to this: Canst thou by searching find out God? rendring it thus; Canst thou find out the last thing of God? The word (Hakar) which we translate searching, signifies the chief and last of a thing. And so that Text of Solomon is expounded by the same Author (Prov. 25. 27) It is not good to eat much honey, so for men to search their own glory, is not glory; so we render: he thus; It is not good to eat much honey, but the last of glory is glory; The sence of which reading is to this effect. The best of temporal and outward things (honey it self) if you eat much of them, will not be sweet, you may eat honey till honey be loathsome to you; but glory, or heavenly things (he takes glory for the happiness which man shall have with God in Heaven, not for the fame or respect which man hath with man on earth, which is the sense of our translation) glory (I say) or the state of Heaven, is such, that the last of it is glory; the longer you feed upon glory, the sweeter it will be, the last bit will be as sweet as the first; The manna which came down from heaven was loathed by the Israelites. But no Israelite shall loath the manna which he finds in heaven: The last of glory will be glory; the longer we eat, the more we shall delight; the more we taste those dainties, the more pleasant will they be to our taste. Taking the word (Hakar) in that sence, it may be rendred, Canst thou find out the last of God? And so it falls in with this, Canst thou find him out unto perfection?

Unto perfection.] Canst thou come to the uttermost of what God is? or of what God doth? Canst thou know God, as we speak (à capite ad calcem) from head to foot, from beginning to end, from first to last, within and without? Canst thou take in all the excellencies and dimensions of God? thou canst not do it, man, wert thou more then a man; hadst thou the understanding of an Angel thou couldst not do it. How much soever thou art above man, below God, thou canst not find out God unto perfection; God only knows God perfectly.

Invenire potest deus sed non ad plenum. Drus.

Hence observe, Though much of God may be found out, yet all cannot.

We cannot find him out unto perfection. Finite cannot hold infinite. Some may conceit (but it is a meer conceit) that they can; as a Country fellow thinks, if he were upon such a Mountain which bounds the Horizon, he could touch Heaven, and take a Star in his hand; but when he comes thither, Heaven is as far off as it was, and the Stars as much out of his reach, as they were, where he stood before: Such are the guesses of men about God: if they could attain such a point, and be resolved in such a doubt, then (doubtless) they should know all the mysteries of the Divine nature: but if they get thither, they are as far from the perfection of God as before; for how near soever we come to God, there is an infinite distance between us and God. Every Believer is near God in affection, yet is he still infinite removes from his perfection. When we seem to come neerest the perfections of God, God goes further off from us, and we are as much to seek as ever. When holy Augustine walked by the sea-side, rapt in the meditation of God and of his wayes, he heard a voice, which bad him lade the ocean with a cockle-shell: We may sooner drain the ocean with such a little shell, or with a spoon, then the perfections of God with our largest understandings. The Lord bespeaks Job (chap. 38. 22.) Hast thou entred into the treasures of the snow? There are secrets in Nature, which were never entred into by Art: The treasures of the snow descend upon us, but we cannot ascend into the treasures of the snow: we cannot enter into natural things, how shall we enter into spiritual? how shall we enter into the God of spirits? Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entred into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him, (1 Cor. 2. 9.) And if the things which God hath prepared for man, have not yet entred into his heart, can God, who hath prepared those things, enter into his heart? Solomon puts the question (Eccles. 11. 5.) Canst thou know how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child? Even so (saith he) thou knowest not the work of God who maketh all. If natural questions pose us, divine questions may amaze us. To know God here is eternal life; and yet we shall not know all of God in eternal life. It is our perfection to know God while we sojourn here upon the earth; yet we shall not know God to the utmost of his perfection in Heaven: In Heaven we shall know him perfectly, but not unto perfection: Now we know in part, then we shall know as we are known; that is, we shall know much, we shall know abundantly: Now we see through a glass darkly, but then face to face (1 Cor. 13. 12.) that is, clearly, immediately, not by reflection, but by intuition. Then the curtains shall be drawn aside; then all the clouds and dark vapours, which stand between us and truth, shall be scattered from before our eyes: Then, the beautiful face of truth shall be unveiled, there shall not so much as any doubt interpose between truth and our understandings. Those perplexed questions, and fatal controversies, which have troubled the peace of the Churches, and exercised, yea, vexed the greatest wits to resolve and compose them, shall have all their knots untied, and their fallacies discovered by the meanest Scholar in glory. And yet Zophar's denying question may be put to the highest Graduate in glory; Canst thou find out God unto perfection? As there shall be no seekers in heaven, so, no such finders. Creatures shall there know so much of God as will make them perfectly happy, but to know God unto perfection, is more then comes to the share of a creatures happiness. 'Tis the perfect happiness of God, to know himself unto perfection.

Cum accesserit, longius abit.

Zophar having by way of question laid down this Position, That, man cannot find out God unto perfection, exemplifies it.

Altitudines cœli, Heb. Emphasin continet plurale, more Hebræorum, maximam altitudinem significans.

Verse 8. It is as high as heaven, what canst thou do? deeper then hell, what canst thou know?

It is as high as heaven, what canst thou do?] What is as high as Heaven? The Wisdom of God is. Wisdom is the soaring Antecedent to this Relative. The Hebrew is plural, It is as the highnesses of heaven; take all the heights and elevations, all the spheres and stories of Heaven, climb the loftiest pinnacles of Heaven, Wisdom is higher, or high beyond them all: so it may be rendered from the original, high above the heavens.

Quid facies in altitudine cœlorum? Sept. Vatabl. Pag. Regia.

Some Translators give us the Text in this Interrogation, What wilt thou do in the height of the heavens? which sounds like the Apostles caution; Be not high minded, but fear: or like David's humble acknowledgment (Psal. 131. 1.) I do not exercise my self in things too high for me: As if he had said, Seeing thou canst not mannage the height of the Heavens, surely thou canst not digest the height of God who is above the Heavens: If thou shouldst be put to give an account of things in Heaven, of the Sun, Moon and Stars, or of their motion, thou wilt be puzled. How then wilt thou be able to give an account of him who is higher then the Heavens, whom the Heaven of Heavens cannot contain? (1 Kings 8. 17. Isa. 66. 1.) Who also buildeth his stories in the heavens, Amos 9. 6. Astronomers have left us the doctrine of the Heavens; they tell us of the nature and order, of the qualities and influences of those superiour bodies: but they speak most by guess, or without book. There is no certainty in that knowledge, though some probability. Astronomers look up to Heaven, but they bring little of Heaven down to us. What wilt thou do in the height of heaven?

Deus non solum in rebus creatis est, sed extra, pro sua essentiæ immensitate. August. lib. 11. de civ. D. c. 5. Damas. l. 2. de orthod. fide, cap. 6.

Further, when Zophar saith, The wisdom of God is as high as heaven, he means, his Wisdom is exceeding high. The highest Heaven being the highest of all things visible, that must needs be higher then the highest of visibles, which is higher then the Heavens; and because those things which are extream high affect us highly, therefore he gives Divine wisdom the utmost line of the dimension. It is as high as heaven.

שאול denotat omnia loca subterranea Deus.

Deeper then hell, what canst thou know?] The word Sheol, is taken for all that is deep or low, sometimes it is put in special for the grave, here for the place of the damned. As we can do little in the height of Heaven, so we know little of the lowest hell. Some of the upper part of the earth is to us yet (terra incognita) an unknown land: but all of the lowest part of hell, is to us an unknown land: Many thousands have travelled thither, but none have returned thence to make reports, or write books of their travels. That piece of Geography is very imperfect. It is deeper then hell, what canst thou know? Heaven and hell are the greatest opposites, or remotest extreams. (Matth. 12. 23.) Thou Capernaum, which art exalted up to heaven, shalt be brought down to hell: Heaven and hell are at furthest natural distance, and are therefore the everlasting receptacles of those who are at the furthest moral distance, Believers and unbelievers, Saints and impenitents. And as the height of Heaven, so the depth of hell is ascribed to wisdom, to shew the unsearchableness of it. O the depth (as well as O the height) of the wisdom of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his wayes past finding out! (Rom. 11. 35.) We read of the deep things of God (1 Cor. 2. 10.) The Spirit searcheth all things, even the deep things, or the depths of God. Satan, who is full of subtilty and craft, hath his depths also, (Rev. 2. 24.) But unto you I say, as many as have not known the depths of Satan: That is, who have not approved nor practised the policies and devices which Satan inspires his disciples with, under the notion of profound wisdom. Deeps of all sorts lie far out of our view, and are hard to be found out.

Verse 9. The measure (or the stature) of it is longer then the earth, and broader then the sea.

The former verse shewed us the height and depth of wisdom; this, its length and breadth.

Populari modo loquitur, nam hoc spatio ac distantia vulgus nihil rarius concipit. Bold.

It is longer then the earth.] He speaks popularly, or to the shortest and narrowest capacity; man thinks there is nothing longer then the earth: The length of many parts of the earth is exceeding long; how long then is the whole earth? Mathematicians tell us, that the circumference of the earth is about twenty two thousand miles, a vast length; and the measure is the same in the length of it from East to West, or in the breadth of it from North to South: Every Sphærical body is of equal dimensions. The measure of wisdom is longest, being longer then the earth, which is the longest journey man ever travelled.

And broader then the sea.] Latitude or breadth is usually ascribed to the sea, as longitude or length unto the earth. The Psalmist, in his meditations upon the works of God, calls it, The great and wide sea, Psal. 104. 25. Breadth is ascribed to the sea, because of its huge extension. The sea is a lower firmament: and as the upper firmament is called in the Hebrew, A thing stretched out, or spread forth. The upper firmament is one expansion; so also is this lower firmament, the sea. The sea puts out long arms, and thence it is denominated broad. The breadth of a man is measured by his arms stretched forth, as his length is measured from head to foot: Thus the sea stretching forth its mighty arms to imbrace the earth (we commonly call them, The arms of the sea) carries away the name from all other creatures for latitude or breadth. There is nothing counted so wide and roomthy as the sea. Such (and how much more no man knows) is the wisdom and knowledge of God.

Here are four very different dimensions met together, height and depth, length and breadth, yet they all mind and speak the same thing, That the wisdom of God is infinite; higher then all natural height, and deeper then all natural depth; broader then all natural breadth, and longer then all natural length. The Apostle speaking of the love of God in Christ (Ephes. 3. 18.) ascribeth these four dimensions to it, with which Zophar here adorns the wisdom of God, That you may be able to comprehend with all Saints, what is the breadth and length, and depth and height, and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge. Many wits run riot in Geometrical notions about these moral dimensions. And whereas Naturalists give us but three dimensions of a body, longitude, latitude and profundity, the love and wisdom of God have altitude added, which is a fourth. But all these dimensions serve only to shew the immensity both of the love and wisdom of God.

Observe hence, First, Mans inability to reach the perfection of creatures, should convince him of his utter inability to reach God in his perfection.

For when Zophar affirms the wisdom of God higher then heaven, deeper then hell, &c. He by a lesser impossibility would convince us of a greater. Thou canst not find out the height of heaven, nor the depth of hell; thou canst not take the perfect length of the earth, nor the breadth of the sea; therefore much less art thou able to take the height and depth, the length and breadth of God himself, or of his wisdom.

Secondly, When he saith, that the wisdom of God is higher, longer, deeper and broader then heaven, earth, hell and sea; We may observe,

That God is present with all his creatures in all places.

The wisdom of God is every where, therefore God is. Wisdom is the eye of God, and God is said to have seven eyes (that is, many eyes, or a manifold wisdom) running to and fro through the whole earth, Zech. 3. 9. cap. 4. 10. There is one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all, Eph. 4. 6. God is above all, not only in regard of power and authority, but of inspection and over-sight. God stands aloft, as upon a watch-tower, beholding all that's done below, whether within or without; whether for or against the Church. There is no turning, no corner, wherein any can stand unobserved; for as he is above, so he is through all, and in all: He is through all the world by his common providence, as well as in all his Saints by his special grace. In him we live, and move, and have our beings, Acts 17. Yea, he is present in all places, not only virtually and efficaciously, but essentially. It is not with God as with the Sun, the Sun is fixt in its orb, and from thence sends forth its light and influence into all the world: We cannot say the Sun is every where, though the light and heat of the Sun are every where; the body of the Sun is only in Heaven. Again, it is not with God, as with a King, who sits upon his Throne, and yet hath long hands, and many eyes, reaching all places of his Dominion, but it is by his Authority and Commissions only. A King is virtually present in many places at once, but not personally; whersoever his residence is, there his person is, and no where else. Whereas Gods hands and eyes, his power and wisdom extend over all personally. The Divine nature is as large and vast as the Divine power. Do not I fill heaven and earth, saith the Lord (Jer. 23. 24.) Once more, God is every where, not as the Air is every where: The Air is part in one place, and part in another, God is all in every place; God is wholly in the height of heaven, and wholly in the depth of hell, wholly in the length of the earth, and wholly in the breadth of the sea. All God is in all things, and all God is without all things; he is without all things, and not shut out of any thing; he is in all things, and not included in any thing, so the Ancients speak of this wonderful mystery of Gods omnipresence.

Essentia divina tota est intra omnia & tota extra omnia. Nusquam inclusa, aut exclusa, omnia continens, a nullo contenta, nec propterea est immista rebus aut sordibus inquinata. Aug. ep. 57. ad Dar.

Thirdly, Note, God is not only in, but above and beyond all creatures.

He is higher then heaven, and deeper then hell. (So the Hebraism) 2 Chron. 2. 6. Who is able to build him a house (saith Solomon) seeing the heaven, and heaven of heavens cannot contain him? God hath given a limit to every thing, but himself hath none. He that made all things, cannot be circumscribed by the things which he hath made. Man makes a house, and there he dwelleth, his house shuts him in. God hath made a house big enough for all creatures, but not big enough for himself; The heaven, and the heaven of heavens cannot contain him, how much less this house which I have builded? saith the same Solomon. The heaven of heavens is the highest heaven, the chiefest heaven, the third heaven, the heaven compassing and containing all those heavens which we behold. That heaven which containeth the heavens, cannot contain the God of heaven. (1 Kings 8. 27.) God is a sphere, whose center is every where, and whose circumference is no where.

Fourthly, Observe, All that is done in the world, is done by the ordering or over-ruling hand of God.

God useth means, but himself is present with all the means he useth, and acts in every thing that acts; He that is every where can as well do all, as any one thing. A man who hath many businesses to do at the same time in many places, cannot attend them all, and gives the reason, Do you think I can be every where? I was in such a place; could I be in this too? Carnal minds think it a strange doctrine to affirm, That God doth all things, and that there is not any motion in the creature, but God is in it. But what difficulty is there in this, when we have once digested this principle, That God is every where? He that is higher then heaven, and deeper then hell, &c. is ready at every turn to do what is done. Kings send their Vicegerents and Deputies, who do their work, while themselves are absent. Kings are not in the means and with the means which they imploy, and that's the reason why instruments work often so contrary to the mind of Kings: They not being actually present with them, cannot over-rule and order them. But God being present with all instruments and second causes that are awork in the whole world, orders them all by his sovereign will. They who act against the revealed will of God, are yet order'd by his secret will. There is nothing done against the counsel and purpose of God, though many things are done against the command and appointment of God. For as he is with every hand that helpeth us, so he is with every hand that smiteth us; as he is with every tongue that blesseth us, so he is with every tongue that curseth us. When Shimei cursed David, he knew God was with that tongue, and therefore he said, So let him curse, because the Lord hath said unto him, Curse David, 2 Sam. 16. 10. We indeed pray to God Our Father in heaven. Heaven is the Throne of God, but Heaven it is not the Prison of God; God is never shut up in Heaven, though his glory shine most in Heaven. But Moses saith to Israel, Go not up, for the Lord is not among you, (Numb. 14. 42.) I answer, The Lord is not among a people when he doth not assist, prosper and bless them; but he is then among them, both, to observe what they do, and to punish what is done amiss. Thus God is near those who depart from him, as is further cleared in the next point.

Fifthly, Observe, God beholds all the good, and all the evil that is done in the world.

His wisdom being higher then heaven, and longer then the earth, brings him in intelligence from all the quarters and corners of heaven and earth; our works are before him, and so are our words (Mal. 3. 16.) Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another. What then? Did they whisper so in one anothers ear, that no ear else heard them? No, the Lord hearkened and heard it; the Lord listened (as it were) at the key-hole, he was under the window; and what then? A book of remembrance was written before him; all was kept upon record. And when they who do not fear the Lord speak one to another, when wicked men plot against the righteous, or conspire against the righteous wayes of God; He hearkneth and heareth, and there is a book of remembrance kept of that too. Let them whisper as softly as they can, God can hear, and will record all their malicious speeches, all their evil devices and contrivements against himself, or against his servants.

Sixthly, Observe, There is no avoiding or getting from the justice of God.

God is higher then heaven, and deeper then hell, &c. Some who have done wickedly in one place, escape the Law, by getting into another; they will be out of your bounds, and then they are safe: But who can go out of Gods bounds? (Amos 9. 3, 4.) Though they dig into hell, thence shall my hand take them; though they climb up to heaven, thence will I bring them down; though they hide themselves in the top of Carmel, I will search them, and take them out thence, &c. And, Psal. 139. 7, 8. Whither shall I go from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there; if I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea, even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me, &c. There is no avoiding the justice of God; for there is no avoiding the presence of God. He hath power to arrest and attach a malefactor, where-ever he finds him, and he can find him where-ever he is; though he fleeth, yet he shall not flee away, and though he escapeth, yet he shall not be delivered, (Amos 9. 1.) that is, though he thinks he hath escaped, yet I (saith the Lord) will overtake him quickly, and my sentence shall be executed upon him. Thus the workings of God, and his wisdom, are compared unto, and exceed all the dimensions of the creature; he is above and beyond all their perfections, therefore unsearchable, therefore not to be found out unto perfection.

Zophar, from the infinite wisdom of God, descends to argue his Soveraignty, and the uncontroulableness of his power.

Verse 10. If he cut off, and shut up, and gather together, then who can hinder him?

As if he had said, The Lord is in all places, and where-soever he comes, he is within his own Dominions; it is possible for the greatest Prince in the world to travel out of the bounds of his own power. The chief Officer of a City hath great power within that City, but beyond he cannot meddle. Kings have great power within their own Dominions, but get into another Countrey, and they cannot touch you: Should a King act his authority beyond his limits, many would hinder him, no man would obey him. But where-soever God acts his authority, he is in his own Kingdom; for all the world is his: therefore none can hinder him. This Zophar shews in three Acts of Soveraignty; If he, 1. cut off, 2. shut up, 3. gather together; who can hinder?

If he cut off.] The word signifies, to change and alter; to put things into another course, to pass away, as well as to cut off and destroy; that which is cut off, is changed, and that which is destroyed, passeth away. We have an elegant gradation (Isa. 8. 8.) and this word makes the first step of it; He shall pass thorow Judah, he shall overflow and go over, he shall reach even to the neck, and the stretching out of his wings shall fill the breadth of thy Land, O Immanuel. He shall pass thorow; that is, the King of Assyria; who is compared to a mighty river, covering all its channels, and overflowing all its banks; he shall pass thorow the Land like a violent torrent, he shall destroy and cut off much people in Immanuel's Land, that is, in Christs Land, who is God with us: Yet he will not suffer his people to be utterly cut off. The enemy, who once associated and prevailed, shall associate and be broken; for God is with us, vers. 10.

And shut up.] The word is taken two wayes; sometimes in a good sence, so, If he shut up; is, if he secure any from danger, hiding them in his own pavilion of protection, Deut. 32. 36. The Lord shall repent himself for his servants, when he seeth that their power is gone, and there is none shut up or left: that is, when he shall see that none are out of the power of the enemy, none shut up in the City, none guarded and kept safe from danger; but all doors & places lying open to the destroyer; then God repents himself for his servants; that is, he changes his course (though not his decree) and hastens to the rescue of his people, thus exposed to trouble on every side.

Again, The word is taken in an ill sense; so, If he shut up, is, if he restrain mercy, and expose to misery (Deut. 32. 30.) How should one chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight, except their rock had sold them, and the Lord had shut them up? How shut them up? As into a prison, or under durance; except the Lord had delivered them as prisoners, into their enemies hands, they had never come into their hands. The people of God are compassed about with such priviledges, that they can never be overcome by man, till God withdraws his safe-conduct, and gives them to the robbers, and to the spoilers, till their rock sells them, and their God shuts them up. It is an allusion to strong Cities or Forts, which are so built and mann'd, so victualled and provided with ammunition, that it is impossible to take them in by assault or siege, unless the Governor, or he that hath the power of the place, sell, or betray them to the enemie. The People of Israel were so fortified with promises, yea, walled about with God himself, that except their rock had sold them, except God had (as we may speak with reverence to his eternal faithfulness) betrayed them into their enemies hands, they had continued impregnable. In this sence take the word here, If the Lord shut up; that is, if he put men as in a prison, or into the adversaries hands, who can hinder?

Or gather together.] This act of providence is opposite to the former; by that, men are shut up as prisoners, and debarred of liberty; by this, they are gathered together, as friends, unto one society. Scattering imports affliction; and gathering, a return out of affliction. The Apostle James dedicates his Epistle to the twelve Tribes scattered abroad. And when the Prophet Zephanie foretells the restauration of the Jews (chap. 3. 17.) he brings in God rejoycing over them with joy, resting in his love, joying over them with singing, and saying (ver. 18.) I will gather them that are sorrowful, I will save her that halteth, and gather her that was driven out. To gather, is to restore, whether to civil, or to spiritual society.

There are two words in the Hebrew, noting Church-Assemblies, whereof this is one; yet it may be interpreted a Common-wealth-gathering, as well as a Church-gathering, of a civil, as well as of spiritual communion. The book Ecclesiastes receives its title (Koheleth) from this root. Two reasons may be given of it; either because that book of the Preacher is a collection of excellent observations: Solomon there gathered together and congregated many points of highest wisdom. Or because men ought to assemble, or congregate themselves chearfully together, to hear, and drink in at the ear those excellent instructions which Solomon gives in that Book. A learned Interpreter understands all these acts, of affliction; if the Lord cut off by sword; shut up in prison, gather together, and bundle men up as fewel to feed the flame of his fiery indignation, though he doth all or any of these things, who can hinder him? The Chaldee Paraphrast translates, though he gather together his armies, his military forces; though he muster nations together in a warlike manner, to vex or destroy each other.

Koheleth, Liber in quo collectæ omnes scientiæ, & ad quem audiendum homines congregantur.

Si congregaverit exercitus aut copias militares. Targ.

Who can hinder him?] The Hebrew is, who can turn him away from his purpose? who can stop him? The Lord hath no peer, no superior, none to check his counsels, or stay their executions; when he hath determined to do a thing, none can say, it shall not be done, or it shall be done another way; his power is supream, and he can do what he pleaseth, without giving an account to any. The sum of all is, that God may destroy, spoil, overthrow, burn, consume if he will; he may do what he will with men and Kingdoms, and no man must open his mouth against him; or if any do, it is in vain, or at their own peril. Thus he answers Job, who complained in his afflictions, that the Lord had cut him off, and shut him up; that the Lord had gathered together armies of Caldeans and Sabeans to destroy him. Though he do, (saith Zophar) yet know the wisdom of God is unsearchable, higher then heaven, deeper then hell; if he will take these courses with thee, who can hinder him? why dost thou complain, as if God had done thee wrong? whereas he hath right to do what he will, and he can will nothing but what is right.

Hence

Hence observe, First, All the changes and troubles, the good and evil in the world, is from God.

If he cut off, if he shut up, if he gather together; he speaks as if there were no hand of the Creature moving in any of these things, but that God himself had done all: Come (saith David, Psal. 46. 8.) behold the works of the Lord, what desolations he hath made in the earth. See how the Lord hath made the earth desolate; see how he drives the nations, and drives the inhabitants of the world. We have a great instance in this Kingdom; Behold the works of the Lord: see what desolations he hath made in the North, in the West; see how many houses are burnt, how many towns impoverished, how many families utterly ruined: Come, behold what desolations the Lord hath made. Come also, and behold what habitations, what reformations he makes in the earth: where you see these things done, know it is God that hath done them, as the Psalmist adds in the next words; He maketh wars to cease unto the ends of the earth, he breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder, he burneth the chariot in the fire. Our eyes are usually much upon second causes, and little upon the first; this makes us angry and impatient: if we could see God more in what is done, and man less, we should be much satisfied; or, at least, less troubled; we should possess our souls in patience whatsoever is done.

Secondly, Observe, God cannot be hindred of his purpose.

What he hath a mind to do, shall be done, though all the world say no; he gives no account of, nor can any restraint be laid upon his actions. If he cast one into prison, and enlarge another; enrich one, and impoverish another; give one honour, and lay reproach upon another; who shall say, What dost thou? I have often met with this point of the Soveraignty of God, therefore I only touch it here.

Zophar, in the former words, moves Job to consider the unsearchable wisdom of God, and his unquestionable soveraigney; Canst thou by searching find out God? &c. If he cut off, and shut up, and gather together, who can hinder him? Thou canst not fadom the bottomless abyss of his wisdom, nor stay him in the resolved actings of his power. He now proceeds to give the reason of both (for the connection may refer to either.)

First, He gives a reason why a man cannot reach the wisdom of God (ver. 11.) He is vain man. And as man shews his vanity in nothing more, then in his assayes and offers to find out the secrets of God; so his vanity renders him under an utter impossibility to find out the secrets of God.

Vanitas hominum assignatur causa cur secretorum divinæ providentiæ sunt incapaces. Merc. Probari videtur à Sophare cur Deus jure possit succidere, &c. Quia omnium hominum vanitatem & secretiora dignoscat peccata. Bol.

Secondly, He gives a reason why; If the Lord cut off, and destroy, and gather together, if he turn the world upside down, why man cannot hinder him: He knoweth vain man; he knoweth that man hath no power to match his; vain man is weak man, and what can weakness do against strength, impotency against omnipotency?

Again, man is vain, and therefore gives the Lord cause (if he should descend to give a reason of himself, or of his actions) to cut off, to gather together, to shut up: Vain man is wicked man; he seeth wickedness also: so that if God would not act by his prerogative, man gives him ground enough, legal ground according to the line of humane understanding, to do what he doth. He knoweth vain man well enough, both what he is, and what he hath done.

All this Zophar intends against Job, as if he were the man whom God knew to be vain, and in whom he saw iniquity; yea, the brutishness of a wild asses colt, and was about to break and tame him by those judgments. Zophar speaks right in this, of mans nature in general; but his censure of Job, was erroneous. He was not a vain, but a holy man; neither did God see wickedness, but uprightness in him. Grace had changed his nature; and the Spirit in regeneration, had blotted out the image of a beast, and stampt him with that image, which is after God, in righteousness and true holiness. And as for his afflictions, they were not sent to tame him, but to try him; not to break his headstrong spirit, but to shew that he was already broken, and brought to hand; yea, led by the Spirit of God.

Verse 11. He knoweth vain man, he seeth wickedness also; will he not consider it?

He knoweth.] To know, is sometimes taken for a pure act of intuition, or for the discerning of persons and things, what they are. Sometimes it imports an act mixt, or made up with the understanding and affections; and then, to know, takes in both delight and approbation, Psal. 1. 6. The Lord knoweth the way of the righteous; it is the way, which himself hath cut and chalked out for them; therefore he cannot but approve it (2 Tim. 2. 19.) The Lord knoweth who are his; yea, he knoweth who are not his too; but with a knowledge as different as the persons; he knows the latter, and rejects them; he knows the former, and is pleased with them; I know Abraham (saith God) I, there's a man; I know what an one he is: he is a good man, and he is one I have in my heart to do him good. The Lord also knoweth vain man; there is nothing of vain man hidden from God, though there is nothing of vain man, loved or approved by God. He knoweth vain man, or men of vanity; so the Hebrew. We put it into an Epithite, vain man.

Vain man.] That is, inconsiderate, rash, heady, hasty man. With all these fences the original word is filled. When men go headlong, and without heed upon businesses, when they move without steadiness of spirit, or an inward ballast to keep their thoughts in a due and equall poyse, they are vain men. The Law saith (Exod. 20. 7.) Thou shalt not take the Name of the Lord thy God in vain (it is this word) that is, Thou shalt not speak rashly of the things of God, or of God himself, without reverence and pre-meditation, who God is, and what the errand is thou dealest with God about.

Further, The word signifies craft, deceit, lying and falseness, whether of heart or tongue. The Lord knoweth the falseness, baseness and corruption, as well as the inconsiderateness and rashness that lies in the heart of man; some render it so here, from the Letter of the Hebrew, The Lord knoweth men to be liars; or, those men who are liars. Idols are expressed by this word, because they are vain, lying, false gods, Jon. 3. 3. They that follow lying vanities (which may be either meant of worshipping Idols, or of any sinful way of practice) forsake their own mercy. So, Psal. 62. 9. Surely men of low degree are vanity, and men of high degree are a lie; to be laid in the balance, they are altogether lighter then vanity. Vanity is a light thing, but these men will prove the lighter of the two. The Citizen of Sion is one, that hath not lift up his soul unto vanity (Psal. 24. 4.) unto false worship, or false wayes: he lifteth up his soul unto that which is holy, just and good, the righteous Law of God.

Novit homines mendaces. Pagn. Homines falsitatis. Caj.

In general, this word signifies any evil or sin, especially those which refer to injustice, or our neighbours wrong, Psal. 12. 2. They speak vanity every one with his neighbour; that is, they speak injuriously, every one deceiveth, or would circumvent and over-reach his neighbour. This is to speak vanity with a neighbour (Psal. 16. 4.) I have not sate with vain persons; who are those? he expounds it in the next words; Neither will I go in with dissemblers; that is, with men that make a fair shew to their brethren, whilst their hearts are full of poyson against them; who speak one thing, and intend another; these are vain persons, and how religious soever they may seem to be, their Religion is vain too.

The Lord knoweth vain man; or, he knoweth the vanity of men. Hence Note,

First, That, Man is naturally full of vanity, very full of vanity.

To be called a man of vanity, imports vainest vanity; as it imports, that God is full of truth, when he is called the God of truth; and that he abounds with comfort, when he is called the God of all comfort; so it is a Hebraism, noting how full of vanity man is, who is called a man of vanity; and how false he is, who is called a man of falshood: So the Apostle shews how full of sin that man is, how many thousands he hath sent to perdition, whom he calleth that man of sin, the son of perdition, 2 Thes. 2. 3. They who would have sin, and the fruit of it, perdition, let them go to that man. He that would have vanity, needs must go to the heart of any man for it; there's enough, and too much of this to be had in the heart of the best, of the wisest man. Generally man hath,

1. Much

1. Much falseness of spirit.
2. Much rashness of spirit. And he hath a double rashness.

First, Rashness, in not considering his end (Deut. 32.29.) O that they were wise, that they would consider their latter end! Wisdom looks to what is coming upon us; folly stayes upon what is present with us.

Secondly, Rashness, in not considering the way or means that lead unto a good end. Many a man sees such an end, but goes a way quite contrary; he sets up his resolution for heaven, that's his end; but he walketh hell-ward. This also is vanity, and unless timely foreseen and turned from, will prove the greatest vexation of spirit.

Secondly, Observe, God is exactly acquainted with the state of man.

He needs not enquire of others, or receive information from abroad; he knows vain man. In the former verses, Zophar asserteth, That man cannot find out man by searching; here he shews, That God can find out man without searching. Man knoweth but little of God, therefore he adds, Canst thou find him out unto perfection? But God knoweth all of man, and therefore finds him out unto perfection. That's the opposition, He knoweth vain man thorow and thorow. The darkest room in man, is light to the Lord (Jer. 17.9.) The heart of man is deceitful above all things; there's a depth in mans heart, and it is a depth of deceitfulness; hence the Prophet sends a challenge to all men; Who can know it? Can you find any man able to find the bottom of man? the bottom of mans deceitful heart? The answer waves all mankind: God only takes it upon himself, I the Lord search the heart. God can find out all the deceits and tricks of mans false heart; he can easily discern a wolf under sheeps cloathing, and rotten bones in a painted Sepulcher; he can see a wooden post to be but a post of wood, though gilded over, and looking very beautiful; the Lord can do it, it is at once his work, and his priviledge, to know vain man.

Thirdly, Take the words in connection with what went before; He cutteth off, shutteth up, and gathereth together; for the Lord knoweth vain man. Hence observe,

That, God is led by his knowledge to do whatsoever he doth.

When we see so much confusion, such cutting off, such shutting up, such gatherings in the world, we are apt to think no account can be given of these things. Yes, God knoweth vain man; he doth not work at a venture: he sees that in man, which justifies him in all the works he doth among all the children of men.

Further, From the connection, we see the cause of all troubles which are in the world, of cuttings off, and shuttings up, of destructions and devastations: The Lord knoweth vain man. It is the vanity of man, which subjects the Creature unto vanity, Rom. 8. The creature groaneth. We hear Creatures groan, Kingdoms and Nations groan, when God cutteth off, and shutteth up, and hudleth them together; but what causeth this doleful groan? Is it not the sin of man? Vain man brings in all these vanities into the world. We may see the seed of all our troubles in our sins: The nature of man gives you an account of these workings of God. There is war, there is famine, and there's the plague, there are divisions, there are vexations, between man and man, friend and friend, kingdom and kingdom: All these breed in the heart of man. The Prophet (Jer. 4. 18.) speaking of judgments then abroad, saith, This is thy wickedness, because it is bitter. Troubles are alwayes bitter, often very bitter; but would you know whence this bitterness is, and how to call it? This wormwood is wickedness; you may read what you are, and what you have done, in what you feel and suffer. Mans sufferings are so much from his sin, that they are called his sin.

He seeth wickedness also.

That's a second step.

He seeth.] To know, is an act of the understanding; to see, is an act of sense. These, in God, are not distinguished; his eye is his understanding, his sight, his knowledge. Zophar puts it under distinct terms, to shew the exactness of Gods knowledge; he knoweth vain man, and he seeth. That knowledge which we have by sight, hath a threefold advantage of any other natural knowledge. It is,

First, The Easiest
Secondly, The speediest } Knowledge.
Thirdly, The surest

An eye-witness is far more authentick then an ear-witness is. God seeth; he doth not trouble himself to dig down into a matter by tedious enquiries, he needs no Committee of Examinations to make discoveries; he need not pump and fetch up the hearts of men; he seeth what waters are in the fountain; he seeth, he doth not learn. And what doth he see? He seeth

Videt non discit. Coc.

Wickedness also.] The word is sometimes taken for internal wickedness, that stock and mass of corruption, which lies close within us; and so it falls in with the former expression, the vanity of mans nature.

Intrinsecam malitiam ac mentale desiderium ad malum importat.

But besides, It notes any external evil, and so there is a difference, The Lord knoweth vain man; what his nature is, and he seeth wickedness. All the actings of vain men, all the evil counsels and crooked conveyances of their lives, whatsoever wickedness they do, is immediately before his eye. The Lord knows the vanity that dwells in the heart, and sees the wickedness that is acted by the hand.

In propriety, the word imports that which is without reason: wicked men are unreasonable, or absurd men; that's the Apostles character of them (2 Thes. 3.2.) They can give no account why they are wicked, neither of the end they propose, nor of the means they use. There is no reason in what they do; nor can they give any true reason why they do it. Sin is an absurdity both wayes: He seeth wickedness. Hence observe,

All the movings of the sons of men in the wayes of sin, are evident to God; He seeth them.

What we do, we do in the eye of Conscience; and though Conscience be now asleep or blind, in the sinners eye, yet Conscience hath an open Eagle-eye upon every sin. Now if conscience seeth wickedness, God seeth it much more; If our heart condemn us (and that it could not do, unless it see us) God is greater then our heart, and knoweth all things, 1 John 3.20. Take heed of endeavouring to hide sin from God, or of hoping you sin unseen. That was good counsel which one of the Ancients gave; It is best to shew that unto God, which we cannot hide from him. Shew your wickedness unto God, by confessing it; for you cannot hide it from God, by denying or excusing it; He seeth wickedness also. There is yet a third act inferred upon the former two.

Will he not then consider it?] Many a careless man knoweth and seeth his own wickedness, or the wickedness of others; but he layeth neither of them to heart: But do you think that God knoweth and seeth wickedness after the rate of careless men? Doth he know, and see, and not regard? No, he considers it. And Zophar is not satisfied to say, he considers it; but he puts it home strongly with a Question, Will he not consider it? Yes, he will; certainly he will consider the vanity and the wickedness of man, because he knoweth the one, and seeth the other. What is not known and seen, cannot be considered. One or both those acts are precedaneous to consideration; but some see and know what they never consider; consideration doth not alwaies follow those acts. God looks weightily upon the world, he sees judiciously, critically; he doth not look upon men to gaze at them, but to discern, try and judge them.

The Hebrew word signifies a clearness of observation, and a strength of judgment about the things which are seen; or an act of discerning, arising from greatest attention and meditation, Psal. 37.10. Thou shalt diligently consider his place, saith David; prophesying the utter ruine and abolition of a wicked man; though he flourish, yet it is but for a while; anon he is gone, and when he is gone, though thou diligently consider his place, though thou sit down and mark how this man lived, and what he was, yet scarce any footsteps of him will be found; It shall not be. The word is used to the same sence (Lev. 10.10.) where Laws are given to the Priests, about discerning the defilements of the people; That they might put a difference between holy and unholy, and between unclean and clean. So to consider, as to see a difference between person and person, state and state, is diligent consideration. Thus God considereth; he he distinguisheth man and man, the wayes of one man from the wayes of another; and the way of every man in it self: He knoweth man, as a Judge knoweth, upon trial and examination of witnesses, with all the circumstances of the fact.

Ex vi originalis hæc consideratio est attenta quædam, diligens, prudens, & quasi consiliatrix meditatio, qua unum ab alio discernitur.

Zophar, in this seems to touch Job's supposed hypocrisie; as if he had said, Possibly thou presumest to impose upon God, or put him off with fair shews; but thou wilt be deceived: he trieth the spirits of the children of men, he weighs all their actions, he will weigh thee out to a grain, he will discover the least error and variation from the Rule. Therefore never think by thy flourishes of profession and out-side devotion, to deceive him. He knoweth vain man, and seeth wickedness; will he not then consider it? Hence observe,

God doth not only know and see, but he takes deep consideration of mens wickednes.

The Prophet calls the Jews to consider their wayes (Hag. 1. 7.) as if he had said, I know you have kept many fasts, you have confest your sins, and often arraigned your selves in the ears of heaven, but all this while you have not considered them; Go now, and consider your wayes. God considers your wayes, and will not you? Gods consideration is not a bare knowledge of the fact. He considers the person who, the place where, the time when the fact was committed. He considers the means and admonitions, the warnings and cautions, the threatnings and the judgments which providence administred to prevent it. All these are brought into the reckoning, where there is (such as Gods is) a full consideration. Now consider this, ye (inconsiderate ones) that forget God, lest he tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver, Psal. 50. 22.

Secondly, To consider a thing, is to punish it; and so it answers the former Verse: The Lord cutteth off, and shutteth up; he makes strange work in the world. Why? He knoweth vain man, and he seeth wickedness also? will not he then consider it? that is, Is it possible he should know and see so much wickedness, and not punish it? As we say to those under our power, concerning the faults which we know them guilty of; well, there will come a time, when we shall consider this; that is, a time will come, when we shall punish you for this, you shall find and feel what you have done. Thus God considers the sins of men. Hence note,

The evils which God knows and sees, he will certainly punish.

Amos 3. 2. You only have I known of all the families of the earth, therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities. God knows all the families of the earth, as to know is a work of the understanding; but he knoweth only some, (and then he knew but one family of the earth, that of the Jews) as to know, is a work of the affections, fruited with works of special mercy: When the Lord saith to Israel, You have I known; he means, I have shewed you mercy, I have done you good above all the families of the earth, but now I will bring evil upon you. Abused mercy turns to wrath, and the greater the mercy abused is, the greater is the wrath. The Lord will not cocker his own children; his nearest people, who lie in his bosom, shall have stripes for their sins, and broken comforts for broken Commandments. Will the Lord thus consider the failings and backslidings of his professed friends, and will he not consider the wickednesses of his professed enemies? When Jehu was upon the execution of Gods design against the house of Ahab, and had slain Joram his son, he thus bespoke Bidkar his Captain, I remember how the Lord laid this burden upon him, Surely I have seen the blood of Naboth, and the blood of his sons, said the Lord, and I will requite thee in this plot, 2 King. 9. 29. I have seen. God saw, and he saw with an eye of vengeance; He saw blood to requite it with blood, (Psal. 10. 11.) The wicked hath said in his heart, God hath forgotten, he hideth his face, he will never see it. There's self-flattery at the highest: Hence the conclusion is ready, ver. 13. The wicked contemn God; he hath said in his heart, thou wilt not require it. This is the language of a wicked heart. But what saith the heart of David, the next words are the language of his heart, Thou hast seen it, for thou beholdest mischief and spight, to requite it with thy hand: As the hearts of men differ, so do their opinions: an evil heart will not allow God to be a beholder of evil: a good heart is afflicted that he is not only a beholder, but an avenger of evil. Let no man deceive you, (saith the Apostle, Eph. 5. 6.) with vain words. (And let no man deceive himself, say I, with vain hopes) for because of these things the wrath of God cometh upon the children of disobedience. Disobedience is the forerunner of wrath; where sin opens the door, judgment will enter, (Psal. 34. 16.) The face of the Lord is against them that do evil. The face of the Lord is either his anger or his knowledge; The face of the Lord is against them; that is, he seeth, and his wrath goeth forth against what he seeth. Seeing them, he is against them: They (perhaps) have cast their own sins, as well as the word of God, behind their backs; But God hath not cast their sins behind his back; his face is against them: and what to do? To cut off the remembrance of them from the earth. The anger of God is sharp, sharper then any two-edged sword; it doth not only cut, but cut off; it cuts off branch and root, wicked men, and their remembrance from the earth. Then God remembers sin indeed, when he doth not leave a remembrance of the sinner. There was never any sin committed in the world, but God considered it, to punish it. The sins of believers are considered, and punished upon Jesus Christ; Justice went forth against Christ, he was arrested for our debt, and discharged it with the full consideration. Believers may tell God, that Christ hath given him consideration for all their sins. And God tells unbelievers that they must pay the consideration themselves. The holy God cannot see the unholiness of man, and not consider it. Man makes no great matter of sin, but God doth. Man thinks himself good enough, though he be stark naught; and wise enough, though he be a very fool. The next verse leads us unto that meditation.

Verse 12. For vain man would be wise, though man is born like a wild asses colt.

For vain man.] The Hebrew word signifieth, hollow or empty, any thing which hath nothing in it; and so a person who hath (as we say) nothing in him. The French call such persons Fols, which comes near in sound, to our English word Fools; but their language takes it up from the Latine word Folles, signifying a pair of bellows; because the men they mean to decypher by it, are like a pair of bellows, sending out nothing but a blast of wind or air. The word of the Text is of the same intendment with Racha, of which we read, Mat. 5. 22. He that shall call his brother Racha, &c. that is, an empty man, a man empty of worth and wisdom, a man that hath no brains in him (as we say) or no goodness, such a man as this is Racha; and he is Nabub too, an empty, hollow fellow.

נבוב Significat concavum, vacuum, nullam habens solliditatem: hinc notat stolidos, vanos, qui, ad instar vasis in quo nihil est, vacui dicuntur, sc. cerebro & sapientia. Galli vocant tales fols, quasi follies, instrumentum, quod nihil continet, nisi aerem. Bold. Racha eandem habet significationem ריק evacuare.

He hath nothing in him, but that which is good for nothing. There is no natural vacuum (as Philosophers speak) in any part of Nature. Neither is there a moral vacuum in any man. But a thing or person is then said to be empty, when void of that with which it should be fill'd: that which hath not the filling, which of right or duty, which according to its own constitution, or the just expectation of others, it should have, is empty. The stomach is empty when it hath no meat in it, though it be full of wind. Man is called empty, because (though as full of evil as an egg of goodness, yet) he is not fill'd with good, he is not fill'd with God, with the knowledge of God, with love to, and faith in God. So the Apostle James bespeaks him (ch. 2. 20.) But wilt thou know, O vain man, that faith without works is dead? As if he had said, Thou empty man, thou that hast but a boast of faith, thou whose faith is fill'd up with good words, not fruited with good works, wilt thou know (thou shalt, whether thou wilt or no) that thy faith is dead? Where there is life, there is operation; works are not the form, but they are the fruit of faith: they are not the essence of a living faith, but they are the evidence that faith lives; and he is to be numbred among the vainest of men, who speaks of his faith, while his works are altogether speechless, or speaks nothing but unbelief.

When man fell from God, the Devil emptied him of that which he was full of, the Image of God in uprightness, and fill'd him with that which was but emptiness, his own Image, in unrighteousness. The nature of fallen man, in the best notion of it, is but white paper, in which nothing is written; in another notion, it is black paper, written, or blotted rather with evil. And though some notions and general principles ciples (from which conscience works to conviction) remain there, yet they are so weak and languid, so like sparks covered over with, or rather buried in embers and ashes, that they are scarce discernable; and are not only utterly unable without assistance to discern between common truth and error, good and evil, but quite dead to spiritual good. Hence, though man hath not lost all, yet he hath as bad as lost all, because he hath lost that which was best, or should make him fit to act that which is good. Things which act not are but very little better, then those which are not. Man having totally lost all holy habits, and all power to act in, or toward holiness, is not wronged, when he is called, vain empty man.

And as he is vain, because empty of what he ought to have, so he is more vain, because full of all that which he ought not to have. This empty fulness the Apostle describeth (Rom. 1. 29, 30.) filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness, full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity; with such stuff as this he is filled, of this chaffe and cockle he hath good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over, to give into your bosom. The heart of man at the best of nature, is but like a Childs pocket full of stones, and balls, and bables. How empty is that heart which is thus filled? The understanding of man, which hath not one holy sentence written in it, is yet written all over with unholy sentences; his judgment and conscience are defiled and fly-blown with false principles, with lyes and errors; and if there be any truth there, it is about such things as make him little the wiser, and never a whit the better. Vain man is empty man, unless to be full of vain things, or a fulness of evil things (which are worse then emptiness) may go for fulness.

Vir vanus cordabitur, vel cordatus efficiatur.

Would be wise.] There is an elegant Paranomasia in the Hebrew, which our Language doth not admit: but the literal sence runs thus, Vain man would have a heart. This gives us a further evidence, what this vain man is; he is a man without a heart. Ephraim was a silly Dove without an heart (Hos. 7. 11.) without judgment to know, and without courage to do the will of God: here, vain man would have a heart: He would be wise if he knew how. The heart is the seat of wisdom; therefore we render it well, Vain man would be wise. Mr. Broughton thus, Vain man would be made hearty: And the Vulgar, Vain man is raised up to pride; or as our Proverb speaks, Takes heart at grass. As the heart is the throne of knowledge, so knowledge (unless sanctified) is usually a step to pride: Bare knowledge is windy, it puffeth up (1 Cor. 8. 1.) They who are not edified by knowledge, are elated by knowledge. We have cause to be humbled, because we know so little; and if we once know much, it is alwayes a temptation to, often a cause of pride.

Cor est sedes sapientiæ, unde pro sapientia ponitur. Vir vanus in superbiâ erigitur. Vulg.

But to our reading, Vain man would be wise, he would have a heart. Naturalists observe, That, those creatures which have the thickest and grossest hearts in bulk, are the most stupid and uningenious. But to have a great heart in a moral sense, noteth greatest wisdom, noblest ingenuity, and (in Scripture language) purest holiness, Prov. 15. 32. He that heareth reproof getteth understanding, so we translate: The Hebrew is, He that heareth reproof possesseth a heart; or, getteth a heart. A man that will not be reproved, hath lost his heart as well as his ear; have but a patient ear to hear, and you may get a heart to know: understanding and knowledge, yea and grace too, come in at the ear.

Quanto stupidiora sunt brutæ, tanto crassiore pollent corde. Plin.

Cordare nihil aliud est, quam ingeniosum, sapientem magnique consilii vivâ evadere.

Vain man would be wise; and is not this a good woulding? Is it any part of mans folly, that he would be wise? What can be better wished then wisdom? Solomon's prayer was for a heart. When God gave him a blank from Heaven, and said, Ask what I shall give thee: He said, Give thy servant an understanding, or (according to the letter of the Original) an hearing heart, 1 Kings 3. 5, 9. And was Solomon called vain man, because he would be wise? Was not his election highly approved by the only wise God? How then is it, that Zophar upbraids Job with this design, and closely taxeth him as a vain man, because he would be wise?

I answer, To desire to be wise is a great point of wisdom: and whereas Zophar makes it a fault, That vain man would be wise, the faultiness must be found in one or both of these sences.

First, When man would be accounted wise, and affects the reputation of wisdom, more then the reality of wisdom; when he doth not so much care to be wise, as to be thought wise. The name is better to him then the thing. Many have a great opinion of their own wisdom, and would have others take up that opinion of them too. Wisdom is the best thing. And these think themselves well enough, if they flourish in the thoughts of others for wise men. The reputation of wisdom pleaseth them as much as the enjoyment of it. Thus, to have an itch to be esteemed wiser then we are, or wise when we are not, is the greatest piece of folly. It is a loud vanity to affect an opinion of wisdom among others, or to have an high opinion of our own wisdom. Thus vain man would be wise, and it is his vanity that he would.

Secondly, Man is vain when he would be wise beyond his line, or in things above him, not in things about him, or fit for him. The scope of the place leads us to this Exposition. Canst thou by searching find out God! Canst thou find him out to perfection? He is as high as heaven, &c. Though such knowledge of God be too high for any man, yet vain man offers at it, and thinks he knoweth nothing, if he know not something which he ought not to know. Man naturally desires forbidden wisdom; and his desire is seven times stronger after it, as it is forbidden, then as it is wisdom. Many will not hear Wisdom when she calls, who yet would be wise in that which they have no call to. An evil heart cannot desire any good, but for the sake of some evil that comes with it. The Devil tempted man to be wise in a way of sin. The first sin came in by an attempt to get forbidden wisdom: When the woman saw, that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eye, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, &c. Gen. 3. 6. But what was the wisdom which the woman expected from the fruit of this tree? It was not wisdom to know God, but to be as knowing as God: So the Tempter promised, Ye shall be as Gods knowing good and evil, ver. 5. To know God is eternal life; but a desire to know, as God, brought in eternal death. The Apostle cautions, Not to be wise above that which is written; and adviseth, Rom. 12. 3. To be wise unto sobriety. There is an intemperance of the understanding, as well as of the affections. There are two extreams about wisdom, neglect and affectation. One cares not to know what is necessary, what may make him holy, and bring him near to Christ. Another cares only to know unnecessaries: His wisdom and learning lies in canvasing foolish and unlearned Questions, which Paul bids Timothy avoid, 2 Tim. 2. 23. He pleases himself with crotchets and curiosities, with meer notions and niceties; about these, his imagination waxes wanton, and runs riot, yea, mad. Or, he must be breaking open of Gods Cabinet, entring into his Counsels, prying into his Ark; he thinks he knoweth nothing worthy a man, unless he know that which is above man. Thus also vain man would be wise, and it is his vanity that he would.

Hic vertitur pullus tamen ejusmodi esse constat, qui oneribus vehendis, & agrariæ culturæ aptus sit.

Though he be born as a wild asses colt.] That is, like a wild ass. As Son of man is not a young man, but a man; so the asses colt is not a young ass, but an ass, any ass. The word is often used for asses under burthen, and fitted for use, which colts are not, Gen. 49. 11. Binding his foal unto the vine, and his asses colt unto the choice vine, there to take up their burden, and undergo their labour. So then, when he saith, Vain man would be wise, though born like a wild asses colt, his meaning in plain English is only this, man would be very wise, wiser then man, he would be thought as wise as God, at least he would search out the wisdom of God, and yet indeed he is a beast; and Zophar instanceth in the wild ass among all beasts, because the ass among beasts, and the wild ass among asses is furthest from wisdom. Some beasts have a kind of knowledge, and are very teachable, but the wild ass is not guilty of either. A man of weakest parts and thinnest intellectuals is in scorn (though not without blame) called an ass; as a crafty man is (without blame) called a fox.

Man hath wit and subtilty for the world, and to contrive for his lusts, but being degraded from that dignity of a son of God, he walks more like a beast then a man towards God. Eccles. 3. 18. I said in mine heart concerning the estate of the sons of men, that God might manifest them, and that they might see that they themselves are beasts. That they might might see; How shall they see it? They will not see it till they are shewed it, and scarce then. I said in mine heart that God would manifest this to them, that they themselves are beasts. As whatsoever good we have, comes from God, not from nature, so it is from God that we must learn the badness of nature. Man is so much a beast, that he cannot know himself to be one, till God teach him. And we never learn to be men, till we have learned that we were beasts. Man was made like unto God, but man hath made himself like unto a beast. In three respects man is born like a wild asses colt, or like a beast.

First, In regard of his ignorance. Knowledge is proper to those who have reason, yet some who have reason have scarce any thing which can be called knowledge. And though grace repair the image of God in knowledge, yet the best of men may confess with Agur, (Prov. 30. 2.) Surely I am more brutish then any man, or (more near the Hebrew) then a man, and have not the understanding of a man. Wicked men are more brutish then beasts, and holy men are more brutish then a perfect man. The best have somewhat of the beast in them, because they have not the whole understanding of a man in them. David charges himself for one sinful act, much more then is it true of a sinful state, So foolish was I, and ignorant, I was as a beast before thee, Psal. 73. 22. His dissuasion carries the same meaning, Psal. 22. 9. Be not as the horse, or as the mule which have no understanding. And so doth his conclusion (Psal. 49. 20.) Man that is in honour and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish. Not as if he meant it of men quite rob'd of reason. This not understanding is to be restrained to the duty of their high place, and the providence of God in raising them to it. He that understands not who raised him to honour, and what his honour leads him to, is the more like or below a beast, because he is so much above other men. Of all fools a fool in honour looks most unlike a man.

Secondly, Man is like a beast, or like that beast here expressed, for wantonness, lust and vanity. The Church of the Jews in her defection to idolatry is compared to a dromedary and a wild ass, (Jer. 2. 23, 24.) Thou art a swift dromedary, traversing her wayes, a wild ass (or, O wild ass, so some translate it) used to the wilderness, that snuffeth up the wind at her pleasure; in her occasion who can turn her away? All they that seek her will not weary themselves, in her moneth they shall find her. The Prophet describeth the spiritual wantonness of that people in their idolatrous and superstitious mixtures by the natural wantonness of the ass, In her occasion who can turn her away? she is not to be medled with, when the fit's upon her. All they that seek her will not weary themselves, they desist from pursuing her, knowing they may tire themselves, but not take her with all their travel, till somewhat hath tamed her; Then, In her moneth they shall find her. Not that the wild ass (as an old Rabbin dreams) useth to sleep one whole moneth of the year, and then the hunters used to catch her napping. I shall remit this among Jewish fables. But the moneth she is to be found in, may be the moneth near her sorrows, when her burden takes off her speed, and makes her more easie to be brought to hand. Some read the text differently, yet the sense is the same. All they that seek her need not weary themselves: In her moneth they shall find her. As if he had said, A little labour will serve to catch her, she is to be had with ease, when or where her lust is to be satisfied. Like this wild ass were the people of Israel in spiritual wantonness, so set upon it, that none could turn them from it: The Prophets wearied themselves in vain to reclaim them from that lewdness; So prone to it, that none needed to weary themselves to get their good-will, they did even prevent wooing, and went up to the bed of love, or of mystical fornication, with the Nations round about, as soon as they did invite, but with a glance of the eye. And as they were like the wild ass for spiritual, so they, together with the most of mankind, have undergone as mean a comparison for their proneness to, and violent pursuit of corporal wantonness and uncleanness.

Thirdly, Man is like a wild ass, in regard of stubbornness and unteachableness. Wild asses are as untractable, as almost any creature. Naturalists tell us, They are all for liberty. The wild ass is not used to burthens, or brought to hand; he or she are not fed at rack and manger, they eat what the wilderness affords, and are not under any mans care or government. God himself hath given us this character of the wild ass in this book (Job 39. 5.) Who hath sent out the wild ass free? (What master hath the wild ass been apprentic'd to?) or who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass? (from whose hand hath he received his Indentures, or been manumitted?) Whose house I have made the wilderness, and the barren land his dwellings. He scorneth the multitude of the City, neither regardeth he the crying of the driver. The horse and ox must serve; the horse travels, and the ox tills the ground: the ox is under a yoke, and the horse hath a bit and bridle to keep him in subjection: but the wild ass regardeth not the driver, he cares neither for his whip, nor for his whistle. He is altogether a stranger to discipline, and likes not to hear of any master but himself, or to be a servant to any but his own will. Such is the nature of man, Man is born like a wild asses colt; he loves to be free, or rather to be dissolute, he cannot endure to be subdued to order; he would know no law but his own lust, nor rule, but his own desire. Every man is of himself, A son of Belial, A son without a yoke. Man is so much for sinful liberty, that he cares not for true liberty. The liberty he seeks, makes him a bond-slave to corruption; Thus man is born a wild asses colt, he is ignorant, wanton and licentious.

So much for the words as we translate.

There is yet another reading of good use, and worthy our examination. 'Tis given out thus, So shall vain man be made wise, and the asses colt shall be born a man. This rendering may bear a double interpretation.

First, It may be understood Ironically, as a scorn put upon Job, and upon all such as Zophar supposed him to be, vain men. Vain man shall be made wise, when an asses colt is made a man; that is, He shall never, or very hardly be made wise; as if he had said, It is as unheard of, and as strange a thing that such a man as thou, a man so proud and high in thine own thoughts, so vain in thy imaginations, that such an one as thou shouldst be made wise or holy, as it is for a wild ass to be made a man. There is a truth in this position, if Zophars supposition had been true. For the distance between mans nature, and grace, is greater then that between mans nature and a beasts: Bare reason is further from grace then sense is from reason. It is as easie to change a beast into a man, or to make a beast understand reason, as to change a sinner into a Saint, or to make a believer of an Infidel. Conversion is not the change of actions only, but of nature. This sentence, Vain man shall be made wise, when an ass is made a man, is of the same sense with that Proverb among us, When the skie falls we shall have larks; or with this, Such a thing shall come to pass when a black-more is washed white; or rather with that of our Saviour in the Gospel, It is easier for a camel to go thorow the eye of a needle, then for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God, Matth. 19. 24. Rich men shall go to heaven, when a camel or a cable (so some read) passeth thorow a needle; that is, it is impossible they should by any power of man; and therefore to ease the sharpness of the speech, Christ adds by way of explication, With God all things are possible. It is an hard thing, yea an impossible thing (without God) for a rich man to be saved, or for a vain man to be made wise. And it is thus hard to make a rich man happy, because he thinks himself happy enough; and to make a vain man wise, because he presumes he is wise enough. Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit, there is more hope of a fool then of him, Prov. 26. 12. or in the language of this text, there is as much hope of a beast as of him. A man had better be ignorant, then conceited of his knowledge. An opinion of knowledge keeps out true knowledge. Not only instruction, but correction is lost on such Opinionists. (Prov. 27. 22.) Though thou shouldest bray a fool in a morter among wheat with a pestel, yet will not his foolishness depart from him. He means it not of a natural fool, nor of one that is convinced of his foolishness, but of him (who is the great fool of all) that is in love with his own fancies and shadows of wisdome: take such a fool and beat him to pieces in a morter, that is, let him be afflicted, till he be almost destroyed, yet his folly departs not from him; you may as soon make a beast a man, as such a fool to understand. There is but one greater enemy to real knowledge then ignorance, and that is a conceit of knowledge.

Only he that can drive a camel thorow a needles eye, and make a beast a man; Only he that calls those things which are not, as if they were, can make vain man wise, and him to be holy, who is not.

Secondly, This rendering, So shall vain man be made wise, and the wild ass shall be born a man, sheweth us the effect of those afflictions, which God layeth upon man. He considers their sins to punish and chasten them; What of that? So shall vain man be made wise, &c. As if he had said, The end of the chastening of God upon man, is to make him wise, or (as the Prophet speaks, *Isa.*27.9.) By this shall the iniquity of man be purged, and this is all the fruit to take away his sin, his vanity, that the wild asses colt may be born a man, or reborn. This interpretation gives us the very language of the new Testament, about the grace of regeneration, or a new birth, John 3.5,6. In which this wonder is continually wrought, A wild ass is born a man. Hence observe,

That, afflictions blessed and made effectual by God, make a gracious change in man.

How many ignorant men have, with correction, received instruction? how many proud men have been made humble; and of carnal, spiritual? how many unruly spirits have been brought in compass, and stubborn ones subdued with a rod? The rod and the word work miracles, when God works with them. If God speak to a dry rod, it shall bring forth these Almond-blossoms and heavenly fruits; and unless he speak with the word, we continue dry, yea dead, earthly and unfruitful. Before I was afflicted, I went astray; saith David: David wandred like a sheep, and was as a beast; affliction made him a man, and turned him home. Ephraim crieth out, Jer. 31.18. Thou hast chastised me, and I was chastised; importing either the strength of the affliction; when God will afflict, no man can stay his hand, or take off his blow: or the effect of the affliction; Thou hast chastised me, and I was chastised; that is, I was bettered by my chastisements. The Lord chasteneth some, who are not chastised; there is no change made, they do not mend with beating. This I rather pitch upon, as the meaning of Ephraim's bemoaning affliction, Thou hast chastened me, and I was chastened: and observe how he speaks of himself under the notion of a beast; I was as a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke, I could not endure to come under discipline, I could not abide the yoke; or submit unto thy will; Turn thou me, and I shall be turned; for thou art the Lord my God; But is this the language of a beast? No, when once the Lord had chastened him, he spake like a man, whereas before he spake and did like a beast, even like a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke; but now he hath the voice of a man, yea the voice of a Saint, Turn thou me, and I shall be turned, for thou art the Lord my God. O happy chastenings, which make such changes! And chastisings have many advantages to make such changes, to turn beasts into men. For,

First, They imbitter the world to us, the world is such a beast that it makes men beasts, and when the world is taken out of our hearts, the beast departs from us, and is taken out of our hearts.

Secondly, Afflictions make sin more visible, judgements reallize the evil that is in sin; and shew us the poison of that serpent.

Thirdly, Afflictions are proper to tame our wildness, and take down the loftiness of our spirits. Nebuchadnezzar for his pride was (in a manner, in his manners he was before) turned into a beast. His outward shape was not changed, (The Poets Metamorphosis was in morals, and so was this in the Prophet) but he lived like a beast, or he lead the life of a beast. Some for sin are put to live like beasts, and all men in sin live like beasts. Nebuchadnezzar living among beasts, and like a beast, learned to be a man; For at the end of the dayes, saith he, I Nebuchadnezzar lift up mine eyes to heaven, and mine understanding returned unto me, (Dan. 4.24.) Thus Nebuchadnezzar was born a man, I do not say he was born an holy man, but a man he was born, His understanding returned unto him, and his Councellours and his Lords sought unto him, they owned him then not only as a man, but as a Monarch. Afflictions civillize most, and they spiritualize many. They are more brutish then beasts, who (as the Prophet describes them, Isa. 91.20.) continue like wild bulls full of the fury (and empty of the spirit) of the Lord, when they are entangled in these nets, or taken with these toils.

And because there is so great a tendency in affliction to humble and purifie vain man from his sin, therefore affliction is brought in as a great aggravation of the sin of man. How beastly are they that will not return from their folly, when they are smitten and broken with judgements? Hence that iterated expostulation (Amos 4.) I have smitten you, &c. yet have ye not returned unto me, saith the Lord. God himself doth even wonder that the beast should not turn man, when he had been so long under the burden, and had received so many blows. 'Tis seasonable for us of this Nation, to consider this point. We have been like wild asses colts, ignorant, vain, obstinate, and unteachable; God hath considered these things, he hath written his observation of them in bloudy characters. O that this might be the fruit, that such as have been empty, and without hearts, might learn wisdom, that such as have been wild asses, might be born men, yea good men. This would make all our losses gain to us, and our judgments mercies; such a change as this would change our water into wine, and all our sorrows into joy.

Thus I have done with the first part of Zophars speech, wherein he reproves Job, and argues the matter with him. He is now ready to alter his stile, and instead of conviction prepares advices for him.

VERS. 13,14.

If thou prepare thine heart, and stretch out thine hands towards him.
If iniquity be in thine hand, put it far away, and let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacles.

IN the former part of this Chapter, Zophar confuted the opinion of Job, and reproved him for asserting and standing so closely to it. In this he gives him counsel and direction; his counsel is contained in these two verses. Toward the receiving of which he proposeth not a few encouragements, in the words which follow. The whole may be formed up thus,

Est parænesis, qua Jobum hortatur, ut ad Deum rede-at amplissima illi boni pollicent. Merc.

Thou oughtest willingly to hear, and chearfully to obey that counsel, in the hearing and obeying whereof, thou shalt be freed from evil, and enjoy all desireable blessings and good things.

But if thou hear and obey my counsel, if thou prepare thine heart, and stretch out thine hands towards God, if thou put the iniquity of thy hand far away from thee, thou shalt be freed from all evil, and enjoy all desireable blessings and good things.

Therefore thou oughtest willingly to hear, and chearfully to obey my counsel.

The conclusion of this syllogism is delivered in the thirteenth and fourteenth verses. The assumption, (namely that, in preparing his heart, and praying unto God, he should be blessed) is laid down, in the 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19. verses; which is illustrated by the opposite and contrary condition of the wicked, at the twentieth verse, But the eyes of the wicked shall fail, and they shall not escape, and their hope shall be as the giving up of the ghost.

If thou prepare thine heart.

The words are an hortatory supposition, and (as was toucht before) we may observe that the three friends of Job, cast their discourses in the same mould, and insist in the same method. Their speeches are all of one frame and piece, as if they had spoken by consent, or had before-hand resolved upon a joynt-mannaging of their arguments & proceedings. While they all hit the same nail, they hope at last to drive it home to the head. As I have shewed Eliphaz in the fifth, and Bildad in the eighth Chapter, so now I must shew Zophar, after he had sufficiently, if not bitterly reproved Job, administring holy and wholsom advice and counsel.

If thou prepare thine heart.] As if he had said, Come (friend) leave off thy complainings, and disputings, leave off thy self-justifyings and over-weenings of thy own worth; Be perswaded at last to lay down thy weapons, and submit thy self, give over reasoning, and fall to praying. Prepare thy heart to seek God.

The

Tu autem firmasti cor tuum, &c. Vulg.

The Vulgar reads it, as a charge brought against him, and not as a counsel given to him, Thou hast stiffened thine heart against God, and thou hast stretched out thine hands toward him: As if Job had still continued contumacious and obstinate against God, after all these breakings. To firm or strengthen the heart, is to harden the heart, or to be insensible under the hand of God. But rather take it according to our translation, as a direction or counsel, If thou prepare thine heart, that is, if thou puttest thine heart into order, or if thou fix thine heart, so the word is translated (Psal. 57.7. & 108. 1.) My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed, I will sing and give praise. An unfixed, or an unsetled heart, must needs be an unprepared heart. Fixedness of heart is preparatory to preparation of heart. A fixed heart (and that only) is fitted to move towards, and to follow after God. It is very hard to aim right at that which is in motion, but it is harder for him that is in motion to aim right. The steady man hits the mark.

Paratum vel fixum est cor meum

Yet more distinctly consider,

First, What is here meant by the heart?

Secondly, What by the preparing or fixing of the heart?

Cor est primum vivens & ultimum moriens.

First, The heart is not here taken in its natural capacity, for that part of the body, which Philosophers call the first living, and the last dying in man. But by the heart (in a metaphor) we are to understand the soul, or the whole inward man: For as the heart is the principal part of the body, so the soul is the principal part of man, and the failings and wounds of the soul are to the whole man, like the failing or wounding of the heart in reference to the outward man.

Again, As the heart in Scripture signifies the whole soul or inward man, so it is put distinctly for those noble faculties of the soul; First, The understanding. Secondly, The will. Thirdly, The memory. And for a fourth, which is a result or compound of them three, The conscience. The Apostle means the understanding, while he saith of the Gentiles, (Rom. 1:21.) Their foolish heart was darkned: they had a knowledge of God in the creature, but they waxed wanton, and became vain in their imaginations; and therefore their foolish heart, that is, their understanding was darkned; God sent them a spiritual cloud, because they did not improve natural light. They who abuse light are most usually and most justly left in darkness. But to the point, the same Apostle attributes blindness of heart, that is, of understanding, to the same Gentiles, Ephes. 4. 18.

Secondly, The heart expresseth the will, in that answer of Christ to the Lawyers Question, Which is the great commandment in the Law? Matth. 22. 36. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God (saith Christ, v. 37.) with all thy heart, with all thy soul, with all thy mind; that is, with thy will, with thy affections, with thy understanding, and with all of each of these. And as the heart of man is his will, so also is the heart of God. I have sought me a man (saith God, 1 Sam. 13.14.) after my own heart. He is such a man as I would have, he is so much after my will, That he will perform all my wills.

Thirdly, The heart of man is his memory (Psal. 119. 11.) Thy word have I hid in my heart: Memory is the repository or store-house of the Word, the treasury of holy Truths, Mary hid the words of Christ there, Luke 2. 19.

Fourthly, The conscience, which hath in it the light of the understanding, the motions of the will, and the recognitions of the memory, comes under the notion of the heart (Psal. 51. 12.) Create in me a clean heart, O God; that is, purifie my conscience, set that right; David's conscience was extreamly out of frame, his sin had reduced it back into a kind of chaos, this made him pray for a new creation: Ordinary repairs, or a little mending would not serve his turn. But if this Scripture convince not the heart, for the conscience, yet that of the Apostle John doth beyond all exception. If our heart condemn us, God is greater then our heart (1 John 3.20.) and so doth that of Job (Chap. 27. 6.) My heart (that is, my conscience) shall not reproach me so long as I live. It is conscience which chideth and reproacheth the sinner, and tells him his own. It is conscience that speaks fair, and gives good words to those who walk uprightly: My heart (saith upright Job) shall not reproach me; that is, I have walked in my integrity, therefore I am not afraid what conscience can do, or say against me.

When Job is advised to prepare his heart, we must enlarge it to the whole inward man, not fix it upon any one of these faculties in opposition to, or exemption from the other. If thou prepare thine heart.

Dicit cor tuum, non labia tua, quod hypocritarum est; hortatur Jobum, ut ad Deum redeat non fictè & simulatè. Drus. Verbum כון semper accipitur in bonum.

This preparation consisteth in two things.

First, In removing and sweeping out the filth which is in the heart, Matth. 15. 19. Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies. Now, as it is the continual work of an evil heart to send out these; so it is the first work of preparing a good heart, to purge and cast out these. They come out of the heart easily, but, O how hard is it, to thrust them out! yet this must be done, or else nothing is done towards the preparation of the heart. If you were to prepare an house for the entertainment of a great Prince, what would you do? Would not your first care be to carry out the dirt, and wash the floor; down with the cobwebs there (cries one) away with every unclean thing (saith another) Thus we begin to prepare our houses for such noble entertainments. Again, when you are to prepare a plot of ground to receive seed, what do you? Do you not first pick out the stones, pull up and bury the weeds, and then sow? Thus the Lord dealt with his vineyard (Isa. 5.2.) He fenced it, and gathered out the stones thereof, and then planted it with the choicest vines. He gathered out the stones before he planted it, he would not set vines among stones. The first work in all preparations is to get out the rubbish, and remove impediments.

Secondly, The heart wherein Christ is to be lodged, must not be a mere vacuum, only swept and empty; holiness doth not consist in negatives, in removing and throwing out of evil, though that be a great part of it: Therefore the next part of preparation is the adorning and beautifying of the heart, the quickning and heightning of it to those duties and services which God calls for. If you entertain a Prince, or but a special friend, as you sweep your house, and wash away the dirt, so you put up your Arras hangings, lay on your Persian carpets, set up your Ivory beds, uncover your rich stools, bring out your Plate and ornaments, till then the house is not prepared. Thus to the point in hand, the preparation of the heart consists in the actings of grace, in opening of all your spiritual stores, in putting on the richest furnitures of the inward man, in being cloathed with the Spirit, in shewing forth the vertues of the Lord Jesus Christ. If you be not thus beautified, as well as emptied, you are unprepared.

It is said (Matth. 12.44.) That the evil spirit returning to his house, whence he came out, when he is come, findeth it empty, swept and garnished. No marvel if it were empty, for who would dwell in a house, which hath had the Devil for its Tenant? But how came it swept, and with what broom? How came it to be garnished, and with what furniture? Must a house be made clean to entertain an unclean spirit? Must it be swept to receive him, who hath fill'd the whole world with filth and rubbish?

This emptying, sweeping, and garnishing, is fit for such a guest. A heart emptied and swept of goodness, a heart adorned and garnished with noisom lusts (such are the ornaments and garnish there meant) is a heart prepared for the Devil. In this manner, but with the most contrary materials must the heart be prepared for God. It must be emptied and swept of sin, it must be garnished with grace, before the King of glory enters in.

In these two acts, preparation of the heart consists, and without both it is imperfect; if the room be not cleansed, he who is of purer eyes then to behold any unclean thing, will not lodge in it. God and sin cannot dwell together, What communion is there between light and darkness, between Christ and Belial? Neither is it enough (if it were possible) to cast out sin, and to put off the old man, unless you put on the new. Some attempt to put the new man upon the old. They are willing (in this sense) to be cloathed upon, but cannot endure to be uncloathed. Holiness upon unholiness is the disguise, not the habit of a holy man. Others would be uncloathed, so they might be spared this pains to be cloathed upon. It is easier with them not to do evil, then to do good. Evil laid aside, and good not admitted or acted, acted, makes but half (if ſo much of) a good man. A due preparation of the heart conſiſts in putting off every evil, and in not doing any; in putting on all, and in doing every good.

This is the work which Job is adviſed unto. The ſum of all ſafe and wholſom counſel is contracted into this one ſentence, Prepare thy heart.

Hence obſerve, Firſt, God muſt have the heart.

He made the heart, therefore he deſerves it. He gives us his heart, therefore he deſerves ours. Whatſoever we give him without a heart, we give him nothing. There is only ſo much of value in what we do, as there is of heart in it. It is the voice of our hearts, not the muſick of our tongues that God regards, My ſon, give me thine heart. God muſt have your beſt piece, for he is the beſt of all.

Secondly, Any heart will not ſerve Gods turn, it muſt be a prepared heart.

He accepts not the beſt ſervice without a heart: How then ſhould he accept an evil heart, which can do him no ſervice, or none but ill? As a good heart is the beſt part of man, ſo an evil heart is the worſt; and there is no heart, but is one of theſe; that which is not good, is evil, and that which is not prepared, is not good. Therefore the heart, which is a gift fit for God, muſt be a prepared heart.

Thirdly, Our preparations for God muſt begin at the heart.

When Zophar would direct Job, he ſaith, If thou prepare thine heart; never think to cleanſe your hands before you cleanſe your hearts: who can ſweeten the ſtream, while the fountain is bitter, or make the fruit good, while the tree is evil? (Act. 15. 9.) He put no difference between us and them, purifying their hearts by faith: Where the holy Ghoſt begins, we muſt: They who agree not in purity of heart, ſhall differ for ever. They who agree in purity of heart, though they diſagree in opinion, ſhould put no difference (I am ſure not ſuch wide ones as now are) between themſelves. The truth is, where hearts are really purified by faith, their differences in opinion cannot be very wide: for they who are ſo wide that they cannot be ſaved, were never purified: When once the heart is purified, head and hand cannot continue very long, or very much unpurified. For though purifying begins alwayes at the heart, yet it never ſtayes there. Many a man hath purified his head from falſe principles (he is very Orthodox) and his hands from falſe practices (he is very honeſt) whoſe heart was never purified. But there is no man, nor ever was, whoſe heart is purified; but his head and hands, were, are, or ſhall be purified, even in this preſent life. A man whoſe heart is prepared cannot perſevere to the end in doing or holding evil; but the reaſon of all the evil both done and held in the world, is, becauſe the heart is not prepared. So it is ſaid of Rehoboam (2 Chron. 12. 14.) He did evil in the ſight of the Lord, Why? Becauſe he prepared not his heart to ſeek the Lord. Poſſibly he made ſome outward preparations, but he prepared not his heart. And when Simon Magus, who made ſuch haſte to be waſhed in the water of baptiſm (Act. 8.) did ſoon after appear ſo foul; where lay the fault? He had made ſuch an outward profeſſion, that the Apoſtle could not refuſe him, his tongue was as good, and 'tis like he ſhewed as fair a hand as the reſt did; why then did Simon Magus fail? The Apoſtle tells him (and us) the reaſon (verſ. 21.) Thine heart is not right in the ſight of God; he had waſhed his out-ſide, but his inwards were unclean. The heart is the worſt part of man, till it be mended, and then 'tis the beſt. Where moſt evil lieth, there we muſt begin to be good; all is good, when that is good which is the ſeat, the neſt of all evil. When Chriſt was coming into the world, to accompliſh that great work of redemption, he ſaith (Heb. 10. 5.) Lo I come (in the volume of thy book it is written of me) to do thy will, O God, a body haſt thou prepared me, &c. Chriſt needed not to have a heart prepared him, his heart was prepared from all eternity; there was never any, the leaſt unpreparedneſs in his heart, for he was holy in his temporal conception, and he was the holy Son of God, by an eternal generation; and therefore he doth not ſay, An heart haſt thou prepared me, no, he might ſay (in the higheſt ſence with the Pſalmiſt) My heart is ready, O God, my heart is ready. What needed he then to fit him for a ſacrifice? Only a body capable of ſufferings. He had a heart fit both to do and ſuffer, but he wanted a body: He was in the form of God, therefore a body, a ſute of fleſh and blood, ſuch as the Divine Nature never wore before, muſt be provided for him, and provided it was: God himſelf was at the whole coſt to make it (man contributed nothing) A body haſt thou prepared me, O God. But when man is called to do the will of God, he hath a body prepared, but he wants an heart. He hath but need to pray, Lord prepare an heart for me; if the heart be prepared, the body is. All the diſtempers and unſerviceableneſs of our bodies ariſe from the unpreparedneſs of our hearts. The heart carries the whole man with it; if once that be ready, all is ready.

Fourthly, Obſerve, God will not do us good, until we are fit to receive good.

Grace is free, yet grace prepares us for grace. As the mere favour of God beſtows the firſt grace upon us, ſo the exerciſe of grace fits us for further favour. If thou prepare thine heart, then, &c. In all the publick reformations recorded in Scripture, God calls his people to ſet their hearts right (1 Sam. 7. 3.) Put away the ſtrange gods, and Aſhtaroth from among you, and prepare your hearts unto the Lord. The want of this is complained of, as the cauſe of all their wants: Hence the Prophet prayeth (Pſal. 78. 8.) that they might not be as their Fathers, A ſtubborn and rebellious generation, a generation that ſet not their hearts aright. While our hearts are not right with God, no marvel if things go wrong with us. All the unevenneſs of our lives, whether in what we do, or in what we enjoy, ariſeth from the unevenneſs of our hearts. How can they expect to receive good, who are totally unfit to do good? The lips of the wiſe diſperſe knowledge, but the heart of the fooliſh (doth) not ſo: (or nearer the original) is not right, (Prov. 15. 7.) This latter Tranſlation expounds the former; for the reaſon why he cannot do ſo, is, becauſe his heart is not right. The lips of the wiſe diſperſe knowledge, they ſcatter or ſow the good ſeed of knowledge: but the heart of a fool is not right, therefore he cannot do ſo; and becauſe his heart is ſo unprepared to do good, he receives no good. This was the ſtop, or gave check to that good work of reformation (2 Chron. 20. 23.) much was done, Howbeit the high-places were not taken away; why what hindered? The people had not as yet prepared their hearts unto the God of their father; they were not ready for God. And that may be the very reaſon, why at this time we go on ſo ſlowly in duty, and why our mercies come on ſo ſlowly; we are not prepared for the God of our fathers; our pride, our envyings, our worldlineſs, and creature intereſts, are ſo great, and ſtick ſo cloſe to us, that we are unfit for the work God calls for at our hands, and for the mercy which we are waiting for at the hand of God.

Fifthly, How is it that Zophar ſaith, If thou prepare thine heart? he puts the work upon Job. Who is able to prepare his own heart? We may as well create a world, as convert our ſelves. We may as ſoon be our own Saviours, as our own preparers.

It is indeed Gods work to prepare the heart; yet Zophar gives good counſel to Job, when he ſaith, If thou prepare thine heart. The Pelagians of old, with their ſucceſſors in that perſwaſion, Papiſts and Arminians, miſ-interpret texts of like importance with this, to prove that the converſion of man to God begins at man; or that the grace of God is ſubſequent, or but a ſecundary to the ſelf-preparations of man. Whereas ſuch Scriptures ſhew us our duty, not our ability, what muſt be done, not what we can do. A natural man hath no ſtrength; a godly man cannot improve his ſtrength without aſſiſtance. Without me (ſaith Chriſt) ye (my Diſciples) can do nothing, Joh. 15. 5. Our preparations of heart do not at all begin at us, nor are they compleated by us.

Hence Obſerve, We may be called to do what is not in our power to do.

The Apoſtle exhorts, Work out your own ſalvation with fear and trembling (Phil. 2. 12.) He ſeems to give a ſtrange reaſon in the next verſe, For it is God that worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleaſure (v. 13.) Our inability to work doth not exempt us from working, we having a promiſe from God to make us able: we are commanded to do what we have not ſo much as a will to do, becauſe cause God is engaged to work in us both to will and to do; and that, not according to any predispositions of ours, but of his own good pleasure. Our Master in Heaven shews us our duty, and then helps us to perform it: He calls us to prepare our hearts, and then prepares them for us. For they who have received grace, have not a full power to obey this call, and they who are in nature have none at all; yet it is not in vain to say to a man of the one estate, nor of the other, Prepare thine heart; though the latter be dead in sins and trespasses, yet it is neither improper, nor unprofitable to bid him turn from sin, because while we speak to the ear, God saith he will speak to the heart, and accompany the Word with his own power, yea, make the word of man the power of God unto mans salvation. And though the former cannot fully obey this call, nor prepare his heart without new actual concurrences, and fresh receits of grace, yet by such invitations God awakens and stirs up those old habits of grace, which lay slumbering, or unacted, and causeth such to stir up themselves, who were asleep, or very unactive. The Prophet complained (Isa. 64. 7.) That no man stirred up himself to take hold of God. As man must stir up himself, yet he stirs not, till God stir him; so man must prepare his heart, yet he cannot prepare it, till God prepareth him; Psal. 10. 17. Lord, thou wilt prepare their heart, thou wilt cause thine ear to hear. It is not only the priviledge, but the purpose of God to prepare our hearts; yet if we desire he should, we must set our selves to prepare our own hearts. David in that gratulory prayer for the free oblations and contributions of the people toward the building of the Temple, thus bespeaketh God, Keep this for ever in the imagination of the thoughts of the heart of thy people, and prepare their heart unto thee (1 Chron. 29. 16.) He blesseth God for the present preparation, he begs of God to continue their prepared hearts in a gracious frame; and yet as if nothing had been done, he prayeth for further preparation (Prov. 16. 1.) The preparations of the heart in man, and the answer of the tongue, is from the Lord. You see all is from the Lord, the root and the fruit, heart-work and tongue-work, our thoughts which are the moulds of action, and our words which are the image of our thoughts; God works at the bottom of the heart, and at the tip of the tongue, yet man must not sit still; that God works, must not make us idle: when we hear that God doth all, we must not take up resolutions to do nothing, no, the Lord in speaking thus, at once directs us what to do, and assists us to do it. Grace is as much magnified in working in us, as in saving us without works; that's the reason why we are so often called to duty, though we have no power. If thou prepare thine heart,

And stretch out thine hand toward him.

Or Spread thy palms to him, so the letter of the original.

ופרשת אליו כפיך

The word which we translate, Stretch out, signifies sometimes an affected ostentation, or the spreading of a thing to have it seen. Hence one of the Ancients expounds this place as a reproof upon Job, giving the meaning of it thus, Thou hast stretched forth thine hands towards him, that is, Thou hast vaunted of thy works of piety, justice and charity; thou hast spread thy palms, yea thy plumes before God, and shewed him what work thou hast done him. Some tell us that the word Pharisee, is derived from (Parash) to lay open, to unfold and stretch out: and there is a double reason given of it; First, Because the Pharisees wore the Law openly, with broad enlarged phylacteries: Or secondly, Because they loved to do all their duties openly, they would pray in the open Streets, they gave alms with sound of trumpet, and Christ tells them to their teeth, That all they did was to be seen of men; they kept their evil hearts close, and durst not let them be seen; but their good works they cared not who saw them, or rather their care was that all should see them; thus they spread out their hands. Christ adviseth in the matter of alms, to keep the hand close, Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doth (Matth. 6. 31.) The right hand is the working and giving hand; our good works, especially our gifts, should be done in such secrecy, that the left hand which is so near a neighbour, must not know what is done by the right. But the Pharisees made not only their left hand, that is their next neighbours, but Town and Country know what their right hands had done. He that desires all should be known, which his right hand doth, doth nothing at all with a right heart. It is dangerous to hide the talents which God lends us; but it is as much our duty to hide the talents (such are gifts to the poor) which we lend to God, as it is to lend them. These talents are best traded, when wrapt in a napkin, or buried in the earth.

Expandere manus est opera pietatis ostentare & vaniloquentia dilatare. Greg.

Some conceive Zophar in these words taxing Job with vain ostentation of his good deeds; Thou hast stretched out thine hands, that is, Thou hast told God stories of thy charity, of thine alms, &c.

Manuum expansio pertinet ad habitum furentis. Phil.

Others interpret it thus, Thou hast stretched, &c. that is, thou hast carried thy self insultingly, furiously, madly toward God. Stretching forth of the hands, is a posture of fury: an uncomposed mind is often visible in the uncomposedness of an outward member.

But thirdly, waving those two, stretching forth of the hands, as it is here given in counsel, hath a three-fold use in Scripture.

First, It is a gesture of sorrow, mourners stretch out their hands (Jer. 4. 31.) I heard a voice as of a woman in travel, and the anguish, as of her that bringeth forth her first child. The voice of the daughter of Zion that bewaileth her self, that spreadeth her hands, saying, Woe is me now, for my soul is wearied, because of the murderers.

Secondly, It is a gesture of bounty or pity. Stretching out the hands, implieth a readiness and willingness to receive to favour, or to shew favour (Isa. 65. 2.) I (saith the Lord) have spread out my hands all the day unto a rebellious people; that is, I have expressed my willingness to entertain them, to pardon them, and to do them good. Open hands are the emblem of an open heart, and arms stretched out, of a readiness to imbrace. When we stretch out our hands to God, it speaks our willingness to receive his commands; and when God stretcheth out his hands to us, it speaks his readiness to pardon our sins, and supply our wants.

Est habitus opem implorantis & orationis signum. Merc.

Thirdly, Stretching out the hands is a prayer gesture. As he that helps stretcheth forth his hand, so doth he that would be holpen. When Moses went out from the presence of Pharaoh, he saith, As soon as I am gone out of the City, I will spread abroad my hands unto the Lord, and the thunder shall cease, &c. Exod. 9. 29. That is, I will pray unto the Lord, that the thunder may cease, and I am assured it shall. So (1 King. 8. 22.) at the dedication of the Temple, Solomon stood before the Altar, and spread forth his hands towards heaven. Let us lift up our heart with (our) hands unto God in the heavens (Lam. 3. 41.) or according to the letter of the Hebrew; Let us lift up our hearts to our hands, to God in the heavens; that is, let our hearts be lifted up as well as our hands. Some lift up their hands while their hearts hang down in prayer. The Apostles charge (1 Tim. 2. 8.) clears it further, I will that men pray every where lifting up holy hands without wrath and doubting. Heathens have observed and described this posture of suppliants to their Idol-gods, bowing their knees, holding up their hands and praying.

Nixæ genibus supinas manus ad Deos tendentes, ovantesque, &c. Livi. 39 Ac supplex geminas tendens ad sidera palmas Syl. Ital.

So that putting both together. Prepare thine heart, and stretch out thine hands towards him, are plainly this, Prepare thine heart and pray, or prepare thine heart to pray. The sign is put for the thing signified, or the gesture used in that duty for the duty it self in which it is used. There are four significations which stretching forth the hands may have in prayer. I will touch upon that (only to shew the vanity of it) which the superstitious Papists do much insist upon; we pray (say they) stretching forth the hands or arms, to express the cross of Christ; because when a man stretcheth out his arms, his body makes the figure of a cross. This they make one reason, why stretching out the hands, is appointed or accustomed in prayer. But how they who lived where such a kind of death as crucifying was never heard of, as Zophar and Job did; and so many hundred years before Christ died upon the cross; how they (I say) could in prayer form their bodies intentionally, to that which was never formed in their minds, the cross of Christ, is beyond all conjecture, and is no point at all of faith. To pass that, there are (I say) four significancies in it.

First, stretching out the hands towards God in prayer, implieth a resignation of our selves to the will and work of God. It is as much as to say, These hands of mine, which I have heretofore imployed about the work of the Devil, and the service of sin, now, Lord, I dedicate them and their work wholly to thy self. They who give their hearts to God, will not ſtick at giving their hands. Holy prayer offers up the whole man to God, and deſires him to take the ſpoils of all. A godly man hath not a finger at his own diſpoſe. The hand being the great organ or inſtrument of action, the ſtretching out of our hands to God, may well imply our readineſs to act wholly at his direction. The ſureſt way to write our ſelves ſervants to God, is to give him our hands.

Secondly, Stretching forth of the hands, ſignifieth a holy ſtriving with God in prayer, or the earneſtneſs and ſtrong intention of our ſpirits in prayer. A man that ſtriveth with another, ſtretcheth out his hands, and takes hold of him. So did Jacob when he wreſtled with the Angel, he held him faſt, and would not let him go, till he had prevailed for a bleſſing.

Oratio eſt elevatio mentis ad deum.

Thirdly, Stretching out of the hand imports the lifting up of the mind to God in prayer. Prayer is the aſſent of the ſoul to God. We pray no more then we have communion with God in prayer. Unto thee, O Lord (ſaith David, Pſal. 25. 1.) do I lift up my ſoul. We ſhould not leave any thing of our ſouls, no nor of our ſelves here on earth, when we pray to our Father which is in Heaven. We ſhould then lock our hearts againſt worldly thoughts, and ſet them open to God only. Satan is very buſie to buſie the heart with temptations, while the tongue is uttering petitions. Let hands lifted up be witneſſes that the ſoul is, that it is in the mount, out of the noiſe and clutter of this world. How can we believe that God heareth us, when we do not hear our ſelves? or that he ſhould be mindful to grant what we ask, when we do not mind what we are asking?

Quæ autem ſignitia eſt alienari & capi ineptis cogitationibus cum deũ deprecaris, quaſi ſit aliud quod magis debes cogitare quam quod cum Deo loquaris? quomodo te à Deo audiri poſtulas, cum teipſe non audias? vis eſſe deum memorem tui cum rogas; cum tu ipſe memor tui non ſis? Cyprian. Ser. de Orat. Dominica.

Fourthly, Stretching out of the hands ſaith, that all our hope and expectation is in God. We ſtretch out our hands to him to tell him that we depend wholly upon him for help, mercy, favour and pardon; that unleſs he deliver us, we are loſt and undone for ever. When a child is in danger of falling, he ſtretcheth out his hands to his mother, or to any next him, crying for their help. If a man be fallen into the mire, or water, he ſtretcheth out his hands preſently; though himſelf cannot ſpeak, yet his hands lifted up ſpeak for hands to lift him up. The priſoner in war caſts down his weapons, and lifts up his hands to the victor for pitty and quarter. Thus hands lifted up or ſtretched out in prayer, beg mercy, and ſhew our dependance upon God for ſuccour. The lifting up of our eyes to God, is of the ſame ſignification: Unto thee lift I up mine eyes, O thou that dwelleſt in the Heavens; as the eyes of ſervants look unto the hand of their maſters, and as the eyes of a maiden to the hand of her miſtreſs, ſo our eyes wait upon the Lord our God till he have mercy upon us; Pſal. 123. 1, 2. In this poſture Chriſt prayed to his Father, Joh. 17. 1. Theſe words ſpake Jeſus, and lift up his eyes to Heaven, and ſaid, Father, the hour is come, glorifie thy Son. He lifted up his eyes as a ſign of confidence in, and holy boldneſs with his Father. This ſign is alſo given, with a hand ſtretched out in prayer, as Zophar gives in counſel; If thou ſtretch forth thine hands towards him.

First, Obſerve, That as the heart muſt be prepared for all good duties, ſo eſpecially for prayer. If thou prepare thine heart, and ſtretch out thine hands towards him.

Prayer is a duty of greateſt weight, a moſt ſpiritual duty, it is our acceſs to God in Chriſt, it is our entring into the holieſt by the blood of Jeſus, Heb. 10. 19. And if ever we had need to look to the holineſs of our hearts, it is when we draw near unto the holy God, who is looking into our hearts. In prayer we deſire God to look into our hearts, and ſhall not we look into them our ſelves?

Secondly, Obſerve, Prayer is a ſpecial duty of repentance: And the confeſſion of our unpreparedneſs, is a ſpecial part of prayer.

Zophar thought Job had need enough to repent, and he that repents hath need enough to pray: repentance is our returning to God: prayer is our drawing near to God. I will ariſe (ſaith the prodigal Son) and go to my Father, and I will ſay unto him, Father, I have ſinned againſt Heaven and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy Son.

Thirdly, If thou prepare thine heart, and ſtretch out thine hands towards him;

Hence Obſerve, In prayer the whole man muſt be exerciſed.

Heart and hand muſt joyn in this duty. Not only the ſoul but the body muſt pray; hands muſt pray, knees muſt pray, and eyes muſt pray; Geſtures are ſpeaking in prayer, by theſe we pray when we hold our peace, and lift up a loud voice when we ſay never a word; kneeling or proſtrating the body ſpeaks humility; beating the breaſt, ſmiting upon the thigh, are ſignificative of ſorrow; lifting up the eyes and hands to Heaven, argue a fervent and attentive ſpirit. But as it is compleateſt duty to pray with hand and heart; ſo it is emptieſt hypocriſie, to pray with the hand and not with the heart. Theſe geſtures (take that caution) may ſoon degenerate; the body may be very active when the ſoul ſits ſtill or is eſcaped from the work. Some uſe much action, who uſe no affection in prayer; ſoul-prayer, though alone, is good, but wo to body-prayer when it is alone; how can it get warmth or heat when it is alone? Soul prayer is abſolutely neceſſary, body prayer is comely. Internal prayer pleaſeth God moſt, external prayer honours God moſt. What God hath joyned together, let not us (while we may keep them together) part aſunder.

Hi geſtus facile degenerant. Optimæ preces quæ minimum ſtrepunt & in abſcondito cordis ad eum effunduntur qui videt in occulto & rependit in aperto, qui non tam vocis quàm cordis auditor eſt.

And as the whole man ſhould be imployed in prayer, ſo eſpecially in that ſignal concluſion of it, Amen. Some of the ancient Hebrews teach us to gather up all our ſpirits into the Amen of prayer, becauſe prayer is (as it were) gathered all together, or ſumm'd up into Amen. The ſpirits of the whole prayer are contracted into it, and ſo ſhould the ſpirit of him that prayeth. Amen is a ſhort word, but it is in ſence as long as the longeſt prayer. Moſt ſay Amen, becauſe they uſe to ſay ſo, not becauſe they know what they ſay. Amen is often at the tongues end, but 'tis ſeldom at the hearts end. Formality and flatneſs of the ſpirit, pal's and unſpirits it in the ſpeaking. There are three things which the Rabbins have obſerved upon the ſaying of Amen.

First, Your Amen (ſay they) muſt not be haſty. Secondly, It muſt not be maimed or defective. Thirdly, It muſt not be alone.

Ne ſit reſponſio Amen raptamanca orba, in Notis ad Pirke Avorh.

First, It muſt not be haſty, without a ſetled conſideration of what we have prayed for. We muſt ſay Amen with our underſtandings. That's the Apoſtles argument for prayer in a known language: Elſe when thou ſhalt bleſs with the Spirit, how ſhall he that occupieth the room of the unlearned ſay Amen, at thy giving of thanks, ſeeing he underſtandeth not what thou ſayeſt? 1 Cor. 14. 16.

Secondly, Amen muſt not be maimed, that is, without the proſecution and inſtance of our ſpirits, we muſt ſtretch out our hearts after it, and be ſwallowed up in God.

Thirdly, Amen muſt not be alone, or an orphan, that is, without faith, love, and holy confidence: for when we ſay Amen, we ſay Let it be done; and ſhall we ſay to God, Do all, and have no faith that any thing ſhall be done? Let not Amen ſtand alone as a poor orphan, which hath neither Father nor Mother, faith nor love, to ſupport and carry it on to the object of prayer, to the God hearing prayer.

Some Interpreters give it, as Zophars ſpecial aim, to remember Job that his prayers had been faithleſs and flat; that the ſpirits of his petition were exhal'd and gone. For whereas Eliphaz and Bildad had exhorted him to humility and patience, Job anſwers, he had prayed for both, as alſo that God would either end his pains or him; remove his ſorrows, or ſhew him the reaſon why they were continued. Zophar ſteps in upon this advantage: Thou haſt been praying indeed (ſaith he) but thy heart hath not been right, nor thy ſpirit fervent; thou haſt not prayed with a prepared heart, nor with a ſtretcht-out hand unto God; thou haſt prayed rather out of the bitterneſs, then out of the holineſs of thy ſpirit: Thy ſutes are the fruit of preſumption, not of faith; of unwarrantable boldneſs with God, not of an holy confidence in him; now I would have thee pray indeed. Prepare thine heart and ſtretch out thine hands, pray with all thy might, and then hearken what the Lord God will ſay.

This check (as ſome conceive) cauſed Job in his anſwer to Zophar, to complain, I am as one mocked of his neighbour, who calleth upon God, and he anſwereth him: (Chap. 12.)

as if he had said, Zophar, you have mocked and upbraided me with my prayers, you thought I did not prepare mine heart nor stretch out my hands to God in prayer; you speak to me as if you had felt me in a cold sweat at duty, or had seen the image of pale death sitting upon all my addresses unto God. But I am sure I feel you too hot at reproofs, and see the image of an unfriendly jealousie sitting upon this your address to me. You do but mock me while you say unto me, prepare thine heart and stretch out thine hand to God. Yet (in my thoughts) this counsel of Zophar is so holy and grave, that I see not how a gracious heart (such Job's was) could interpret it as a mock, especially considered in its connexion with the next verse.

Verse 14. If iniquity be in thine hand, put it far away, and let not wickedness dwell in thy Tabernacle.

He had exhorted him before, to prepare his heart and stretch out his hand; now he bids him prepare his hand before he stretch it out.

If iniquity be in thine hand.] The word Iniquity bears any sin; yet the Chaldee specificates it into a lye; if a lye be in thine hand. Others (which amounts to a lye) if deceit, wrong dealing, oppression or any violence be in thine hand, put it far away from thee: any thing that deceives is a lye. Isa. 44. 20. He feedeth of ashes (that is, sorrow is his food) a deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lye in my right hand? As if he had said, His Idol promised him better fare then ashes, yet he is so much deceived, that he cannot see he is, or say there is a lye in his right hand. Oppression is properly and usually called the sin of the hand. There are many sins of the body, which are not sins of the hand; all those are, wherein the hand acts most, as in violence and wrong; in these sins there is so heavy a hand, that they deserve to be called sins of the hand. And though the word may take in any kind of sin, yet Zophar charges Job chiefly with that, as his other friends had done, more then once, before. That proclamation to repent, which the King of Nineveh caused to be published through the City, ran in this tenor, Let every one turn from the violence that is in their hands; and if you would know what that was, read the second of Nahum, there we are shewed that Nineveh was a spoiling City, and the men thereof as Lions, tearing in pieces enough for their whelps, and strangling for their Lionesses, they filled their holes with prey, and their dens with ravin; they cared not whom they ruined, so they might raise up their own estates. This is iniquity of the hand.

Si mendacium sit in manu tua. Targ. Intelligit rapinam aliorum bonorum facultatis male partas. Si qua defraudatio manu tua. Bez.

And secondly, We may understand it not only of outward and violent, but of any close and secret wrong; carry it as covertly as you can, even like Juglers, who do that before your face which you cannot see; yet wrong dealing and wrong doing is iniquity, and the iniquity of the hand. Evil done by sleight of hand, or cunningly, is as bad as that which is done by strength of hand or violently.

Thirdly, If there be iniquity in thine hand, is as if he had said, if thou hast gotten any thing wrongfully, which still remains in thy power, put it away, &c. To be in the hand, is to be in our dispose; and we say commonly, such a thing is out of my hand, when we have parted with it, or disposed of it. So, if iniquity be in thine hand, is, if thou hast deceived any man, and the matter be still with thee, restore it, send it home to the right owner, away with it, put it far from thee.

Before I come to the other branch, take one Observation from this as it hath reference to the former counsel, Prepare thine heart, and stretch out thine hands towards God: if iniquity be in thine hand, put it far away from thee.

The hand must be cleansed as well as the heart.

For as God cannot bear it, that we should come with clean hands, a fair outward conversation, when our hearts are filthy; (such Christ discovered the Pharisees, who were like platters washed on the out side, but unclean within; or like sepulchers fairly painted, but full of dead mens bones and rottenness,) so neither can he bear it, that they whose hands (even to the eye of the world) are filthy and unclean, should yet pretend, they have as good hearts as others, they mean well; as the one is gross hypocrisie, so the other is gross profaneness. Never brag of your good meanings, or that you have good hearts, when your hands are foul. I grant many have clean hands, while they have polluted hearts; but where I see polluted hands, I have great reason to think there is a polluted heart too: many appear better, but scarce any worse then they are. The heart may keep in its filthiness while the hands are washed; but if the heart be washed, the hand will not keep its filthiness. It is very possible for a man that hath a clean heart to foul his fingers, but he will not wear them foul: He reneweth faith and repentance, he washeth off the filth in that fountain which is always open for sin and uncleanness. They whose constant way is evil, and yet say they have good hearts, deceive themselves, but cannot deceive others. Their impiety is too plain to deceive the plainest soul in grace, that hears them say so. The preparation of the heart will be seen at the fingers ends: purity of spirit cannot consist with impurity of life: if thou hast iniquity in thine hand, put it far away from thee.

Put it far away from thee.] The Original is one word, רחקהו but it is a strong one; thrust it away, remove it to the utmost distance. Elonga eam

Hence learn, First, That, sin must be put away.

There is no inmate or neighbour so bad as sin, if it dwell nigh you it will undo you: it were better a Lyon and a Bear dwelt with you, or that you dwelt among Scorpions, then that you and sin should dwell together. Sin is a bad commodity, you will never gain by it, you will certainly break if it lye upon your hand; put it off at any rate, or rather whatever it cost you, put it off. If iniquity be in thine hand, put it away. And not only so, But Secondly, Put it far away from thee.

We can never put sin too far from us.

The Apostles rule is, Abstain from all appearance of evil, that is, do nothing wherein sin appears, or which hath a shadow of sin, 1 Thes. 5. 22. There is no holiness in having a shew of goodness, but the very shews of sin are evil. What the Apostle adviseth for the avoiding of sin, that it may not be committed, is as good advise for the putting away of sin when it is committed: for as we are to go far from sin by a holy care lest we fall into it; so we must go far from sin by a holy repentance after we have fallen into it. We should put it so far from us, that there may be no returning. We should put it as far from us, as the East is from the West, which is the greatest distance, not only mensurable, but imaginable. When God pardons sin he puts it thus far from us (Psal. 103. 12.) and so should we (if it were possible) when we repent of it. The Original word in the Psalm is that of the Text, and may be rendred thus, God hath put our sins as far away from us, as he hath put the East from the West. As the grace of God toward us will not suffer sin in the guilt of it to abide near us; so the grace of God in us, will not suffer sin in the pollution of it, to abide near us. Besides, sin is such both in the nature and effects of it, as no wise man can desire near him. Who would not put poyson far from him? Who would not thrust the Plague or the Leprosie far away from him? Who desires the neighbourhood of a mortal enemy? Sin is all this and more to us, therefore put it far away.

Thirdly, Zophar having invited Job to pray, counsels him to put iniquity far away.

Note from it, We cannot draw near to God in prayer, except we put sin far from us.

If sin be not put far from us, God will remove far from us: The holy God will not come near (unless to punish) the prayers of an unholy heart. You may stretch out your hands to Heaven, but you cannot reach Heaven, if any iniquity be in your hands.

Fourthly, Taking iniquity (as it hath been opened) for the violation of commutative justice, for wrong dealing and oppression; Then Observe,

That which is ill gotten must be restored.

Put it out of thy house, out of thy family; it will be a fire to burn, a moth to consume, a canker to fret all thy com- *Rapina ... ret diu in ... manu, facilius est bona sua dividere, quam male parta suo possessori reddere. forts; sorts; that which is ill got, will poison that which is well got. Moses bespeaks the Israelites concerning Corah, Dathan and Abiram, Depart I pray you from the tents of these wicked men, and touch nothing of theirs, lest you be consumed in all their sins: it is dangerous to be a neighbour to wicked men; the tail of the storm sent upon them may fall upon our selves: it is more dangerous to keep wickedness in our own hands, the whole storm will then fall upon us: It is very sinful to get by wrong, but it is more sinful to keep what is wrongfully gotten; yet how hardly are men perswaded to part with it! It is easier to do an act of charity then of justice; Many are willing to give, but few are willing to restore; yet we are more bound to be just then to be charitable, and to restore then to give; and indeed no man can give till he hath restored, nor be charitable till he is just. That which is stollen is not fit for a gift either to God or man. God hates robbery both for almes and for burnt-offerings. They who are unable may be innocent though they restore not, but no man can be innocent who is unwilling to restore. Some have done iniquity with their hands, who have not iniquity in their hands. What they have taken from others, is taken from them, or spent by them. These must shew, they have it in their hearts to restore all, though they have nothing in their hands to restore. How can we expect, that God should remit our just debts, if we will not restore our unjust gains?

Let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacle.

As the former clause respected the reforming of his person, so this the reforming of his family.

Let not wickedness dwell.] That is, let it not continue there. But is it well if wickedness dwell not with us? may it stay a while with us? No, not a moment. As the Apostle Paul speaks in reference unto those false brethren, who came in privily to spie out their liberty in Christ, and bring them into bondage, unto whom we gave place by subjection, no not for an hour, (Gal. 2. 5.) So we must not give place to wickedness for an hour; it is not enough to say of wickedness, it shall not dwell or abide with us for ever; we will have it but for a week or a night, it may be but for an hour: no, it must not stay with us an hour, no not one moment, with our good leave and liking. When Zophar saith, Let not iniquity dwell in thy tabernacle, he means, hasten it away; and the reason why he saith, let it not dwell, is, because no man can so watch his house and family, no nor his own heart, but sin will sometimes come in; he shall find such strangers there as he never invited, such as he never looked for; he shall find them not only knocking at the door, but boldly drawing the latch, unlocking the door, and thrusting in; man cannot prevent this, either in regard of his heart or his house; but he may say, wickedness shall not dwell with me; as soon as he discovers it he may remove it, or chide it out of doors. Though we cannot keep evil out, yet we may thrust it out; though we cannot hinder its coming in, yet we may hinder its staying in; we need not make a bed, or provide a chamber for sin: this requires some pause and consideration. We examine men (if we know them not) whence they are, and whither they will, before we bid them welcome, or admit them to rest under our roof. The Prophet rebukes the people of Israel (Jer. 4. 12.) How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge within thee? vain thoughts will offer themselves, but why do you accept and entertain them, why do you speak them fair? Let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacle.

In thy tabernacle.] Some understand it personally: The body of a man is his tabernacle, When the earthly house of this tabernacle (saith the Apostle) shall be dissolved, (2 Cor. 5. 1.) So let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacle, is, let it not dwell with thee, or in thy heart.

But secondly, Tabernacles were of two sorts, Ecclesiastical, or Civil, either the place of Gods worship, or of mans residence. Some expound this Text in the former notion: Let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacle, that is, take care to purge the worship of God from all idolatry and superstition: There was a publick worship in that age, as we may collect from the discourse of Job's friends; here Zophar (according to this sence) presseth Job to a reformation of worship (he being a publick person and the Priest) or accuseth him, as having suffered abuses to creep into it: at which Eliphaz seems to aim in his rejoynder (Chap. 15. 34.) For the congregation of hypocrites shall be desolate, and fire shall consume the tabernacles of bribery.

But I rather take tabernacle, for a civil dwelling, so, Let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacle, is (by a Trope) as if he had said, let not wickedness dwell in those who dwell in thy tabernacle: A tabernacle is not a subject capable of good or evil, but as persons abiding there are good or evil.

Hence Observe, First, He that cleanseth himself, should labour to cleanse others also.

As it should not satisfie us to be happy alone, so not to be holy alone. Grace is communicative and catching as well as sin: A man that hath no wickedness dwelling in himself, would not have any man a dwelling for wickedness: having purified his own heart and hands, he labours as far as his line reacheth, to purifie those about him. Christ gives this charge to Peter, When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren.

Secondly, In relation to our own tabernacles, Observe,

The governour of a family is to look to his family, to all under his charge, that wickedness dwell not among them.

It was the commendation of Abraham, and that which moved God to entrust him with his secrets; I know Abraham that he will command his houshold, and his children after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord: and if Abraham would teach his houshold the way and will of God, doubtless Abraham would not let that dwell in his houshold, which was contrary to the way and will of God. When Jacob went to Bethel, with sacrifice, he said unto his houshold and to all that were with him, put away the strange gods that are among you, and be clean (Gen. 39.) Such was the resolution of Joshua, I and mine house will serve the Lord: And David who had the care of a whole Kingdom upon him, yet takes care that no wickedness should dwell in his Court and Royal family, Psal. 101. 7. He that worketh deceit shall not dwell in my house, he that telleth lies shall not tarry in my sight. The sins that dwell in our families, become ours, if we labour not to purge them out. A man is guilty of so much sin as he might prevent by such means as God hath afforded him, if he doth not. We have not satisfied our duties when we look to our selves only, but to all under our shadow or within our sphere. Further, Family sins bring family judgments, as well as national sins bring national, or personal sins personal judgments. Because Eli suffered his Sons in sin, and did not restrain them, therefore he suffered for their sins; their sins were charged upon his account, and he paid dearly for them. When we make other mens sins our own, they will make us smart as much as our own: And the sins of those who are ours, may quickly be ours. Where the relation is nearer, the contagion is quicker. They are so, not only when we command and give them counsel to sin, or take pleasure in their sin, but when we do not reprove them for sin, or not improve all due means to prevent or remove their sin.

Lastly, These two verses present us with a platform of repentance in three special acts or requisites. First, Preparation of the heart: Secondly, Fervent prayer: Thirdly, The putting away, casting out, or banishing of iniquity. Till the heart be prepared we cannot pray; untill iniquity be purged out, prayer is not accepted; unless all three be done we have not repented, or our repentance must be repented of. Except we repent thus we cannot be saved; and only that repentance is not to be repented of, which is unto salvation.

Nota hic tria ad veram resipiscentiam necessaria, primo cordis preparationem, secundo orationem, tertio iniquitatis propulsionem Merc.

VERS. 15, 16.

For then shalt thou lift up thy face without spot; yea, thou shalt be stedfast, and shalt not fear.
Because thou shalt forget thy misery, and remember it as waters that pass away.

IN the former context, Zophar gives Job good counsel; in this he gives him encouragements to follow that counsel. His encouragements are laid down more generally in these two verses; and they are drawn into particulars ticulars in the words following to the end of the Chapter. There are three branches of this general promiſe in the fifteenth verſe.

Firſt, Thou ſhalt lift up thy face without ſpot.
Secondly, Thou ſhalt be ſtedfaſt.
Thirdly, Thou ſhalt not fear.

In the { First / Second / Third } he promiſeth him { an honourable / a ſetled / a comfortable } eſtate.

Verſ. 15. Thou ſhalt lift up thy face without ſpot.

We had an expreſſion neer this at the 15. verſe of the 10. Chapter, where Job ſeems to ſpeak (as ſome expound) deſpairingly, If I be righteous, yet will I not lift up my head: or, as others, humbly, I will not lift up my head though I were righteous. Zophar anſwers him here: thou ſayſt, if thou wert righteous thou wouldſt not lift up thy head, but, I tell thee, if thou wert righteous (according to the counſel given thee) thou mighteſt lift up both thy head and heart, thou mighteſt take both courage and comfort, Then ſhalt thou lift up thy face without ſpot.

What the lifting up of the head, or of the face imports, may be ſeen (ch. 10. 15.) I ſhall here only add a threefold ſignification about lifting up the face; both phraſes being of near affinity.

Firſt, To lift up the face is a ſign of chearfulneſs, Job 22. 26. For then ſhalt thou have thy delight in the Almighty, and ſhalt lift up thy face unto God; that is, thou ſhalt lift up thy face unto God with delight. Joy is the light and life of the face; no marvel then, if we lift up our faces when God cauſeth us to rejoyce. A merry heart, ſaith Solomon (Prov. 17. 22.) doth good like a medicine; and where that medicine works kindly, it ſets a man upon his legs, and makes him hold up his head like a man. God hath given man an erect countenance in the fabrick of nature; but his countenance is then moſt erect, when grace cauſeth him to rejoyce in God.

Secondly, To lift up the face, is an act of reverence and reſpect. (Deut. 28. 50.) The Lord ſhall bring a nation againſt thee of a fierce countenance, which ſhall not regard the perſon of the old, ſo we tranſlate; the Hebrew is, which ſhall not lift up his face to the old, that is, which ſhall give no reverence to old men; the Septuagint render it thus, there ſhall come againſt thee a people of fierce countenance, who ſhall not admire the face of an old man; an old grave man, according to the common rules of civility, is to be had in admiration or high eſteem. Young ones ſhould lift up their faces to honour thoſe, whoſe faces hang down with age.

Non elevet faciem ad ſenem. Heb. Non miratêtur faciê ſenis. Sept.

Elevare caput geſtus eſt erecti animi confidentis & nihil erubeſcentis. Pined.

Thirdly, (Which I rather take for the meaning of this text) lifting up of the face, implieth ſtrong confidence. Thus Abner ſpeaks to Azahel, Turn thee aſide from following me; wherefore ſhould I ſmite thee to the ground? How then ſhould I hold up my face to Joab thy brother? (2 Sam. 2. 22.) that is, how ſhall I come with any confidence or freedom of ſpirit, before Joab, if I ſhould ſlay thee? When Cain was rejected with his offering, (Gen. 4. 5, 6, 7.) the text ſaith, He was very wroth, and his countenance, or his face fell: which is directly oppoſite to lifting up the face. The falling of Cains face was in two things: Firſt, He fell from a chearful to a churliſh countenance, he lookt doggedly and ſourly; we ſay of ſuch a man, he hath a down look. Secondly, He fell from a confident, to a cowardly countenance. The fall of Cains countenance diſcovered the fear which fell upon Cains heart; he did not bring the firſt offering with his heart, and he had no heart left to bring another offering. The face varieth as the mind varieth. That is ſeen in the face which is out of ſight: The evidences of the heart are read there, and we may take the copy of a mans ſpirit in his countenance. Four things are chiefly ſeen in the face; Firſt, Pride: The wicked through the pride of his countenance will not ſeek unto God, (Pſal. 10. 4.) Secondly, Fear; Dan. 5. 6. Then the Kings countenance was changed, and his thoughts troubled him. That is, his thoughts being troubled at that dreadful apparition, his countenance changed. Thirdly, Envy and diſcontent, (Gen. 31. 2, 5.) Labans countenance was not toward Jacob as before; his face ſuffered an evil change, becauſe God made a good change in the eſtate of Jacob. Though Laban was a ſubtle man and a diſſembler, yet his envy at the proſperity of Jacob, was too big to be diſſembled. Fourthly, Guilt; and ſhame, the fruit of it, appear in the face; He dares not ſhew his face, whoſe wickedneſs ſtares in his face. The Lord ſaid unto Cain (Gen. 4. 7.) If thou do well, ſhalt thou not be accepted? The word which we tranſlate accepted, ſignifies properly to lift up, and ſo it may be rendred in that place; if thou do well, thou ſhalt have a lifting up, that is, thou ſhalt lift up thy face upon as good terms as thy brother Abel: uprightneſs hath boldneſs both with God and man. (1 Joh. 3. 21.) If our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence (or freedom of ſpeech) towards God. They that are aſhamed of what they have done, hang down their heads, or pull their hats over their eyes, they dare not be ſeen of men, much leſs of God, who is of purer eyes then to behold iniquity. Thou ſhalt lift up thy face.

Quem faſt aut pudet aut pœnite oculos dejicit. Erubuit gremio; pudor dejecit ocellos. Ovid. 6. Met. Si bene ego vis elevare i.e. elevati erit ſibi.

Without ſpot. The Original imports any kind of blemiſh. Some tell us, that the word Momus, is derived from it, which ſignifies a fault-finder, or one who makes it his buſineſs and ſtudy, to find or make faults in what is done or ſpoken. To lift up the face without ſpot, is, to be without blemiſh, or blameleſs.

מום Denotat vitium corporis vel quicquid pulchritudinem deſtruit. Hinc Momus.

Spots in propriety of ſpeech belong to the body. Can the Leopard change his ſpots? (Jer. 13. 23.) The Lamb for the Paſſover muſt be without ſpot, (Exod. 12. 5.) So muſt the Prieſts, (Lev. 2. 17.) As whatſoever ſtains the the beauty, and darkens the light of the face, ſo whatſoever diſcompoſeth the harmony, or hinders the comlineſs of the whole body, comes under the proper ſenſe of this word.

There is alſo a metaphorical ſpot, which is twofold: Firſt, Upon the name or credit: ſo a mans diſhonour is his ſpot; any blemiſh caſt upon our reputation, is called an aſperſion. Secondly, Upon the mind or inward man; ſo every ſin is a ſpot. The Greek word for unblameable, or without ſinful blemiſh, diſcovers it ſelf plainly to be the offſpring of this in the Hebrew. The ſoul takes ſpots as well as the body. Whatſoever blemiſheth the beauty, or obſcures the glory of the mind; whatſoever ſullieth the credit, or obſcures the dignity of man, comes under the metaphorical ſence of this word. ἄμωμος.

Moſes having exalted God in his perfections, A God of truth and without iniquity, juſt and right is he, (Deut. 32. 4.) ſubjoyns (the more to aggravate them) not the imperfections, but the groſs impieties of Iſrael, (verſ. 5.) They have corrupted themſelves, their ſpot is not the ſpot of his children; that is, their ſin is, not a ſin of infirmity, ſuch as often appears upon the children of God. They ſin as if they had no relation to God; they ſin like aliens, yea like rebels, not like children, not like members of the Commonwealth of Iſrael. Any ſpot is bad, but ſome are worſe. Sin-ſpots are the worſt of ſpots, yet they are not all equally bad: There is a ſpot which is, and a ſpot which is not the ſpot of Gods children. The Apoſtle counſels the Philipians to take heed of theſe ſpots, as they deſired to live in the reputation of children, (Chap. 2. 15.) That ye may be blameleſs and harmleſs, the ſons of God without rebuke (ſo we render,) or (as the Greek bears it clearly) that ye may be ſpotleſs ſons of God, that is, without all ſuch ſpots as are unſuitable to, or inconſiſtent with your ſonſhip. Some are ſo beſpotted, that they are called ſpots: Theſe, ſaith the Apoſtle Jude (verſ. 12.) are ſpots in your feaſts of charity. He that hath many ſpots, is not forward to hold up his face; then how ſhall he who is a ſpot? τέκνα θεοῦ ἀμώμητα.

But what is the ſpot intended in this text? There are three interpretations about it.

Firſt, Some take it for the ſpot of grief and ſorrow ariſing from affliction. Thou ſhalt lift up thy face without ſpot, that is, thou ſhalt get clear of theſe afflictions which ſpot thy face with ſorrow. This ſence alludes to that (Chap. 9. verſ. 31.) where Job complaineth, though I waſh my ſelf, &c. yet ſhalt thou plunge me in the ditch, I ſhall be all mire and dirt, all to be ſpotted with troubles and ſorrows, though I waſh in the waters of repentance: No ſaith Zophar, if thou doſt repent indeed, thou ſhalt lift up thy face without ſpot, God will throw thee into the dirt no more. Some tranſlate from the letter of the Hebrew, thou ſhalt lift up thy face out of the ſpot, that is, thou ſhalt riſe out of thy affliction, and recover out of the mire of thy tribulations.

Index animi vultus.

Though

Though all our repentings, washings and purgings, cannot deserve freedom from the least evil, yet this is the way to such freedom; and when we (through the power of Christ) purge our selves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, we are in the fairest probability, in the neerest possibility to be freed from the spots of tribulation and affliction. Sin and sorrow usually come, and go together: when we fall into the mire of sin, God casts us into the mire of sorrow; and though he often vary his dispensations, yet this is a truth, That when we get out of the mire of sin, the Lord lifts us up out of the mire of sorrow.

Secondly, Others take it for a sin-spot. If thou prepare thine heart, &c. then thou shalt lift up thy face without spot, that is, the Lord will not take notice of thy sin.

Hence note, Though no man is without his spot, yet all believers are accounted spotless.

Balaam confesseth (Numb. 23.21.) He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath he seen perverseness in Israel; that is, he charged no spot upon them at that time, they sinned not perversly, nor did they lie impenitently in sin; Christ sanctifieth and cleanseth his Church with the washing of water by the word, that he may present it to himself a glorious Church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish, Ephes. 5.26,27.

Thirdly, Many understand it of a shame-spot, which is the consequent of sin. Thou shalt lift up thy face without spot, that is, thou shalt not be ashamed to lift up thy face, or when thou liftest up thy face, thou shalt have clear and free access to God. No cloud shall sit upon thy spirit to interrupt communion with him.

Hence Observe, Holiness of life and purity of conscience, cause boldness and confidence in our approaches to God.

The Apostle Peter chargeth husbands, to dwell with their wives according to knowledge, and as being heirs of the same grace of life, that their prayers be not hindred (1 Pet. 3.7.) Uneven or sinful walking in any relation, hinders prayer three wayes. First, It deads our spirits, streightens our hearts, weakens our gifts for prayer. Secondly, It hinders the effect, fruit and success of prayer. Thirdly, It hinders us from the very act, it breeds a strangeness between our souls and God, and makes us listless to the duty. The soul is unwilling to come into the presence of God, while sin sticks upon the conscience: such as have no heart to come before God, cannot lift up their faces to him. It is said of the poor Publican (Luke 18.) that he durst not lift up his eyes to heaven, he had low thoughts of himself, and his posture was lowly. The Publican had no purpose to continue in sin, yet because his conscience was not cleared of sin, he durst not lift up his face to heaven, but standing afar off sayes, God be merciful to me a sinner. Guilt clogs the soul. How shall an unholy heart converse with a holy God? When we lift up our faces, or give good looks to sin, we cannot lift up our faces to, or expect a good look from God. They whose hypocrisie is so vigorous, that they can at once look upon sin with joy, and upon God with confidence, shall at last to their sorrow find God rejecting their confidences; and indeed he is not confident but impudent, who hopes for favour from God, while himself makes sin his favourite. Those hypocrites went thus high, whom the Lord upbraids (Jer. 7.9.) Will ye steal, murder, and commit adultery, and swear falsly, and come and stand before me in this place? Some hypocrites seem to have a very lively hope; yet the hope of all hypocrites shall be as the giving up of the Ghost.

Lastly, The spot from which Job is promised freedom, is expounded for disgrace or dishonour. Job was bespattered by his friends as a wicked man, as the worst of wicked men, an hypocrite.

Hence Observe, It is a great mercy to have our credit cleared up from those blemishes which the uncharitable suspitions or rash censures of men have cast upon us.

There is no spot except that upon the conscience which is so unbeautiful as that upon our credit. He hath little to lose in this world who hath lost his good name: And if the loss of credit be so great an affliction, the reparation of it cannot be a small mercy. David was a man spotted with the imputation of rebellion, Saul lookt upon him as a traytour: It was a high favour which God gave him, when he gave him back his good name, when he caused him to lift up his face without spot, yea without spot in the eye of Saul: Saul acquitted him, and said, thou art more righteous than I. The Lord brought forth his righteousness as the light, and his just dealings as the noon-day, Psal. 37.6. His righteousness lay in the dark, and his just dealing was adjudged treachery and deceit: Yet at last he recovered his credit, and his name was cloathed with honour in the estimation of his adversaries. This is the first promise, Thou shalt lift up thy face without spot. The second is,

Yea thou shalt be stedfast.] It is a happiness to get a good estate, but it is a greater happiness to keep it. Thou shalt be stedfast. The Hebrew word, in the verb, signifies to melt or dissolve; and in the adjective, strong durable and compact; that which is melted is called compact, either by the figure antiphrasis, because it is uncompact, or, according to the nature of the thing, because mettals which have been melted grow more compact and solid when they cool again. Some render it here, Thou shalt be like a molten pillar; brass or iron being molten and cast into the figure of a pillar, are strong and steddy; the word is so rendered, (1 Sam. 2.8.) The pillars (that is the firmest and strongest parts) of the earth, are the Lords. This promised stedfastness may be taken two wayes.

יצק Fudit, liquefacit durus compactus, vel per antiphrasin, vel quòd metalla fusa consolidentur. Hinc מוצק fusum, in hoc libro passim sumitur pro חזק forti, valido. Merc.

First, In reference to his externals, as if Zophar had said. Thou wast once Master of a good estate, thou wast once rich and full, but thy estate, thy riches were not stedfast, thou hast lost all, thy wealth is consumed and gone; yet humble thy self, and thou shalt lift up thy face, thou shalt not only be exalted, but established: Thou shalt be stedfast.

Secondly, Stedfastness may refer to his internals, and so there may be a fourfold stedfastness.

First, Of judgement; when a man holds to his profession, and fleets not in opinion. The Apostle cautions his Ephesians (chap. 4.14.) Be no more children tossed too and fro, with every wind of doctrine: be firm to your principles, be not as a meteor carried about with every gust, but as a star fixed in your orb.

Secondly, There is a stedfastness of resolution, 1 Cor. 15.58. Be ye stedfast and unmoveable, that is, hold to your purpose: serve the Lord, and go on in his work, let nothing take you off: Such was the masculine stedfastness of Queen Hester, resolving to do her duty in the face of danger, If I perish, I perish.

Thirdly, There is a stedfastness of faith. When we believe and do not waver, or hesitate (Jam. 1.6.) The Apostle Paul speaks of the solidity of the firmament of faith, (Col. 2.5.) Rejoycing in your order and the stedfastness of your faith in Christ. And Peter exhorts to resist the devil, being stedfast in the faith, 1 Pet. 5.9. He that fights must look to his footing. We cannot resist another till we are setled our selves. στερέωμα πίστεως.

Fourthly, There is a stedfastness of conscience. Conscience is full of uncertainties till we settle upon Christ: the stedfastness of conscience ariseth from the peace of conscience, and our peace flows to us in the bloud of the covenant.

We may understand this promise, of outward, but especially of inward stedfastness; of the stedfastness of his faith and the quietness of his conscience; that he should no longer hang between hope and fear, between perswasions and doubtings of the love of God.

Hence Observe, Grace establisheth the heart.

Put away sin, and thou shalt be stedfast. Grace is brought into the heart by Christ: Grace and Christ can never part: the doctrine of grace is therefore said to establish the heart, because Christ is in it, Heb. 13.9. It is a good thing that the heart be established with grace, not with meats, which have not profited them that have been occupied therein: when he saith it is good, he means, it is better that the heart be established by grace then by meat. For meat doth in a sence establish the heart, that is, it recreates and refreshes the heart. As Abraham speaks to the three men whom he invited to his tent (Gen. 18.5.) I will fetch a morsel of bread, and comfort ye your hearts, the Hebrew is, stay or establish your hearts. But the lasting comfort and establishment of the heart, is by grace; that is, with grace wrought in the heart, or with the doctrine of grace (which is a means of working Gratia reddit homini constantem firmum secure & constanter agentem, minimè præsumentem. Pined.

working that grace) for he opposeth grace to meats, about which, questions were then started, and many were unsetled; and with meats he understands by a Synechdoche the whole body of the Ceremonial Law, which is opposed to the Gospel, or the doctrine of grace; as if he had said, do not think to settle your selves by the Ceremonial Law, one part whereof consisted in the choice and distinction of meats, for they have not profited them that have been occupied therein, they have gotten no establishment by them, but grace will do it. As your Fathers did eat Manna in the Wilderness, so meats of the Sacrifice in Canaan, and are dead; but he that feeds upon Christ, and is filled with grace, shall live for ever. Meats profited them so little, that they are said not to profit them; they administred only a transient help to the body: but grace profits so much, that it only may be said to profit, that administers a permanent advantage to the soul. Grace renders us alwayes the same, and preserves us from change. Inconstancy is the companion of sin; yea inconstancy is the companion of all earthly things; earthly things move and are unsteady; it is impossible to stand fast upon an unsteady foundation. The Apostle (Ephes. 4. 13.) describeth the Gentiles thus, I say unto you (speaking to the Saints) that ye henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk; ye were Gentiles, but now I would not have you walk as other Gentiles, namely as unconverted Gentiles: do not imitate them from whom you have made so happy a departure; but how did they walk? In the vanity of their mind, that is, in the unsetledness and unconstancy and unstaidness of their minds; you have received grace, and grace should make you firm and stable upon your basis, upon Christ your bottom. The holy Ghost reproves this unsetledness in the old Jews (Jer. 2. 23.) Thou art a swift Dromedary traversing her wayes, (never setled in any way, vers. 36.) why gaddest thou about so much to change thy way? thou also shalt be ashamed of Egypt, as thou wast ashamed of Assyria; thou wentest to this Kingdom and to the other Nation for help, and here thou thoughtest to strengthen thy self, and there to obtain deliverance; Why gaddest thou about so much? the world being uncertain, leaves thee in perpetual uncertainties; thou couldst find no help in Assyria, thou shalt find none in Egypt, neither the one nor the other shall be able to establish thee. So Chap. 31. 22. How long wilt thou go about, O thou backsliding daughter? We are in continual motion till we settle in God. As the needle in the Mariners compass being toucht with the loadstone is unquiet till it points to the North, and there it settles: so it is with the soul, to what quarter of the creature soever we turn our selves, we shall be unsetled, wavering, and unsteady, till we point directly unto God, till we look heavenward. The heart finds no ground, till it gets off the earth.

Impius non potest esse firmus.

There is a double unstedfastness which sin brings in, and grace casts out.

First, About our way. Many are alwayes to choose; whether this way or that, is their quere: they not only (which is the infirmity of many of the Saints) halt in their way, but between two wayes. An upright heart may be unsteady in the right way; but a carnal heart is unsteady between the right way and the wrong. Such are sometimes in good wayes, and sometimes in evil wayes; they may happen upon a good way, but they cannot chuse it; or if they chuse it, it is not for its goodness, but commodiousness; it serves their turns, and upon that account they take a turn in it.

Secondly, They are unstedfast about the end. A wicked man is often secure, but he is never setled concerning his end. He presumes he shall be well, but he cannot know it shall be well with him. They who walk in dark wayes, must needs be in the dark about their end. An evil mind is never quiet upon good termes. They who are morally evil, have no true reason to expect eternal good. There is a quietness of mind concerning our end, which ariseth from the ignorance of our ill estate, and there is a quietness which ariseth from the knowledge of our good estate: in the former sence many wicked men are quiet, their consciences do not trouble them, and they wonder why any mans should. These are asleep in the darkness of sin, and they shall lye down in the darkness of sorrow. Only he that finds himself united unto Christ, and by vertue of that union, cleansed from the guilt, and relieved against the dominion of sin, is steadfast indeed. Him wilt thou establish (saith the Prophet) in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee. It is a bastard peace which is the daughter of ignorance: true peace is the daughter of saving knowledge.

Lastly, As this stedfastness is understood of his outward estate, We learn,

That God only can establish the creature to us.

The fashion of the world passeth away, yet God can bid it stand. The creature can be no more to us then God makes it, how much so ever we make it in our account. David calls his outward estate a mountain, Psal. 30. 6, 7. yet he acknowledgeth that all the strength and standing of his mountain was from God. Lord, by thy favour thou hast made my mountain to stand strong. And he found his mountain shaking, yea and his heart shaking too, when God did but hide his face. Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled. That's the second thing promised. There is yet a third, viz.

And thou shalt not fear.] He carries it higher yet. There is an holy fear, and there is a sinful fear. There is a fear of care, and there is a fear of distraction. There is a fear of watchfulness, and there is a fear of distrustfulness. He doth not mean the holy fear of care and watchfulness; but the sinful fear of distraction and distrustfulness, Psal. 112. 1. Blessed is the man that feareth God. Why? vers. 7, 8. He shall not be afraid: he that feareth holily, shall not be afraid distractingly. Again, This exemption from fear doth leave us secure; it is Babylon which saith, I sit as a Queen and am no widdow, and shall see no sorrow. She is so fearless that she is also careless. The more Jerusalem and her children know their safety, the more they labour to be safe.

Thou shalt not fear. This negative promise may have a threefold reference. Thou shalt not fear, First, The continuance of thy present troubles. Nor secondly, The return of these troubles. Nor thirdly, The rising of new troubles. Thy heart shall be far above all these fears.

Hence Observe, First, To get free from sin, is the way to get free from fear.

Put away iniquity, and then thou shalt not fear. As by fear we keep from iniquity (The fear of the Lord is to depart from evil,) so by departing from iniquity we keep from fear: An evil conscience is a troubled conscience: God is above all fear; and man is never without fear till he is in God, (Prov. 21. 1.) The righteous is bold as a lyon.

Mala conscientia nunquam est sine motu. Extra Deum nihil est firmum, unde efficitur ut nemo extra Deum possit esse sine metu. Sanct.

Secondly, To be free from the fear of evil, is better then to be freed from evil,

He doth not say barely, Thou shalt be freed from evil, but, Thou shalt be freed from fear. Happiness consists more in removing inward then outward trouble. He that is not indeed afraid of evil before it comes, may be happy though it comes. It is the perfection of our spiritual estate not to fear: Perfect love casteth out fear: (1 John 4. 18.) It casteth out all fear that we shall loose the favour of God, or be cast out of his love: it doth not cast out the fear of offending God, but that whereby we question the favour of God. Whatsoever the premises of Gods dealings are, such souls make this conclusion, That God will do them no hurt, and means them nothing but good. A great part of the Saints portion both on Earth and in Heaven, lies in their deliverance from fear. And if any ask, how can this be? The next verse answers,

Vers. 16. Because thou shalt forget thy misery, and remember it as waters that pass away.

נשכח
Laborum oblivisceris.

These words give us a reason of the former, Thou shalt not fear, because thou shalt forget thy misery, or thy labour. As we do not feel, so we cannot fear that which we have forgotten: and he who is delivered from dangers, is much armed against the fear of danger; while he well considers how he overcame those which are past, he sees whatsoever may come, as already conquered.

Thou shalt forget.] This forgetfulness implies two things.

First, That he should be long free from such evils as had oppressed him, so long, that he should forget that he was ever oppressed by such evils: The fruit of a long freedom from from trouble, is forgetfulness of that trouble. The Lord saith of his people in Babylon, They have been lost sheep, their shepherds have caused them to go astray, they have gone from mountain to hill, they have forgotten their resting place (Jer. 50. 6.) Now as sheep having gone long astray, forget their former folds and resting places, so they who have been long freed from misery, forget their misery. Length of time wears out the remembrance both of the good we have enjoyed, and of the evils we have suffered. Thus God encourageth the believing Gentiles (Isa. 54. 4.) Fear not, for thou shalt not be ashamed, neither be thou confounded, for thou shalt not be put to shame: for thou shalt forget the shame of thy youth, and shalt not remember the reproach of thy widowhood. The shame of their youth, was their bondage in Egypt; the reproach of their widowhood, was their captivity in Babylon: here the Lord promiseth such a mercy, as shall swallow up the memory of both. As a great mercy puts out the memory of a lesser (Jer. 16. 14, 15.) The deliverance out of the Babylonish captivity, swallowed up that deliverance from Egyptian bondage;) so great mercies long continued, swallow up the remembrance of all our miseries.

Secondly, This forgetting notes such a removal of former evils, that not so much as a scar, or any print of them should remain to be seen: while the scar of a wound remains, the memory of it cannot but remain. When Joseph interpreted Pharaohs dream about the seven years of plenty, and the seven years of famine, (Gen. 41. 13.) he saith there should be such a famine upon the land after the seven years of plenty, that the seven years of plenty should be forgotten; why forgotten? because there should be no print, no sign left of plenty: so the Lord sometimes after seven years of famine, after seven years of poverty or trouble, gives seven years of such plenty, peace, rest and comfort to his people, as wear out all the marks of their former afflictions. When Josephs brethren feared he would remember the wrongs which they had done him, he answers as if he would assure them that there was not the least print of them left in his mind, Gen. 50. 21. Fear ye not, I will nourish you and your little ones. He hath forgotten all received injuries, who resolves to return courtesies. He is farthest from revenge, who is ready to feed his enemy. Thus saith Zophar, Thou shalt forget thy misery, the Lord will heal thy wound so perfectly, that there shall not be so much as any mark of it remaining. The forgetfulness of misery, cannot but spring from any eminent succession of the contrary mercy. The Prophet describes such a change, and this effect of it, Isa. 65. 13. My servants (saith the Lord) shall eat, and ye shall be hungry; my servants shall drink, but ye shall be thirsty; my servants shall rejoyce, but ye shall be ashamed; hence v. 16. He that blesseth himself in the earth, shall bless himself in the God of truth, because the former troubles are forgotten: Eating causeth us to forget hunger; so doth drinking, thirst; and rejoycing, shame. Thus saith Christ, A woman after sore travel remembers her anguish no more, for joy that a man is born into the world, Joh. 16. 21. Either of these ways Zophar may be expounded, Thou shalt forget thy misery, that is, thou shalt have freedom from thy misery, till the memory and marks of it are quite worn out; such a series of mercies shall succeed thy troubles, as shall make thee doubt whether thou wast at all in trouble: Thus to forget misery, is to be perfectly happy; and in the issue both these met in Job: The long continuance, and the abundance of mercy which he received, made him discount all the evil which he had endured. Thou shalt forget.

Obliviscetur pristina mala, non oblivione memoriæ sed bonorum successione. Hier. in c. 54 Isa.

But how could he forget? For the clearing of this and other Scriptures of the same stile, take this distinction. There is a double forgetfulness. First, In reference to the rational part. Secondly, In reference to the sensitive part. He is not promised (for that were an affliction) forgetfulness of his afflictions in reference to his rational part, he should remember them still so as to consider what they were, and to be thankful for his deliverance out of them. In this sense, they who have the greatest cause to forget these miseries, have also greatest cause to remember them; it is the will of God we should. As it is a sin affectedly to forget the sins we have committed and are pardoned, so to affect a forgetfulness of the sorrows we have suffered, and are escaped, is sinful; God receives much glory by our recognizing of pardoned sins, and of escaped sorrows.

Quantum attinet ad scientiam rationalem tantor præteritorum malorum, quantum autem ad experientiæ sensum prioris immemor. Aug. de civ. Dei l. 22. c. 30.

But in reference to a sensibleness of those evils, or of any trouble arising from the remembrance of them, thus he is promised to forget them. As if Zophar had said, When thou thinkest of thy affliction, it shall not afflict thee, yea it shall be thy joy to remember it. It is a great refreshing to remember the troubles which we have been in, and are freed from. When Joseph was advanced in the Court of Pharaoh to great honour, and was married there, he called the name of his first-born son Manasseh, from this word signifying to forget; and he gives the reason of it, for God hath made me forget all my toil and all my fathers house (Gen. 41. 51.) How had God made him to forget it? Not in regard of the rational act, for he did remember what his Fathers house was, together with all the afflictions he met with there from his envious Brethren, and this was his duty: but the Lord made him forget all the pain, smart and sorrow of those afflictions; He was very sensible how much he had suffered, but he had no sense of it. In Heaven we shall forget all the troubles and storms of this life, and all our sins, as they are any hinderance to our joy; but there shall be a remembrance, even in Heaven, of the troubles and sins of this life, so far, as to give God the glory of making that glorious change. As we may be said not to know evils two wayes, either because we are ignorant of them, or because we have no experience of them; so we may be said not to remember past evils two wayes, either because the memory of them doth not stay with us, or because the remembrance of them doth not annoy us. And that's the meaning of forgetfulness about injuries; when we exhort not only to forgive a wrong, but to forget it: A man may rationally remember the wrong which another hath done him, with all the circumstances and passages of it, and yet forget it spiritually. Some say, they are content to forgive an injury, but they can never forget it; I say, forget it so far as to forgive it fully, and then remember it as much as you will. The natural memory of injuries is no sin, but the angry and revengeful memory. God in the new Covenant is said to forget the sins of his people, and to remember them no more; but doth he forget any thing, or doth it slip out of his memory? No, he knows all things by one everlasting act, and he remembers even all the sins of his elect, he remembers all the sins which he hath pardoned; but he is said not to remember them, or to forget them, when he pardons them, because they are before him as if they were not remembred, that is, he is not provoked by those sins; his Spirit is not drawn out in revenges against such sinners as he hath pardoned. Thus in the Text before us: Job being delivered from his outward afflictions and inward temptations, is assured he shall forget them; not that the rational act should be deleted and blotted out, but the sensitive: the trouble of his troubles, the afflictiveness of his afflictions should be removed, he should remember sorrow to his sorrow no more.

Hæc olim meminisse juvabit.

Anima beata fruent indeficienter æternorum jucunditate gaudiorum, oblita erit culparum, oblita pœnarum; nec tamen ideo suæ liberationis oblita, ut liberatori suo sit ingrata. Aug. ubi supra.

Seeing it is promised Job that he shall forget his misery,

Hence Observe, That, The very representation of evils past, may be a present pressing evil.

The representation of past afflictions, is sometimes very afflictive. As a man by considering his former comforts, may take in comfort; or by reflecting upon, and remembring his former sins, may sin over all his sins: so by remembring his former sorrows, he may have a new indurance and impression upon his spirit of all his sorrows. It is a mercy when evils are remembred without a taste of evil; and when a review of former sorrows doth not revive our sorrows.

Secondly, Observe, Thou shalt forget thy misery.

Forgetfulness is the cure of all our sorrows.

The forgetfulness of some things is a sin, and the forgetfulness of other things is a priviledge. To forget our duties, to forget the mind of God made known unto us, is our sin; but (as explained) to forget the trouble and affliction which hath been upon us, is a special priviledge. It is sin to forget the history of our troubles, but it is mercy to forget the pain of them. Forgetfulness is good for little; only the forgetfulness of the evil of sin, or of evil customs, so as not to practise them again; and the forgetfulness of the evils of punishment, or of our evil condition, so as not to be oppressed with them, is good, and the cure of all those evils. When the word preached hath wounded the heart of a wicked man, and made it smart, what is his cure? his cure is to cast the word out of his thoughts, and to forget it, or as much of it as he can; if he can but forget the word, his cure is wrought, and he is whole again; though indeed, such a mans remedy is worse then his disease; and his plaister then his pain; yet he hath got (such as it is) a cure. Thus also the forgetfulness of our troubles is the remedy of our troubles, as sleep is of our sorest travels (Psal. 127. 2.) So he giveth his beloved sleep; So, how is that? that is, notwithstanding all the hard labour and pains they take, yet the Lord giveth them sleep, and sleep makes them forget all their former labour. So some interpret those words (Psal. 126. 1.) We were like them that dream; that is, when the Lord began to work deliverance, to turn again the captivity of Zion, we (as it were) forgot what our state and condition but lately was. A dreamer forgets how it was with him; so, we are as them that dream, we have forgotten all the evils we have been in; even the long time of our captivity. When a friend is in great pain, such as the tooth-ach, &c. we say to him, (in a merriment) do but forget it a while, and you shall be cured. You may write (probatum est) upon this receipt, if you can receive it; but it is God only that can cause us to receive it; he only can work this forgetfulness of evil, as he only works a true remembrance of what is good. Some men have taught an art of memory, but 'tis God must teach this art of forgetfulness; this forgetfulness proceeds from the grace or favour of God. Heathens speak much of the River Lethes, of which, if a man did drink, he presently lost his memory, and forgot all that he had either enjoyed or endured. Lemuel (Prov. 31. 4.) would not have Kings drink wine (that is, immoderately) lest they drink and forget the law (ver. 5.) but he adviseth (ver. 6.) to give strong drink to him that is ready to perish, and wine unto those that are of heavy hearts. Let him drink and forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more (ver. 7.) Of this wine, some understand that of the Evangelist Mark, in his description of Christs passion (ch. 15. v. 22.) They gave him wine to drink mingled with myrrhe, but he received it not. Naturalists observe, that myrrhe stupifies and dulls the sense of pain; but Christ bids pain do its worst, he needed not forget it, who was able to conquer it; his spirit was infinitely above such reliefs. But to the point; as there is a natural and an artificial way to cause forgetfulness of misery, so there is a supernatural. God can give his people to drink of such a mystical Lethes, he can give them a cup of such a river of consolation, as shall drown the memory of all their sorrows. As when a Table-book is written all over, you may take a spunge, and wipe out every Letter; so when our memories are full of our miseries, the Lord can spunge all out, and not leave so much as one line or letter to be read any more.

Multimodis fefe commaculat ictibus, myrrhæ presumptione munitus. Apul. l. 8.

Thirdly, Zophar puts this forgetfulness of his misery, as a consequent of Job's putting away of his iniquity. Hence observe,

When the hand and heart are clear of sin, former sufferings will not be grievous to us.

So long as a man continues in sin, not only his present, but his past sufferings are his torment: put away iniquity, and thou putteſt away the tormenting thoughts of thy misery; thou shalt not feed upon the wormwood and the gall, as the Church did, (Lam. 3. 19.) while she remembred her affliction: the blow was past, but the remembrance of it was as bitter as gall, and as unpleasant as a dinner of wormwood. In heaven, or in that perfect state of blessedness which is promised (Rev. 7. 17.) God will wipe away all tears from our eyes; because then he will for ever cast every sin out of our hearts and lives. The captive Jews in Babylon, kept their sins too close, and therefore when they sate down by the river, and remembred Zion, they wept, (Psal. 137.) the sorrows and afflictions which they had in Zion, as well as their love to Zion, made them weep in Babylon; though while they were in Babylon, they lived free from sorrow; so free, that many of them could not be got out of Babylon, when God called them away (Zech. 2. 6.) and when Cyrus had proclaimed them a full liberty to go away (Ezra 1. 3.) yet say they, when we remembred thee, O Zion, we wept. The remembrance of former troubles will afflict, till we are cleared from the guilt, and have subdued the power of sin. Thou shalt forget thy misery.

And remember it as waters that pass away.] Some read these, and the words before, not as a promise, but as an exhortation; Do thou forget thy misery, or remember it as waters that pass away. As if he had said, thou poreſt too much upon thy sorrows; I counsel thee to forget them, let them be as a river swallowed up in the sea of an eternal oblivion.

But I conceive this latter clause to be an explication of the former: For if any ask, How shall he forget his miseries? Here's the answer, he shall forget them as waters that pass away. This similitude is more then once used in Scripture, to note utter forgetfulness. Job (chap. 6. 15.) compares his friends to the stream of brooks that pass away, because they had forgotten the laws of friendship. David imprecates vengeance on his enemies in a like phrase (Psal. 58 7.) Let them melt away as waters that run continually; that is, let them and their memorial perish. Who takes notice or remembers the waters that pass in a River, or under a Bridge? When the woman of Tekoah would shew that they were all as lost and buried in oblivion, if David did not fetch home his banished, she expresseth it thus; we must needs die, and are as water spilt upon the ground, which (passeth away, and) cannot be gathered up again, 2 Sam. 14. 14.

Non recordaberis amplius, nam aquarum quæ præterierunt nulla penitus recordatio est.

This may be interpreted, first, as an allusion, either strictly, to Noah's floud: Thou shalt remember it as waters that pass away, that is, thou shalt remember the flood of all thy sorrows and afflictions, as thou dost remember the flood of Noah; of which, no doubt, Job had heard. The Lord, in the Prophet Isaiah, chap. 54. 9. speaks of the removal of his peoples affliction, under that Notion; For this is as the waters of Noah unto me; for as I have sworn that the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth, so have I sworn that I would not be wroth with thee, &c. So here; thy afflictions shall be as the waters of Noah that are past. Thy troubles swell now very high, thou sufferest a deluge, an inundation of sorrows; but they shall be dried up, and shall not leave so much as their slime for a token that they have been there.

Or more generally, as an allusion to all sudden torrents, or the rising of waters upon the fall of great rains in the southern parts of the world; of which, Psal. 126. is a great proof: waters in those regions swell in a moment, and are down almost as soon as swoln; having no constant fountain to feed them, they cannot continue. So saith he, a mighty flood of trouble and sorrow overwhelmeth thee, but it shall quickly dry up; it is but a cloud, a storm, it will pass away, and be spent sooner then thou dreamest, even so soon, that thou shalt be like one that dreameth.

Secondly, It may be taken as a proverbial speech, You shall remember it as waters that pass away, that is, you shall not remember it; it shall be as if it had not been. Who can tell what waters have past, or where to find those waters which are past? to remember a thing as waters that pass away, is to let it pass out of memory. Some things leave lasting expressions behind them, but a sudden passing water doth not.

Proverbialem reor hunc loquendi modum, quo significatur aliquid justive boni, sive mali, quod jam præteriit nihil esse reliquum. Sanct.

Thirdly, We may interpret it thus, Thou shalt remember it as waters that pass away, that is, thou shalt remember it as that which shall never return again, or is quite gone, and shall never trouble thee any more. Some expound that of the Prophet so, Affliction shall not rise up the second time, (Nah. 1. 9.) (which others, and I think rightly, interpret of an utter consumption; there shall be no need for affliction to come the second time; for it shall spoil all at first; thy affliction shall make a total devastation.) Yet it may be taken in the sence suggested. Affliction shall not rise up the second time, that is, thou shalt not be afflicted the second time. The waters of affliction are passed away, and shall not flow back again. Job (chap. 28. 4.) speaks of waters forgotten of the foot; he means (as is conceived) waters so deep, that no man could pass thorow them, and are therefore said to be forgotten of the foot, because no foot had passed them of a long time, nor was any like to pass them any more. Thus also an affliction through which a man shall never pass again, may be called a forgotten affliction. Hence when the prophet had said (Nah. 1. 9.) that affliction should not rise up the second time, he adds from the Lord, (ver. 12.) I have afflicted thee, I will afflict thee no more. This I apprehend as the proper meaning of the text in hand, Thou shalt forget thy misery; or if thou dost remember it, thou shalt remember it but as waters that are passed away. Thy misery will be as nothing to thee, and shall never return upon thee. Hence observe,

The memory of miseries which shall never return to hurt us, comforts us.

Miserrima malorum impendentium expectatio. Mercl.

It is our joy to remember those things which were our sorrow, when we are beyond the borders of sorrow; such a remembrance is as joyous, as the remembrance of an evil, whose return we fear, is grievous. The very suspition that an affliction will renew, reneweth our affliction. Then we feed heartily upon the good which is before us, when we are freed from the after-claps or after-reckonings of evil. That the Israelites were delivered from those Egyptian task-masters, was very sweet, but to see them at their heels, and upon their backs again, was exceeding bitter; hence the Lord, to relieve them from those thoughts, gave them this assurance by Moses (Exod. 14. 13.) The Egyptians whom ye have seen to day, ye shall see them again no more for ever. It is not so great a loss not to see, as it is a trouble to see what we would not. The King of Babylon slew the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes, before he put out his eyes (Jer. 39. 6, 7.) doubtless the putting of his eyes to that use, pained him more then the putting of them out. Now as it is a misery worse then blindness, to see that which grieves us; so it is a mercy as good as sight it self, not to see what would grieve us; especially to receive a faithful promise, that we shall see it again no more for ever. And as it adds to the affliction of a man in misery, to remember that he hath enjoyed friends and good dayes, which he shall not enjoy nor see again any more for ever; so it adds to the comfort of a man, encompassed about with mercies, to remember he hath endured sorrows, and been oppressed by enemies, which he shall not endure, nor be oppressed by, no nor see again any more for ever. This is the priviledge of the Saints, in reference to that greatest enemy, Sin; they remember their sins as waters that are passed away, they shall never return to hurt them, much less to condemn them. Thus to remember our sins on earth, is a piece of heaven, and will be a great part of our happiness in heaven; where we shall say in highest triumph and exultation of spirit, concerning sin and Satan, death and sorrow, or whatsoever hath the face, or deserves to wear the name of a mystical Egyptian, these Egyptians whom we have seen and felt so often in the dayes of our mortality, we shall not feel, no, nor so much as see them again any more for ever.

Miserum est misse fœlicitatem.

VERS. 17, 18, 19, 20.

And thine age shall be clearer then the noon-day; thou shalt shine forth, thou shalt be as the morning.
And thou shalt be secure, because there is hope; yea, thou shalt dig about thee, and thou shalt take thy rest in safety.
Also thou shalt lie down, and none shall make thee afraid; yea many shall make suit unto thee.
But the eyes of the wicked shall fail, and they shall not escape, and their hope shall be as the giving up of the ghost.

THis latter part of the Chapter, consisteth (as was touched before) of divers motives and encouragements, which Zophar bestows on Job, to hearten him on in hearkning to his counsel. As he was encouraged before by a promise, that his present troubles should suddenly expire; so here, that ancient mercies should suddenly revive; as if Zophar had said, Thou shalt be blessed, not only by deliverances from, or removals of evil; thou shalt not only forget misery, and have the prints of thy afflictions wiped out; but thou shalt be fairly stamp'd with fresh favours, and the best of blessings shall be heaped upon thee. This he expresseth in those elegant metaphors and comparisons.

Verse 17. Thine age shall be clearer then the noon-day, thou shalt shine forth, thou shalt be as the morning.

All which he exemplifieth in plain assertions, assuring him, that he shall spend the latter part of his life in safety. ver. 18. Thou shalt be secure, &c. In freedom and honour. ver. 19. None shall make thee afraid; yea, many shall make suit unto thee. The ungodly are not so. ver. 20. The eyes of the wicked shall fail, &c.

חלד Tempus, seculum, ævum sed & vitæ curriculum citò cessantem significat, quasi per Metathesin à חדל cessare. Quasi meridianus fulgor consurgeret tibi ad vesperam. Vulg.

Thine age.] The Hebrew word signifies time in general, or the whole state of this world. David prayeth to be delivered from the men of this world; or, of this age, (Psal. 17. 14.) he means it of men who have nothing beyond the world; all whose estate lies on this side heaven. The word signifies also the particular age of a mans life; and here distinctly the latter part or old age of a mans life. Thine age, that is, thine old age, or the latter part of thy life, of which thou seemest to make little reckoning; upon which thou lookest as if it were not worth the having; that latter part of thy life, of which thou sayest in thine heart, surely it will be as death to me, it will be full of death and darkness, of diseases and of weaknesses; the strength of it will be but labour and sorrow; that evening of thy life, of which thou judgest (according to the experience of others) surely it will be dim and misty, cloudy and uncomfortable; even that age of thine shall be Clearer then the noon-day.] The letter is, thine age shall rise above the noon-day. The noon-day is taken two wayes; sometimes for extream heat, and sometimes for extream light.

Esto illis jucundum refrigerium à meridiano æstu. Jun.

First, At noon, we expect the extremity of heat; the Sun of persecution is signified by the noon-day, Isa. 16. 3. Make thy shadow as the night, in the midst of the noon-day; that is, be a refreshing and a protection to my people, when their troubles are at the hottest. And Cant. 1. 7. Tell me where thou makest thy flocks to rest at noon, that is, in the heat of persecution. The Church desired to understand where to shelter, what cooling place was to be had in the times of greatest tribulation.

Notum proverbiale est, luce meridiana clarius, item lucernâ accendit in meridie. Lux fœlicitatis symbolum. Vita jucunda & luminosa. Coc. Summa erit lætitia tua.

Secondly, Noon imports the clearest light; it is a common proverb, when we affirm a thing to have the greatest clearness, to say, It is as clear as the light at noon-day. And, to light a candle at noon, is a proverb of reproof to those, who trouble themselves to make that plain, which hath no obscurity in it. And as noon is put for light, so light is often put for joy; and clearest light (such is that of noon-day) for greatest joy; light is sown for the righteous, that is, they shall reap a harvest of joy.

When Zophar promiseth, Thine age shall be clearer then the noon-day; his meaning is, thy latter end shall be full of comfort, and thou shalt rejoyce in the serenity of thy condition. Hence observe,

God can make the worst part of our life the best to us; and when we expect (according to the course of nature) the least good, he can encompass us with the choicest good.

Old age is called the evil day (Eccl. 12. 1.) and the description of it is given in terms very apposite unto this; while the evil dayes come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them; while the Sun, or the Light, or the Moon, or the Stars be not darkned, nor the clouds return after the rain. He compareth old age to a gloomy day, when shower falleth after shower, and cloud follows after cloud; yet the Lord can make that age which usually gives nothing but clouds and showers, but moisture and wet, to be as clear as the light at noon, and as dry as sunshine. We need not fear our worst state, if God will undertake to mend it: be not troubled with tiring expectations of pain and weakness, of diseases and sicknesses in old age; God is able to make thee, notwithstanding the disadvantages of nature, strong and healthy. Old age will be youth to us at his word. Abraham was not troubled at an hundred years old, when God promised him, thou shalt have a son. Sarahs dead womb was no impediment, when God said, thou shalt conceive. Young men shall faint, and old men shall renew their strength like the Eagle, when God will have it so. The summer of your lives shall be a winter, and your winter a summer; your cloudy dayes shall be clearer then the noon, and your noon a cloud, at his command, who made both summer and winter, sun and cloud. He that put nature into order, can order things against nature.

Thou shalt shine forth, thou shalt be as the morning.] This

This additional clause heightens the sence of the former. The words which we translate, to shine forth, signifies also, to darken; so Mr. Broughton renders, Thy time shall pass the noon-day, obscureness shall match the morning. And another thus; If thou dost wax obscure, or dark, yet thou shalt match the morning.

Licet te ut vitæ functũ existimes novo natali velut aurora consurgas.

Our Translators take Zophar continuing the Metaphor of light; Thine age shall be clearer then the noon-day: and here he shews, that it shall not be a standing, but an encreasing light, the light of the morning; Thou shalt be as the noon, in regard of the clearness of thy light; and thou shalt be as the morning, in regard of the increase and continuance of thy light: For though we have the greatest light at noon, yet that light is near a declension. The Sun being come to his height, is in its vertical point; and every hour after noon, (though we cannot perceive it) grows darker and darker, till the shadow of the night wrap up all; but the morning-Sun is a rising Sun, which gains and gathers every moment. That's Solomon's description (Prov. 4. 18.) The path of the righteous is as the morning-light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. So then, these two are excellently joyned together, to make up the highest expression of a prosperous estate; thy estate shall be so prosperous in the degree of it, that it shall be clearer then the noon-day; and yet it shall be of such continuance, or rather, of such encrease, that it shall be as the morning; thou shalt be in a state of perfection, yet receiving addition: though in a strict sence, Philosophy defines that only perfect, to which nothing can be added; yet there is a kind of perfection in receiving additions: Job's state shall be so perfect, that it shall need no addition, and yet there shall be additions to its perfection. It shall be noon for perfection, it shall be morning for addition and augmentation; Thou shalt shine forth as the morning. Hence observe,

Æquè illustrandi ac tenebrescendi significationem habet. Si obtenebrescas, eris tanquam mane. Merc.

God is as able to continue his people in a high estate, and to encrease it, as to raise them to it.

Thy light shall be as the noon, and thou shalt shine forth as the morning. If the Lord please, he can stop the declinings and decayes even of temporals; he can give us an everlasting noon in the things of this life, and he will certainly do it in the life to come. He who causeth our Sun to ascend till it makes a noon, can command it to stand at noon, or ascend till it makes a clearer noon: As himself is higher then the highest, so he can make us higher, when we think our selves at the highest. As he makes the darkness of affliction darker to many, who supposed it to be at the darkest; so he makes the light of joy lighter to many, who supposed it to be at the lightest. Some whose state is darker then midnight, are yet as the evening encreasing in darkness; and some, whose age is clearer then the noon-day, are yet as the morning encreasing in light. Our evil dayes, and our good dayes, our sorrows, and our joyes, receive their limits from the hand of God. Our sorrows will every day be more sorrowful, unless God stop them; and our joyes will every day be more joyful, if God enlarge them.

Consolatio nunquam deerit in omnibus adversitatibus.

Secondly, As the word signifies to obscure and darken, the sence appears thus, Thou shalt be clearer then the noon, and if any obscurity seize upon thee, yet thou shalt match the morning; thou shalt overcome that darkness, and thy skie shall be clear again; the clouds shall break upon thee, day shall dawn, and comfort shall renew; thy obscurity shall be as the morning, which disperseth darkness, and conquers it by the approaching light. That promise (Isa. 58. 10.) is a clear exposition of this; Then shall thy light rise in obscurity, and thy darkness be as the noon-day; that is, thy affliction shall be turned into consolation, and thy evil dayes into good dayes. The vulgar Latin translates the former part of the verse thus, Thou shalt be clear towards the evening; or, thy evening shall be clear; the latter, thus, when thou thinkest thou art consumed, thou shalt be as Lucifer; or, as the morning-star; even like that star which is the forerunner or messenger of the morning. Hence observe,

Et quasi meridianus fulgor consurget tibi ad vesperam, & cum te consumptum putaveris, orieris ut Lucifer. Vulg.

That, God can quickly turn all our sorrows into joy, and our worst times into pleasant times.

Thy obscurity shall match the morning. He can cause joy to rise out of sorrow, and turn our water into wine, our losses into gain; Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning (Psal. 30. 5.) And again, Unto the upright there ariseth light in darkness (Psal. 112. 4.) As the Sun of wicked men sets at noon, so the light of the Saints riseth at midnight, Amos 8. 9. I will cause the Sun to go down at noon, and I will darken the earth in the clear day; which text stands in as direct an opposition to this, as words can be penn'd. He who causeth the Sun to go down at noon, can command the Sun to rise at midnight; and he who darkens the earth in the clear day, lightens the earth in the darkest night. As natural, so civil and spiritual light and darkness take their turns, and make their changes, as God decrees. It is the happiness of the Saints in misery, that their friend and father can say unto their misery, Be gone; and to happiness, Return. The state of the Jews was obscured by the rising of that fiery fatal Comet, Haman; but anon, Mordecai arose, like a bright star in their Horizon, and then, the Jews had light and gladness, and joy and honour, Est. 8. 16.

Thirdly, Compare this Verse with the counsel before-given. Zophar adviseth Job to seek unto God, and to humble himself before him; what shall be the fruit of it? Thine age shall be clearer then the noon-day; thou shalt shine forth, thou shalt be as the morning. Hence note,

When we are better, God usually makes our estates better.

Turn thou to God, and God will turn thy darkness into light. The Prophet (Isa. 58. 10.) having described a fast, and taught the Jews how to humble themselves aright before God, subjoyns this promise, Then shall thy light rise in obscurity, and thy darkness be as the noon-day. When we depart out of the darkness of sin, the Lord bids the darkness of trouble to depart from us. While we cast our selves down, he raiseth us up, and sets us in the glory of our enjoyments. We complain we are in darkness, but we forget that our sins stand in our light, and hinder good things from us. As promotion comes neither from the east, nor from the west, nor from the south, but from God; so the stop of promotion comes not from any of those quarters, but from our selves; if we were empty, God would fill us; if poor, God would enrich us; if low and abased, he would exalt us. That advice of the Apostle James, speaks all this; Humble your selves in the sight of the Lord, and he shall lift you up (chap. 4. 10.) As for those, who, being in darkness, kindle a fire, and compass themselves about with sparks, that they may walk in the light of their own fire, and in the sparks that they have kindled; this shall they have from the hand of the Lord, they shall lie down in sorrow (Isa. 50. 11.) A man continuing in sin, shall find himself as much disappointed in labouring to get out of darkness, into light, by his own power, as in hoping that God will bring him out by his power.

Zophar goes on, and draws this general into particulars. There are five particular blessings laid down in vers. 18, & 19. all which, summed together, make up the mercy of ver. 17. viz. prosperity like the noon-day, and comforts like the morning. The first is,

Thou shalt be secure, because there is hope.

Thou shalt be secure.] The word signifies an act, not only of adherence, but of assurance; not only of recumbency, but of certainty: when the heart is fully setled, and acquiesceth in the sufficiency and faithfulness of him who hath undertaken and stands up for our protection.

There is a double security.

First, Sinful, accompanied with a neglect of good means, and with a presumption of a good end. Both are comprised in that rebuke given the false Prophet (Jer. 28. 15.) Thou makest this people trust (or secure) in a lie.

Secondly, There is a security which ariseth from the actings of a vigorous faith, grounded upon the promise and word of God; that's the security for which Zophar engageth: That sense is clearly given in the words following; Thou shalt be secure because there is hope; that is, because thou hast a sure word, upon which to cast the anchor of thy hope. True hope is rooted in the promise, and fruited with peace. That's it, which, in this point, we call security. When a lender hath the word of a good man for his money, he is said to have good security. How secure then may the Saints be, who have the word of the good God for their security. Thou shalt be secure.

Spes illa solum firmitatem habet, quæ Deo nititur. San.

Because there is hope.] That is, Thou shalt not only have a present good estate, and store of blessings in possession, but abundance in expectation: Hope is of good things to come: An assurance of what we have not, is as good a settlement to the heart, as what we have; and he that can look for no more then he hath, can never have a settled heart. The hope of more is a richer inheritance then the inheriting of much. Were it not for hope, the heart would be unsatisfied in the best times. It is never well with us in this life till we can, upon warrantable terms, look beyond what we see. Vision will be enough for us in Heaven, but on earth we cannot have a vision of any good thing which is enough. This makes the difference between the state of the Saints, and of worldly men, We walk by faith, and not by sight: They walk by sight, and not by faith. Faith leads us into the Treasury of God; sight leaves them among the treasures of men. Our best estate lyes in invisibles: Sense is of things present or seen, which are but temporal; Faith and hope are of things absent, and out of sight, which are eternal.

Further, These promissory words, Thou shalt be secure because there is hope, may refer,

Spes est melior res. Drus.

First, To the attaining of a good condition. Secondly, To the increasing or bettering of that good condition to which he should attain. Thirdly, To the keeping or maintaining of the good which should be so increased. Thou shalt have a morning, there's good attained; thy morning shall rise up to a noon-day, there's good increased; thy noon shall not decline, there's good maintained; and because of all these hopes, thou shalt be secure: and all these hopes must meet to make up a full security.

Hence observe, Hope in God is the settlement and security of the soul.

There is a hope which is ill set, such a hope cannot settle us. That hope which is right set is setling. Our hope is as the object is upon which we hope: if we hope upon that which is sure, hope it self is sure; hope in God must needs be sure, because God is. So the Apostle argues: God willing more abundantly to shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath, that by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation, who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon the hope set before us, which hope we have as an anchor of the soul both sure and stedfast, (Heb. 6. 17, 18, 19.) God is the Saints anchor-hold, they cannot be removed by any storm, when once they have fastened upon him. As every one that hath this hope purifieth himself, even as God is pure: So every one that hath this hope may assure himself, because God is sure. He is the hope of all the ends of the earth: and hope in him shall never end but in a full enjoyment of himself in heaven.

Observe secondly, That the condition of a godly man can never be desperate.

Whatsoever he wants in the world he cannot want hope; he hath somewhat in hope, though he hath nothing in hand: He hath much in the promise, though little in his purse: He hath plenty of bread in the word, when he hath scarce a loaf, or when he hath greatest scarcity at his table. He may expect more of the world then he hath, though he hath much; and he may look upon all that is in the world, as his, though none of it be his. He hath a right to all, and he shall receive as much as he needs: If less then all will not support his needs, he shall have all; God will give every Believer a world by himself, rather then not give him as much as he hath promised. If the good things which God hath already made, be not enough to make good every word which he hath spoken, he will speak another word, which shall make more. As the heaven and the earth, which are created, shall pass rather then his word; so he will create a new heaven and a new earth, that all his words may stand.

Confide dum spes est. Jun.

There is a textual reading of these words given by some, which reaches the sence of this Observation; Be thou confident, or secure, while there is hope: So it is a counsel, not a promise; an exhortation, not a doctrinal assertion; or it is the use of the former doctrine, shewing us what becomes us to do, when we hear what God hath spoken. When God makes us a promise, it is our duty to rest upon him in it: Promises are the pillars of the soul; Christ is the substantial pillar of the soul, the promises are declarative pillars. As it is the priviledge of believers, that they may, so it is their duty, and they must rest upon those pillars. They are invited to close with every word of God, and embrace every offer which he makes. The word is spoken in vain, mercies are tendered in vain, except we act faith, and pitch our hope upon them. Shall we be confident when men (who are a lye, and their breath is in their nostrils) give us hopes they will stand our friends and help us; and shall we not when the great, the faithful and ever-living God saith, he will be our friend and helper!

There are three considerations which should make us hope whensoever God offers us a word.

First, Consider what God hath done. Experience works hope. Look into your own experiences, and ask after the experiences of others. The report of both will be, Thou Lord hast not forsaken them that seek thee (Psal. 9. 10.) Who would not seek him, who hath never forsaken those that seek him?

Secondly, Consider who it is that ingageth: It is God: A God all-sufficient to make good his word; there is nothing too hard for him: and as not one Iota or tittle of his commands, so not one of his promises shall fail, all shall be fulfilled. He gives promises, and he can create performances. The Promise is good, but the Promiser is better; therefore be thou secure and trust when thou hast his promise.

Thirdly, Consider the relation which God beareth to his people. It is not an enemy, that speaks to ensnare and circumvent us, to mock and delude us; it is not a just man who speaks, who (though he mean well, and hath a mind to do what he speaks) yet may soon become unable: but it is God, in relation a Friend to us, a Father to us, one who speaks what he meaneth, and is able to do what he speaks. It is God who is able, and whom no accident can disable, he it is that speaks unto us. If God tell thee thy light shall be clearer then the noon, that thou shalt shine forth as the morning, be thou confident, act faith, yea let faith have a perfect work; then it hath, when we trust perfectly; Be secure, because there is hope; That's the first priviledge promised. The second is this,

Yea thou shalt dig about thee.] Some expound this digging tropologically for the works of holy worship and obedience to God. These are a kind of digging in Gods earth.

Others, Thou shalt dig; That is, thou shalt provide thy grave. As if he had said, I promise thee favour, not only while thou livest, but when thou art dead; thou shalt have a comely burial, and be laid in thy sepulchre with honour. The words which follow, [Thou shalt take thy rest in safety] are interpreted to fill up this sence, Thou shalt be laid in thy grave; and when thou art there, none shall violate thy ashes, or disquiet thy dust. It is threatned as a sore curse (Jer. 8. 1.) that the bones of the deceased Kings and Princes, &c. should be pull'd out of their graves, and should be spread before the Sun, and Moon, and all the Host of Heaven, whom they had loved. Now here (say they) Job is assured, that none shall stir his bones, or pillage his tomb, when he should sleep with his Fathers in the grave. But I pass it.

Ad sepulcrum pertinet, q. d. Sepultus jacebis securus. Aquin

Thirdly, Thou shalt dig about thee; that is, thou shalt draw a line of defence, or a trench about thee: So Mr. Broughton, Thou shalt entrench, and lye down safely. The Mole's safety (who is named from this word in the Hebrew) is in earthing himself; and so is the safety of men in war. Thus it is an expression of greatest safety, thou shalt be as safe as if thou wert fortified with walls and trenches, or hadst planted bulworks round about thee.

Facebis securus velut fossa circumducta. Tyg. Securus ages acsi vallo & fossa munitus. Vatab.

Fourthly, Others think that Zophar alludes to the fashion of those times: Either first, In their removings, when taking up their tents, and intending to pitch them in a new place, they digged to let in the stakes and fasten them; so, to dig, is no more but this, thou shalt pitch thy tent, or set up thy tabernacle, and be in safety: God can protect thee in a tent as well as in a castle. We call the furniture of our houses, our moveables, but they had moveable houses. Or secondly, That he alludes to their digging of wells, which was in those ages and places a noted business, as we may read in Genesis. So, Thou shalt dig, is, thou shalt make provision for thy flocks and cattel (water being one part is put for all) and none shall contend with thee, as the herdsmen of Isaac and of Gerar did, Gen. 26. 20.

Puto alludi ad morem Arabum, qui subinde tabernacula sua & sedes movebant. Merc.

Fifth-

Fodiendi operam ad rem agrariam refert. Cajetanus.

Fifthly, I rather conceive digging is put either strictly for tilling and manuring the earth, or, more largely, for the labour of any calling: Thou shalt dig about thee; that is, thou shalt follow thy business in the place where providence hath cast thee; digging is put for the whole service of this life, (Luke 16. 3.) the unjust Steward, when he feared to be called to an account, queries with himself, What shall I do? for my Lord will take away my stewardship; I cannot dig; that is, I know not how to put my self to any labour, or calling, especially to a calling of hard labour, and I am ashamed to beg, what will become of me? But what priviledge is there in this, that he should dig? I answer first, It is a mercy to have a calling. But secondly, When it is said, Thou shalt dig; he means two things further. First, thou shalt thrive and prosper in thy calling: Thou shalt gain by digging. Secondly, Thou shalt be safe in thy calling, thou shalt dig without fear or danger, without let or hinderance. When Job's estate was surprized, his servants were some plowing, others keeping sheep, all at work. Now it is promised, that he and his shall dig in quietness. To clear which sence, we may connect the latter clause of the verse (which I have proposed, and shall open as a third distinct priviledge) with this, Thou shalt dig about thee, and thou shalt rest in safety; That is, in labour thou shalt have rest; or, the rest of safety shall be thy portion, in all the motions of thy labour.

Hence observe, It is a great blessing when we freely enjoy the exercise of our callings.

It is our duty to have a calling, and it is a mercy to go on profitably and peaceably in it.

There are some (though I cannot much approve the interpretation) who expound that (Cant. 7. 1.) where Christ speaks to the Church, How beautiful are thy feet with shoes? to this sence, thy feet are beautiful in thy calling. When a man hath his shoes on, he is fit for business, and his feet are never so beautiful, as when he is at honest business: As the Saints have a spiritual and heavenly calling, in which they deal with Christ and trade towards Heaven: So Christ will have them imployed in earthly callings, and maintain dealings with men; one calling honours and supports the other; our general calling gets a blessing upon the special; and in our special callings we have occasion to shew forth our vertues and graces, and so to honour our general calling: It is a high commendation when we can say to a Christian, How beautiful are thy feet with shoes? That is, thou art holy when thou art about worldly things, as well as when thou art about spiritual things: This is a truth, and may be a good allusion, though not a proper exposition of that Scripture: Now as our feet are beautiful with shoes, when we go on justly, and righteously; so when we go on thrivingly, quietly, and peaceably in our callings; when though we have much labour, yet we have no sorrow in our callings: when though we work hard for the bread we eat, yet we get bread to eat, and others do not eat the bread for which we have wrought.

שכב Cubare, cubat qui non dormit: hoc verbum de morte usurpatur hinc שכבים mortui. Drus. ἀναχάσεις ᾗ οὐκ ἔσαι ὁ πολεμῶν σε. Sept.

And thou shalt take thy rest in safety.] That's a third priviledge. The word signifies a lying down, whether in the day time for a short refreshment, or in the night for sleep. And so it is no more but this: As thou shalt dig, and thrive at thy work, so thou shalt take thy rest in safety; thy reposes in the day, and thy sleep in the night, shall be sweet unto thee. Ishbosheth was slain at noon upon his bed: the night hath been fatal to many.

Note, It is a mercy to enjoy rest with quiet.

They who are continually hurried with fears, who (like Job) have had their estates plundered and spoiled, would count it so. How many thousands, lately, in this Kingdom, have, as it was threatned (Deut. 28. 26.) been in fear day and night, who when they have lain down could not rest an hour in safety? The Scripture gives us many promises about this blessing, Prov. 3. 26. When thou lyest down, thou shalt not be afraid; yea, thou shalt lye down, and thy sleep shall be sweet. Psal. 127. 2. So he giveth his beloved sleep. Psal. 3. 5. I laid me down, and slept; I awaked, for the Lord sustained me. Psal. 4. 8. I will both lay me down in peace and sleep, for thou Lord makest me dwell in safety. When the Lord undertakes our protection, we may sleep on both ears; that is, securely and comfortably; when he watcheth over us, we shall rest, though thousands watch against us. A good nights rest is the good gift of God, and deserves daily acknowledgments by man.

The fourth priviledge follows.

Verse 19. Thou shalt lye down, and none shall make thee afraid.

Some interpret this as a repetition, or but as an addition to the former; but we may thus difference them; That, promised rest to his person and family; this, to his estate and cattel. The word (Rabats) here used, properly signifies the lying down of cattel in their fields and folds. Thus understood, it is a distinct mercy, Thou shalt be quiet in thy bed; as also thy cattel, thy sheep and oxen, shall all lye down quietly in their stalls and pastures, none shall stir them up, much less take them away. But some may object, The Text doth not say, Thy cattel, &c. shall lye down: But thou shalt lye down. I answer; A man and his estate, whether in things living, or without life, may be wrapt up in one: we are well and in peace (according to common speech) when ours, and all that we have, are well.

Hence note, A peaceable condition, even for our goods and cattel, is a remarkable favour.

That our estates are quiet as well as our persons, that our beasts can lye down safely as well as our children, is to be numbred among our mercies. The Psalmist prayeth hard for it (Psal. 144. 13, 14.) That our sheep may bring forth thousands, and ten thousands in our streets: That our oxen may be strong to labour: that there be no breaking in, nor going out; that there be no complaining in our streets: and least any should judge these but small matters, he casts them up into a great sum, even the sum of all our desires, Happiness; Happy is that people that is in such a case. Though neither all our happiness, nor our chief happiness, consisteth in these outward things; yet such an enjoyment of these things is a happiness.

There is a fifth priviledge greater then any of these, and yet but an outward priviledge: This makes the Sun of his promised prosperity as the noon day in his highest Zenith of perfection.

Yea many shall make suit unto thee.

The Hebrew is, They shall intreat thy face. And the word which we translate entreat, signifies also to weary, or tire one out, to be pained either in mind or body; and when it is joyned,—as here, with the word face, or countenance, it signifies to weary one with prayer and intreaty; that is, to use many intreaties, so many intreaties as weary a man to hear them. That parable which teacheth that men ought alwayes to pray, and not to faint, represents us with a Judge which feared not God, nor regarded men, and with an importunate Widow, who came unto him, saying, Avenge me of mine adversary, and he would not for a while; But afterward he said within himself, Though I fear not God, nor regard man, yet, because this Widow troubleth me, I will avenge her, lest by her continual coming she weary me (Luke 18. 5.) As many are weary of prayer, so some are wearied with prayers; and grant the petitions of the poor, not to relieve them, but to ease themselves. So the meaning is this, They shall make many suits to thee, even as many as are made to him that is wearied with suitors. Though it be a great honour to have suitors, yet there is a burthen in it too: The faces of Kings and Magistrates are wearied with hearing supplications.

Others understand face here (as it is often taken in the Hebrew) for anger and displeasure, and give the elegancy of it thus, Many shall abate, or weary thine anger; when they hear that thou art angry or displeased with them, they shall make so many suits and petitions to thee, as shall take off thine anger, and bring it down. It is hard to be angry with those that are humbled; when God is angry, we may be said to weary his anger by prayer; or to cause him to give over being angry. The Church wonders when the anger of God outstood so many prayers. O Lord God of hosts, how long wilt thou be angry against the prayers of thy people? (Psal. 80. 4.) The anger of God can hold out as long as his love; but God will appear weary of his anger, when we are not weary of praying to him. We weary the anger of God, and make it faint with supplications, when we supplicate plicate him earnestly, and humbly, without weariness and fainting. As sin and unbelief are said to weary the patience of God, (Isa. 7. 13. chap. 43. 24.) So prayer and faith (or the prayer of faith) are said to weary the wrath of God. In this sence the word is frequently used, (Psal. 119. 58.) I intreated thy favour (or wearied thy face) with my whole heart. Saul speaks in the same form of words, (1 Sam. 13. 12.) I said the Philistims will come down now upon me in Gilgal; and I have not made supplication unto (or wearied the face of) God. So then the blessing here promised Job, is, that many (as subjects to their Princes, and tenants to their Lords, yea, as man to God) should make their suit, and do homage to him. As if Zophar had said, Many now despise and undervalue thee because of thine affliction; and heretofore many came boldly to disquiet thy person, and spoil thy substance; but the case shall be so altered with thee, that they, who before despised thee, shall honour and reverence thee: (As many of them who mocked Christ, shortly after adored him,) they that heretofore terrified thee, shall be afraid of thee, and shall humble themselves before thee. They shall fear thy power, and beg thy favour, with renewed supplications, till it shall be a weariness to hear them. Thou shalt be more able to destroy them, then deny them. Only take my advice, and hearken to my counsel. Be thou earnest in seeking unto God, and others shall quickly seek unto thee; do thou make suit to him, and weary his face, and thou shalt see many will come and weary thy face with suits: Thy very enemies, and unkindest friends, will be glad, not only of thy company, but of a good word, or a good look, from thee. And in this Zophar spake truer, in reference unto himself, and his friends, then he was aware of: For as others, so these three, by the command of God (chap. 42.) were glad to come and intreat the face of Job, that he would intreat the face of God for them.

Te suspicient & colent, tibi supplices erunt propter divitias & dignitatem. Drus.

First, Hence observe, It is an honour to have others sue or seek to us.

In this God gives us a share, and makes us partakers with himself in one of his greatest honours: It is the honour of God, that all creatures sue to him, and depend upon him; that all need his help, and that so many petition him for it every day. He is the God hearing prayer, therefore to him shall all flesh come. The highest glory which God hath on earth, is, that so many thousands come thronging to, and knocking at the gate of Heaven, with tears and prayers. One reason why Princes and Magistrates are called gods, is, because such as are oppressed, or in want, make supplication unto them; Prov. 19. 6. Many will intreat the favour of the Prince: It is the subjects duty to do it; and the doing of it is the Princes honour: Flatterers are the disgrace of Princes; but Suitors are a grace unto them. That civil power is draw down to the lees, or is at the lowest ebb, which no man, or but few, sue unto. And the lowest ebb, both of Zions spiritual power, and outward splendor, is thus expresst (Jer. 30. 17.) This is Zion whom no man seeketh after. Zion was once sought unto, for thither the Tribes went up, they went up thither to worship the Lord: and when the glory of Zion should be restored, the Prophet assures her (Isa. 60. 14.) The sons of them that afflicted thee shall come bending unto thee, and all they that despised thee shall bow themselves down at the soles of thy feet: And they shall call thee the City of the Lord, the Zion of the holy One of Israel. (Isa. 45. 14.) The labour of Egypt, and merchandise of Ethiopia, &c. they shall come over, and they shall fall down unto thee, they shall make supplication unto thee, saying, Surely God is in thee, and there is none else, there is no God. To make supplication to any one, either supposeth him to be a God, or that much of God is in him. (Psal. 45 12.) The rich among the people shall intreat thy favour; (it is the word in the Text) not only poor mean underlings, but the worldly rich among the people shall seek thy heavenly riches; the honourable shall think it an honour to joyn in communion with thee. The Philadelphian Angel is promised this high priviledge, Rev. 3. 9. Behold, I will make them of the Synagogue of Satan, which say they are Jews, and are not, but do lye, behold I will make them come and worship before thy feet, and to know that I have loved thee; that is, I will make them submit and sue unto thee as unto my special Favourite. The glory of Christ himself is thus described (Isa. 11. 10.) There shall be a root of Jesse, and to him shall the Gentiles seek. To seek or make suit to a man, speaks reverence to, and worth in his person: It speaks ability to help, and supposeth willingness; it speaks a fear of having that power used against us, and an earnest desire of having it improved for us; honour comes in from all quarters to those who have many suitors.

Secondly, To whom, and upon what terms, doth Zophar make this promise? He makes it unto Job, and to him in case he should seek unto God, and humble himself before him.

Observe, Holiness towards God, makes us honourable and venerable among men.

I grant, some are therefore despised because they are holy; and not a few continue in, or turn to unholiness, lest they should be despised. Holiness, which is the beauty of men and Angels, yea of God himself, is accounted a blot among unholy ones; yet all they who are holy are truly honourable in themselves, and they are honourable in the eyes and esteem of many others. Though they are thought unworthy to live in the world, yet the world is not worthy of them, Heb. 11. 38. There is more worth in the least Grace, then in all earthly glory. Them that honour me (saith God, 1 Sam. 2. 30.) I will honour; and they that despise me, shall be lightly esteemed. God is the fountain of honour, and yet he receives honour. We give much honour unto God, when we sincerely seek unto him, and obey him; they that honour God thus, shall have a like honour, others shall seek to them, and obey them. Since thou wast precious in my sight thou hast been honourable (Isa. 43. 4.) All are ready to honour those who are precious in the eyes of earthly Kings, and sue for the favour of their Favourites. This in a proportion is true of every one that is precious in the eyes of God, he shall be honoured, sometimes in the eyes of worldly men, but alwayes in the eyes of men fearing God. There is a spiritual excellency stampt upon the face of the meanest servant of God: they that are spiritual see and reverence it. The Citizen of Zion is described among other qualifications by this also, he is a man, in whose eyes a vile person is contemned, but he honoureth them that fear the Lord. As Grace is honourable, so it is a sign of grace to honour those who are gracious.

Omnes quodāmodo mali esse cogūtur ne viles habeantur. Sal. lib. 4. ad Eccl. Cathol.

These are the promises made by Zophar to encourage Job, both in general, ver. 17. and in particulars, ver. 18, and 19. In ver. 20. he draws up the conclusion of his speech, setting down the contrary estate and condition of wicked men, and by consequence the estate of Job, if he should continue (as he supposed him) wicked. While he spake of mercy, he spake in the second person; here he speaks of judgment in the third.

Verse 20. But the eyes of the wicked shall fail; and they shall not escape, and their hope shall be as the giving up of the ghost.

As if Zophar had said, If thou dost persist in thy sin, thou mayst look for good till thy eyes ake, and never be blessed with the sight of it; or thy condition shall grow yet more sad, so sad, that thy eyes shall be pained to see it, and thou shalt have no hope to escape it; or if thou hast, it shall be a dying hope, even like the giving up of the ghost.

Here are three branches of this description, concerning the opposite condition of wicked men.

First, Their eyes shall fail, in looking for good.

Secondly, They shall not escape, present evil. If they hope they shall, then Thirdly, Their hope shall be as the giving up of the ghost.

The eyes of the wicked shall fail. The failing of the eyes may be considered two wayes. There is first a natural failing of the eyes through age, as also through extremity of want and affliction (which is an accident unto Nature.) The eyes of the wild Asses are said to fail because there was no grass, Jer. 14. 6. God threatens the Jews with such troubles as should consume their eyes, Levit. 26. 16. When Jonathan (1 Sam. 14. 29.) wanted food, his eyes were dim, and as soon as he had tasted a little honey, See, I pray you, (saith he) how mine eyes have been enlightened, because I tasted a little of this honey. Neither of these wayes are we to understand it here. Secondly, There is a failing of the eyes in a moral sence: Though the optick vertue of the eye be like like that of Moſes, which was as ſtrong and clear at a hundred and twenty years old, as at twenty, yet when a man is diſappointed of the thing which he looks for, his eyes are ſaid to fail. The failing of our eyes is the diſappointment of our hopes. And the reaſon of that expreſſion is, becauſe the eye is the inſtrument, by which we look up, or look out for that, which is the deſire, and would be (as we conceive) the ſatisfaction of our ſouls. Yet further, the eyes may be ſaid to fail two wayes.

Dum expectant bonum & non aſſequuntur. Sic conſumptio oculorum ſumitur in Scriptura. Rab. Sol.

First, (As before) When we obtain not what we have long expected: So the captive Jews complain (Lam. 4.17.) As for us, our eyes as yet failed for our vain help: in our watching we have waited for a nation that could not ſave us. Job, in vindication of his integrity, profeſſeth, That he never cauſed the eyes of the widow to fail (Chap. 31.16.) that is, he neither made them ſtay over-long for an anſwer, nor did he chide them away preſently with a bad one. For,

Videndo & invidendo langueſcit. Invidia eſt oculorum dolor.

Secondly, This failing of the eyes doth ariſe from the ſight of that which we would not ſee, as well as from the not ſeeing of what we would. To meet with that which we look not for, is as troubleſome, as not to meet with that for which we look. And as want of that good, which we would enjoy, ſo envy at the good, which another enjoyes, is a pain unto the eyes. Envy is the worſt diſeaſe of the eye: when a man ſeeth another flouriſh in proſperity and in peace, whom he hates, that monſter envy tortures him, and his eyes begin to ake.

In both or either of theſe ſences we may underſtand it here.

First thus, Wicked men ſhall look long enough for any good before it comes, their eyes ſhall fall out of their heads with looking for good becauſe it comes not.

Dicit Jobi æmula oritus & invidis hæc arbitror intelligenda. Bold.

Secondly, Their eyes ſhall fail; that is, they ſhall ſee the righteous in ſuch proſperity, and raiſed up to ſuch luſtre and glory, that they ſhall not be able to bear it. This ſome give as the peculiar intent of the place. For though the aſſertion be appliable to all wicked men, yet it ſeems to aim chiefly at thoſe who inſulted over Job in his affliction. Theſe mens eyes, ſaith Zophar, ſhall be dazled, and ſink in their heads, at the ſplendour of that reſtitution which God will make in thy eſtate, if thou wilt but return to God, and repent. They who mocked thy fall, ſhall be amazed at thy riſing.

This firſt clauſe taken in connection with the counſel before given, yields us this Obſervation:

The prayers of the Saints draw down good upon themſelves, and trouble upon their adverſaries.

Prayer is an offenſive weapon as well as a defenſive: as it protects us from evil, and attaineth good for us, ſo it wounds our enemies, and obſtructs the paſſages of their good. What hinders the deſires of wicked men, and breaks their projects? what ſtops the courſe of their counſels? Some poor ſoul, perhaps many, are praying againſt them, and then, the eyes of the wicked ſhall fail, they ſhall never partake of their expectations. There is a deſtroying power in the prayers of the Saints, as well as a ſaving and a helping power. The witneſſes have a flame at their lips, fire proceedeth out of their mouthes, which devoureth their enemies (Rev. 11.) which moſt interpret to be their prayers: they pray their enemies to deſtruction, they pray them into diſappointments; their enemies lay deſigns, and prayer diſmounteth their deſigns, or turns their Artillery againſt their own breaſts.

Secondly, Take the interpretations given of theſe words in their own compaſs. Then Obſerve, firſt, It is a vexation to wicked men, a very pain to their eyes, to ſee the proſperity of godly men.

A good man is an eye-ſore to thoſe that are evil. Haman was in an high eſtate, a great man, and full of honour, yet Mordecai was an eye-ſore to him; Haman's eyes failed when he ſaw him, and therefore after he had made report to his friends, and to his Wife, of the glory of his riches, and the multitude of his children, and all the things wherein the King had promoted him, &c. he melts into this ſad and diſcontented concluſion, yet all this availeth me nothing, ſo long as I ſee Mordecai the Jew ſitting at the Kings gate, Eſther 5. 13. All the pictures in the Kings gallery, did not pleaſe and feed the eyes of Haman ſo much as the ſight of Mordecai ſitting at the Kings gate vexed him.

Secondly, Obſerve, Wicked men ſhall never obtain the good things they long for and gape after.

Their hopes ſhall be fruitleſs, their projects ſucceſleſs, their labour ſhall be labour in vain. The beſt are ſometimes put to it very hard, their refuge and their hopes fail them long, though not for ever, (Pſal. 69. 3.) Mine eyes fail while I wait for my God. David waited ſo long, that he was even weary with waiting, yet God came at laſt. The ſtubborn Jews are threatned, Deut. 28. 32. Thy ſons and thy daughters ſhall be given to another people, and thine eyes ſhall look and fail with longing for them all the day long. Siſera's Mother, and her wiſe Ladies, looked long through the lattice for his coming, but he came not at all. The eyes of the wicked ſhall fail indeed, they ſhall fail with waiting upon their idols and vanities, upon their luſts and lyes, upon their relations and friends, upon their policies and plottings: It ſhould make the Saints to lift up their heads and their eyes with confidence, that God will cauſe the eyes of wicked men to fail.

And they ſhall not eſcape.] As they ſhall not receive the good which they expect, ſo they ſhall not be able to deliver themſelves from the evil which they fear. They ſhall not eſcape; the Hebrew is, Their refuge ſhall fail them: Mr. Broughton, Their refuge ſhall be forlorn. You may take it either in reference to their eſcaping the hand of men, or to their eſcaping the hand of God. They ſhall not eſcape the hand of men, their refuge ſhall fail them there. When once Saul was forſaken of God, he could not eſcape the hand of the Philiſtims: ſee (1 Sam. 28.) what means he made to eſcape them, whom he had often conquered; he goes to the Devil for help, but he could not eſcape; Nothing ſhall do them good who are forſaken of God. And if they cannot eſcape the hands of men, much leſs ſhall they be able to eſcape the hand of God. As his hand is not ſhortned to ſave, ſo not to puniſh. Where he reſolves to ſtrike, he can. They ſhall not eſcape. This intimates two things.

First, The falſeneſs of thoſe props and ſupports, whether perſons, or things, upon which they leaned. I (ſaith David, Pſal. 142. 4.) looked on my right hand, and beheld, but there was no man that would know me, refuge failed me: The help of man often fails good men, though the help of God never fails them. The help of man often fails wicked men, and the help of God fails them ever. They may look in a ſtreight not only on the right hand and on the left, that is, on all creatures, but upward alſo, on God himſelf, and yet find no refuge. God will not deliver wicked men, and others ſhall not. Nothing can ſave him whom God will deſtroy, or give up to deſtruction.

Secondly, The vanity of their own hopes; they have great hopes that they ſhall get off, and out-run their dangers, but they cannot. Their ſorrows ſhall be too ſwift of foot for them; yea, their ſorrows ſhall purſue them as upon Eagles wings. They ſhall not eſcape.

Hence obſerve, There is no eſcaping the hand of God.

His is a long hand, every thing is within the reach of it. His foot is a ſwift foot; therefore the flight ſhall periſh from the ſwift, and the ſtrong ſhall not ſtrengthen his force, neither ſhall the mighty deliver himſelf, neither ſhall he ſtand that handleth the bow, and he that is ſwift of foot ſhall not deliver himſelf, Amos 2. 14. When a prevailing enemy comes, there's no fighting with him, but there may be an eſcape from him. A good pair of heels may do us ſervice where hands cannot. But when a people can neither fight nor flee, neither charge nor retreat, their caſe is deſperate. There is no getting from that vengeance which God ſendeth to attach and apprehend his enemies. As all outward helps ſhall fail thoſe whom God will not help; ſo God rejects the confidences which wicked men have in him. On that ſuppoſition Rabſhakeh thought to daſh the confidence of Hezekiah, and to perſwade him that he ſhould not eſcape. Is not this he in whom thou truſteſt (ſaith he) whoſe high places and whoſe altars thou haſt taken away? Thou truſteſt in God, but will God deliver thee when thou haſt thus diſhonoured him? They that deſtroy the inſtituted worſhip of God, have little reaſon to hope that God ſhould aſſiſt them; while they they offer to trust him, which is his natural worship. Seeing then God rejects the confidences which wicked men have in him, and blasteth every outward thing which they make their confidence, how is it possible for them to escape? When our Rock will not save us, how shall we be saved by a staff of reed?

The third branch of the Text wrings the very dregs of the wrath of God, into the cup of ungodly men.

Spes eorum. נפח נפש

Their hope shall be as the giving up of the ghost.

When hope dyes all dyes: hope is the last commodity which a man puts off in this life; But what is their hope worth which is as dead?

Proprie hæc phrasi significatur deliquium animæ. Est spes stolidum abominatio animæ. Vulg.

There is much variety in interpreting this expression. The word properly taken signifies swooning, or failing of the spirits. The giving up of the ghost, is the total and final failing of the spirits. He can have but few spirits left alive, whose hope hath given up the ghost. Mr. Broughton renders, Their hope is nought but pangs of the soul: The Vulgar, Their hope shall be the abomination of their soul: The sence of which translation seems to be this; That which wicked men receive in lieu of, or in answer to their great hopes, shall be an abomination to them; they hope for good, but evil cometh. And every evil is then most grievous, when it succeeds the hope of good. Hope may be said to give up the ghost, when either the good we would obtain removes further from us, or the evil we would decline comes closer to us: Hope expires when we are presented with visions of fear and sorrow, after our highest expectations of joy and comfort: Hence some translate the word (Nephesh) a breath or puff of wind; to which the hope of the wicked is elegantly compared, because it quickly vanisheth, and produceth no effect, or not the effect hoped for. That complaint of the Prophet, sutes this notion fully, (Isa. 26. 18.) We have been with child (big with hopes) we have been in pain, (endured much to enjoy our hopes, and bring them to the birth, but instead of them) we have, as it were, brought forth wind, we have not wrought any deliverance in the earth. After long looking, and long labour, all proved but a gripe of wind, or a Collick fit.

Vox Nephesh hoc loco pro illitu & simili sumitur. Bold.

Again, say others, Their hope shall be as the snuffing of the breath; that is, they shall be so angry at their disappointments, that they shall vex and snuff at it. Or thus, The things which they shall receive upon all their hopes placed in, and credit given to the creature, shall not be worth a snuff of breath; that is, they shall be light and vain: So some expound that (Mal. 1. 13.) where the Prophet brings in that people toyling under the pressures of (that which should have been their delight) the publick worship; Ye have said, Behold what a weariness is it, and ye have snuffed at it; (it is this word) they cryed out, we have brought many weighty Offerings, and Sacrifices, and what a burthen is it to do so? And ye snuffed at it; that is, ye thought much of it, or were vexed at it; so we translate: But the letter of the Original is read thus, Ye have said, Behold what a weariness is it, whereas you might have blown it away, or blown it off; as if he had said, you think you have done a great matter, and speak as if ye were all in a sweat at my service; whereas indeed you have done little for me, and what you did, you spoiled it in the doing, you have done it in an ill manner; you have brought me a poor, a lame, and a halting Sacrifice, such as a man might even blow away with his breath; and your own hearts have been more halting, lame and light, then your Sacrifice. So here, their hope shall be as a thing blown or puffed away with a breath; there shall be no stability, no subsistence in it.

Spes speratæ rei nunc sunt pro re exhibita. i. e. exhibetur pro re quæ speratur. Sic flatus pro flatu dicitur, & pro re quæ projicitur.

The words (according to our reading) teach us, that the hopes of wicked men are decaying and dying hopes. Giving up the ghost is the last act of life, and the beginning of death. As all the hopes of wicked men perish when they dye, so while they live their hopes are dying. A godly man hath not only a living, but a lively hope, (1 Pet. 1. 3.) A wicked man hath but a dying hope at best; and his hope shall be worse and worse every day, till it be utterly desperate. The Prophet Joel describeth the judgments of God upon his ancient people, by pulling off the bark of a tree (chap. 1. 7.) He hath laid my vine waste, and barked my fig-tree; He hath made it clean bare, the branches of it are white. The Caldee Paraphrast glosses it by the expression of this Text, He hath caused my fig-tree to give up the ghost; hence the meaning is plain, that, look as a tree (take it for a fig-tree, or any other tree) when you pull off the bark, bears no more fruit, but dyes; so shall the hope of a wicked man be: We may say of such a mans hope as Christ of the fig-tree which he cursed, Never fruit grow on thee more; thou art a dying tree, thou hast done thy worst, thou hast seen thy best dayes, now thy bark is peeled off, thy boughs are bare; Thy hope is as the giving up of the ghost.

Spes eorum perditio Sept. sui sc. rerumque suarum, vel quod de ipsis impiis sperari potest animæ perditio est.

Lastly, The Hebrew, having no particle of similitude, runs thus in the letter, Their hope shall be the giving up of the ghost; that is, A wicked man is often brought into such a condition, that he hath no hope but this, that his day is almost done, and himself a near neighbour unto death: He hath no hope when he dyes, yet all his hope is to dye; and that's a miserable hope. Jonah's hope (under temptation) was the giving up of the ghost; therefore he prayes hard that God would take him out of the world. Achitophel's hope was his death; he being crossed in his wicked counsel, went and hanged himself. They who are past all positive hope in this life, retire (as their last reserve) to this privative hope, O that they were dead. Not to be, is their hope who are oppressed with fears of being miserable. Despair of all good while we live, makes evil (such is death) the best of our hopes.

Spes eorum efflitio animæ i.e. tanto dolore afficientur excidentes sua spe ut sibi mortem consciscant.

The sum of all is, A wicked man is a miserable man. Put the three parts of this verse together, and you may read the worst of misery. He that never receives the good he hopes for, and sees others receive that good which he grieves for: He that cannot escape any danger which he fears, nor meet with any deliverance which he desires: He whose hopes are dying, or who hath no hope but to dye: He that is all this, is any thing but happy, and wants nothing but hell (at the very brink whereof he is, when he is all this) to make him compleatly miserable.

The Prophet Malachi gives us the opinion of those times concerning wicked men, You call the proud happy, and they that work wickedness are set up; but he tells of a time when they should return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked: There is the greatest real difference already between the righteous and the wicked: but God will make a legible difference, a difference so plain and legible, that you shall not need to call in the help of faith (which hath the most exquisite eye) to read it; sense may do it. The oldest eyes, even the eyes of the old man shall discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God, and him that serveth him not; when the one shall be burnt up root and branch in the fire and flames of Justice, and the other refresht with the healing beams of the Sun of Righteousness. Wait but a while, and you shall see God drawing out these positions in providences towards his people, and making a visible comment upon this Text of Scripture. The light of the righteous shall not fail, but the eyes of the wicked shall: The one shall be secure because there is hope; but the other hath no hope to escape, or the hope he hath shall be as the giving up of the ghost.

CHAP.

CHAP. XII. Vers. 1, 2, 3, 4.

And Job answered, and said,

No doubt but ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you.

But I have understanding as well as you; I am not inferior to you: yea, who knoweth not such things as these?

I am as one mocked of his neighbour, who calleth upon God, and he answereth him: the just upright man is laughed to scorn.

THis, and the two following Chapters, contain Job's answer to the counsel and objections of his third friend, Zophar, not excluding what had been said by the two former. There are four things most remarkable in it.

First, Job sharply rebukes that pride of spirit, and confidence of their own opinion, which he observed in his friends. He pursues this point from the beginning of the Chapter, to the end of ver. 4. No doubt but ye are the people, &c.

Secondly, He refutes that opinion which they three had maintained against him; namely, that good or evil things distinguish good and evil men; himself shewing by many arguments, taken from the various administrations of God, that outward evils are often the lot of good men; and that outward good is often the lot of evil men in this life. The Theme begins at ver. 5. and is enlarged to the end of the Chapter.

Thirdly, He rejects his friends, as Physitians of no value; yea, as having wronged God, whilst they seem to be advocates for him. This he prosecutes with much variety, from the beginning of chap. 13. to ver. 17.

Fourthly, He renews his former plea with God, putting many requests to him, and strongly arguing for a release from, or at least, a lessening and mitigation of his troubles.

The whole discourse is somewhat more pressing and sharp, then either of the former; Job's stile tasts much of the gall and vinegar, in this reply; and there was some reason it should: for seeing his friends undervaluing the defence he had made, and charging him afresh with that old leaven of hypocrisie (as if there were no way to assert the justice and holiness of God, but by condemning him for unjust and unholy) he could not take it well at their hands, but grows somewhat warm in language towards them; we shall be sensible of it in opening the body of his answer.

Then Job answered, and said.] He seems to assert, rather then to dispute; and is larger in laying down his own positions, then in answering the objections of his friends. Yet indeed a clear assertion of truth, is a sufficient confutation of error; and a clear stating of a question, is the answer of all objections.

No doubt but ye are the people.] The word is usually translated, the multitude; and it comes from a root, which signifies to cover or hide; because a multitude, or a great croud of people hide and cover the face of the earth.

עִם a עם Operuit, texit, quia multitudo terram tegit

No doubt but ye are the people: The text is taken two wayes; some read it as a plain assertion; others, as an Irony; which is a speech fill'd with derision; while the letter of it makes no doubt, the spirit of it is an absolute denial.

Vidéo quod estis populares, & vobiscum mortua est sapientia. Pagn. Vos estis hominum universitas. Tygur. Putatis quod vos estis specimen totius orbis. Vat.

They who take it as a plain assertion, read thus; Without all question you are to be reckoned (inter plebem) but as the ordinary sort of people, even as the vulgar; and wisdom is dead with you; if ever you had any wisdom, your wisdom is faded, your parts are spoiled, you have outlived your prime; you are not the men you pretend to be, the choicest and the chiefest, the cream and flower of all; no, your speech betrayes you, and saith, you are of the vulgar, of vulgar judgments, and common understandings. I see no depth or mystery in any thing ye have spoken. Thus the Pharisees speak, Have any of the rulers believed on him? but this people (this common people, this vulgar) who know not the law, are cursed, John 7. 49.

Secondly, By the people, some of the Rabbins understand the choicest, the elect of the people; so the language is ironical. No doubt but ye are the people, the choice the chosen people, the chosen of God, his elect and precious ones, his favorites and familiars, to whom he opens his bosom, and reveals his secrets; ye are the Church and people of God, to whom the divine Oracles are committed. We are thrust out among the prophane.

עם Populus, id est, מבחר דעם electus populi. Rab. Mos. ben. Nahm. Vos estis lectissimi in toto populo, at velut columnæ totius nationis. Merc.

Again, Ye are the people, that is, the chosen of the people, the representative of the whole Nation; as we may say of the House of Commons in Parliament, ye are the people of England, that is, the people have chosen you, and confide in you, as the wisest, the most judicious and faithful of your several Countries, for carrying on the affairs of the Kingdom, and maintaining of their rights. In this sense (though they are but a few hundreds, yet) they are the people of the Kingdom. Job taxeth his friends as arrogating this; Ye are the people, ye are they that would seem to be a whole Nation of men; ye (sure) have got away all the wit from the world, ye would be accounted as mankind, or as the flower of the universe; ye take it upon you as if all the world were epitomized in you three; as if all wise, learned and knowing men had delivered up, and put over their judgments and understandings, their all, into your hands; yea, as if wisdom had yielded her self captive to you, and ye had devoured all knowledge: surely ye are the men. The Lord by the Prophet Jeremy (chap. 5. 1.) bids them run to and fro through the streets of Jerusalem, to see if they could find a man: And the old Cynick went into a throng with a torch by day, to find a man. A man of wisdom and integrity is the man; other men compared to him, are but beasts. Zophar at the twelfth verse of the former chapter, compares Job to the wild asses colt, and numbers him among the beasts: here Job fits him with an expression; you carry your selves (saith he) as if you only were The men, and I, yea, all men besides, very beasts, or wild asses colts, that knew neither what ye say, nor whereof ye affirm.

Amicos modestè reprehendit asperso tamen modico sive sale sive felle sub ironica forma. Sanc.

Quoniam Zophar Jobum vellicando, pullo onagri, i. e. stupidissimo bruto comparaverat, ideo dicit, vos estis homines, cæteri ad, vos bestiæ. Merc.

And wisdom shall die with you.] Moral wisdom is the knowledge of natural things, and of their causes. Divine wisdom is the true knowledg of God and of our selves. We may suppose both wisdoms intended here; as if he had said, you pretend to so much wisdom, that if you should die, all that is called wisdom must surely die with you, there will be none (to be feared) left in the world, when you leave the world. When the Sun goes down, the light goes down; the Sun is the vessel of light: it was said of Chrysostom (who held forth much light of knowledge in his time) that it were better the Sun should be taken out of the firmament, then he from his Sphere. When some men go down, much light goes down with them: A wise holy man is both a burning and a shining light. Job puts it upon his friends as their presumption, to think so highly of themselves; his thoughts were, that wisdom would be safe, when they should not be; that the common wealth of learning would lose little or nothing, though it lost them, with all their learning; that the day of knowledge would not be darker, whensoever they with all their light should set.

Sapientia est rerum divinarum & humanarum, causarumq; quibus hæ res continentur scientia. Cic. l. 2. de Off.

Whether or no Job's friends were thus conceited of their own abilities, and preferred themselves before their brethren, is more then I dare conclude against them. Their round dealing with Job, and those magisterial lessons and advices given him, sound somewhat that way; but let it be granted that Job in his passion over-acted a little upon his friends, yet there is this truth in it, which shall be my first Observation from these words: That,

Quando non vicinum integræ mentis hæc quæ in mundo est sapientia. Bold.

That, Many are apt to over-value and over-rate their own abilities, as if they had engrossed all knowledge, and had the monopolie of wisdom in their own breasts; as if all must borrow or buy of their store, and light their candle at their torch.

Wisdom is no mans peculiar; and a great opinion of our own wisdom, savors of great folly: The very head of that monster, Papal pride, appears in this point. The Pope thinks himself to be The man, that He is the people; that all the wisdom and judgment of the world is contracted into him, and fastned to the pummels of his chair; whence he would be believed to utter Oracles with a spirit of infallibility. No man errs more then he who saith he cannot; nor is any man a greater stranger to true knowledge, then he who boasts he hath more then his neighbours. It is noted of the inhabitants of China, that as they are a witty nation, so they have a conceit of their own wit above all the nations of the earth. Hence their boast, that they have two eyes, the Europeans one, and the rest of the world is blind. But they who think all are blind, who see not with their eyes, are yet blind, and have never seen themselves. It is the emptiness of knowledge, not a fulness of it, which makes so great a sound. They who expect that all should bow to their judgments, and acquiesce in what they resolve; they, who would be esteemed to speak nothing but principles and postulata, which must be swallowed, without chewing, by an implicit faith; they, who require assent, rather then perswade it, may justly fall under the weight, and feel the smart of this scornful objurgation, ye are the men, and wisdom shall die with you. The Apostle is express, He that thinks (that is, proudly conceits) he knoweth any thing, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know (1 Cor. 8. 2.) What then doth he know, who thinks (which he cannot without highest pride) that he knoweth all things, and that all men must know (if they will know any thing) from him.

Secondly, Observe, All kind of scorn is not alwayes uncomly.

We may, without breach of charity, or stain of holiness, check pride with derision, and speak them below men, who speak themselves above men, or act what is unworthy of men. The Jews are taught by God himself to deride the proud King of Babylon, Isa. 14. 4. Thou shalt take up this proverb (or taunting speech) against the King of Babylon, and say, How hath the Oppressor ceased, the golden City ceased! &c. vers. 9, 10. Hell from beneath is moved for thee, to meet thee at thy coming; it stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the chief ones of the earth; it hath raised up from their thrones all the Kings of the nations; all they shall speak unto thee, and say, art thou also become weak as we? art thou also become as one of us? This is the Proverb which was to be taken up against the King of Babylon, and it is a taunting proverb indeed. Not only should the great Princes then alive who (ver. 8) are expressed under the shadow of Firtrees and the Cedars of Lebanon, rejoyce against him; but even the dead whom he had oppressed, are here brought in, insulting over him. When the Babylonian should tumble down to hell, the Princes there are represented rising from their places, to give this great Prince the upper hand, and the highest room in that kingdom of darkness. Thus hell it self is said to be moved, and to be, as it were, in a hurry, how to entertain that mighty King; that he who had been chief in wickedness and in pride, might have his right, to be chief in torment. The dialogue which the dead are said to have with that deceased King, is somewhat like those in which Alexander and others are derided by the dead in Lucian; Art thou become like unto us? &c. In what a heat of heavenly zeal doth Eliah deride the Priests of Baal? 1 Kin. 18. 27. Cry aloud, for he is god, either he is talking, or he is pursuing, or he is in a journey, or peradventure he sleepeth, and must be awaked. When the Prophet Micaiah, (1 King. 22. 17.) was called for to give his opinion about Ahab's expedition to Ramoth Gilead, he knowing what they would have him vote, they expected he should join with the rest, and say what they had said; therefore when Ahab asked, shall we go up to Ramoth Gilead? yea, saith he, go up and prosper; I know you have a mind to go up, I pray go; Ahab resented it as a scorn, and therefore adds, How oft shall I adjure thee, that thou tell me nothing but that which is true in the name of the Lord? They who resolve upon their way, before they ask counsel, are often counselled according to their own way, are led to error in scorn, because they had no love unto the truth. We find the Apostle Paul, in the highest elevation of his spirit, expressing himself in language extreamly parallel with this of Job. It seems the Corinthians, much like the Laodiceans, had boasted of their spiritual fulness, that they were rich, and encreased with goods, and had need of nothing. Yea, saith the Apostle, I know ye are, I will be of your opinion too for once (1 Cor. 4. 8.) Now ye are full, now ye are rich (all things go bravely with you) ye have reigned as Kings without us, that is, you exalt your selves above us here, as much as a King is above his own subjects, you are supream. I and Apollos, whose Ministry God was pleased to use in planting and watering the Gospel among you, are now looked upon as mean fellows, as men of low and poor parts; or, at best, but as some good honest dull Preachers, not worthy to be named the same day with your new and high-flown teachers (yet all this is but an holy scorn put upon them, as his correction, in the next line, imports) I would to God (saith he) that ye did reign (namely, in deed and in truth; I shall not envy you, only I would be bold to put in for a part with you) I would to God ye did reign, that we also might reign with you; I would be glad to share in those gallant Gospel-notions you so much brag of; but I fear your portion is but small in true spiritual Gospel-knowledge, except in your own conceits, and there you abound sufficiently. Again, in v. 10, though in another stile, yet fully to the sence, and almost the words of Job; We are fools for Christs sake, but ye are wise in Christ; we are weak, but ye are strong; ye are honourable, but we are despised; we are nothing, ye are all: This the Apostle speaks, as most interpreters agree, by an Irony; or if taken properly, the sence may be given thus, we are fools in the opinion of the world, possibly in yours too, because, for the Gospels sake, we expose our selves to so much hazard. But ye are wise; who so preach Christ, that ye endanger neither life nor liberty, neither persons, nor estates. Read the same strain, (1 Cor. 14. 36, 37.) What! came the word of God out from you? or came it unto you only? What! do you think that you have all the word and will of God? doth all the knowledge of Scripture, and resolution of doubts lie in your breasts, and flow out at your lips? comes all from you? have you the sole trade of Gospel-truths? he subjoins, If any man thinks himself to be a Prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you are the Commandments of the Lord: as if he had said, do not think you have got all, I have somewhat as well as you, I know what the commandment, what the will of God is. Job speaks in the next verse, as if he had read this Epistle of Paul, or had set him a pattern; for having said, No doubt ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you; he adds, Ridet spiritus carnales, videt ciro spirituales. Descendit ad gravissimam ironiam, ut ambitiosos illos ad ruborem vel invitos cogat. Bez. in loc.

Postquam serio & absque figuris vanam eorum confidentiam repressit, tum ironicos quoque eam deridet. Cal.

Hæc antithesis est ironica & plena aculeis.

Aspera objurgatio ne soli sapere Corinthii sibi videantur. Bez. Objurgatio est paulo asperior, sed quâ necesse fuit retundere superbiam Corinthiorum, qui sibi ultra modum placebunt. Calv.

Verse 3. But I have understanding as well as you, I am not inferiour unto you; yea, who knows not such things as these?

As before, he derided their ignorance, or their presumption of knowledge; so now, he puts himself into the ballance with them: you that think you have all the wisdom and knowledge, let me come in for a share with you; I have understanding as well as you, I am not inferior to you; possibly I shall weigh as heavy as you, when we are weighed together; yea, who doth not weigh as heavy as you? Who knows not such things as these?

We have here a double comparison.

First, Job compares himself with his friends, and that two wayes. 1. For the matter; That, as they had understanding, so had he: I have understanding as well as you. 2. He compares himself for the degree; my understanding is as large as yours: I am not inferiour to you.

Secondly, He makes a comparison between his friends and the rest of men; even with the vulgar and ordinary sort of men: as if he had said, Do not think that I lift my self up above my brethren, or would be reckoned for more then an ordinary man, when I say, I have understanding as well as you; for truly who knows not such things as these? yours is but the common Ephah, and your measure but the measure of a man.

I have understanding as well as you.] The Hebrew is,

Non sum excors, neque cor perdidi.

I have a heart as well as you. The heart in Scripture is put, as for the affections, so likewise for the understanding; a man without understanding, is a man without an heart: the heart is the treasury wherein the precepts and maximes of holy knowledge are laid up: A good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth good things. Hear now this, O foolish people, and without understanding. The Hebrew is, and without heart (Jer. 5. 21.) And in chap 34. of this Book of Job, ver. 32. Let men of understanding tell me; the Original is, Let men of heart tell me. And the Latines call a wise man (Cordatum) a hearty peice, a man of heart. The name of one of the twelve Apostles was Lebbeus (from Leb, the heart) signifying as much as wise, or understanding. Some, for I have understanding, read, I have courage and height of spirit, as well as you: The heart, in Scripture, is often put for courage, 2 Sam. 17. 10. He that is a valiant man, whose heart is as the heart of a Lion, shall utterly melt; that is, his courage shall fail. So the Prophet threatens, that the mighty mens hearts in Moab, in that day, shall be as the heart of a woman in her pangs (Jer. 48. 41.) The failing of the heart is the failing of courage; that's a good sense here, I have courage as well as you; or, I have spirit to stand to my cause, and maintain what I have asserted, notwithstanding all the contempt and contradictions which you have poured upon me; you have not yet made my heart fall, though my body, though my estate be cast down. You have loaded me with reproaches and heavy censures, but my spirit bears your infirmity in doing so.

Non cado à vobis, vel præ vobis, Hebraismus est, quo cadere significat abjectum esse & inferiorem.

I am not inferiour to you.] I have the same for kind, and I have as much of it as you. The Hebrew is very elegant, I do not fall before you; a man that falls before another, is subdued and overcome. He that falls under in wrestling, is prevailed over: I do not fall as the weaker, I yet keep my ground, and stand upon my legs. So the word is used, Nehem. 6. 16. When those enemies perceived how God dealt with his people, the Text saith, they were cast down in their own eyes; or, fell before their own eyes, that is, they were ashamed and dejected, because they saw the prosperity of the Jews.

There may be a threefold sence of this, I am not inferiour to you; or, I do not fall before you.

First, I am not inferiour to you in honour and dignity; I am as great a man as you.

Secondly, It may refer to holiness: I am not inferiour to you in grace; I am as good a man as you.

Thirdly, Which is specially meant; I am not inferiour to you in knowledge and understanding; I am as wise a man as you. Some render it thus, I yet fall, trip, or stumble no more then you, and I hope to stand my ground in this controversie as long as you dare stand against me. Hence observe,

> First, That, In some cases, self-commendation is not uncomly.

To boast of our understanding, proceeds from the want of it; but a man may say, I have understanding as well as you, without a boast. This is a very tender point; example from the servants of God in Scripture, teacheth us to be more ready to speak and write our blots and failings, then our good works or praises: And the rule of Scripture is, Let another man praise thee, and not thine own mouth; a stranger, and not thine own lips (Prov. 27. 2.) The Apostle also is expres, that self-commendation is no commendation (2 Cor. 10. 18.) Not he that commendeth himself, is approved; but whom the Lord commendeth. To have praise of other men, is better then to have praise of our selves; but to have praise of God, is better then to have praise of men. Yet when men dispraise us maliciously, we may justly praise our selves. Such praise is but to do our selves justice, which we are more bound to do, then to any other man.

There is a twofold commendation of our selves. There is a sinful self-commendation, when we desire to be lifted up in the opinion of the world. There is a lawful self-commendation, when we desire to be lifted up, lest the glory of God should be cast down. When the honour of God is in danger to be abated in our abatings, we may safely take all due honour to our selves; yea, we are bound to honour, and make the most (we possibly can) of our selves with truth, when either the truth, or honour of Christ must be lessened, if we do not. I think (saith Paul) that I have the spirit of God (1 Cor. 7. 10.) He speaks not, as if he doubted whether he had; but to reprove those who slighted him, as if he had not the spirit of God. While he saith only, I think I have the spirit of God, he saith more to this purpose, then if he had asserted strongly, I have the spirit of God. The confidence of the false Apostles, that they had the spirit, gave occasion, not only to suspect whether they had it, but to conclude, that they had it not: Paul's modesty, in but thinking, gave occasion to be resolute, in concluding, that he had the Spirit.

Further, Job doth not only commend himself positively, and say, I have understanding, I have wisdom; but he commends himself comparatively, which is the most unpleasing way of commendation. We use to say, comparisons are odious, and subject to misconstruction; yet Job commends himself, at least, by comparing himself with, if not preferring himself before the formost of his friends; I am not inferiour to you. Hence observe,

> A man, in some cases, may so stand upon his own honour, as not to yield or submit to others at all.

The Apostles counsel is, In lowlineß of mind, let each esteem other better then themselves (Phil. 2. 3.) and yet a time may come, when a man, with lowliness of mind enough, may judge himself better then another. When the matter lies between Saints and Saints (of such the Apostle there speaks) one Saint should not lift up himself above another, they should rather give honour one to another, and think others better then themselves: If any man hath wherein to boast, I much more (saith Paul, Phil. 3. 4.) yet he calls himself leß then the least of all Saints; amongst Saints, he cares not though he were accounted the least of Saints; but when his Ministry and Apostleship was under-rated, he speaks of himself at the highest rate, 2 Cor. 11. 5. I suppose I was not a whit behind the very chiefest Apostles, fully the language of Job here; I am not inferiour to you, no, not to the best of you. But were some of the Apostles greater and better then others? was there inferiority and superiority amongst them? No, Apostleship, as an office, is of equal honour in all Apostles; but even amongst Apostles, some had more excellent gifts, and greater enlargements; God did communicate himself more to one then to another; one of those stars differed from another star in glory: Thus among Apostles, some one might be chief: thus Paul was not behind (which I take for a modest expression, that he was even with, yea, that he, in some things, went before, or outwent) the chiefest of the Apostles. He indeed confesseth at chap. 12. of the same Epistle, ver. 11, 12. I am become a fool in glorying; as if he had said, it is the guise and character of a fool, affectedly to commend himself, but (I have not affected it) ye have compelled me to it, for I ought to have been commended by you (that is, ye ought to have given testimony to my integrity, and to have maintained the honour of my Ministry) for in nothing am I behind the very chiefest Apostles, though I be nothing; though you, through envy, account me nothing; and though I, in humility, would account my self nothing, yet (being now put to it) I must speak it out, I am not behind the very chiefest Apostles: or, as some render from the letter of the Greek; I want nothing, (not a hairs breadth) of their measure, who are Apostles above measure; I am as much an Apostle, as they who are more then much Apostles. All this while, Paul was no Braggadochio, no vain Thraso: He doth not contend personally with the Apostles for preheminence or primacy, but he checks those who hoped to be excused in undervaluing him, because they valued other Apostles above him, or pretended to have received Gospel-mysteries from some other of the Apostles (whose great confidents and familiars they would be esteemed) beyond all that Paul had ever yet taught. Paul (I say) never wrangled with any of the Apostles for the upper hand; he never said to Matthew, Thomas, or Andrew, &c. I am not behind you; or, I am better then thou. But because they made use of the parts and gifts of some of the Apostles, to slight his, he, who somewhere saith, I am not worthy to be called an Apostle; saith here, I am not behind the greatest, the chiefest of the Apostles. Thus we may stand upon terms of credit with any who lay our persons low, that they may disparage our work, and lay that service low to which God hath called us.

Solomon gives us an excellent observation (Prov. 25. 26.)

A righteous man falling down before the wicked, is as a troubled fountain, and a corrupt spring. Some interpret it thus, A righteous man falling into sin, before, that is, in the company or presence of the wicked, is as a corrupt spring, many begin to suspect that his waters are not wholesom, when they see such corruption swimming at the top, and so refuse to drink him any more, &c. to accept his counsels or instructions. This is a useful explication; yet I rather give the sence from the point in hand: A righteous man falling, that is, basely submitting, or creeping poorly to a wicked man, is as a troubled fountain. Many a righteous man is made to fall down before the wicked. Abel fell down before Cain; for he murdered him: and so have thousands of righteous souls fallen before their bloody persecutors; but for a righteous man actively to fall down, to crouch or stoop to wicked ones, either through fear or flattery, is an act unworthy a righteous man. A righteous man thus falling before the wicked, what is he? or to what shall we liken him? Solomon tells us, he is as a troubled fountain, and a corrupt spring. A righteous man is a wholesom fountain, a spring of pure water, many may refresh themselves at him; but he, by this his act, becomes a troubled fountain, he hath mudded the purity of his own soul, with worldly respects and carnal interests, else he had never bowed to that generation of golden Idols, and graven Images. Noble Mordecai would not fall before proud Haman: He chose rather (if that must have been the issue of it) to fall down by his power, then to fall down unto his person. Giants are called Nephalim, from this word, Fallers, because men, beholding their vast limbs, and dreadful stature (like the Army of Israel before great Goliah) fall before them for fear. There are Giants still in every Land (though not in body, such are very rare, yet in mind) they would be Nephalim, all must fall before and submit unto them; they would be Josephs, every mans sheaf must make obeisance unto theirs. Paul would never fall down to false Apostles, nay, he would not to a true Apostle, when he did not walk according to the truth; he withstood Peter to the face, because he was to be blamed, Gal. 2. 11, 14. Though Christians ought, in lowliness, to submit to one another; and in duty, to submit to Magistracy, and the higher powers, yet they must not submit to the pride or lust of any how high soever. Thus to bow before wicked men, is somewhat like bowing to an Idol. To adore them, is to dishonour God; yea, to make them Gods.

Heb. Cum quo non sunt hæc?

Who knows not such things as these?] As he had ballanced himself with his friends, so he thought any man might. Such a treasure of knowledge as this, is no mans peculiar: We may gather up such upon the common; we need not travel to the oracles of learning for it, he that knows any thing, knows what you say; he that is not (such as you think me to be) a wild asses colt, a very fool, may fathom all your notions; they carry no such depth, but that line enough may be had in any mans brain to reach their bottom. Who knows not such things as these? Hence note,

First, There are some common principles, and easie truths, which fall under every mans apprehension.

Who knows not such things as these? The Apostle (Heb. 6. 1.) speaks of the first principles of the doctrine of Christ. The objects of knowledge are of various degrees, according to the degrees of capacity in the subject. (Heb. 5. 14.) we read of strong meat for men of full age, and milk for babes. The youngest child feeds on milk. Who knows not such things as these? Some principles in Religion are of so easie a digestion, that even babes in Christ may feed upon them, and suck them in. We say of those commodities which are rich and high-prized, they are not every mans money; so we may say of those truths which are dark and mysterious, they are not for every understanding: He that hath an understanding, may understand so much of the mystery of Christ, as may light him safe to heaven, though some things are too high for those who are highest, to understand fully, while they are here upon the earth.

Secondly, Observe, Who knows not such things as these?

It is a shame not to be acquainted with common principles.

Every one knows these things; what? not understand that which the meanest may understand? We find the Apostle improving this argument, Rom. 2. 4. Where (having convinced the Gentiles in the former Chapter, for sinning against the light of nature, and the benefits of creation) he proceeds to convince the Jews for sinning against the light of Scripture, and the mercies of redemption. Despisest thou the riches of the goodness and forbearance of God, &c. Not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance? Art thou a Jew, one that boastest of so much knowledge, and dost not thou know this common principle? dost not thou know the meaning of the goodness and forbearance of God? every child in holy knowledge knows the voyce of mercy, that it bespeaks our return to God, or leads us to repentance. The Apostle deals with the Corinthians upon the same ground (1 Cor. 11. 14.) about the wearing of long hair, Doth not nature it self teach you? It is a shame for you to be ignorant of that which you may learn at the school and university of nature? nature teacheth, that if a man have long hair, it is a shame unto him. It is not only a sin, but a dishonour for a man, to do that, which his being a man tells him he should not do. By a like insinuation Paul labours to keep the Ephesians at furthest distance from gross sins; for this ye know (saith he) that no whoremonger, &c. hath any inheritance in the Kingdom of God and Christ. This is a received truth; do you not know this? I know ye know it. Some truths can hardly be known by all our study, many are known without any study. It is almost as hard to be ignorant of some things, as it is to know other things. There will be a sore reckoning with the world one day, because they are not seen in the deep mysteries of Christ, having been often shewed them; but when it shall be found, that they are not seen in that, which they could not but see, except they had shut their eyes, this will render them altogether inexcusable, and shut their mouths for ever. The more easie any truth is, the harder will be our suffering, and the greater our sin, if we attain not to the knowledge of it.

Thirdly, Job's friends carried it, as if their discourse had been all riddle and mystery; yet he tells them, Who knows not such things as these? Hence note,

It is a vanity to pretend mysteriousness about vulgar truths.

Some cover the Sun with clouds, and put disguises upon the plainest doctrines. They dig deep for that which lies above ground; and in stead of enlightning what is dark, darken the cleerest light. They speak and write of things as new and never known, whenas all that hear or read them, may justly reprove them with that ancient proverb, You tell us news; or in the language of this Text, who knows not such things as these?

Job having thus rebuked the pride of his friends, begins to check their scorn.

Verse 4. I am as one mocked of his neighbour, who calleth upon God, and he heareth him; the just upright man is laughed to scorn.

I am as one mocked of his neighbour.] The word signifies scorning joyned with laughter, strictly called derision. The letter of the Hebrew is, I am the laughter (the sport or pastime) of my neighbour; he speaks partly in the first, and partly in the third person: He doth not say, I am as one mocked of my neighbour; that had cast it too directly upon his friends; but, I am as one that is mocked of his neighbour, and so lets it light where it will. Job's comforters had high thoughts of themselves, and low thoughts of him. A man that is mocked, is under the greatest contempt, and meanest estimation. I am as one mocked, &c. as if Job had said, Instead of comforting, informing, and supporting me, you have mocked me in my adversity.

Nolnit Job dicere prima persona, socio meo, sed socio suo in tertia, ut modestius loqueretur. Merc.

Observe, It is an addition to affliction, to be mocked in affliction.

Mocking is one of the greatest afflictions. Amongst the sufferings and cruel persecutions that the Saints endured, the Apostle mentions this, They had trial of cruel mockings, (Heb. 11. 36.) Who knows how deep sharp words will enter, and what wounds they will make? They not only wound the name, but the spirit; they stab to the heart. It was one great part of the sufferings of Christ, he was mocked and used like a fool in a play; they put a robe on his back, a reed in his hand, and a crown upon his head; and when he hung on the cross, finishing the work of our salvation, they (in

(in highest scorn) Bid him save himself. The Apostle Jude assures us, that the Lord is coming to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly of all their hard speeches which they have spoken. Hard speeches are as bad as hard blows; and amongst all hard speeches, mockings are the hardest. A man will easier receive a blow from his friend, then a scorn from his friend: Scorning is fundamentally opposite to the fundamental laws of love. This is the second ingredient which imbittered his sufferings; I am as one that is mocked of his neighbour.

Ab amicis acceptæ contumeliæ acutiũ habẽt molestissimum.

Secondly, Note, The nearer they are from whom we receive discourtesies, the nearer they go to our hearts.

A wound from a hand afar off, is far off from our hearts. What? Thou my friend, Thou my familiar use me thus? The mock of a neighbour is cutting, almost killing. The unkindness of a friend hath most of the enemy in it. When Christ perceived his own Disciples withdrawing, he was extreamly troubled at it. Many of the people were offended, and went back, and walked no more with him; and he complained not, he expected no better from them: But when he saw his Disciples hang a little off, he expostulates, Will ye also go away? (John 6. 67.) What, you my Disciples? As if he had said, That will be a cross indeed, your departure will be a home-affliction; it is no wonder if others do it; but will ye do it? will ye go away too? And because the sufferings of Christ, were to be the highest in all aggravating circumstances, that they might answer all the aggravations of our sins, therefore he was wounded (as the Prophet speaks) in the house of his friends, betrayed by his own Disciple, and by a Disciple kissing him. Betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss? (Luke 22. 48.) Any treason is bad enough, but the treason of a Disciple, and of a Disciple kissing is worst of all. But as it behoved Christ to fulfil all righteousness, so to receive all unkindnesses, and therefore this. Though (as I have noted already) Job was not a type of Christ, yet their sufferings were very like: Christ was wounded by the lips, and Job by the tongue of a friend. I am as a man mocked of his neighbour,

Who calleth upon God, and he answereth him.

There is a difference among Expositors about the Antecedent of this Who: whether it should be referr'd to Job, or to the neighbour about whom Job speaks. I am as a man mocked of his neighbour; who, which neighbour calls upon God, and he answers him. So some understand it, and then the words are a description of Job's neighbour, I am as a man that is mocked of his neighbour; And what kind of neighbour is he? He is one that useth to call upon, and to be heard of God; he is a man acquainted with God in prayer. The Hebrew word, which we translate to call upon God, notes a sort of men, whose chief business, or trade, was to call upon, or invocate the Name of God (Psal. 99. 6.) Moses and Aaron among his Priests, and Samuel among them that call upon his Name; they called upon the Lord, and he answered them: implying, that it was their special calling to call upon God. So saith Job, I am as one mocked of his neighbour; which neighbour is one that calls upon God; that's his profession, or his work; and 'tis, as a painful, so a most noble work. Prophets and Priests were professed callers upon God. That interpretation of the word gives the sence thus, I am derided by neighbours, who yet are such as would be loth that God should deride them: they deride me, whose duty it is to pray for me, and to pray with me; you are men of prayer, men that call upon God, and you have the favour to be heard of God; God is facile and favourable unto you, but ye are hard and sowre to me, you shew me no favour: how uncomely a thing is this, that you, who wait to be heard of God, should not hear me? or that you, who are heard of God, should deride me? This Exposition, as it may stand with the letter of the Text, so it may teach us this lesson:

Dicitur cui ex officio incumbit invocare Deũ. Bold.

Siccine ludus & fabula ero etiam illis, qui in Dei famulatu socii mei sunt ejusdemque consortes ministerii? Bold.

Ego risui sum socio meo, qui sc. socius, quoties deum inclamat eum exaudit: q. d. deum in omnibus facilẽ habent.

They who have had experience of Gods tenderness to help them, and hear their prayers, should be very tender to others, when they call to them, and seek their help?

What? Should I be mocked of a neighbour that useth to call upon God? such carriage looks like theirs who call not upon God. You that have had answers from God in prayer, and know what it is to be answered, think what it is for you but to deny a friend, especially to mock a friend, when he calls upon you in the day of his calamity. Will you take it well if God deny you, or send a mock in steadof an answer to your prayer? You that have any suit to God, be not hard, much less inexorable, when distressed friends sue unto you.

But the Antecedent seems rather to be Job himself. I am as one mocked of his neighbour; who, that is, which man thus mocked, doth yet call upon God, and he answers him: They mock him, but God doth not mock him. Or thus, I am as one mocked of his neighbour; who thereupon takes an advantage to call upon God, to go to God, when he cannot be entertained, or is rejected by men, and he hears him. The vulgar translation reacheth this sence very clearly, He who is derided of his neighbour as I am, will call upon God, and God will hear him.

Qui deridetur ab amico, sicut ego, invocabit deum & exaudiet eum. Vulg. Et respondet illi i.e. ut exaudiatur ab eo, emollietur interpretatio si & sumatur pro ut. Antehac cũ ad dẽum clamarem, me exaudire solebat, sed & nunc eum idem facturum non despero, me nunc qui talis sum vos mei socii ridetis? Merc.

There is a difference in the latter clause, And he answereth him; we put it in the Present tense, He answereth him; others in the Preterperfect tense, He hath answered him; some in the Future, He will answer him: He calleth upon God, that he may answer him, or to be answered by him: So Abraham speaks (Gen. 23. 8.) Intreat for me to Ephron, that he may give me the cave of Machpelah: Thus here, He calls upon God, and he answereth him; that is, he calleth upon God that he may answer him; he hopeth to speed well in Heaven with his petition, though he speed ill on earth.

Hence observe, First, It is the priviledge of the Saints, when men fail and reject them, to make God their refuge, and their recourse to Heaven.

They who have interest in God, know how to make this improvement of it: If the world cast out the Saints, God will take them in: His stile is, The helper of the friendless. And David's experience was, When my father and my mother forsake me, the Lord taketh me up, (Psal. 27. 10.) that is, Though my father and mother, who are nearest to me, should be so unnatural, as to restrain their bowels, and forsake me; or though they should be restrained from doing me those offices which Nature dictates, yet the Lord takes me up, sc. in the everlasting arms of mercy: His love never changes, nor can any thing stop the motions of his love. His love is hottest to us, when the love of man waxeth cold. The departures of friends bring him nearer to us; and where creature comforts end, the comforts of God begin. They are in a sad condition, who being cast off by men, have not a God to call upon, and go unto. Only they who can have access to God, need not fear the recesses of men.

Ubi deest auxilium humanum, ibi maximè adest auxilium divinũ Aquin. in loc.

Secondly, Observe, That the repulses which we meet with in the world, should drive us nearer to God.

I (saith Job) am mocked of my neighbour; What course shall I take? Shall I lye down and vex? Shall I fret my self, and pine away? I know a better way then that: I will call upon God, I will try what's to be had in Heaven, now that the earth hath nothing for me; men have not an ear for me, but sure enough God hath not only an ear to hear, but a heart to pity, and a hand to work deliverance. The holy Prophet resolves, It is good for me to draw nigh to God, (Psal. 73. 28.) And when he saith, 'tis good, his meaning is, 'tis best. This positive is superlative. It is more then good for us to draw nigh to God at all times; it is best for us to do so; and it is at our utmost peril not to do so; For lo, (saith the Psalm, vet. 27.) they that are far from thee shall perish; thou shalt destroy them that go a whoring from thee. It is dangerous to be far from God; but it is more dangerous to go far from him. Every man is far off by nature; and wicked men go further off: The former shall perish; the latter shall be destroyed: He that fares best in his withdrawings from God, fares bad enough: Therefore it is best for us to draw nigh unto God. He is the best friend at all times, and the only friend at some times. And may we not say, that God suffers and orders evil times, and the withdrawings of the creature for that very end, that we might draw nearer unto him? doth he not give up the world to a spirit of reviling and mocking, that he may stir up in his people a spirit of praying? This is a gracious design of God, and we should interpret the neglects, the contempts and scorns of the world, to be as the Voice of God saying to us, Come to me, and see whether you shall not have better usage; see whether I will scorn you; you have loved the world too much, you have too much pleased your selves with the smiles and good looks of men; you have been taken and overtaken with the things of this life, come to me, and take (you cannot overtake) the things of eternal life. The least things of Heaven are more noble then the greatest things on earth. Shall we not then prize the great things of Heaven much, when we can hardly enjoy the least things of the earth? Shall we not, when we are mocked of our neighbours, call upon God, we having this assurance, that he will not mock, but answer us?

And he answereth him.] The answer which God makes to such as call upon him, is either to the outward, or to the inward man: he answers the inward man, or the spirit of man, by a hint from his Spirit. Satisfaction to our spirits, is an answer from the Spirit. When the Lord (having said to the soul, I am thy salvation) saith also, I am thine honour, I am thy credit, I am thy liberty, I am thy riches, I am thy friend; the soul is more abundantly filled then with riches, credit, liberty, friends, or honour. Again, answer comes to the outward man, Providence speaks to some as the Spirit doth to others. We having called upon God, see the creature at work towards a redress of our evils, and a supply of our present wants. Under the Law God answered many wayes: He answered by Urim and by Thummim, by Prophets and by dreams, by visions and revelations. And though we have not such answers now, yet we have as sure answers. God never receives any prayer which doth not receive an answer. We may call upon men, and not be answered; men may go to idols, to lying vanities, and not be answered; but if we go to God, we shall.

Hence observe, Prayer and seeking unto God are not in vain, or fruitless.

The Lord will answer. Sometimes he answers before we call; and he gives before we ask; and he promiseth, if we ask he will give; and answer if we call. Christ raiseth up our confidence, that God will hear us, because men do. (Math. 7. 9, 10.) What man (saith he) is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone? or if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent? Christ argues from that readiness which is in men (especially in those who are in relation to us) to give, that God will give much more. If ye then being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father, which is in Heaven, give good things to them that ask him? If a father will answer when a son asks him, much more will God: Yea though when a son asks, a father will not answer; though when a son asks, a father mocks, and in stead of bread gives him a stone; in stead of fish a serpent; though in stead of granting, he cross his sons petition; yet be confident your Father in Heaven will answer; he will not mock; he will not give stones for bread, nor a serpent for fish; he loves to be giving, and to be giving good gifts is his delight.

Further, From these words, taken together, we may observe,

That, As it is sinful, so it is extreamly dangerous to mock those who have the ear of God, or acceptance with God in prayer.

Will you use him ill that can go and tell God how you have used him, and shall be sure to be heard? It is uncomely to mock an enemy, it is more for one friend to mock another; it is yet worse to mock a friend in his affliction; but it is worst of all to mock any man living that is praying in faith, and humbling himself before God. Such the Psalmist brands, Ye have shamed the counsel of the poor, because God is his refuge, (Psal. 14. 6.) That is, ye have derided godly men, when ye have heard them pray in their affliction. The great Wits and Politicians of the world smile at the simplicity of those, who make such a business of prayer in times of distress: who, when they hear of any troubles arising, presently give this counsel, Come, let us go pray, and seek God. This counsel of the poor they shame, and think them silly fellows who give it. They had rather lay their heads together a plotting, then their hearts together a praying. And if such joyn in counsel to call for prayers in times of trouble, it is not out of an opinion, much less out of faith that it will do any good, or prevail any thing, but only to please the people, or comply with a party: for in truth they shame those counsels of the poor, as the poorest counsels. Some are ashamed of prayers; and others will put them to shame who pray. The best I can do for such as deride prayer, or those who pray, is to pray for them, as Christ for his crucifiers, Father forgive them, for they know not what they do. Do you know what you do, when you mock a man that can pray? I believe you do not, therefore I will tell you: you mock that Spirit by which he prayes; you provoke God to whom he prayes; you stir up the whole Church against you, for whom he prayes, you set the Chariots and Horsemen of Israel against you, you turn Armies against you; that is, you turn the prayers of all the people of God against you, when you turn against prayer. Do you know what it is to provoke such who can complain to God of your provocations? You were better have tales told of you to the greatest enemy you have in the world, then to have tales told of you unto God, by those, whom he is pleased to number among his friends.

Job having thus set forth how he had been assaulted by men, and how he had retreated to God; now layes down a general proposition, as a corrollary, or conclusion, drawn from all, The just upright man is laughed to scorn.

The just upright man.] Job speaks still in the third person, he doth not say, I who am a just upright man, am derided, he speaks modestly as Paul, 2 Cor. 12. I knew a man. So here, The just upright man.

Both words are near a kin in signification, the one, at most, doth but explain and heighten the other. The just upright man, is the man justly upright, or uprightly just. The latter word is plural in the Original, (as Gen. 6. 9.) noting a man that acts in the exactness of uprightness, even all manner of uprightnesses; or a man so upright, that he hath the uprightness of many men in him; for as we say of some men, who are egregiously dishoneſt, that when dishoneſt men are scarce, they may go for twain; so some men are so exactly upright, that where upright men are scarce (as they are every where) they may be reckoned for two, or many.

But how is this just man, who hath the uprightness of many men in him, entertained in the world? do not all reverence and adore him? The next words shew us his usage, The just upright man

Is laughed to scorn.] He was mockt before; now he is laughed to scorn. The Original is the same, though the sence be extended; he is not only laughed at, but he is a laughter. The perfect, just, is a mockage, so Mr. Broughton, the abstract is put for the concrete. A man that is through in justice, through in integrity and purity, this man is made a laughing stock, a jest, a sport, he is loaded with disgrace, while some are unburdening themselves of sorrow. They resolve to laugh and be fat, to be merry and sing care away, they want a theme, a subject; none so fit as the just upright man: Come let's pass upon him: Thus He is laughed to scorn. As if Job had said, It is no great wonder to see that I am mocked of my neighbour, for this is according to the wont and old custom of the world, the just upright man meets with such dealing every where; it is no new thing which I suffer, mine is but a common lot with the best of the Saints: If I am laughed to scorn, so have my betters been.

שחוק Irrisio justus perfectus. Heb. Hic te ludos facit. Plaut.

Hence note, First, That holiness is under disgrace among unholy men.

It is not alwayes a disparagement to be laughed at; the best may be laughed at; The just upright man is so. Jeremiah was more then so, he was a Prophet of the Lord, yet he saith, I was a derision to all my people, and their song all the day, Lam. 3. 14. He was a derision, and a derision to all his people. Some read thus, I, together with all my people, am a derision; as noting, that he and all that adhered to him, or owned him, were derided. So speaks the Prophet Isaiah typically of Christ, Chap. 8. 18. Behold I, and the children which thou hast given me, are for signs and for wonders in Israel. Our Translation makes all his people deriders of him: And then all doth not include every individual, but only shews the great and general Apostacy of that people, from all respect to this Prophet, or to his ministry. How often doth holy David, that heavenly Singer, complain of those who made hellish songs upon him? And Job complains of this more then once, read Chap. 12. 2, 6. Chap. 21. 3, &c. Paul was one of the ablest speakers, in the mysteries mysteries of the Gospel, that ever lived: yet when he came to Athens (Acts 17.) they say, What will this babler say? Solomon gives us a Proverb to this point (Prov. 14.2.) He that walketh in his uprightness, feareth the Lord; but he that is perverse in his wayes, despiseth him. It is a truth, if we understand the antecedent to him, to be the Lord, and so make the opposition thus, He that walketh in his uprightness, feareth the Lord; but he that is perverse in his wayes, despiseth him; that is, despiseth the Lord. But the meaning of the Proverb is this, A man walking in his uprightness feareth God, but a perverse man will despise him that walketh in his uprightness. You are so precise, you go so gingerly, as if you were passing a narrow bridge over a deep precipice; you will not turn aside, or step awry, not you: thus he is despised. The Apostle reports us a great example of this unholy scorn, (Gal. 4. 9.) He that was born after the flesh, did persecute him that was born after the spirit. Ishmael persecuted Isaac. Moses tells us the manner how, and the weapon wherewith; Ishmael did not lift up his hand against Isaac, (as Cain did against Abel) but his tongue: He mocked him, (Gen. 21. 9.) Those greatest differences in Divine Heraldry, of being born after the flesh, and after the spirit, shew where the quarrel lay; it was the spiritualness of Isaac, which rendred him so obnoxious to his carnal brother Ishmael. Isaac was born after the spirit, and doubtless he shewed some fruits of the Spirit, which Ishmael did not relish, and therefore mocked him. Even so it is now (saith the Apostle there) and we may now say, Even so it is now: The reason of it is that of the Apostle (1 Cor. 2. 14.) The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him. A rational man laughs at, and scorns a foolish thing: Now the natural man hath reason enough (he may be a man of the most sublimated reason) but having no grace he understands not the things of the Spirit of God, therefore they are foolishness unto him: Those things which are fullest of Divine wisdom, are counted most foolish by him that understands them not. As, they are fools who cannot understand; so some wise men count many things foolish which yet are above their understanding. No marvail then, if they use them as foolish things, if they mock and scorn them: No marvail, if they deride those who trouble themselves with such baubles and toyes as they conceive the things of God to be: No marvail, if they count them a company of hair-brain fellows, who are most conscientious about them. Hence it is that Gospel simplicity is mockt as simpleness; punctual obedience, as scrupulousness; sorrow for sin, as dumpishness; zeal, as madness; contempt of the world, as ignorance of the worth of it; self-denial, as a wronging of our selves. It is recorded in the life of Nero, that the Christians were despised, and mockt, as a sect of silly fools, by the wise Citizens, and grave Senators of Rome, because they seemed to use a strange kind of superstition, or a new Religion, and would be wiser in their generation then the rest of the world. Reproach is one of Satans choice engines to batter Sion with; he hath scarce such another shaft in all his quiver to wound Religion at the heart with. This Lion in the way frights many from entring into, or appearing in the wayes of God. It causeth others to apostatize, and forsake the wayes of God, after they have entred into, and for a time appeared in them. As Zedekiah durst not obey the word of the Lord, in rendring himself to the Babylonians; so many are afraid to obey the word of the Lord, in rendring themselves up to Sion, lest some finding them there should mock them, Jer. 38. 39.

Secondly, Observe, As holiness in any degree is subject unto scorn, so they who are most holy meet with most scorn.

The just upright man, who would be holy to the height, shall have scorn to the height. If a man serve God (as David danced before the Ark) with all his might, a Michals wit will mock and teem with a prophane jest, though she be cursed with barrenness all her life after. That child of the flesh made her flesh childless unto the day of her death, 2 Sam. 6. 23. If a man do (as Christ expects) some singular things, he may quickly be laughed at for singularity. Paul, in the highest actings of his faith, was accounted mad, 2 Cor. 5. 13. It is possible to move in the ordinary course and common round of Religion, and to have fair quarter, yea to have respect, and be accounted wise in the world; but he that will be a just upright man, that is, he that sticks at small matters, and acts the greatest; he that will not go an hairs breadth from the mind of Christ, and will do his whole mind; he that will walk precisely, accurately, and, as we say, in print, this man may soon have the honour to be called, a fool in print; at best he shall be laughed at, let him look for it. All holiness may come under contempt; but the more holy you are, the more subject you are unto contempt: never think to get credit in the world by your holiness: It is enough that holiness hath credit with God and good men. The Apostle assures us (Heb. 11.) That those Worthies of the Jewish Church (whose names sparkle like bright stars in the firmament of that chapter) obtained a good report, through faith, (ver. 2.) But of whom, or with whom? Did the world think the better of them, or well of them, because of those high and heroical actings of their faith? No, vers. 36. tells us, they were both scourged, and mockt by the world, for all their faith. These gallant men in grace, had a good report with none but gracious men, and the God of grace. If we will now live after their rate by faith, and walk in the uppermost regions of Religion, we must expect a good report there only, where they found it. Those works of faith, which are most above reason, seem to be without reason; and that which is most pleasing unto God, seems to have not so much as any thing of a man in the eyes of many men: you venture not only liberty, estate, and life, but your very discretion, if you walk in the cleanest paths of wisdom. Few have holy wisdom enough to be accounted fools, or seriousness enough in the things of God to be laughed at, especially to be laughed to scorn. No man knows where his worldly losses will end, when once he hath gained Christ. It is an experienced truth, which is lent us by a Noble Patriot yet living; That man will but deceive himself, who hopes to save any thing by his Religion but his soul. The just upright man is laughed to scorn; and the more just he is, the more he is laughed at.

VERS. 5, 6.

He that is ready to slip with his feet, is as a lamp despised in the thought of him that is at ease.
The tabernacles of robbers prosper, and they that provoke God are secure, into whose hand God bringeth abundantly.

IN the former context, which contained the preface to this ensuing discourse, Job taxeth the pride and self-conceitedness, the scorn and contemptuousness of his friends. They thought themselves the chief of men, and mocked him; as if he had not been so much as a man, or not to be numbred among men.

Now he enters upon the Argument it self: And in these two verses layes down two Positions in direct opposition to what Zophar had asserted. He at the seventeenth verse of the eleventh Chapter, describes the state of a godly man, exceeding the light of the noon-day, and of the morning: Thine age shall be clearer then the noon-day, and thou shalt be as the morning, &c. And at the twentieth verse he gives ungodly men their doom: The eyes of the wicked shall fail; and their hope shall be as the giving up of the ghost. Both these conclusions are contradicted by Job; the former in the fifth verse, and the latter in the sixth. In the fifth, He that is ready to slip with his feet, is as a lamp despised: As if he had said, Thou tellest me, that a godly man shall be brighter then the Sun at noon; that his brightness shall increase like the Morning-sun, more and more unto the perfect day; whereas, alas, I see all the light which many a godly man hath, no bigger then a candle, or lamp, and that not like the light of a great candle neither, or of a goodly beautiful lamp, but like the light of some poor candle, or of the meanest lamp. There is a great difference between a lamp and the Sun. What is the light of the most shining lamp, to the light of the Sun? but the difference is greater between the Sun and a base blinking lamp. I see their light no clearer, then that of a despised lamp, whose light thou talkest up to the Sun at noon for clearness. The holiest men, if afflicted, do but smother in stead of shining. Again, Thou tellest me, that the eyes of the wicked shall fail, and that their hope shall be as the giving up of the ghost; but I have often seen, and can give thee proof of it, the eyes of ſuch are bleſt, and refreſht with the deſire of their eyes; they ſee what they moſt deſire, proſperity in their dwellings. The tabernacles of robbers proſper, and they that provoke God are ſecure, into whoſe hand God bringeth abundantly. Thus the oppoſition ſtands in theſe two verſes, as they are an anſwer to what Zophar had promiſed as the portion of the righteous, and threatned as the lot of wicked men.

He that is ready.] That is, he that is very near ſlipping. The Hebrew (Nachon) ſignifies to be prepared or diſpoſed, yea to be deſtinated to ſuch a purpoſe, it ſignifies alſo to be fixed and ſetled (Pſal. 108.) O God, my heart is fixed, or, my heart is ready. He that is ready to ſlip, is, as it were, fixed to ſlip, he is ſet in a ſtate wherein he cannot ſtay. All men in the world are in an unſetled eſtate, in a ſlippery condition, but ſome are in a more ſlippery condition then others; They are (as we ſay) next door to deſtruction, within a ſtep of danger, ready to tumble and fall from the pinacle of their proſperity. There are preparations for ruine as well as for riſing. He that is ready

To ſlip with his feet.] There is a twofold ſlipping with the feet ſpoken of in Scripture.

Firſt, There is a ſlipping into ſin; of that David ſpeaks, Pſal. 73. 2. As for me, my feet were almoſt gone, my ſteps had well nigh ſlipt, when I ſaw the proſperity of the wicked; that is, I had almoſt ſinned, I was tempted to hard thoughts of God and of his wayes, as he explains himſelf at the 13th verſe of that Pſalm, ſhewing what the ſlip was, Then ſaid I, verily I have cleanſed my heart in vain, and waſhed my hands in innocency; This was the thing he was ready to fall into, to look upon all his labour, as loſt labour, as labour in vain, which he had beſtowed in attendance upon the duties of holineſs and repentance.

Secondly, Slipping with the feet, is to fall into affliction. When we decay and decline in honour, credit, riches, and poſſeſſions, we may be ſaid to have got a ſlip. 'Tis a proverbial ſpeech, and we find it frequent in Scripture; his foot ſhall ſlip, that is, he ſhall down, his ſtate ſhall change. Moſes deſcribes the Lord thus ſpeaking of his enemies, (Deut. 32. 35.) To me belongeth vengeance and recompence, what then? Their foot ſhall ſlide in due time. Theſe men ſuppoſed themſelves ſetled upon a rock, that they were ſo eſtabliſhed that nothing could remove them; but in due time they ſhall find that they ſtood upon ice, or glaſs, their foot ſhall ſlide, they ſhall fall from their heights and ſeeming holds in due time. So (Pſal. 94. 18.) When I ſaid, my foot ſlippeth, thy mercy, O Lord, held me up, that is, when I gave my ſelf for a loſt man in the world, then the Lord ſupported me, (Jer. 13. 16.) Give glory to the Lord your God, before he cauſe darkneſs, and before your feet ſtumble upon the dark mountains. Dark mountains, are mountains of ſorrow and trouble: to ſtumble upon the dark mountains, is to be ruined among our troubles. To ſtumble, ſlip, fall, run all into the ſame ſenſe. In purſuance of which, the ſtate of wicked men is called a ſlippery ſtate, and the place upon which they ſtand, a ſlippery place, Pſal. 73. 18. David being much troubled at the proſperity of wicked men, and ſo troubled that his ſteps had well nigh ſlipt, ſtayed, or recovered himſelf, by remembring that his enemies did not ſtand faſt. I went into the Sanctuary of God, and there I found that thou didſt ſet them in ſlippery places: and when he found that their eſtate was ſlippery, that they ſhould ſhortly fall, then he kept his ground and ſtood upright. Who can envy or be grieved to ſee a man in an eſtate great and proſperous, wherein yet there is no continuance, or from which he muſt ſhortly fall, and in the fall bruiſe and hurt himſelf more, then he did comfort himſelf in his ſtanding? all the things of this life, eſpecially to wicked men, are ſet in ſlippery places. The world it ſelf is ſlippery, and ſo is all that's in it. The world may be compared to that ſea of glaſs, (Rev. 4. 6.) It is a ſea for the uncertain motions, and tempeſtuouſneſs of it; and it is like a ſea of glaſs for the ſlipperineſs of it. Glaſs you know yields no good footing, neither doth the world to any that would ſtay themſelves upon it. And as the ſliding of our feet ſpeaks the change; ſo the firmneſs of our feet, the eſtabliſhment of our eſtate, Pſal. 121. 3. He will not ſuffer thy foot to be moved; a man cannot go without moving of his feet; and a man cannot ſtand whoſe feet are moved. The foot by a Synechdoche is put for the whole body, and the body for the whole outward eſtate: ſo that, He will not ſuffer thy foot to be moved, is, he will not ſuffer thee, or thine, to be moved or violently caſt down. The power of thine oppoſers ſhall not prevail over thee, for the power of God ſuſtains thee. He will not ſuffer, &c. Many are ſtriking at thy heels, but they cannot ſtrike them up, while God holds thee up. If the will of thine enemies might ſtand, thou ſhouldeſt quickly fall; But God will not ſuffer, &c.

Hence Obſerve, That the beſt earthly eſtate in it ſelf, is a tottering eſtate.

An earthly eſtate is ſo, whoſoever is the maſter of it, unleſs God will be the eſtabliſher of it. This text ſpeaks of the afflictions of the godly; their outward eſtate is full of uncertainties, their feet (treading earth) are ſubject to ſlide. David once thought himſelf ſo ſetled, that he ſhould never fall, In my proſperity I ſaid, I ſhall never be moved: Lord, by thy favour thou haſt made my mountain to ſtand ſtrong, Pſal. 30. 6. But he quickly felt his feet ſliding, and his mountain falling. Worldly men phancy and project to themſelves an everlaſtingneſs in worldly things, Pſal. 49. 11. Babylon boaſts (Revel. 18. 7.) I ſit a Queen; ſhe doth not ſay, I am, but, I ſit a Queen; as if ſhe had ſaid, I am not only in a high place, but in a ſure place, I have a warm and a firm ſeat, I am well ſetled. I ſit a Queen, and am no widow, and ſhall ſee no ſorrow: I feel no ſorrow, neither do I fear any, I ſhall have no changes. Preſumption makes the ſoul believe it foreſees, and therefore propheſies as great things as faith can. The Prophet Zechary (chap. 1. 11.) hath Chriſt repreſented in a viſion, ſending out the Angels, thoſe heavenly ſcouts or intelligencers, to bring him in a report, how things went in the world, Theſe are they (verſ. 10.) whom the Lord hath ſent to walk to and fro through the earth; and what is the report they bring? Behold all the earth ſitteth ſtill, and is at reſt. The earth of wicked men, did not only, as they thought, ſtand faſt, but had ſet themſelves down ſoft and ſure, they thought themſelves ſitting upon down pillows for eaſe and ſoftneſs, and upon rocks of Adamant for ſureneſs and unmoveableneſs; they ſate ſtill and were at reſt, yea doubtleſs they ſaid in their hearts, who ſhall raiſe us up? Both the poſture and the confidence of literal Babylon was like that of myſtical Babylon; yet as old literal Babylon (though ſhe ſate ſtill and cloſe in her ſeat, yet ſlid and fell at laſt) ſo alſo ſhall myſtical Babylon. She that ſaid, I ſhall ſee no ſorrow, ſhall ſee nothing but ſorrow. Now if the feet of that great temporal monarchy did ſlide, and the feet of this ſpiritual monarchy muſt, both which have had as ſure footing as the world with all its wit and ſtrength, policy and power, were, or are able to make, what then may the weaker and more uncompacted parts of the world expect? There is no firm ſtanding upon that which is unfirm; if our foundation be unſure, our footing cannot be ſure: moveable creatures will never put us into an unmoveable condition. The ſoul ſtandeth faſt in Chriſt alone; when we once fix upon him, we are fixed; our feet may ſlip or ſlide, I confeſs, though we are in him, but they ſhall not ſlip or ſlide from him at all for ever. He that is ready to ſlip with his feet.

Hic verſiculus obſcurus eſt. Merc. Vox לפיד propriè tædam vel facem ſignificat, non illud vaſculum in quo ignis oleo nutritur. Abē Ezra in לפיד Lamech ſervile facit ut פיד ſit calamitas idem quod אוד infortunium, ut hoc de ſe dicat per tertiam perſonam; ſum ut qui eſt deſpectus in mente felicis hominis ob afflictionem & calamitatem.

Is as a lamp deſpiſed.] The words of this text are ſomewhat dark, and there are not a few who make the lamp the darkeſt word in it. One of the Rabbins reades very differently. The word which ſignifies a lamp, he divideth into two words. Lamech prefixed is ſervile (as Grammarians ſpeak) noting as much as for, or becauſe of; and Pid, deſtruction, calamity, or ſorrow: So it is taken, chap. 31. 29. If I have rejoyced at the deſtruction of him that hated me: and then the ſenſe is, as if Job in the third perſon had ſpoken thus, I am as a man deſpiſed in the thoughts of him that is in proſperity, becauſe of my afflictions. But I ſhall not inſiſt upon this tranſlation of the word, which yields us this ſence, though it ſtand entire under the notion of a torch or link, which are carried in the ſtreets to give light, or (as we render) of a lamp, which is a veſſel, filled with oyl, and fitted with wick, giving light in the houſe. Every one knows what a lamp is; but what is a deſpiſed lamp? a deſpiſed lamp is a lamp whoſe frame is old, worn, batter'd & out of faſhion, or whoſe oyl is conſumed. A lamp or a torch is very deſirable in a dark night, but when

'tis day, or when the torch is burnt down to the laſt inch, and the lamps oyl is ſpent to the laſt drop, then both are deſpiſed, who cares for either? So that, for a man to be looked upon as a deſpiſed lamp, is a proverbial ſpeech, importing, that he is of no more value then a thing of naught.

Tæda deſpecta eſt tæda conſumpta quæ jam uſui eſſe non poſſit ad prælucendũ. Dum præluc ebat in pretio erat, ſed conſumpta contemnitur. Merc.

A deſpiſed lamp is of the ſame ſignification with a ſmoaking firebrand. When the people of Iſrael were in a great fear, at the invaſion of Rezin and Remaliah's ſon, and the heart of Ahaz the King, moved as theirs, like the trees of the forreſt ſhaken with the wind, the Lord bids the Prophet, ſay unto him, Take heed, and be quiet, fear not, neither be faint-hearted: What? not fear when ſuch mighty enemies are coming againſt us: No ſaith he, fear not, for the two tails of thoſe ſmoaking fire-brands, (Iſa. 7. 4.) Ahaz and the Iſraelites lookt upon them, as the flame of a devouring fire that would burn and conſume all: no, ſaith God, they are but as ſmoaking fire-brands, they are but brands ends, they have almoſt conſumed themſelves, they are ſmoaking rather then burning, they will ſoon go out. A ſmoaking brand is a proverb for that which is almoſt ſpent, whoſe violence you need not fear, it can do no great hurt, nor can it ſtand you in any ſtead. As ſmoaking flax in the Goſpel (Matth. 12. 20.) notes the loweſt degree of grace, which Chriſt will not quench nor put out; ſo a ſmoaking fire-brand notes the leaſt degree of hurtful power remaining, or malice vexed out; and a ſmothering lamp, the leaſt degree of uſefull remaining power, or comforts wearied out. On the other ſide, a bright burning lamp, or the lighting of a candle, expreſſeth the beginnings of honour and excellency, or our continuance in the enjoyment of them, (Pſal. 18. 28.) Thou wilt light my candle, the Lord my God will enlighten my darkneſs. See what an office holy faith puts God unto; David believed that God would come and light his candle; what candle? his meaning is that the Lord would renew his eſtate, and chaſe away the darkneſs which lay upon it. Thou wilt light my candle; thou wilt cauſe me to ſhine clearly and fairly in the world, though I have been a while as a candle extinguiſht, or burnt out. The Prophet ſets the hoped and prayed for reſtauration of Sion under a like metaphor and alluſion (Iſa. 62. 1.) For Sions ſake I will not hold my peace, and for Jeruſalems ſake I will not reſt, until the righteouſneſs thereof go forth as brightneſs, and the ſalvation thereof as a lamp that burneth: That is, till the eſtate of the Church be beautiful and glorious. Now as a burning lamp is the emblem of a happy, ſo a dying deſpiſed lamp is the emblem of a miſerable condition. For what's a broken dying lamp worth? what's the ſnuff of a candle worth? or a candle burnt down to the ſocket? of no more worth is many a gracious ſoul in the thoughts of worldly wealthy men, when once he hath loſt the wealth of the world. Riches are to the reputation of man, as oyl to the lamp, they feed and nouriſh it, they cauſe it to ſhine out with a reſplendent brightneſs: but when riches are conſumed, a mans reputation conſumes too, he is a deſpiſed lamp. Thus the intendment of Job is obvious, and may be drawn into this plain obſervation, Tempora ſi fuerint nubila ſolus eris.

That they whoſe eſtates are ſliding and falling are ſubject to deſpiſing. Or more briefly thus, They who are afflicted are uſually ſlighted.

Affliction ſubjects us to contempt. Chriſt appeared meanly in his outſide, he appeared in an afflicted condition, a man of ſorrows (Iſa. 53.) and what was the effect of this? He was deſpiſed and rejected of men (verſ. 3.) and we hid as it were our faces from him, and we eſteemed him not. Unhappy poverty (ſaith the heathen poet) hath nothing in it more unhappy then this, that it makes men ſcorned and derided. A man emptyed of riches is uſually filled with contempt. They that ſlide ſhould be lifted up, as the law ordered concerning the aſs overburthened, and the oxe fallen into a pit; but when a man is fallen under the burthen of affliction, uſually another burthen, the burthen of contempt is laid upon him, he is deſpiſed: while we are burning lamps ſhining with riches and greatneſs, we are lookt upon and ſought to; but no ſooner under a vail of want, but thrown by and regarded no more.

Nil habet infælix paupertas durius in ſe, quam quod ridiculos homines facit. Juven. Sat. 3.

This holds true alſo in regard of internal gifts and endowments; while a man hath great abilities and quick parts, he is as a lamp full of oyl, or as a burning light: ſo John Baptiſt is deſcribed (Joh. 5. 35.) He was a burning and a ſhining light, and ye were willing for a ſeaſon to rejoyce in his light, all liked him very well, yea they even danced about him, as children about a bonfire (ſo much the word bears) for a ſeaſon. The lamp of Johns Miniſtery was alwayes alike, burning and ſhining, his oyl did not waſt. 'Tis ſaid indeed by John himſelf (Joh. 3. 30.) I muſt decreaſe; not that John did abate or leſſen his light, but becauſe a greater light coming, his light was obſcured (as the ſtars by the ſun) but not at all diminiſhed; but though Johns light was alwayes alike, yet the peoples delight in him was only for a ſeaſon: Even they whoſe gifts are not at all abated, may yet find a great abatement in the acceptation of their gift; how much more they (which is the caſe of not a few) whoſe gifts are indeed abated? Many are as a burning and ſhining lamp a great while, but at laſt (according to the lamps motto) by ſhining they conſume: Their oyl ſpends, their parts impair, their gifts are deaded, Theſe are deſpiſed lamps. There are lamps ſpoken of, Matth. 25. which Chriſt will deſpiſe. The fooliſh Virgins brought lamps, but they had no oyl in them. Some make a great profeſſion, and would be thought burning and ſhining lights, who yet have no oyl, that is, no truth of grace. Lamps without oyl, Chriſt will deſpiſe: But he will not deſpiſe a lamp becauſe it is not gilded with riches and worldly honour, or becauſe not filled with ſuch or ſuch a meaſure of gifts; that's the way the world goes; let a man have never ſo much oyl of grace and ſincerity in his lamp, never ſo much of God and of Chriſt in his lamp, if he have not golden oyl in his lamp, riches and fulneſs, rare gifts and great parts, he is deſpiſed, and caſt off.

Prælucendo pereo.

There is another reading of the words, take it thus; A man that is as a deſpiſed lamp by thoſe who are at eaſe, is ready to ſlip with his feet; that is, to ſin: the words may bear this tranſlation, without any ſtrain to the text, and with the advantage of another truth, which may be given you in this Obſervation,

Affliction layes us open unto temptation.

As holy David (Pſal. 73.) was ready to ſlip with his feet into ſin, by ſeeing wicked men ſtand ſo faſt in honour while they ſinned: So when a holy and righteous man ſees himſelf diſhonoured, he is ready to ſlip with his feet, to ſin, and ſay, I have cleanſed my heart in vain, and waſhed my hands in innocency. It is a temptation to be deſpiſed; and, except the heart be very well ſetled, the feet will ſlide. When a hypocrite is deſpiſed, he not only ſlips in, but falls from that profeſſion he formerly ſeemed to ſtand in; he caſts off the wayes of God, when he ſees himſelf caſt off by men. They who are well rooted and ſound at heart may be ſorely ſhaken; but the rotten hearted, and unſound, are rooted up by the ſtrength of this temptation. The third branch of this verſe, ſhews us by whom the man ready to ſlip is deſpiſed, it is

In the thought of him that is at eaſe.

In the thought.] The word ſignifies alſo clear, or pure, and by a metaphor it notes a thought, becauſe thoughts are as the irradations and beamings forth of the mind. And the word in ſpecial notes joyful or delightful thoughts; that ſence makes the text yet more emphatical. A man compaſſed about with ſorrow is deſpiſed in the joyful, or rather jolly thoughts of him that is at eaſe: a man at eaſe hath pleaſant and merry thoughts, and being full of theſe merry delightful thoughts, he deſpiſeth him who like an expiring lamp, ſits ſobbing and ſmothering in ſad and ſorrowful thoughts.

Of him that is at eaſe.] Quiet, ſetled, and (as the word imports by a trope) inſolent and ſecure; eaſe doth uſually make men not only ſecure, but inſolent. Becauſe they have no changes, therefore they fear not God, Pſal. 55. 19. It is ſeldom that their hearts are changed, whoſe eſtates feel no change. Civil changes occaſion ſpiritual: None are further from a ſpiritual change then they, who fear not God; and they who have no civil changes are very often far from fearing God. Jeruſalem had little eaſe a long time, but ſhe is promiſed it: Thine eyes ſhall ſee Jeruſalem a quiet habitation, or, an habitation at eaſe, (Iſa. 32. 20.)

Jerusalem that now is, hath been an unquiet habitation, full of troubles, tost up and down; but at last God will make her a quiet habitation: Babylon hath been at ease a great while, but Jerusalem shall have her turn to be at ease too.

Job speaks indefinitely; he is despised in the thought [Of him that is at ease.] Let him be who he will, a good man or a bad man, he is apt to despise those that are in great affliction. A godly man is not wholly exempt from this, not only unchristian, but unmanly passion. Job speaks here with an eye to his friends, whom, though he rebukes often very sharply, as acting very sinfully, yet he did not judge as wicked. The best man at ease, may not only be unsensible of his brethrens afflictions, but, in a degree, slight the afflicted: Job supposes his friends faulty in this; as if he had said, you (my friends) are at ease and quiet, all things go well with you; I am a poor snuff, a consumed lamp, and you despise me, you make nothing of my ordinary sorrows, and but light of my heaviest burdens. A good man may fail thus far for a time in his duty towards an afflicted friend, and though he fail not thus far, yet he may come within the verge of this sin, despising. For we despise the afflicted, not only by reproaching them with our words, and vilifying them in our thoughts, but by not laying their afflictions to our hearts, and bearing a part in them, by a brotherly fellow-feeling. When we do not suffer with them, we under-reckon them in their sufferings. Hence observe,

First, They who are at ease, whosoever they are, especially wicked men, are apt to despise those that are in pain.

Few feel any smart, till themselves smart, or any want till themselves are empty. It is bad enough, not to feel the smart or want of others; but it is far worse to insult over it. Of such, David makes complaint (Psal. 123. 4.) Our soul is exceedingly fill'd with the scorning of those that are at ease, and with the contempt of the proud. And again, The drunkards made songs upon me. Wine puts the wit in tune for a prophane jest. When David was eating ashes, and drinking tears, he was despised by those who did eat the fat, and drink the sweet; they cried out, Where is now thy God? Psal. 42. 3. David professeth concerning his enemies, (Psal. 35. 13.) When they were sick, my cloathing was sack-cloth, I humbled my soul with fasting, and my prayer returned into my own bosom; that is, say some, though they got no good by my prayers, yet my own soul did: rather thus; I prayed often and much for them, even from my heart; the returning of the prayer, may signifie his frequent minding of them; and the bosom, both secrecy and affectionateness in prayer for them. Lastly, We may read it thus, Let my prayer return into my bosom, that is, I wished no worse to them then to my self; let me receive that of God for my portion, which I have desired may be theirs; either of these interpretations shew David's sympathy, even towards his enemies; which the next verse (14) clears yet more; I behaved my self as though it had been my friend and brother, I bowed down heavily as one that mourneth for his mother. Would you not believe, if these enemies of David should hear of any affliction befallen him, that they would be in blacks? See how they mourn (as we say) in Sack and Sugar (ver. 15, 16.) But in my adversity they rejoyced, and gathered themselves together. With hypocritical mockers at feasts, they gnashed upon me with their teeth: When they were a feasting, they were mocking; abusive speeches were as sauce to their meat, and sugar to their wine; and they would forbear a while to employ their teeth at eating, that they might employ them in reviling; they gnashed upon me with their teeth. The teeth speak as well as the tongue; gnashing of the teeth hath a loud voice in it. The damned in hell shall gnash their teeth in sorrow for pain; the pain which themselves feel: and the wicked here on earth, do often gnash their teeth in joy or scorn at the pain which others feel. The Prophet Hosea describes the tempe of such intemperate feasters (chap. 7. 5.) In the day of our King, the Princes have made him sick with bottles of wine, that is, in the day of the celebration of the Kings Birth or Coronation, or some of those great feasting festivals, the Princes made him drink more then did him good; and what did he then? he was then fit to do evil, and so he did; He stretched out his hand with scorners, that is, say some, he took up his cups, or put his hand to his cups, as often as vile persons, scorners, use to do: or nearer to the point; He stretched out his hand, that is, he acted against goodness and good men, against justice and those who are just, even as scorners and contemners of justice, and goodness, of just and good men, use to do. Neither is it any wonder that men at ease are thus ready to despise the best of men in a low condition, seeing they despise even the most high God. They who serve their lusts, cannot serve either God or man, but they can despise both. And their consciences seldom trouble them (whatsoever they do) who have no trouble in their condition. Jesurun waxed fat; Israel was called Jesurun, either from Jasher, righteousness; because they had received righteous laws, or were called unto righteousness; or from Shor, to look or see; because this people saw more of the glory of God, then any people under heaven; yet even this Jesurun, when he waxed fat, that is, rich and great, then he kicked (Deut. 32. 15.) Kicking is an act of contempt; and against whom did he kick? Moses tells us; then he forsook God that made him, and lightly esteemed the rock of his salvation. If men at ease venture to despise God, they will not stick at men; least of all, at men in their afflictions.

Secondly, Observe, It is very sinful to despise those that are in affliction.

Job speaks it, not only by way of Narration, declaring what was done; but by way of conviction, reproving what was done. If it be sinful not to pity those that are afflicted, then much more to despise them (Amos 6. 4. They lie upon their beds of Ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches, &c. but they are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph. He speaks nothing of their rejoycing at Joseph's affliction, or that they laughed and passed jests upon him; no, but they did not grieve, they did not pity him in his affliction; this was their sin: how sinful then is theirs, who despise the afflicted?

There is another reading of this verse; which I shall only name. He that is fit to guide the feet of others, is as a despised lamp in the thought of the rich, who are at ease: As if Job had said, they whose holiness is most eminent and exemplary, even leading-men in holiness, are despised. Lucerna contempta judicio hominis opulenti, qui idoneus est gressibus dirigendis. Tyg.

Job having thus crossed Zophar's first assertion, representing the righteous as a despised lamp, whom his friend had compared to the morning-light, or noon-day Sun; he now proceeds to refute his second assertion, representing the wicked in fullest prosperity and highest security; whose eyes, his friend had said, should fail, and whose hope he had compared to the giving up of the ghost.

Verse 6. The Tabernacles of robbers prosper, and they that provoke God, are secure, into whose hand God bringeth abundantly.

As if he had said, Friend Zophar, thou hast affirmed, that the righteous man is as the shining light; I say, he is but a despised lamp: thou affirmest, that the eyes of the wicked shall fail, &c. but I have seen the tabernacles of robbers prosper, and they that provoke God, secure.

He describes a wicked man, by sins against both Tables. First, He sins against his neighbour by injustice; he is a robber, the tabernacles of robbers prosper. Robbery is a sin against the second Table; and robbery is here mentioned by a Synechdoche, for all sins against the second Table. Secondly, He sins against God; he provoketh God, which is the breach of the first Table: and provocation of God is here mentioned by a Synechdoche, for all sins against the first Table. They that provoke God, are secure. Though every sin against our brother, be also a sin against God, and we may provoke God, when the sin is immediately or nextly against our brother; yet God, in the sins of the first Table, is chiefly provoked, and those sins are immediately against God; therefore he putteth both instances. Take a man that breaks the first Table, or the second; take a man that cares not how he wrongs his neighbour, or how he prophanes the name of God, the one prospers, and the other is secure; therefore your position is false, that the eyes of the wicked shall fail, and that their hope shall be as the giving up of the ghost.

The Tabernacles of robbers prosper.

That is, the dwellings and families, the affairs and undertakings of robbers, they, and all that belong unto them, prosper. Tabernacula i. e. quæ ad illos pertinent universa.

Robbers

Robbers are of two ſorts; there are open and violent robbers, who waſt, ſpoil and deſtroy all that comes near them, and care not who ſees; ſuch are warlike robbers, who bring power to do, what they cannot do by juſtice: Such were thoſe warlike bands (and at them Job aims in this argument) of Caldeans and Sabeans, who ſpoiled Job's eſtate and cattel. The uſual effect of war is waſt and ſpoil: It is ſaid of the Turkiſh wars, That where the Grand Signiors horſe ſets his foot, no more graſs will grow; he makes havock of all. By robbers here, we may underſtand firſt, thoſe boiſterous ſons of Mars, men of blood and violence, who make their will their law, and think they may do whatſoever they have power to do. God himſelf is called El-ſhaddi, the mighty God; he is mighty to ſave, and mighty to deſtroy; he is able to lay all the world waſte when he pleaſeth, as he once did, when the world diſpleaſed him. God can deſtroy as much as he will, but he will not deſtroy as much as he can. Theſe robbers have their name from the ſame root, becauſe they uſe all their power to deſtroy: They have a will to deſtroy as much as they can; but they cannot deſtroy as much as they will: If they could, the whole world muſt fall before them, if it will not fall down unto them.

Secondly, There are ſecret robbers; deceit and fraud commit robbery, as wel as power and force. Some rob while they pretend to ſeek for right; they ſue at law, hoping to pervert juſtice. Some are robb'd, others are murdered by the law. The law is a ſhadow to many lawleſs actions. He is a robber, that takes his neighbours right from him by pretence of law, as well as he that takes his purſe in the high way. Again, others rob ſecretly, while they ſeem only to ſell; they ſteal, while they tell you, you ſhall have a penny-worth for your penny. Ephraim ſaid, ſurely I am become rich, I have found me out ſubſtance; in all my labour they ſhall find none iniquity in me, that were ſin, Hoſ. 12.8. I have got a great eſtate, and I hope there is none in the world can tax me that I have done them wrong; in all my labour they ſhall find none iniquity: Who? I wrong! I ſteal or rob! not I; I have not ſtained my trading and commerce with any ſuch foul fact; I confeſs, I have uſed ſome ſubtilties and ſleights, I have a little helped my ſelf by art; my calling is a myſtery, and if I deal myſteriouſly in it, for my own advantage, who can blame me for that? I am ſure, none can charge me with any open wrong or robbery; in all my labour they ſhall find none iniquity. And it appears plainly, that I have done no ſuch thing, for that were ſin; that is, punishment would follow ſuch iniquity; whereas I thrive and proſper: ſuch ſales they make, who have ſold their conſciences. To clear this ſence, obſerve what the Prophet ſaith in the former verſe; He is a merchant, the balances of deceit are in his hand, he loveth to oppreſs: When a buyer comes to him for a commodity, he weigheth it out fairly in the balance, there's no iniquity; but there is deceit in the balance, or he hath a bag of deceitful weights; that's iniquity. To deceive with weights, is robbery, as well as to take by force; a man may rob with a pair of balances or a meet-wand in his hand, as well as with a ſword or piſtol in his hand. Both or either of theſe robbers may be underſtood here.

Ex eo facilè conſtat me non eſſe peccati reum, quod mihi bene eſt: Nam qui rei ſunt, eos Nemeſis impunè abire non ſinit. Jun. in loc.

Laſtly, Some, inſtead of robbers, read, rich men. Rich men are called robbers, not as if a man could not be rich without robbery (the bleſſing of God, not their wronging of men, makes many rich; a diligent hand, not a violent nor a fraudulent hand, enriches many) but rich men are called robbers, becauſe many, if not moſt rich men, are (in one of theſe ſences) robbers, or becauſe riches are alwaies a provocation to robbery; yea, and a help to it. For, as in one reſpect, poverty is a temptation to robbery (Prov. 30.9.) Feed me with food convenient for me, leſt I be poor, and ſteal: as poverty is a temptation unto ſtealing, ſo are riches. He that hath power, hopes he may oppreſs, and go unpuniſhed. Some durſt not oppreſs, but for the ſhelter of a high place. A Pirate taken at ſea, and condemned by Alexander, ſaid unto him, I am condemned for robbing at ſea in a little ſhip, but thou robbeſt at land all the world over, and art applauded: There are more who ſteal by reaſon of their abundance, then by reaſon of their want; what they have, gives them ability to rob for more.

שלו Quievit, per-

The Tabernacles of robbers,] whether of the one kind, or of the other, [proſper.] The Original ſignifies, not only a thriving, but a peaceable condition: They and their ſtoln goods lie (for a time) as ſafe and quiet as a child in the mothers belly. The word bears ſuch a ſence. Hence obſerve, Metaphora fœlix, ſalvus fuit.

Unjuſt men, men of violence, may proſper for a while.

Robbers may enjoy proſperous ſafety, and ſafe proſperity. Having met with texts before, about the proſperity of the wicked, I ſhall not ſtay upon it here; the next clauſe alſo, giving further occaſion to touch upon it again. The ſecurity of thoſe who provoke God, is the ſame with the proſperity of the robbers, and they who rob men, provoke God; yet here to provoke God, is a ſin of another claſſis, yea, of another nature then to rob men; therefore I ſhall diſtinctly open it.

They who provoke God, are ſecure.

Here is the ſecond ſort of proſperous wicked men. They who break the ſecond Table, and wrong their neighbours, proſper; they who break the firſt, and provoke God, are ſecure.

They that provoke God, The word ſignifies, to move, or irritate: it ſignifies, to move corporally and locally (Job 9.6.) He ſhaketh the earth out of her place. (Iſa. 23.11.) He ſhook the kingdoms. This word ſerves in both Texts. And hence it is taken for paſſion or inward diſtemper againſt others (2 Kings 19.28.) Becauſe thy rage againſt me; word for word, becauſe thou waſt moved againſt me: ſuch a one (we ſay) was moved, exceedingly moved when he was in a rage and angry. They may be ſaid to move God, who provoke him, they attempt to put him out of temper. רגז Movere, cõmovere, irritare ad iracundiam.

To provoke God, is more then to ſin againſt God; it is ſinning with an high hand, or with ſuch circumſtances, as exceedingly aggravate ſin. Provocation notes the higheſt act of diſpleaſure, and therefore that ſin which provokes, is one of the higheſt. (Pſal. 106.7.) They remembred not the multitude of his mercies, but provoked him at the ſea, even the red ſea. The confluence or meeting together of many ſins, makes up a provocation.

Such ſinners of the higheſt ſtature, Job deſcribes in this ſecure eſtate: They who provoke God; As if Job had ſaid, I do not ſpeak of thoſe who ſin lightly, who trade in ſmall ſins, or ſin after the rate and courſe of ordinary men, that theſe only are ſecure; but they who ſin provokingly and boldly; they who ſend defiance to heaven by ſinning, even theſe live ſecurely here on earth, Theſe

Are ſecure.] The hebrew is abſtract and plural; They that provoke God, ſecurities, confidences are to them; as, (Pſal. 1.1.) we read of the bleſſednеſſes of him that walketh in the Law of God; which we tranſlate, The man is bleſſed: So here; They that provoke God, are ſecure; or, ſecurities are to them that provoke God: They ſin againſt God every way, and they have ſecurity every way; they ſin againſt God as much as they can, and they have as much proſperity as they will. All kind of ſecurity is their portion, who commit all kind of impiety. Hence obſerve, בטחות Numerus pluralis abundantiam ſignificat, q. d. magna ſecuritas, & vox originalis eam ſecuritatem denotat quæ audaciam & temeritatem parit.

God ſometimes gives them greateſt worldly peace, who offer him the higheſt provocations.

Such as will not let God reſt, God lets reſt. Wicked men would throw God out of heaven, if they could; but he doth not throw them out of earth, though he can. It is a wonder of patience, that God ſhould let them have any eaſe, who do their utmoſt to weary him.

I ſhall here touch four grounds of this diſpenſation of God toward wicked men in temporals.

Firſt, The Lord gives them ſecurity, that they may have opportunity to ſhew themſelves, and to bring out thoſe curſed treaſures of iniquity ſtored up in their hearts. If luſt were alwayes pinched with poverty, and burdened with affliction; if luſt were alwayes in bands and chains, in priſon and reſtraint, under the revenging hand of God, luſt could not look like it ſelf, nor diſcover what it can do. There had never ſo much of the ſinfulneſs of men appeared, if ſo much of the goodneſs of God had not appeared. As afflictions draw out the graces of the Saints, ſo they keep in, and dead the corruptions of the wicked; many corruptions cannot at all, but in a warm Sun. There are ſome, I confeſs (unbelief, diſcontent, murmuring, &c.) which act eſpecially in cold and froſty ſeaſons; but moſt are ſtopt.

Secondly,

Secondly, Tis thus, as to discover what men are; so to make them more unexcusable for being what they are. What can they say for themselves, who have received so much good from the hand of God, and have requited him with so much evil? What plea can they make, who anger God, while he is giving them content? who, while God encompasseth them with blessings, compass him about with their rebellions? Thou art unexcusable, O man, who makest such returns. When Dives in the parable, begs for a drop of water, he is answered, Son, remember, that thou in thy life-time hast had thy good things: Dost thou call now for an abatement of fire and torment, who didst multiply thy sin as fast as thy comforts were multiplied? Dost thou call for ease, who didst abuse all thy ease? He hath not a word more to say for himself, his next suit is for his brethren, that they might not come into that place of torment, out of which he had no hope to escape. Every mouth will be stopt by these openings of the hand of God.

Thirdly, Such dispensations are both the trial and honour of the Saints. They will not venture into sinful waies, though others thrive in them. They see some prosper by robbery, others advanced by flattery; yet they will not set up those trades. This is an evidence that they love holiness for holiness sake, and hate wickedness (how prosperous soever it is) for wickedness sake. Sin is worse to them then hell. The blackness of that coal offends them more then the heat of it.

Lastly, God doth this, to keep the Saints, while they are in the world (which is their proper way of living here) to a life of faith. If all godly men should prosper and have peace, if all wicked men should suffer and be in trouble, if God should leave visible marks of his displeasure upon every one that provoketh him, and visible marks of favour upon every one that pleaseth him, men would live by sight, and not by faith. In the next life there will be an end of faith, God will then give every one his portion: then no man that provoked God impenitently, shall be at ease; nor shall any smart who have sincerely pleased him. Tribulation and anguish shall be upon every soul that sinneth; and every soul that hath taken hold on Christ by faith, and walked in love, shall have life and immortality: every one shall feel what he is, and enjoy what he hath believed. Heaven and hell have all in sight: faith will have no work in either. Here we must always walk by faith, and then most, when godly men are cast down, and when they who provoke God are secure.

Into whose hand God bringeth abundantly.

As if he had said, They take courage to provoke God through the abundance which he bestows upon them. Those treasures of good things which he brings into their hands, cause them to bring out those evils which were treasured up in their hearts. Hence observe,

Wicked men make the blessings of God fewel for their lusts, and beat their outward comforts into the weapons of an unholy war against him.

Their bread and their wine, their gold and their silver, their wool and their flax, do but feed and cloath, enrich and strengthen their base corruptions, Hos. 13.6. According to their pasture, so were they filled; they were filled, and their heart was exalted; therefore have they forgotten me. When the heart is lifted up with the creature, it falls from the creator; and that proves an occasion of forgetting God, which should be a means of remembring him. The smallest taste of benefits ought to put us in mind of our Benefactor: But they had put God out of their minds, while he was putting fat morsels into their mouths, and had filled them with his benefits.

Again, In these words, Into whose hand God bringeth abundantly.

Job seems to have a special respect to the Caldeans and Sabeans, into whose hands God put all his abundance. Hence observe,

What the worst of men have, is of Gods giving; he puts into their hands.

Satan puts wickedness into their hearts, but it is God who puts power into their hands; God puts the persons and estates of others into their hands. They indeed ascribe all to their own power and policies. So the King of Babylon (Isa. 14.) boasted, By my hand and by my power have I done these things; he forgot that he was an instrument in the hand of God, or that God gave those nations into his hand. The Lord stayes himself from bringing afflictions upon his people by this argument, Deut. 32.27. Lest their adversaries should say, our hand is high, and the Lord hath not done all this. God would not put his people into their hand, because he foresaw they would not acknowledge it; but sacrifice unto their net, and burn incense unto their drag, as if by them their portion had been fat, and their meat plenteous. Man is unwilling to own any beyond himself as the author of his enjoyments. He scarce accounts any thing worth the having, unless it be of his own bringing in.

Further, We translate, Into whose hand God bringeth Abundantly.] The Adverb, Abundantly, is not in the Original; our translators add it in a different letter, as an explication, to shew the bounty of God, even to many of them, who most designedly disobey him. Such receive not only enough to support their lives, but to satisfie their lusts. They have, not only as much as they need, but as much as they desire. God brings Quails into their hands as well as Manna; yet he puts these into their hands, not as love-tokens, but as wrath-tokens. And while the meat is in their mouths, the wrath of God falls, yea abides upon them. It is not alwayes a mercy to receive what we would. God brings abundance into their hands, who never had one drop of favour from his heart.

In cujus manum venire facit deus, sc. omnia animi sui vota. Merc.

There is another reading, which gives an intimation of that particular sin, whereby these secure ones had provoked God. They were such, as brought God in their hands, that is, false worshippers and Idolaters: Such are well described by this Periphrasis, they bring God in their hand: we render, into whose hand God putteth; these render, who put God into their hand. The Jewish Doctors are much for this sence; but it receives little approbation amongst the Latines, and I will not insist upon it; yet this is a truth, Idolaters put God in their hand: True worshippers carry God in their hearts; Idolaters carry God in their hands; that is, they have a God of their own making; an Idol, an Image, is the work of their hands. He that worshippeth according to mans invention, hath his god in his hand. Again, false worshippers may be said to carry god in their hand, because they act as if God were in his power and dispose (or they desire he should be so) not they in his. The Tyrians chained Hercules to a post, that he might not depart their country. Other of the heathen would adopt or reprobate their gods as they pleased; unless the gods pleased them, they should be no longer gods. This is to bring a god in the hand grosly and openly: they do it closely and covertly, who are unwilling to be guided by his hand. They who would bring God down to their wills, make laws for God; and they who make a law for God, act as if they had made God. Every thing must receive the rule of its being, where it receives a being.

VERS. 7, 8, 9, 10.

But ask now the beasts, and they shall teach thee; and the fowls of the air, and they shall tell thee.
Or speak to the earth, and it shall teach thee; and the fishes of the sea shall declare unto thee.
Who knoweth not in all these, that the hand of the Lord hath wrought this?
In whose hand is the soul of every living thing, and the breath of all mankind.

JOB having checked the pride of his friends, in the four first verses of this Chapter; and opposed the opinion of Zophar, in ver. 5, 6. he in this context brings out his proof, which he takes as low as low can be; that so he might raise his conviction the higher. He deals not with him upon the dictates of humane reason, or upon the authority of Scripture; but from the voice of nature, from the common cry and consent of all the creatures; he convocates a synod of beasts and birds, of senseless trees, and mute fishes, to give their suffrage for the determination of the controversie betwixt him and his friends.

Disseruisti; amici, plenaque de sapientia & potentia Dei, quod omnia creat & conservat, quasi hæc mihi incognita essent, nam vobis tacentibus docet me hæc creatura. Mer.

Ask now the beasts, and they shall tell thee.

As

As if Job had said, Friend Zophar, thou hast discoursed about the providence of God, as if it were all riddle, or mystery, which none but learned men could teach, and none but men of extraordinary parts could understand: But surely thou needest not speak so high, or in the clouds, forasmuch as the beasts of the earth, the fowls of the air, &c. may be our masters, to teach us the wisdom and power of God, though man should be silent. These have a voice, these have tongues like trumpets to proclaim a providence in ordering the world, and that God doth, both in Heaven and earth, whatsoever pleaseth him: And therefore though the wisdom of God be higher then heaven, deeper then hell, broader then the sea, and longer then the earth; though there is a wisdom of God, and much in all his wisdom, which no creature can comprehend, yet his wisdom receives testimony from every creature, and we need not make such weary and long journeyes to find out so much of it as concerns our instruction and satisfaction. Ask now the beasts, and they shall teach thee.

Hence observe, All creatures have a teaching voice, they read us divinity lectures of Divine Providence.

Non est ullum animal tam exiguum in quod non plus discere possimus quàm in omnibus sculptis, pictis aut fusis simulachris. Lavat.

Christians, who have not only reason but grace, may learn from creatures which have not so much as life or sense. Images made by man are teachers of lyes; but the things which God hath made are teachers of truth. And hence it is that Christ himself taketh up parables from the meanest of the creatures, to instruct his hearers. I confess there is no knowledge like the knowledge of Christ, and of him crucified: The cross of Christ is the chief subject of holy study: As the Apostles resolve assures (1 Cor. 2.) I determined to know nothing among you but Christ, and him crucified. All knowledge, without the knowledge of Christ, is but ignorance: Yet there is a usefulness of knowledge from natural things, as subservient unto spiritual. Grace in the heart of a Believer improves common earthly objects to holy ends, as having a stamp of Heaven upon them. The world below is as a glass, wherein we may see the world above. They who cannot read other books, may run and read this: It is the Plowmans Alphabet, the Shepherds Kalender, the Travellers Perspective, through which he receives the lively species of infinite excellencies in God. We may meditate from the Sun, to the Stone; from the Cedar, to the Hysop that groweth on the wall; from the Angel, to the Worm that creepeth on the ground; from all, from the least of these we may know much of the great God; and it is the scope of the Apostle, (Rom. 1.) to convince those who do not. It is reported of one, who had but little or no knowledge at all in Arts and Sciences, or skill in Tongues, and yet was full of knowledge in Heavenly things; that being asked, How he came by that knowledge, having not read books? he said, he had a book which he read continually, which had three great leaves, The Heaven, the Earth, the Waters; the creatures contained in these, were as so many letters, out of which he spelled many mysteries, and comfortable truths. Though the creature is not able to lead us into a saving knowledge of the mysteries of Christ, yet it gives us such advantages to know God, as will leave us unexcusable in our ignorance.

Seculum est speculum

There are four things which the creatures teach us.

First, They teach us that there is a God; and much of that which God is. (Rom. 1.20.) The invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead. As faith sees him that is invisible, so sense shews us him that is invisible: Faith sees God in himself; sense shews us God in his works.

Secondly, The whole creation teacheth us ready obedience to the will of God: All creatures obey the law of their creation: Fire and hail, snow and vapours, stormy wind and tempest fulfilling his word, Psal. 148. 8. And if there be any stop at all, or interruption in their obedience, if they do not fully answer the end for which they were created, it is either to testifie, or to punish mans disobedience.

Thirdly, All creatures teach us dependance upon God. Things without life are expressed, as putting forth acts of faith towards the living God. (Hos. 2.21.) The earth cryes to the heavens; and the corn, and the wine, and the oyl cry to the earth; there is an intercrying from the lowest to the highest, till the cry come up to the most high God. The whole presents us with an elegant prosopopeia, All the creatures striving to do them good, to whom God had once betrothed himself in mercies, and in loving kindness; yet all (in a chain of dependance) confessing their inability to do them good, without help from God. The corn, and the wine, and the oyl would feed and refresh Jezreel; but then the earth must give these rooting, juyce and nourishment: The earth is willing to do her office, and give out her strength to these, that these might strengthen Jezreel; but then the heavens must open their treasury, and let down their rain, and heat, and influences into the bosom and bowels of the earth, to make it fertile. The heavens are ready to befriend the earth, at her request, with these inriching dowries of rain, heat and influence; but the heavens cannot send a shower, nor the sun a ray, till God gives commission, and therefore they cry to God to unbind the sweet influences of Pleiades, and loose the bands of Orion, that so, God commanding the heavens, the heavens may feed the earth, and the earth may feed the corn, the wine, the oyl; and these may feed Jezreel, the beloved ones of God. Thus the eyes of all wait, or look up unto God (Psal. 145. 15.) that they may receive good. Such is the very manner of their subsistence as declares their dependance: they wait upon God, and shall not we?

Fourthly, The whole creation teacheth us, that there is somewhat more provided for us then we now enjoy. The Apostle makes that use of it (Rom. 8. 19.) The earnest expectation of the creature, waiteth for the manifestation of the Sons of God: But how can the creation have an earnest expectation? Not that the creature is able to put forth such an act directly, for then it must have not only life, but reason and grace; but there is somewhat in the creature, not only like expectation, but like an earnest expectation; the creature stretcheth out (as it were) its head to look for these things, and is weary till it receives them: We know (saith the Apostle, ver. 22.) That the whole creation groaneth and travelleth in pain together until now. Now if the irrational and inanimate creatures, which have been tired out by mans sin, and made subject to vanity, by reason of mans vanity, if they live under an expectation, how much more should man himself? Shall liveless creatures be restless in their present condition, which our sin hath brought upon them; and shall we, who are the sinners, rest in that condition? Shall the world groan under a state of vanity, and shall we rejoyce, and satisfie our selves in it? The beasts of the earth may teach us better; and the fowls of the air may instruct us to soar to a more heavenly pitch of spirit.

Ask now the beasts.] The word Behemoth, signifies all sorts of beasts, whether wild, or tame; yet most usually those that are wild and savage, such as will not come to hand: to take the word in that strictness inlargeth the sence, as if Job had said, The worst, the most unteachable of the beasts, will teach thee; those beasts which have nothing in them but cruelty and fierceness, but rage and ravening, will inform thee. The Elephant, in this book, is called Behemoth, which word is in the plural number; as if we should say, beasts; intimating the huge vastness of the Elephant, that he hath (as it were) many beasts summ'd up in him; here are Behemoth, or beasts, in that one Beast.

Ask the beasts. * It is usual in Scripture to turn us to the irrational creatures, when we depart from, or act below reason. To put a man to school to the beasts, implies beastly ignorance: Ask now the beasts, they will convince thee, or stop thy mouth. The Prophet brings in the Lord bespeaking Heaven and earth, (Isa. 1. 2.) Hear O Heavens, and give ear O earth, I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me: So Deut. 32. 1. Give ear, O ye Heavens, and I will speak; and hear, O earth, the words of my mouth: Moses tells the people, that the very Heavens and earth should shame them, if they would not hearken. Now as when at any time God appealeth to, or bespeaketh the Heavens and the earth, and makes them his witnesses, or hearers, it is to shame mans deafness and rebellion; as if unreasonable creatures, were more ready to hear, and receive instruction, then man. So when he bids us go, or sends us to inanimate creatures, to hear them speak, it is to shame mans dulness; as if they were more ready to give instruction, then we to receive and entertain it. Thus Solomon sends the sluggard to the Ant; Go to the Ant, thou sluggard: The little Pismire shall teach thee; there there thou ſhalt learn a leſſon of laborioufneſs, and induſtry, to provide for thy ſelf and thine. The Apoſtle ſaith, He that provideth not for his own houſe, is worſe then an infidel; becauſe the light of nature teacheth a man to provide for his houſe: But we may ſay, he that provideth not for his houſe is worſe then a beaſt, worſe then the creeping things of the earth; becauſe the light of nature teacheth them to do ſo. Go to the Ant, thou ſluggard; conſider her wayes, and be wiſe. Iſa. 1. 3. Go to the Ox, and to the Aſs, O unthankful man; they will teach thee; The Ox knoweth his owner, and the Aſs his maſters crib: As the Prophet ſpeaks to the Heavens and the earth, he deſires them for his hearers, rather then men; ſo he ſends the people to the Ox, and Aſs, that they ſhould be their teachers, when they refuſed to hear him. Ask now the beaſts, they are wiſe and learned enough to direct thee in this point.

They ſhall teach thee.] Theſe words carry a double figure in them; either a Proſopopeia, which is the imitation of a perſon, or the attribution of ſpeech and reaſon, to things ſpeechleſs and irrational: or a Metonimy of the effect; Ask the beaſts, and they ſhall teach thee; that is, ſtudy the beaſts, and this knowledge is attained. Meditation is both the daughter and the mother of wiſdom. They who have no wiſdom cannot meditate, and they who meditate ſhall have more wiſdom. The creatures teach us when we think of them: they teach us, though not formally, yet vertually. They anſwer, and reſolve the queſtion put to them, though not explicitely, to the ear, yet convincingly to the conſcience: Ask now the beaſts, and they ſhall teach thee.

So then, we ask the creatures, when we diligently conſider them, when we ſearch out the perfections, and vertues, which God hath put into, or ſtamped upon them: To ſet our minds thus upon the creature, is to diſcourſe with the creature. The queſtions which man asks of a beaſt, are only his own meditations. Again, the creatures teach us, when we in meditation make out collections, and draw down a demonſtration of the Power, Wiſdom, and Goodneſs of God, in making them; or of the frailty of man, in needing them; ſuch concluſions, and inferences, are the anſwers, and teachings of the creature. It is an excellent paſſage of Auguſtine, to this purpoſe, in the tenth book of his Confeſſions, I put the queſtion, ſaith he, to the earth, and to the ſea, and to the reſt of the creatures, and they gave me an anſwer. Now if you would know what my queſtion was; it was the deep intention, and conſideration, I had in my heart about the creatures: And would you know what their anſwer was? Their anſwer was that which I collected in my meditations from their ſeveral natures, qualities, and properties. So then to ask the beaſts, and to be taught of the beaſts, is only in a ſerious, and holy manner, to let out our hearts in meditation; and every true concluſion, derived from ſuch a meditation, is the voice, and anſwer, of the creature.

There is one thing further obſervable in theſe words, Ask the beaſts, and they ſhall teach thee. The Original is in the ſingular number; Ask the beaſts, himſelf ſhall teach thee. It is uſual in Scripture to put a plural and a ſingular thus together; though it croſs Grammar, yet it improves Divinity. Eccleſ. 10. 1. Dead flies cauſe the ointment of the Apothecary to ſtink: The Hebrew Noun is plural, and the Verb of the ſingular number: The reaſon of this kind of ſpeaking, is to ſhew that any one of the number, about which we ſpeak, will produce the effect of which we ſpeak: And ſo when he ſaith, Dead flies will corrupt, it notes, that any one, or every particular dead fly among flies, is enough to corrupt the moſt precious ointment. So when he ſaith, The beaſts will teach, putting beaſts in the plural number to a Verb of the ſingular, it notes, that every particular beaſt, or every ſingle creature, is able to give inſtruction. And ſo the ſence is ſtronger, Thou ſhalt not only be taught and inſtructed from the whole congregation and aſſembly of the creatures, or by laying them all together in thy thoughts, but each one ſhall teach thee, every one by himſelf ſhall teach thee; the leaſt as well as the greateſt; the Mouſe as well as the Elephant, or the Lyon; the Shrimp as well as Leviathan; the Hyſop on the wall, as well as the Cedar in Lebanon; the Graſs of the field, as well as the Oaks of Baſhan. So many creatures as are in the world, ſo many preachers there are in the world, of the power and goodneſs of God.

And the fowls of the air, and they ſhall tell thee.

This clauſe is of the ſame ſence with the former. The word ſignifies any thing that flies in the air, all winged creatures, both the greater and the leſſer: The Eagle, or the Sparrow; the Oſtrich, or the Fly: Thou haſt ſwarms of Teachers. All theſe can tell thee: Yea not only ſo, But Verſe 8. Speak to the earth, and it ſhall teach thee.

Hinc עפעופים palpebræ à celeri motu

The word imports a ſilent enquiry, or a ſtudious meditation upon, or about a thing: ſpeak to it in thy heart and thoughts, or in thy deepeſt meditations, as was explained before. There is a different tranſlation. Some render, not by a Verb, but by a Noun, and repeating the Verb, Ask, out of the former direction, they give it thus, Ask every ſlip, or ſprig, which grows in the earth, and it ſhall teach thee: For the word Shuah ſignifies a branch, or a ſprig, a ſlip, or a plant, any thing that grows out of the earth. And ſo the ſence is carried thus, Ask of the beaſt of the earth, ask of the fowls of the air; yea, ask of every ſprig, or ſlip, or plant of the earth, and that ſhall teach thee alſo. So that as Job before ſent him to the beaſts and fowls, ſo now he ſends him to trees and plants, that they alſo may be his teachers. And yet he hath not done, here are more Maſters.

The fiſhes of the ſea ſhall declare unto thee.

The ſilence of fiſhes is grown to a proverb, As mute as a fiſh. How then can a fiſh declare? Fiſhes are ſo far from forming up words and ſentences, that they cannot make a ſound, or the rudeſt noiſe; yet they have a ſpeech, though they have no voice. The Scholars of Pythagoras were enjoyned ſilence for five or two years; here we have a ſort of Tutors who are alwayes ſilent. Theſe ſay not much, while they ſay little; but they ſay much, though they can ſay nothing. A fiſh is expreſſed by a word in the Hebrew, which ſignifies to multiply; and to encreaſe as a fiſh is an Hebraiſm for a great increaſe (Gen. 48. 16.) The very multitude and increaſe of fiſhes, their huge ſhoals, and innumerable numbers, declare much to us.

I might inſiſt largely upon theſe Teachers, and ſhew you how every creature hath a proper leſſon for us, and what thoſe leſſons are. I will give but a touch.

If you ask the beaſts, They will teach you to know and own God, from whom you receive ſo much good, ſo many benefits. That leſſon the Prophet calls the Jews to learn from the Ox and the Aſs, Iſa. 1. 3. The Ox knoweth his owner, and the Aſs his maſters crib, but Iſrael doth not know.

Go to the fowls of the air, and they will inſtruct you: Firſt, That God hath a care of his people, becauſe he hath a care of them who are ſo much inferiour to his people. Thus Chriſt ſupports our faith, and ſcatters diſtracting cares (Mat. 6. 26.) Behold the fowls of the air, for they ſow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns, yet your heavenly father feedeth them; are ye not much better then they? And as he takes care to feed them, ſo to preſerve them; A Sparrow falls not to the ground without the will of your Father, ye are of more value then many ſparrows; therefore be not afraid at the approach of fear. Will not God take care of you, who takes care of Sparrows? Secondly, The obſervation which the fowls of the air make of their ſeveral ſeaſons, teach us to keep time and ſeaſon. The Prophet makes that uſe (Jer. 8. 7.) The Stork in the Heaven knoweth her appointed times; and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow, obſerve the time of their coming; but my people know not the judgment of the Lord. When we ſee the Swallow coming in the Spring, and going away towards Winter; when we obſerve the Turtle and the Crane timing it ſo exactly, do they not teach us to know the time of judgment, and the time of mercy; when it is Winter, and when it is Spring; when it is warm, and when it is cold?

Look upon the earth, and learn, Firſt, The power of God bearing it up: It is marvellous, even miraculous, that the earth ſhould hang upon nothing, that it ſhould hang in the thin air, that it ſhould hang there, where a tennis-ball, yea where a feather will not ſtay without ſupport. The earth hath nothing but the decree and power of God to bear it up. How doth this teach us the power of God, and the infinite ſtrength of his decree! Secondly, The earth teacheth us what we are, and what we muſt be, Duſt thou art art, and to dust thou shalt return. Ask the earth, and that will teach thee that thou art a brittle creature: Ask the grass of the earth, and that will teach thee that thou art a withering creature: Isa. 40. 6. The voice said, Cry; and he said, what shall I cry? All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness thereof as the flower of the field. Thirdly, The earth calls us to fruitfulness, when we are plowed, manured and watered: and that they, who often drinking in the rain of Heavenly doctrine bring not forth fruit, are near unto cursing, Heb. 6. Lastly, All the creatures teach us that special point which Job is upon, namely, That the tabernacles of robbers prosper.

For Job having said in the former verse, that the feet of the godly slide, or that they are trampled under foot, that robbers are rich, and oppressors prosper, he bids Zophar Ask the beasts, the fowls of the air, and the fishes of the sea, whether it be not so or no. As if he had said, Even beasts and birds teach us, that it is thus among men: For are not the most innocent and harmless beasts torn, vexed and devoured by the more cruel and stronger beasts. There is no desert in those, why they are advanced, and prosper: Neither is there any fault at all in those, why they are destroyed, and perish. The fowls of the air teach this also; do you not see the greater preying upon the less: is not the innocent Dove grip't in the talons of the ravening Vulture; and the poor Partridge by the hawk? The sea gives us the same instruction, for there also the Sharks and Whales, &c. swallow whole shoals of smaller fishes. As there are beast-devouring beasts, and fish-eating fishes; so there are men-devouring, men-eating men: There are civil Canibals in every Kingdom of the world, whose Tabernacles are glutted with prosperity.

Again, The beasts and birds, &c. will tell you that the tabernacles of robbers prosper, if you put them this other question, In whose possession are most of you? Who is your master? Come to the flocks of sheep, and to the herds of cattel, and ask, whose are ye? They will answer, such a wicked man is our master, a robber is our owner, an oppressour is Lord of all these flocks and herds. Ask the fowls of the air, and the fishes of the sea, to whose tables are ye most ordinarily served up? who feeds upon you? The fishes will say, We are carried up to the great mens tables, the robbers and oppressors of the earth feed upon us, we scarce ever come to the poor mans trencher, and but seldom (comparatively) to the good mans trencher; the greatest store of us is spent out upon the wicked, the tyrants of the earth glut themselves with us, we satisfie the lusts, fat the backs, and fill the bellies of oppressors. Ask the earth for whom it sends forth corn, and wine, and oyl, for whom she gives out her treasures of gold and silver, together with her rich materials for ornament and cloathing. The earth will tell you, most of my delicates are swallowed down by robbers; my silks and scarlets, my gems and precious stones, cloath and adorn the backs of robbers: Thus pass through every species of the creation, and all return this answer to the question in hand, The tabernacles of robbers prosper. Thus your thoughts may travel through all the creatures, and receive particular instruction from them. Zophar said, Chap. 11. 7. Canst thou by searching find out God? Yea, saith Job, I can find him almost without searching, every thing I see shews me God. I need not go to the heights of Heaven, or the depths of the Sea, as if the knowledge of God were not to be had within the bounds of the visible creature: whereas indeed every created form, informs us of the Creator; and every object we see, is as a teacher to the ear. The Apostle James gives a Caution (Chap. 1. 3.) My brethren, be not many masters: Which we may understand either thus, be not Magisterial and censorious (as if every one of you had many Masters in him) towards your brethren: or thus, let not every one take upon him to be a teacher, or (as some) to be a whole university of Teachers. For as it is said, that there are more Physitians then sick persons: Every man almost will venture to prescribe a Medicine. So we may say, there are more Masters then scholars: There are more who think themselves able to teach, then who are convinced that they have need to learn. Thus the Apostle would not have us to be many Masters: Yet we see God hath provided us many Masters, even as many as there be beasts in the field, or birds in the air, as many as there be trees and grass growing upon the earth, and fishes moving in the sea.

Videbatur Zophar sapientiam extra fines rerum aspectabilium coslocasse. Merc.

Hence take these two Corollaries.

First, We who have had so many Teachers, that we might know God, and glorifie him as God, shall have a many condemners if we do not.

Secondly, If they shall be without excuse, who know not God by the teaching of the creatures, how inexcusable will they be, who know him not in Christ, who is taught and preached every day?

But the points of holy learning which Job especially intendeth, are expressed in the two next verses.

Verse 9. Who knoweth not in all these, that the hand of the Lord hath wrought this? &c.

As if he had said, Though there are manifold lessons to be learned from the beasts, and from the fowls, and from the fishes, yet I call you in a special manner to learn that the hand of the Lord hath wrought this, and that all these things are in the hand of the Lord.

There are two points in these two verses, which Job calls us to learn.

First, The work of creation, ver. 9.

Secondly, The work of preservation, or providence, vers. 10.

The work of creation, Who knoweth not in all these, that the hand of the Lord hath wrought this? And if the hand of the Lord hath wrought them all, then the hand of the Lord doth dispose them all too; which is the Argument he was upon.

Who knoweth not.] That is, every one knoweth this; or every one may know from the works of the Lord, that the hand of the Lord hath wrought them.

That the hand of the Lord.] Why doth he say, The hand of the Lord? Was it not the word of the Lord that made the world? The Lord said, Let there be light, and let there be earth, and let there be seas, and let there be grass; and all things were so; how doth he say here, the hand of the Lord hath wrought them? I answer, the hand of the Lord, is no more then the word of the Lord; the hand of the Lord is the power of the Lord; and the word of the Lord is the power of the Lord too: Only, here he saith, that the hand of the Lord made them, to note, that the Lord made them immediately. The hand of the Lord put to a work, noteth his immediate work. Who knows not that the hand of the Lord hath wrought these things? That is, that the Lord, without any help or assistance, hath set up this mighty frame of Heaven and earth; that he alone hath provided and prepared all those vessels, which furnish it for the use and accommodation of the sons of men.

Who knoweth not in all these, &c.

That is, in one as well as in another. The lowest as well as the highest works of God, shew that God wrought them. Some pieces and parts of the world, are more excellent then the rest, but there is enough in any one of them to speak out who made it.

Hence note, First, God alone made the world.

Creation had but one hand in it. The hand of the Lord hath wrought. Every work of providence hath the hand of God in it, and some the hand of God only. But in creation the supream cause was all the cause, that knows nothing either of subordinate causes, or of instrumental. Some have asked, with what tools, or instruments, did God make the Heavens and the earth? with what ladders and scaffolds did he build so many stories, and after set up the roof over all? Job answers these fools, Who knoweth not that the hand of the Lord hath wrought them?

Naturalis Theologia. Socinus negat naturaliter ex animadversâ mundi machinâ Dei existentiam & providentiam colligi, sc. ut absurdum non sit esse mundum & non esse Deum & providentiam, nempe quia præstantissimi Philosophi non agnoverant. Soc.

Secondly, The Lord hath so made all, that the very things which he hath made, proclaim that he made them.

Who knoweth not in all these? or, from all these. Many works of providence are so done, that man cannot so much as be suspected to have done them. God doth like God: He needs not subscribe his name to his work; for that his Name is near, his wonderous works declare. It must be said by way of affirmation, This hath God wrought; as well as by admiration, What hath God wrought! Now, if providence (wherein usually man acts with God) act so much above man, that the whole is ascribed to God: how much more doth creation declare it self to be the sole work of God, Who knoweth not in all these, that the hand of the Lord hath made them?

But

But it may be objected, To understand that the world was made, is the work of faith; How then do we know it from all these? Or how do the creatures demonstrate their creation? Saith not the Apostle, Heb. 11. 3. Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God; so that things which are seen, were not made of things which do appear? I answer, Faith gives the highest understanding of these things; and there is somewhat of these things which we cannot understand but by Faith; yet the very creature doth demonstrate a creation. A Christian knows in a higher way then a Philosopher; yet a Philosopher may know that by reason, which a Christian knows by Faith. A Believer is in a higher form, and hath a higher light then a Philosopher, though both learn the same lesson.

And this doth more convince, not only Atheists, who deny that there is a God, Who hath wrought all these: but those also who improve not the works of God: for though we give God the greatest glory when we understand by believing, yet we may understand this principle by reasoning. The creature well viewed by a natural eye, tells the understanding, that a Divine power once created, and still ordereth all these things.

Hence thirdly observe, in reference both to creation and providence,

That the Lord doth not only the greater things, but the lesser.

Psal. 145. 6. Whatsoever is in Heaven, earth, or sea, he hath wrought them all. When the Primitive Christians were under the heat of persecution, they lived upon God under this notion, Acts 4. 24. Thou art God which hast made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all that in them is: For hence it follows, that he takes care of all. Providence is as large as creation. It was an ancient heresie, that, but some of the creatures, or the best of them, were made by God, and that, the more troublesome, and worst, were made by the Devil. To which purpose that story is famous, reported by Austin, in his first Tractate upon John, concerning a Manichee, that argued with an Orthodox Christian against the Creation; who having perswaded him, that God never troubled himself to make little Flyes, upon that concession caused him to confess, that he made not the Bee, the Locust, and smaller Birds; having got this advantage, he leaves not his Sophistry, till he forced him to confess, that God made neither the Ox, nor the Elephant, no, nor man himself. The truth is, if we do not give God glory in making the least of the creatures, we shall quickly be drawn to deny him glory in making the greatest. As it is in sinning, if we make not conscience of committing the least sin (I do not say, that if we commit a little sin, we shall presently commit a great one) but if we commit it out of this opinion, that it is no great matter, if once we admit of a little sin upon this ground, it will quickly bring the Conscience to swallow the greatest. 'Tis so about the works of God; if we deny his power in the work of creation, or his wisdom in the work of providence, about the least creature, we shall quickly grow to a kind of Atheism, and deny, or at least not hold forth with power the work of God in any of the creatures, or that His hand hath wrought them all.

Augusti. Tract. 1. in Joh. Cum orthodoxus muscam dixisset à diabolo factam, compulit fateri eum Manichæus ab eodem factā apē, locustā, lacertā, avē, bovem, elephantem, hominem.

Verse 10. In whose hand is the soul of every living thing, and the breath of all mankind.

The hand which made all, keeps all that he hath made in his hand. The former verse holds out the creation, and this the conservation of the world.

In whose hand.] The hand is put for power; and to be in the hand of God, is to be in the power of God.

Hence observe, The same power that made the world, preserveth the world.

Si creaturæ à deo factæ sunt manifestum est, quod in dei potestate sunt sicut artificiata in manu artificis. Aquin.

When men have done their work, they put it out of their hands; we usually say, such a thing is in, or under, my hand; that is, it is a doing, I am at work upon it; but as soon as we have done our work, we say, such a thing is out of my hand; that is, I have done with it: Man cannot hold his work alwayes in his hand; but God doth: And there is a necessity that he should. The world would presently run out of its being, if it were not upheld by the same hand which at first gave it a being: When man sinned, the world had ruined, if Christ (by whom all things were made, John 1.) had not stept in, to be the stay and prop of it, By him all things consist, Col. 1. 17. He upholdeth all things by the word of his power, Heb. 1. 9. He is that powerful word which made all things, and he upholdeth all things by the word of his power; we owe the standing of the world as much to Christ, as we do the creation of it. In whose hand

Is the soul of every living thing.] The Hebrew word נפש Anima qua vivitur cum sensu & sensibili appetitu spiritus hominis qua vivitur cum consilio voluntatis. Omnis anima est in manu dei, quia ut produci ita ab ipso habet conservari. Jans. in loc. signifies, not only the soul of man, but of any creature that breatheth, or the breathing of any creature. And it is put for the whole compositum, the body and the life. Every living thing died: So Moses speaks of the Flood. God put their lives out of his hand into the hand of the merciless waters: Yea, not only men, and beasts, and birds, &c. but trees and plants, the grass in the field, and the flowers in your gardens, live by the power of God: the trees in Winter are as dead, their leaves fall off, and their fruit is gathered, the fields are uncloathed and naked: but when the Spring comes, grass comes, trees bud and bring forth fruit again; shall we ascribe this to the Sun? shall we go no further then the season for this? and say, the Spring is come, and therefore the grass comes? No, In his hand is the soul of every living thing: There is a life in the grass, and it is of God that the grass grows, that the trees blossom and bring forth. In his hand is the soul

Of every living thing.] Sometimes the word is restrained to man, Gen. 2. Eve, the first Woman, was so called, because she was the Mother of all living, yet she was the Mother only of living man. Some take it so here, implying that the Lord, who made all souls, hath the soul of man especially in his hand. But we need not restrain it thus; seeing the last clause of the verse speaks expresly of the care of God towards man: In whose hand is the soul of every living thing,

And the breath of all mankind.] Or, The spirit of all mans flesh: So Mr. Broughton reads it: Breath and spirit are often used promiscuously; and Ruah signifies both.

רוח Spiritus est flatus, seu respiratio universæ carnis.

Here 'tis taken for the breath, or breathing of man, which is but an act of life. In whose hand is the breath of all mankind. Daniel makes report to Belshazzar (Dan. 5. 23.) what God had done for his father Nebuchadnezzar, in what great glory he had set him up, &c. and then reproves him, The God, in whose hand thy breath is, and whose are all thy wayes, hast thou not glorified. The God, in whose hand thy breath is. Belshazzar was a great Prince, the greatest Monarch at that time upon the earth, he commanded all, he had the breath of many in his hand, as Daniel there speaks of his father, whom he would he slew, and whom he would he kept alive, such was the power of that great Monarch; but then he minds him, that he was not Lord of his own life; Thy breath is in the hand of God; if God will, he can keep thee alive; and if God will, he can take away thy life. It is true of God in the fullest extent. Whom he will he slayes, and whom he will he keeps alive.

It is the comfort of our lives, that our lives are in the hand of God. That which is in his hand, is in a safe hand. It is not in the power of all the world to take away one life which God will keep. As the safety of the soul, in the state of grace, lyes in this, that it is in the hand of God, as Christ argues in the tenth of John, Ye are in my Fathers hand; that is, your spiritual estate is in his hand, and my Father, which gave you unto me, is greater then all, and no man is able to pluck you out of my Fathers hand. Here is the safety of the Saints; and that's the priviledge we have under the Covenant of Grace by Christ, beyond what we had under the Covenant of works in Adam. Our spiritual life was then in our own hand; now it is in the hand of God. Here also in its proportion lyes the safety of our natural life; it is in the hand of God; God hath not only taken the life of our souls into his own hand, but the life of our bodies too; he disposeth of lives as he pleaseth; he can say to one in a day of common calamity, Thou shalt have thy life for a prey; and to another, Thou shalt dye by the sword, &c. What can we say in these times of death, when the breath hath gone out of many thousands; why hath it not gone out of our bodies? No other account can be given but this, Our breath is in the hand of God; were it not so, the breath of many of us had not been in our bodies at this time.

Further, It should teach us to honour that God, in whose hand our breath is. Daniel checked Belshazzar, because he failed failed in this, The God in whose hand thy breath is, hast thou not honoured. How careful are we to please those who have our estates in their hands? We respect him also very much, in whose hand our health is: But if our life be in the hand of another (as sometimes it is) how do we study and strive to comply with the commands, yea with the very humours of such a man? Shall we not honour God, in whose hand our breath is?

Lastly, If our breath be in the hand of God, it teacheth us, that the time of our death, and of the going forth of our breath, is set down and disposed by God. Sometimes a sickness indangers our life, and threatens to stop our breath presently; but God saith, no, it shall not be. Sometimes outward violence invades us; but as David comforts himself, Our times are in Gods hand: And as none can take away life, if He will continue it; so none can continue life, if He will take it away. If God send for our breath (how unwilling soever we are to part with it) it must come. One of the Ancients bespeaks a wicked man thus, Thou hast thy breath in thy nostrils, and thou art unwilling to let it go; but if God speak the word, thy breath will go. Again (saith he) When God shall reunite these two, thy body and thy breath, and cast both into hell together, he will hold thy breath in thy body whether thou wilt or no: Here is a double punishment; he will fetch thy breath out of thy body, when thou wouldst keep it; and he will keep thy breath in thy body, when thou wouldst be separated from it. Thou shalt dye when thou wouldst live; and thou shalt live when thou wooest death, and desirest to be dissolved, yea to be annihilated.

This also administers comfort to the Saints, that as when their breath goes forth, Gods hand leads it forth; so that hand of God will preserve their breath for ever. He gives them eternal life, and that is in his hand; He can lengthen out life to all eternity, in whose hand life is. He that gives us life of a span-long, can give us life eternity-long.

Thus we have seen Job's first Argument from the creatures, all which acknowledge God their Maker, God their Disposer, and Preserver; they have their being, and their well being, together with the changes and continuance of both from him.

VERS. 11, 12, 13, 14.

Doth not the ear try words? and the mouth taste his meat?
With the ancient is wisdom, and in length of dayes, understanding.
With him is wisdom and strength; he hath counsel and understanding.
Behold he breaketh down, and it cannot be built again: he shutteth up a man, and there can be no opening.

THe knot of connection, which ties these words to the former, lyes so close, that many have been troubled to find it out.

First, It is conceived by some, that Job having in the former verses, the seventh and eighth, called his friends to read the Book of Nature; Ask now the beasts, and they shall teach thee, &c. Turn over all the leaves of that great Volume, the World, and they will be instruction to thee. He now pursues the same point, and tells them, that it would not be unprofitable for them, or lost labour, if they, in pursuance of his counsel, should set upon this study; For the ear tryeth words, and the mouth tasteth his meat; that is, every sense will give them information about its proper objects, and shew the peculiar end of its institution: he instanceth in two senses, Hearing and Tasting, by a Synechdoche, for all the rest; as if he had said, Each power and faculty with which the nature of man is endowed, will be a contributor towards the attainment of this knowledge; and declare that the wisdom and power of God is eminent and conspicuous in the creature. And because old men have heard many words, and have tasted many meats; that is, have had long experience of things; therefore he addeth in the twelfth verse, With the ancient is wisdom, and in length of dayes, understanding; they who have run the longest course in the world, and have seen the greatest variety of changes, must needs know most of God, because every change holds forth somewhat of God.

Agitur de creatoris cognitione percipienda ex creaturis experimento rerum sensibilium, quæ per illos duos sensus, gustum videlicet & auditum, significantur. Aquin. placet etiã Sanct.

Secondly, The connection appears to others thus; as if Job would here again meet with that opinion, which his friends (Zophar especially) had more then once insinuated, that the doctrine which they were upon, and had taught him, was a deep mystery, and very hard to be understood, that it was (which some now glory in, Theologia cryptica) Divinity in the mystery. No, saith he, there is no such matter; the point you are upon is very plain and easie; you need not make so many preambles, as if it were all under a vail, or within a curtain of secrecy (as was hinted in the former Chapter) for the things are plain. As the ear tryeth words, and the mouth tasteth meat, so it is here; these things are as obvious, as sensible objects to the senses; we may learn them by ordinary hearing, which is the use of the ear; and by common experience, which is imported by the tast.

Thirdly, That Job refers to his own doctrine; As if he had said, I have held forth my opinion concerning the dealings of God with just men. And the truth I have maintained, is as plain and easie to the understanding, as sounds and languages are to the ear, or as meats unto the mouth. For as the understanding is to things rational and speculative, so are the senses to things external and sensitive; the palate to meats, and the ear to words.

Fourthly, That Job being about to lift up the Name of God, to speak out his glory in the attributes of his power and wisdom; and that God by his absolute soveraignty over all creatures, may afflict or prosper, do good or evil as he pleaseth; doth here preface or premise this general commendation of his wisdom, that God doth as exactly apprehend all that is done or spoken in the world, as the ear of a man tryeth the words of him that stands next him, whether they be true or false, for him or against him: or as the palate tasteth meat, whether it be sweet or bitter, liking or loathsome. All the wayes of the children of men are before the Lord, he discerns the voice of all their actions, and the language of every mans life: he knows whether their works be sweet or bitter, whether good or evil. The Psalmist speaks near the language of this interpretation, (Psal. 94. 9.) He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? he that formed the eye, shall he not see? God is elsewhere said to have eyes, which try good and bad; he is here spoken of as having ears discerning truth and falshood. And his ears are so quick, that they take in the least whisper, the stillest voice; there is not a word spoken, but the voice is heard by God: He hears our silence, as well as our speech, and can tell what we say, when we say nothing: He hears the voice of our thoughts, our thoughts are as loud in the ears of God, as a trumpet in our ears. God hears the voice of our actions, though we utter no words. The voice of thy brothers blood crieth; thou hast done a bloody deed, and that hath a voice, a crying voice (Habbak. 2. 11.) The stone shall cry out of the wall. The Lords ear hears the voice of all creatures, even of those that cannot speak; he can do what he pleaseth, and he is as clear in all he doth, as the ear is in trying words, or the taste in discerning meats.

Divina jactentia omnia quæ loquuntur cogitantur aut fiunt, ita cognoscit quasi illorum audiret voces, quod auriũ est; aut gustaret sapores, quod faucium est. Sanct. Sensus percipiunt sonos, sapores, &c. Nonne oportet deum qui hæc dedit omniscium esse? Goc.

Every excellency in the creature is in God by way of eminency. Doth the ear of man try words? then the ear of God doth much more. Doth the mouth of man taste meat? much more doth the Lord taste men. Hence he sometime speaks distastingly of men, they are represented as a burthen to his stomack, and he as ready to spue them out.

Further, The words seem to carry a reproof of the rash and inconsiderate judgement of Jobs friends about what had been spoken. This Exposition may be taken two wayes. Either Socios taxat quod non diligenter expenderent à se dicta, q. d. vestrũ sane erat purgatam aurem afferre non me carpere, &c Merc.

First, In reference unto what Job had offered.

You have heard my judgement about the dispensations of God before, and I have spoken it a second time, that the tabernacles of the wicked prosper, that many a godly man is as a despised lamp: Now, Doth not the ear try words? Doth not the mouth taste meats? As if he had said, You have not yet weighed nor considered what I have proposed; if you had, I should not have needed to come upon this point the second time; you have been rash in your judgements, your ears have not done their office, you have not pondered my speech, nor the arguments and reasons which I have produced in confirmation of my opinion.

Or secondly, in reference to what Jobs friends had offered. As if he had said, You have declared many things to me, and you think that I have taken no notice of them, but I assure you I have, my ear hath as exactly tryed your words, as the mouth or the palate of a man tasteth meats.

Taking it thus, we may best read the words comparatively, (as we find them chap. 34. 3.) The ear tryeth words, as the mouth tasteth meat. Thus the sense is most clear. Hearken diligently to my words, and then you may understand my meaning as distinctly as your taste doth what you eat.

בחן Probare, tentare, penitùs explorare, & diligenter expendere. Aurem non externâ tãtum intelligi sed & internam i.e. exactum judiciũ quod iis quæ audiuntur ist adhibendum. Merc. Aurium & Stateræ idẽ ist nomen in Hebræo, duæ enim aures sunt velut bilances quibus expenduntur quæ audimus.

The word which we translate try, signifies exact tryal, a perfect exploration. The ear is the chief Instrument of the understanding, the sense of discipline. Here Job speaks not only of the outward ear, but of the ear as it acts with the understanding, which not only hears the sound of words, or knowes the English of them, but discerns the meaning and scope of them. This Job especially intendeth, when he saith, The ear tryeth words.

Observe, The ear must do more then hear, in hearing it must try what it heareth.

He puts that which is properly an act of the understanding upon the ear, which is but an outward sense, namely, to try the truth or falshood of those things that are spoken. The Original word for an ear (represents us with this duty of the ear) being in the dual number, signifies a pair of ballances, to note, that when we are hearing we should be weighing; we should put every word into the scales as we receive it. Doth not the ear try words? When you have received a piece of gold you try it, and there is a double tryal, a tryal by the Touchstone, and a tryal by the Ballance. Every one that doubteth will go to the Touchstone to try whether it be good mettal or no, and he will go to his ballances and try whether it be weight or no. Thus when words are spoken they should be tryed, tryed by the touchstone and ballance of the Sanctuary. An attentive ear, and a holy understanding, will never put them among our treasures of knowledge or leading principles, till they have brought them to this tryal.

The point layes a just reproof upon those who hear many words, but try none. It is said of the Bereans (Act. 17.) that when an Apostle spake, they tryed his words; they might have trusted Paul as soon as any man alive, that he would not put any false Coyn upon them, that he would not speak a word that wanted a grain of weight, yet their ears would try the words of Paul, though he spake by inspiration immediately from heaven, though he had an infallible Spirit. If this duty were observed, if hearers would try words, so many light pieces, light doctrines, which bear no weight in the ballance of the Sanctuary, would not be pursed up, and put in among our treasures. Many make treasure of light and erroneous doctrine, of base coyn, and counterfeit money: The reason is, Because the ear doth not try, the understanding and ear joyn not together, Psal. 62. 11. God hath spoken once, and twice have I heard it; that is, he heard it with his outward ear, and he heard it with his understanding: He duly weighed what God spake. Thus you must do if you will hear to purpose, be it who will that speaks; hear it once, and hear it again, that is, hear it with a sensitive ear, and hear it with an intellective ear, judge of it and try what it is. Our Saviour Christ cautions us to take heed how we hear; though to hear be a natural act, yet there is an artificial hearing, there is an heavenly art in it. The ear must be taught by the Spirit to hear, or else it can never hear what the Spirit saith.

Secondly, Observe, No doctrine ought to be rejected until it be tryed.

As none ought to be received till it be tryed, so none to be rejected. Job taxeth his friends, that they out of prejudice had cast off what he had spoken. Doth not the ear try words? Why have you not done me that right, as to examine the things I have spoken, before you censure me? you slight and contemn me, as if I were a man distracted and out of my wits; as though my words were not worth the weighing. It is as dangerous to refuse, as to receive what we have not examined. For, however a doctrine may be worthy to be rejected which we do not try, yet we do not our duty to reject it before we have tried. As we say of a judge, he that judges a man before he hears him, though possibly the sentence which he passeth may be just, yet the judge is unjust; so it is in this case, if we reject a doctrine before tryal, though possibly it be worthy to be rejected, yet we are worthy to be reproved for rejecting it. We erre in laying aside an errour, before we have found it to be an errour. The best that can be said of such, is, that they have done well by accident. And as they need pardon who do evil, though they know it not; so they have nothing to boast of, who refuse that which is evil before they know it to be so. The Apostle gives that rule (1 Thes. 5. 21.) when he had said, Despise not prophecyings, be diligent in attending the means, he adds, Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good. As we must not reject or refuse to hear the Word, so we must not receive every word we hear, but try all things, and hold fast that which is good. Doth not the ear try words?

And the mouth taste his meat?

The Hebrew is, Doth not the palate taste his meat? There is a dispute among Philosophers what is the proper sensorium or instrument of tasting. Most give it to the whole mouth, some to the palate, others to the tongue, not a few to the tip of the tongue; there is a fifth opinion which ascribes it to the nerves which diffuse themselves quite through the tongue; a sixth places it in the throat. Hence Aristotle reports of Philoxenus an Epicure, who wished that he had a neck as long as a Crane, that he might the longer taste the pleasure, and take the more delight in his meat. Which way soever it is in nature, the Moral truth is the same, which you may take in this brief Note. Arist. l. 3. Eth. c. 10.

Every sence hath a distinct office, the Ear is for hearing, the Mouth for tasting, the Eye for seeing, the Nostrils for smelling; Thus the Lord hath made a Polity in the body Natural. The body of man is a kinde of corporation, every officer standeth in his place, and hath his duty. The comliness of the body natural, and the comliness of a body Politique, whether civil or spiritual, shines in the due discharge of each members office: every member needs the help of his neighbour member, and the operation of every member is a help to the whole; The eye sees, the ear hears, the mouth tastes, as a servant, and for the service of the whole body.

There is yet another translation (observed by Chrysostom) in some of the Greek versions, where it is read thus, The ear tryeth words, and the mind tasteth meats. One letter added in the greek changes the signification from the mouth to the mind; taking it with that literal addition, these words are an explication of the former: As the ear tryeth words or sounds, so the mind trieth meats. What meats? Truth is the meat of the mind, the nourishment of the understanding. Hence the word of truth is often compared to things edible and potable, to meat and drink, to honey, and the honey comb. And the want of the word of truth is called a Famine by the Prophet. The soul starves where the word of truth is not rightly divided, cut out, or carved to it. All the excellencies of God that are held forth in the word, are the souls food, (Psal. 34. 8.) O taste and see that the Lord is good; what is it that tasteth how sweet the Lord is? It is the mind working, meditating, and acting faith upon him. Faith is the souls taster, faith is the mouth of the soul, which not only tasteth but cheweth the promises and manifestations of God to his people, and so makes meat of them; Meditation turns the promises into marrow. My soul (saith David, Psal. 63. 5, 6.) shall be satisfied as with marrow and fatness, and my mouth shall praise thee with joyful lips, when I remember thee upon my bed, and meditate on thee in the night watches. As there is all manner of riches, so all manner of dainties in the believing meditations of God: every promise is a dish, and all the promises are a royal feast to faith. Heathens have given this notion about the taste of words. Cicero in his Oration against Piso, saith, Pompey could not taste that Philosophy. He was a great Souldier, a man of action, and troubled not himself with sedentary studies, and bookish contemplations. And as there is a spiritual taste, so a spiritual hearing, or rather these are the same; to taste spiritually is to hear spiritually. It was the meat of Christ to do the will of him that sent him: it is meat to such as are Christs, to hear the will of God by those whom he sends, and the more they hear, the more wisdom they get, as followeth, Ut auris vas mens haud mala sententia. Drus.

Pompeius non gustaret illam Philosophiam. Cic. in Pison. Gustare ejus sermonem volo. Plaut. in Mostel. Act. 6. Judicare genus est ipsius sentire qui namque sentit judicat aliquo modo. Arist. l. 2. de An.

Vers.

Vers. 12. With the ancient is wisdom, and in length of dayes understanding.

בשישים in decrepitis.

With the ancient is wisdom.] The senses are a door to the understanding, both acting together lay up treasures of knowledge, therefore with the ancient is wisdom, and in length of dayes understanding. The word which we translate ancient, signifies not the first, no nor the second (for the Hebrews reckon three) but the third and last step of Old age. The first, by their calculation begins at the year threescore, and extends to threescore and ten: when man is threescore, he enters (say they) the borders of old age, and while he is travelling to threescore and ten, he is in the first territory of old age. The second reaches from threescore and ten to fourscore: he is an old man indeed who attains that reckoning, (Psal. 90. 10.) The third is that whole space be it longer or shorter, that man lives beyond fourscore, and that is properly meant by the word used in this Text, with the ancient is wisdom; and the more ancient any are, the more wisdom they may be supposed to have.

Triplex senectus apud Hebræos, decrepiti sunt annosiores senibus. Merc.

Not that every old, or every decrepit old man hath wisdom; some have attained the last degree or step of old age, who have not attained the first degree of wisdom: They have walked in a vain shadow, and have learned nothing. But when he saith, with the ancient is wisdom, he means; First, it is the duty of old men to shew forth wisdom. Secondly, old men have had a great opportunity to gather wisdom, a price hath been in their hands, though possibly they have not had hearts to make use of it. It is not running through a great many years, that makes men wise: wisdom is the gift of God, not of time. And as this doth not infer, that all old men are wise, so neither doth it infer, that none but old men are. Wisdom is not so with the ancient, as if it could be no where else; Gray hairs have not ingrossed that whole commodity, nor is it all given and granted to them. Wisdom doth not alwayes lean upon a staff, nor look through Spectacles: It doth not alwayes (as some describe venerable old age) go upon three legs, nor see with four eyes. Young men may have wisdom if God give it, and old men cannot have wisdom unless God give it. Some young men have understood as much as the ancient, yea more then the ancient, as there will be a clearer occasion to shew at the thirty second Chapter, vers. 7, 8, 9. whither I refer the Reader, if God shall carry on this work so far by my hand.

Observe, at present, First, Old men should be wise men. With the ancient is wisdom.

Where should we go for wisdom but unto them? Some will not so much as suspect young men for much wisdom, but we have reason to look for it among the Ancients. The Apostle (1 John 2. 11, 12.) writ to Christians of all sorts and sizes, under the titles of little children, young men, and fathers, and he gives a special reason of his dedication to either of them. I write unto you little children, because your sins are forgiven. I write to you young men, because you are strong, &c. I write unto you fathers, why? Because you have known him which was from the beginning. He gives a reason suitable to old men, I write unto you fathers, because ye have known him which was from the beginning. As if he had said, wisdom and knowledge are amongst old men, amongst the fathers. I take it for granted, that you are knowing men, therefore I write unto you about these depths of knowledge. With the ancient is wisdom. The Apostle (Heb. 5. 12.) gives a severe reproof to those who when for the time they ought to be teachers, yet had need that one teach them again which be the first principles of the Oracles of God. When for the time, that is, they had a great deal of time, and therefore their proficiency in holy knowledge should have been great. And proportionably how much time every one had, such a talent he hath had, and he shall be reckoned with, as having had it to get wisdom. Time in it self cannot advantage us, but time bringeth advantages with it for the compassing of the greatest undertakings, and for the perfecting of those who are most imperfect. Time is not an empty duration. God hath filled time with helps to eternity, and with means to know him the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he hath sent, which is eternal life. Wo to those that have not competently learned this great lesson, when for the time they ought to be teachers, &c. An old man ignorant is more childish then a child. To see an old man in the first rudiments or primer of natural knowledge is uncomly; but how dreadful is it to see an old man not able to read nor understand the primmer of the Gospel, or the first principles of Religion; we have seen sad experiences of some who have lived under powerful means, even till decrepit old age, even until this third degree of old age, and yet have not been in their A. B. C. of saving knowledge, being unable to spel or put two letters together in the things of God, or to make out any one conclusion understandingly about the necessaries to salvation. It is bad enough when children and young men are ignorant, and foolish in the things of heaven; but with what tears should we lament it, when with the ancient there is no wisdom, nor understanding in length of dayes. Which crosseth the second part of Jobs Assertion,

Turpis & ridicularis est senex elementaris.

And in length of dayes understanding.] Both parts of the sentence have the same sence. In length of dayes, or in many dayes, that is, by the experiences which we get in length of dayes, understanding is improved and heightned. Experience is a great teacher. The Apostle tells us that every experience we have of God should teach us to hope in God. Experience worketh hope (Rom. 5.) Experience also worketh knowledge. Experience is a tedious Master, it keeps us long at School; but experience is a sure master, and we may learn much by experience. In length of dayes is understanding.

Scientia domi paratur ex libris, prudentia ex itinere & usu verum.

Observe upon the whole verse, Old men are to be honoured, and their counsel to be respected.

With them (probably) there is most wisdom, and therefore they deserve most respect. Hence the Scripture calleth us often to reverence gray hairs, and that we should rise up to old men; not that we are to adore, which is indeed to dote upon old age; it is doting to think that every thing must be true which an old man saith, or which the Fathers have asserted. But as it is the dotage of any man, to credit any thing which an old man speaks, or to pin our faith upon the opinion of the Ancients, so it is a sin (besides the incivility of it) to slight or undervalue what old age speaks. Old men having injoyed the like means that young men have, and having made improvement of the means which they have injoyed, are to be looked upon with veneration, and their counsel is to be received with more respect then that of young men. What destroyed the Kingdom of Rehoboam? he followed the counsel of the young men, and would not follow the advice of the old Councellors, who had been with his Father, and had long known the carriage of the Kingdom, and the way of government: He takes young mens counsel, and so overthroweth all. The same error and danger lyes in spiritual, as well as in temporal affairs. An ancient Writer, describing the happiness of a City, saith, Then a City is happy, when it useth the counsel of old men, and the strength of young men: When it hath the heads of ancient men, and the hands of young men; the one to give counsel and advice, the other to act and execute; then a City, or Commonwealth, is like to be safe and flourish. Though we must not tye up our selves to the counsel of the ancient, nor esteem all truth because the Ancients say so; Truth is older then the eldest; Truth hath the grayest hair, the hoariest head: And though if truth be spoken by a Youth, we must reverence it, and reject error, though an old man be the patron; yet old men must have reverence in what they say, and deserve preheminence in counsel.

Maximè salva est civitas, ubi consilia senum, juvenum arma obtinent. Plut.

Job seems to apply this to his friends. You are men of years, therefore you surely have attained much understanding. You may well know what I have taught, and what I am now teaching, That God is transcendent in wisdom, that his knowledge as well as his power is over all. You must needs know that God works mysteriously and secretly, that he works supreamly and authoritatively, that he needs not give an account unto the children of men, With the ancient is this wisdom, and in length of dayes this understanding; This is the wisdom which I shall now demonstrate.

Vers. 13. That, with him is wisdom and strength, he hath counsel and understanding.

In sapientia & fortitudine consistit divina providentiam esse omnibus partibus perfectam.

With him.] The Antecedent is not the ancient man spoken of before, with him wisdom may be, but not strength. Old men do probably increase in wisdom, but they do certainly and unavoidably decrease in strength. Here then we must look for another Antecedent distinct from the ancient man. With him, that is, with God, about whose providence and justice I have spoken, with him is wisdom and strength; as if he had said, if men by hearing and tasting gather up much knowledge in a tract of time, and length of dayes; then what treasures of knowledge and wisdom are there in God, who is the ancient of dayes, and who is as old as eternity. Job argues from the less to the greater: with God who is eternal, and inhabiteth eternity, there is wisdom and strength, and he hath counsel and understanding.

With him there is wisdom and strength.

We met with both these attributes of God, Chap. 9. vers. 4. He is wise in heart, and mighty in strength, who hath hardned himself against him and prospered? Therefore I shall not stay upon them here, only a word.

First, God is infinitely wise and strong. He is wise to design, and strong to effect.

Secondly, they who want wisdom must go to God for it. With him is wisdom, as if he had said, You may gather wisdom among the creatures, and from observation, but all wisdom is laid up in God. Study alone will not make you wise, experiences alone will not make you wise, you must go to the Fountain of wisdom; So the Apostle directs (Jam. 1. 5.) If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him. And again, (vers. 16) Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights; (Holy wisdom is not a vapour which fumes up from the earth, but an influence which falls from that light of heaven) with whom there is no variableness, nor shadow of turning.

Some conceive that Job here answers the counsel of Bildad, (Chap. 8. vers. 8.) Enquire of the former age, and prepare thy self to the search of their fathers, for we are but of yesterday, &c. I grant (saith he) we are to enquire of former ages; I am of your opinion too, that, with the ancient is wisdom; yet I do not expect to find all wisdom among the ancient, (their Well hath not depth enough to yield these waters to all comers, or for all occasions) no, I must go to God; With him is wisdom, and he hath counsel and understanding. Though all the ancient men in the world, and ancient Councels, affirm that, which the word of God denies, we must not believe them, for with him is wisdom. In the 28. Chapter of this book, vers. 12. the question is put, Where shall wisdom be found? and where is the place of understanding? Where? All the creatures disclaim it, The depth saith, it is not in me, and the sea saith, it is not with me. Though we may gain wisdom by conversing with the creatures, yet there is no creature hath wisdom in his keeping, or at his disposing. That's the priviledge of God; With him is wisdom. With him, as with a Master, as with a Lord; His it is. With him, as with a dispenser, as with a Steward; He gives it out as he pleaseth, he bestowes it upon whom he will; all wisdom is Originally in him, and derivatively from him. (Chap. 15.8.) Hast thou heard the secret of God, and doest thou restrain wisdom to thy self? As if he had said, Thou talkest as if thou hadst been of Gods counsel, or at least as if thou hadst learnt knowledge, not only from the mouth of men, but immediately from the mouth of God himself.

Thirdly Observe, That all the wisdom of man, compared with God, is no wisdom.

Our wisdom is foolishness compared with God. I ground it from the Text, thus. He had said before, With the ancient is wisdom, and in length of dayes understanding. Now saith he, With him is wisdom, and he hath counsel and understanding. As if he had said, I told you of wisdom in old men, and of understanding in length of dayes, but I assure you this wisdom is nothing to the wisdom I now speak of. He means not a wisdom different in kind; for if there be true wisdom in old men, it is a drop of Gods ocean, a beam of the Father of lights. But the wisdom that is in God carries the name of wisdom from the wisdom that is in old men. As all the light of the Stars is but darkness compared to the light of the Sun; so there is wisdom with men, with old men especially, and there is wisdom with God: But the wisdom that is in God, who is the ancient of dayes, extinguisheth and overcometh all the wisdom in men, though they be never so ancient. With him is wisdom and strength.

He hath counsel and understanding.

Here are four words used in reference to God: we had but two before in reference to old men, wisdom, and understanding. But with God there is wisdom, strength, counsel, and understanding; and though three of the four are used promiscuously, yet as they stand here together we may give them a distinct sense.

Understanding consists in finding out secrets and mysteries, in diving to the bottom of truths. With God there is understanding, he findes out the most hidden mysteries, his name is the Revealer of Secrets.

Secondly, Counsel is properly that which fits means to the attaining of an end. When we have a business to do, we go to counsel, and Counsel is to provide futable means for the carrying on of such a design, and the accomplishing of our desires.

Thirdly, Wisdom, as it stands distinct from understanding and counsel, consists in the due ordering of those means which counsel hath found out. Thus understanding findes out the matter, counsel declares the means, and wisdom manages and disposeth all towards the attainment of the end. All these are in God,

And a fourth, which is Strength to execute and carry on the means (according to the dictates of understanding, counsel and wisdom) home to the end. If a man be furnished with the greatest measure of understanding to find out, of counsel to contrive, of wisdom to dispose, yet if he want an arm of strength, what can he do? 'Tis true, wisdom is better then weapons of war, yet what can wisdom do without weapons of war? A good head is better then a strong arm, yet what can a good head do without a strong arm? But where wisdom and weapons of war, where a good head and a strong arm joyn, what can they not do?

Job to demonstrate the absolute compleatness of God in all his administrations, shewes all these meeting in God. Would you have understanding? it is in him, he can search out deep things: Would you have counsel? He can direct you to the most proper means. With him is counsel. Would you have wisdom? He can mannage and order means to the best advantage: He is the God only wise. Would you have strength? He can execute and bring to pass effectually whatsoever he intendeth, his power is over all, and there is nothing too hard for him. Thus the glory of God is lifted up, not only above the actings, but above the thoughts of man.

Hence Observe, God is compleat in all perfections.

Among men excellencies are scattered, and lye divided, one hath depth of understanding, a second clearness for counsel, a third is enriched with treasures of wisdom, a fourth is fortified with a hand of power. 'Tis rare when any two of these meet in one man; and he is a kind of miracle of men, in whom they all meet, though but in some low or languid degree. But in God they meet all, and continue alwayes in the highest degree. Those things which single put honour and value upon man, concenter in God. Who would not seek unto and depend on God? Who would not have God his friend, in whom he hath all friends, and who is such a friend, that having him we need not care nor fear who is our enemy?

One God helping, is more then all men opposing. When word was brought to a great Carthaginian Commander in their war against the Romans, that the Enemy was very strong and numerous; He answer'd the trembling Intelligencer, How many do you reckon me for? Some men are of such vast wisdom strength and courage, that one of them may be mustered for a whole Army of men. How many then may we reckon God for, who alone hath all that which all men have among them, who alone can do more then all men combined together can? Men act their several parts in the scene of worldly affairs, but God acteth all parts. As he that rides post a long journey, takes fresh horses to carry him him through; one horse carries him the first stage, and there he is left: A second speeds him to another Stage, and there stayes: In the same manner a third to a third. So it is in transacting any great business, one man will help you thus far, and another will carry you so far, and a third yet farther. One carrieth us as far as counsel and wisdom work, but he wants strength; another hath strength, but he wants faithfulness. But God carries us through the whole journey of our works, he is never tired, nor can he be taken off. (Isa. 40.28.) The mighty God fainteth not, neither is weary, and there is no searching of his understanding. Yea, not only hath he this unweariedness in himself, but he communicates it to his, the young men shall faint, (that is, they that are strong, especially they that boast in their own strength) but they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength, they shall mount up with wings as Eagles, they shall run and not be weary, and they shall walk and not faint. The Lord gives his much of himself, they shall act like God who trust in God.

Job having arrayed the Lord in all these excellencies, proceeds to illustrate what he had asserted by some special instances. As if he had said, lest any should think that I speak only general notions, I will give you particular proofs, which you who are old men have surely made out by your own Observation, and are able from experience to attest.

Verse. 14. Behold, he breaketh down, and it cannot be built again; he shutteth up a man, and there can be no opening.

Here is an instance of the strength and power of God, yea of his wisdom and understanding; all these concur in one act of providence; though some one appear and be put forth more eminently. I will tell you (saith Job) what God doth: this God of whom I have spoken great things, doth great things; Yea, it is far easier for him to do great things, then for me to speak of them; for himself can as easily, and as speedily do them, as speak them. The Works which speak him great, are more then can be spoken; Of some I shall now speak.

Behold, he breaketh down, and it cannot be built again.

יהרס Propriè deleverit, dissipaverit. Ampla valde & vehemens est illa significatio destruendi, ut etiã denotet Anathematizare, excommunicare. Pin.

These words relate to the attribute of power: With him is strength. And they are more then a bare affirmation that God is strong, they prove that he is strongest, or that there is no strength a match for his: This the instance reacheth fully, Behold, he breaketh down, and it cannot be built again. No man, no nor Angel, is able to preserve what God will overthrow, or to restore, what he hath once destroyed.

The word which we translate to break down, signifies an utter dissipation or dissolution, even the putting of a thing out of its being: Some interpret it by Anathematizing, cursing, or excommunicating, which imports the devoting both of things and persons to a total and perpetual ruine.

First, some understand Job speaking here of his own children and family which God had broken down, with a high and strong hand. Children are a living house; A son in the sacred language hath his name from building, because sons build or continue their fathers house. When Sarah prayed Abraham to go in unto Hagar, she said, It may be I may obtain children by her: The Hebrew letter is, It may be I may be builded by her, Gen. 16.2. Rachel invited Jacob to Bilhahs bed upon the same hopes, That I also (said she) may have children, or be built by her, Gen. 30.3. Now as when God gives children he builds, so when he takes them away he breaks down: If the Lord break down thus, if he take away the children which he hath given, who can restore them to us again, or repair that breach?

Secondly, others conceive he refers to those two ancient acts of Gods breaking providence, the overthrow of Babel, and the destruction of Sodom, which were not builded again to that day.

Melius quadrat ut in communi dicatur, quicquid vult Deus quacunq; ratione destruere. Bol.

Thirdly, we need not restrain his fence to any special City, or to his own family; expound him rather of the ruining of mans estate in general. If the Lord break down, and deface their worldly glory, who are most fairly built and raised up, who have strongest foundations, and firmest walls, who have highest towers, and the most aspiring pinnacles; if he pull down an estate thus founded, thus raised, and break it to pieces, it shall certainly be broken, and that without remedy.

Hence Observe, First, What God will do, he can do, and it shall be done.

He breaks down without asking any man leave: God doth not work by sufferance, but by authority. The whole world is his work, and he may make what work he will in the world. If he will work, who shall let it? (Isa. 43.13.) if he will smite, who shall let it? He will not put up his sword at thy word, no nor for fear of thy power. If he give the word, Break down, down it shall. The word of God plants, and the word of God roots up, and it doth both irresistibly. If God will destroy persons or Kingdoms, there is no saving them. As none can pull down, what he sets up, so none can set up what he pulls down. If he saith, Let it lye in the dust, who shall raise it up again? The Prophet (Mal. 1.4.) brings in Edom surveying the desolations which God had made upon his Territories. Edom began to reflect sadly upon his ruinous condition, We are impoverished, saith Edom: upon this Edom takes counsel, yea he resolves, We will return and build the desolate places. But what saith the Lord to Edom? (Do and you will) They shall build, but I will throw down again. As if he had said, I once threw down, and made desolate the palaces of Edom; and if Edom will attempt to better his condition, and build again, I will again make desolate: as fast as Edom repairs, I will pull down. Man shall never make up the works which God hath slighted, till he hath leave for it from heaven. (Psal. 28.5.) Because they regard not the works of the Lord, he shall destroy them, and not build them up, that is, he shall destroy them, and they shall not be built. For unless God himself will build what he hath destroyed, no man can, (Hos. 6.1.) Let us return unto the Lord, for he hath torn, and he will heal us; If God make the wound, it is not in the skill or Chirurgery of man to give a plaister: He hath smitten us, and he will bind us up. When you have got a wound from God, you cannot get your cure from the creature; man tares, and God heals; man smites, and God bindes us up; but if God tare and smite, he must bind up and heal, or else we can never be healed: our wound and our salve come from the same hand. When Jericho was destroyed, the Lord said by Joshua, Cursed be the man that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho, he shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it, (Josh. 6.26.) We find that for five hundred years none attempted to build this City, the curse of God lay so heavy upon it; but after five hundred years, whether the man forgetting what was spoken, or presuming that now after so long a time, God would forget what he had spoken and not make it good, One Hiel the Bethelite (as you may read 1 King. 16.34.) built it, but how? By building that, he pulled down himself, for saith the Text, He laid the foundation thereof in Abiram his first-born, and set up the gates thereof in his youngest son Segub, according to the word of the Lord which he spake by Joshua the son of Nun. The meaning is this, when he laid the foundation of that city, the curse of God fell upon him, and his eldest son died. God pull'd down the best part of his living house, his eldest son, and yet he would not be warned of the judgement of God, but went on to finish Jericho (for setting up the gates notes the accomplishment of his work, as laying the foundation signifies the beginning of it) and what came of that? then the Lord slew his youngest son, he set up the gates thereof in his youngest son Segub, he built Jericho: but he could not deliver himself from the curse; God did not say, this city shall never be built, but cursed be he that builds it, and this curse shall be upon him, He shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it; and so it came to pass, the History fulfilled the Propheſie, and the work of providence gave Testimony to the truth of the word. This also is very remarkable in the story of Jerusalem. Christ threatned Jerusalem that it should be destroyed, and the Temple, that there should not be left one stone upon another, that should not be thrown down. The event answered this threat. The Romans ruined all, and were that abomination of desolation in the place. Yet in the time of Julian some had a design to build the Temple and restore Jerusalem: Yea that Apostate Julian, on purpose to cross the words of Christ, and the counsel of God, of which he had heard, that There should not be left one stone upon another; therefore he (not out of any good will to the Jews, or out of any desire to have the Worship of God and the Temple restored, but only in spight and malice, to see whether he could cross the word of Christ, and reverse his curse) gave the Jews (like another Cyrus) ample commission, and full liberty, to go and build the Temple. In pursuance of which grant they gathered a vast store of materials; but when they began to work, the story saith, That God from Heaven, by storm and tempest, did so dismay and scatter them, that they were forced to give it over, and confess the hand of God was against them; he confounded those builders of the Temple, as he did the builders of Babel. It is (in some cases) a dangerous attempt to build when the Lord hath pulled down; but it is (in all cases) an impossible attempt to build what God resolves shall continue down.

It is thus also with private men, some have had fair estates in the world, God pulls them down, and breaks them to pieces. We use to say of a man that fails, He is broke; such will be trying to get up again, yet they cannot: some after breakings have had more then they had at first to set up with, besides their stocks of experience; yea these men, besides their experience, have added more diligence in the use of all honest means: yet God will not let them build their estates again, he will not let them thrive in the world. Tis so also with the body: God pulls down a mans health, and strength, and then he goes from Physitian to Physitian, he asks every one he meets what he may do to build up his body again? Yet this man must carry a crazy body to the grave. He breaketh down, and it cannot be built again. That's the first Instance.

The second is, He shutteth up a man, and there can be no opening.

The word which we translate to shut up, notes any kind of block, impediment, or hinderance laid in a mans way to stop his course; it is applyed also to locking of a door, that none come out, or go in; to the shutting of the Heavens, that it rain not, (2 Chron. 7. 17.) Shutting and opening note acts of power; and so to shut that no man can open, or so to open that no man can shut, are acts of supream power. Hence the giving of a key hath been an ancient ceremony, of investing men in places of authority and chief command. He shutteth up a man, and there can be no opening; that is, none till he pleaseth: God saith of Eliakim (Isai. 22. 22.) The key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder; so he shall open, and none shall shut; and he shall shut, and none shall open; that is, he shall have the highest office in the Kings house; to shut and open bears the same sence with going out, and coming in before a people, Numb. 27, 17. Christ, of whose Kingdom the house of David was a type, is described by opening and shutting (Rev. 3. 7.) These things saith he that openeth, and no man shutteth; and shutteth, and no man openeth. Christ hath all power in Heaven and earth given into his hand; and therefore what his hand doth, no man can undo. Now in his absence he puts this general power into the hand of the Church, to be exercised and administred by such Officers as himself hath appointed: Thus he applyes himself to Peter, after he had made that confession, which is the Foundation of the Church (Matth. 16. 19.) I will give to thee the keyes of the Kingdom of Heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth, shall be bound in Heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth, shall be loosed in Heaven: where though the words vary, yet the meaning is the same, and give us this assurance, that no power can rescind what is done in and by the Church, according to the will of Christ in binding, or in loosing. Further, shutting up, notes in general the putting of a man into a sad condition, whether in regard of civil, or spiritual things; and opening imports deliverance and freedom from either.

Concludere ut nemo aperiat, suprema potestatis & libera omnium administrationis symbolum est. Sanct.

Aperire, aliquid significat lætum fortunatum, contra clausum, miserum & ærumnosum. Aprilis vocatur ab aperiendo cælo.

Hence observe, There is no prevailing against God, or repealing any of his resolves.

As when he breaketh none can build; so when he shutteth up none can open. Balaam confesseth (Numb. 23. 20.) God hath blessed, and I cannot reverse it; and where God hath cursed, who can reverse it? If the Lord shut any door against us, or upon us, all the Smiths on earth cannot make a key to open it. If God shut, or lock up the Heavens that it rain not, who can open them? Elijah comes in as if he had the keyes of Heaven at his girdle, (1 Kings 17. 1.) There shall be (saith he) neither dew nor rain these years, but according to my word. We find in the Epistle of James what the word was, Elijah prayed that it might not rain; and it rained not on the earth, for the space of three years and six months. And Elijah prayed again, and the Heaven gave rain. It was not an Imperative word, it was a petitionary word, that locked and unlocked the Heaven: None hath an Imperative word, a word of command to lock and unlock Heaven, but God himself, Amos 3. 7. I caused it to rain upon one City, and caused it not to rain upon another City. Again, If the Lord shut up the womb, there is no bringing forth, Gen. 20. 18. The Lord had fast closed up all the wombs of the house of Abimelech. If the Lord shut up the earth, it becomes as iron, and brings forth no fruit; if he shut a man up in sickness, in poverty, in disgrace, in trouble of spirit, there is no unbinding, no opening. He hath concluded, or shut up, all under sin, that every mouth may be stopped, Rom. 3. 19. He hath shut them all in unbelief, that he may have mercy upon all, Rom. 11. 32. They are shut up as a company of prisoners in a dungeon, that they may receive, whatsoever they receive, at the hand of mercy; for who can open for those men? who can unloose these Seals of unbelief, till mercy unloose them? As none could unloose the Seals of that Book, wherein the Mysteries of God were contained, but only Christ, Rev. 5. 5. So none can open the Seals of sin which are upon the heart of an unbeliever, but Christ only: Christ who opened the Book, opens to our souls; Christ who loosed the Seals, can loose us from our sins: Him God hath appointed to be the great Opener of prisons, and the Deliverer of those who are in bonds: If the Son make us free, we shall be free indeed; and until he make us free, we are slaves indeed. Whom Justice locks up, Mercy lets out. There is no opening, either by the force, or by the desert of man, where God shutteth up. The evil Angels have so much power, that they are called powers; yet they could never get out of prison. They are reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness, to the judgment of the great day, (Jude ver. 6.) Their chains will never wear out, nor can they be filed off; whithersoever those wicked spirits go, they go in chains, like prisoners who are kept till the day of Session. The Apostle Peter (1 Pet. 3. 19.) assures us as much of the spirits, or souls, of those evil men who lived in the dayes of Noah: These being cast into prison, could never break prison, nor make an escape unto this day. Christ by his Spirit, in the ministry of Noah, preached to them for the preventing of their imprisonment: He preached to them who are now in prison, that they might not have been imprisoned. But see how sure a Goal Hell is: those disobedient unbelievers, who were cast into prison in Noah's time, were all fast there in the Apostle Peter's time. There is no picking the lock of Hell gates, nor breaking through the walls of that fiery Tophet. Abraham in the Parable (Luke 16.) assures the rich man in Hell, that he could not come out of that place of torment, and that no comfort, not so much as a drop of comfort could be conveyed to that place (ver. 26.) And besides all this (saith he) between us and you there is a great Gulf fixed, so that they which would pass from hence to you cannot, neither can they pass to us that would come from thence. The man is convinced that he could not get out, and therefore desires that no friend of his might come in; but that Lazarus might be sent to testifie to his five brethren, lest they should come into that place of torment. He knew well enough, if they were once there, they could come out no more. God will at last send his Writ to the Grave to bring out the bodies of the wicked that are shut up there, and he will send a Writ to Hell, to bring out the spirits that are shut up there, that both together may receive sentence of eternal imprisonment and torment: God will shut them up, and there shall be no opening for ever.

VERS. 15, 16.

Behold, he withholdeth the waters, and they dry up; also he sendeth them out, and they overturn the earth.
With him is strength and wisdom: the deceived and the deceiver are his.

JOB

JOB proceedeth upon his former Argument in giving Instances to prove the great power and the unquestionable soveraignty of the Lord. In the former context we had an instance in civil affairs: He breaketh down, and it cannot be built again; he shutteth up a man, and there can be no opening. The acts of God are irreversible by man: Here he instanceth in natural things, Behold, he withholdeth the waters, &c. As God shutteth up men, and they cannot get out; so he shutteth up and imprisoneth the waters, and they cannot get out. This also calleth up our attention and admiration, Behold,

He withholdeth.] The word signifies, First, to stop or to stay a thing by strength, and fine force. Secondly, to stop or to stay a thing by authority, or command. Thirdly, to stop a thing by intreaty, or by prayer (2 Sam. 24. 21.) When David offered a sacrifice in the floor of Araunah, the Text saith, So the plague was stayed: there was a stay, a stop, a withholding of the plague: David intreated the Lord, and the Lord at his intreaty gave that effect; he checkt the malignity of the pestilence, and bid the destroying Angel sheath his sword. The same word is used (Numb. 16. 48.) when the plague was begun among the people, Aaron took a Censer and offered incense, and so the plague was stayed, or withheld: the plague was marching on swiftly and furiously, but at the intercession of Aaron, God stopt its course, and bid it stand. This withholding, is sometimes applyed to the laws of men: Laws are as boundaries and limits, yea, laws are as bridles and bonds, as chains and fetters, to stay and restrain, to stop and withhold the sinful extravagancies and excursions of the flesh. I find it often applyed to the withholding of water. If I (saith the Lord) shut up Heaven, that there be no rain, (2 Chron. 7. 13.) then if ye pray, &c. God locks the Clouds, and prayer is a key of Gods own making to open them. This word is also applyed to the restraint of that other Element, the stopping and shutting in of fire (Jer. 20. 9.) Fire and water are head-strong Elements, They are good servants, but ill masters. God puts a bridle upon the fire, a bridle upon the water. He withholdeth

Prohibuit, cessare fecit.

The waters.] What waters? It may be understood, First, of waters under or upon the earth; there are subterranean channels of water: Springs furnish Rivers, Rivers are subterranean channels, earthen vessels, or rather vehicles and conveyances of water. He withholdeth the waters, he withholdeth the under-waters, he forbids those Springs to feed the Rivers, and then they are dryed up. Secondly, it may be understood of the waters that are above (the Empire of the Lord reacheth both.) Waters hang in the Clouds, there are seas of water above us; it is the mighty power of God which gives those aiery Sponges, the Clouds, a retentive faculty, for else they would soon dissolve and overwhelm us. And it is from the anger and judgments of God, that those aiery sponges, the Clouds, are sometimes so closed up, that they yield no more water then Iron or Adamant. As he alwayes withholds the water from drowning the whole earth, so he sometimes withholds it from refreshing many parts of the earth, he forbids the Clouds to distil a drop. Thirdly, it may be expounded of the waters of the Sea, which feed the Springs, as Springs feed the Rivers, (Nah. 1. 4.) He rebuketh the sea, and maketh it dry, and dryeth up all the rivers. Where the Sea is dryed, the Rivers must. The Sea is Grandmother to the Rivers. The Prophet Zachary speaks the same (Chap. 10. 11.) He shall smite the waves of the Sea, and all the deeps of the Rivers shall dry up. Thus also he withholdeth the waters,

And they dry up.] What dryeth up? The Rivers dry up, when the waters of the Sea are withholden; and the things that grow upon the Earth dry up, when the waters of Heaven are withholden; and when they are withholden very long, not only the Fruits of the Earth, but the Rivers dry up too. In that great drought, (1 Kings 17. 17.) The brooks dryed up, because there was no rain in the land. Again (Joel 1. 20.) The beasts of the field cry also unto thee, for the rivers of waters are dryed up, and the fire hath devoured the pastures of the wilderness. The fire hath devoured; What fire? It was not ordinary elemental fire that burn'd the pastures; the fire was the Sun, there being no rain to mollifie and mitigate his scorching beams; the Sun, as a fire, consumed the pastures of the Wilderness. So here, He withholdeth the waters, and they dry up; that is, the Pastures (as well as the Rivers) together with all Vegetables, that are nursed and nourished by those breasts of Heaven distilling upon them.

Further, He withholdeth the waters, and they dry up; takes in the effect which follows the withholding of the waters, and the dryness of the earth, namely, barrenness, and famine: and so the cause is put for the effect; and, he withholdeth the waters, is, he causeth famine in a Land: He withholdeth the waters, and, then Corn, and Grass, Trees, and Plants dry up. That three years famine (2 Sam. 21.) was from an extraordinary drought, as is conceived: The fruit of a drought is famine; and the fruit of rain is abundance. Plenty descends from Heaven in showers: God takes away the fruits of the earth by taking away that which should nourish and feed the earth in bearing fruit.

q. d. Quando vult potest tum sterilitatem tum copiosã rerum omniũ abundantiã elargiri. Bold.

I shall but note two things from this briefly, referring the Reader to the thirteenth verse of the fifth Chapter, where the power of God, in ordering rain and waters, is more fully opened.

Hence observe, First, The waters are at Gods command, He withholdeth them.

He withholdeth them, as it were, by a law; or he withholdeth them as with a bridle. There shall not be dew nor rain these years, but according to my word, saith Elijah (1 Kings 17. 1.) This spake he in the power of God; for he prayed, and then the rain or the waters were withholden. God complained of his Vineyard, (Isa. 5.) that he had bestowed much cost upon it, and yet had received little rent from it, unless such as was paid in base coin; He looked for righteousness, but behold oppression, &c. Well saith the Lord, Go to, I will tell you what I will do; I will do thus and thus; and besides all this, I will command the clouds that they rain no rain upon it. The power of God, and his glory, is wonderfully lifted up in this work of providence (Amos 4. 7.) I have withholden the rain from you, when there were yet three months to the harvest; that is, in the time when the Corn and Grass had most need of rain, I withheld it, and I caused it (saith he) to rain upon one City, and caused it not to rain upon another City: read Jer. 5. 24. and 10. 13. Joel 2. 23. Matth. 5. 45. Acts 14. 17. There is a piece of secret Atheism in some about this point: The heart may be sweetly moistened by the acknowledgment of God in the rain: But most stick too much in natural causes, and scarce look beyond the Almanack for the changes of the weather. We shall have rain (say they) at the change of the Moon, or when the Wind turns. 'Tis true, that there is a natural reason, why at the change of the Moon, why at the change of the Wind, there may be a change of the weather; yet God hath a power above the Wind, and above the Moon; and therefore sometimes he lets the Moon change and change, yet no rain; and the Wind blows from all the points of Heaven, and yet no rain: That we might not stick in second causes, God often acts beyond them, yea against them: And that we should not despise second causes, and the order in which God hath disposed the frame of Nature, he often works with them, and by them. When natural causes produce their effects, God shews his bounty; and when natural causes cannot produce their effects, God shews his Soveraignty, and teacheth man his duty. Hence the want of rain in an ordinary course, is put as an extraordinary occasion of prayer, and seeking God (1 Kings 8. 35. Zach. 10. 1.) Ask ye of the Lord rain, in the time of the latter rain. When rain comes not in the season of nature, we may shew much of grace in asking rain.

Secondly observe, That natural causes being stopped, natural effects must cease.

There can be no natural effect without a natural cause: All such effects are miraculous; withhold the rain, and all dryes up; there is a natural dependance between the fruitfulness of the earth and the rain. David in his last words, shewing how blessed and how great a blessing a just and a godly King is: He shall be (saith he) as the light of the morning when the Sun ariseth, even a morning without clouds; as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain (2 Sam. 23. 4.) Here he puts in all the natural causes. He shall be as the tender grass springing out of the earth: But what causeth the grass to spring out of the earth? There is first, the rain, to moisten; and secondly, the the clear shining, to warm and draw out the seminal vertue of the earth. When the Lord threatens (Deut. 28. 33.) I will make the Heavens over you as braſs; he preſently adds, and the earth under you ſhall be as iron. If the Heavens be braſs, the earth will be iron. We have this concatenation of cauſes elegantly ſet forth (Hoſ. 2. 21, 22.) I will hear the heavens (ſaith God) and they ſhall hear the earth, and the earth ſhall hear the corn, and the wine, and the oyl, and they ſhall hear Jezreel. Jezreel muſt have Corn, and Wine, and oyl; Corn and Wine muſt be had from fertile earth; the earth cannot be fertile without benign Heavens; the Heavens can ſhew no kindneſs to the earth, either by moiſtening ſhowers, or quickening heat, without orders from God. Hence the Heavens cry to God, and the Earth to the Heavens, and the Corn to the Earth, and Jezreel to the Corn, that he may be fed. If God withholdeth the waters of Heaven, the earth dryes up; we are fed by the bleſſing of God upon ſecond cauſes. Again,

He ſendeth them out, and they overturn the earth.

This latter clauſe doth not hold out the mercy oppoſite to the judgment in the former; but it holds out a ſecond judgment. For as there, the withholding of the waters was a judgment; ſo here, the ſending of them out is a judgment too. When God withholdeth the waters over-long, the earth cannot bear fruit; and when God ſendeth out the waters overmuch, the fruit which the earth bears is ſtifled and choaked. Waters are ordinarily ſent to refreſh and revive the earth; but here they are ſent to overturn the earth.

He ſendeth them.] The word ſignifies the ſending out of a meſſenger upon ſome command. Waters receive a commiſſion to ſtay at home, and they receive a commiſſion to go out in a way of judgment: God gives them a precept, a writ, Go and overturn the earth: He looſens their bonds, and enlargeth their borders, to puniſh thoſe who will not be kept in bounds. Moſes deſcribing the Deluge (to which Job here, as ſome conceive, alludes) ſaith, All the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the windows of Heaven were opened (Gen. 7. 11.) both the under-waters, and the upper-waters were till that day impriſoned and kept cloſe by the Decree of God; But then God broke open the priſon, and let out the waters, and we ſee what work they made in the world.

They overturned the earth.] The word notes a change both of place and ſtate; either of which, when they are great, are an overthrow, or an overturning. But is not the earth too big to be overturned? And hath not God promiſed that he will never deſtroy the earth again by water? Beſides, the earth is rather overwhelmed, then overturned by the waters. To clear this. The earth may be taken three wayes.

Firſt, for ſome ſpecial Tract, or Province of the earth, which the Lord may overturn, that is, ſpoil and deface without breach of that promiſe, Gen. 9. 11. The Bow in the Clouds is a ſign between God and the world, that he will never drown the World any more; this doth not hinder the overthrowing of great Tracts and parts of the World by water.

Secondly, By the earth we may underſtand the Inhabitants of any part of the earth, and the dwellings which they have raiſed for themſelves upon the earth. Theſe the waters are often ſent out to overturn, though the ſite and ſoil of the earth remain the ſame.

Thirdly, By the earth, we may underſtand the fruits of the earth, or the things which grow out of the earth. Thus God overturneth the earth, by ſending out immoderate rains and exceſſive ſhowers: When Corn and Graſs, when the Vines and Olives are deſtroyed, the Earth (for that ſeaſon) is deſtroyed.

Hence obſerve, Firſt, The Lord can make any of the creatures mans ſcourge.

He that made the whole World without any Inſtrument, can make one part of the World an Inſtrument to deſtroy another: He that ſet up the world without help, cannot want help to throw it down. He hath his Fire-works and his Water-works ready; He ſendeth out the waters, and they overturn the earth. We uſe to ſay, Fire and water have no mercy: Water is a terrible Element, though it is a uſeful and a comfortable Element. I might bring you many ſtories, ancient and modern, of the wonderful effects of water. Pliny in his natural Hiſtory, and Seneca, in his natural Queſtions, give us ſundry inſtances of Towns and Countries, made deſolate by water. Plin. lib. 2. cap. 90. & 92. Nat. Sen. lib. 6. Nat. quæſt. c. 23. Hiſt.

The queſtion is put (Job 28. 22.) Haſt thou entred into the treaſures of the ſnow? Or haſt thou ſeen the treaſures of the hail, which I have reſerved: Againſt when? Which I have reſerved againſt the time of trouble, againſt the day of battel and war? The Lord ſpeaks here as ſome great Prince, who hath a Magazine ſtored and filled with Ammunition againſt a time of war. Haſt thou (ſaith he) entred into the treaſures of the ſnow? Haſt thou been in my Magazine, and conſidered what ſtores I have laid up there againſt the day of battel and war? What day of battel and war is this? We may expound it either one or both theſe wayes: Firſt, of ſome day of Gods ſpecial wrath and judgment upon a people, when no enemy appears but himſelf; when he (as it were) in perſon makes war upon them, and comes forth in battel againſt them: In ſuch a day of battel as this, he brings out theſe treaſures of wrath, the Snow and the Hail. God went to war and battel againſt Egypt immediately; and one of the ſoreſt plagues was the Hail, which deſtroyed the earth by killing the Cattel, Corn, and Fruits, Exod. 9. 18. God ſent down ſhowers of water made up into bullets, upon Egypt, ſuch is Hail. Secondly, We may underſtand it of a day when a war is made againſt his people; for then he ſometimes brings forth this Ammunition out of his ſtore-houſes, he fires his great Guns, and pours out volleys of ſhot from Heaven upon the enemies of his people. We have a clear record, which gives God the glory of this truth (Joſh. 10. 11.) When Joſhua was ingaged in battel with thoſe uncircumciſed Nations, The Lord caſt down great ſtones from Heaven upon them, and they dyed; they were more which dyed with hail-ſtones, then they whom the children of Iſrael ſlew with the ſword. Thus whether we underſtand that Text of the day of Gods immediate war againſt evil men, or of the day when evil men war againſt the people of God: both are evidences of his power, in ſending waters, hail and ſnow, ſtorm and tempeſts (all which he hath at his command) to overturn the earth. Great Princes and States, ſend forth their Generals with command to overturn Cities, and deſtroy all that will not ſubmit unto them; God gives a charge to ſenſleſs and inanimate creatures to go forth and overturn the earth, and it is done.

Secondly obſerve, That the very ſame creature which is a mercy to us, may be a great affliction and a ſcourge to us.

Waters fatten, and waters deſtroy the earth. We pray in drought for rain and waters; the Lord can give us rain, until rain ſhall afflict as much as drought. There is no earthly thing but we may have too much of it. The exceſs of any creature is a judgment upon the creature. We may ſoon have too much fire, and too much water; too much heat and too much cold; as the want of theſe things troubles us, ſo likewiſe doth the glut of them: we depend upon God as much for the quantity and meaſure of outward mercies, as for the mercies themſelves. See here a difference between the things of Nature, and the things of Grace. We can never have too much of Grace, nor too much of the Spirit. The more we have of theſe the better; and we are then beſt, when we have moſt. A gracious heart grows up to glory, through the abundance of grace. Be not drunk with wine, wherein is exceſs, (is the Apoſtles caution, Eph. 5. 18.) But be filled with the Spirit. We may drink wine quickly to exceſs; but we cannot be filled with the Spirit to exceſs; there is no exceſs poſſible in that, and therefore the Apoſtle gives no caution about it. Take your fill of the Spirit, you cannot be overfill'd. The wine of the Spirit doth not make us drunk; the more we drink of it, the more ſober we are. And the waters of the Spirit do never drown us; the more and the oftner they fall upon us, or overflow us, the more fruitful we are. The waters of the Spirit are never ſent out to overturn the ſoul; the mightieſt inundations of Grace, make the heart mighty for God. Spiritual things in the leaſt degree are a bleſſing; and the greater the degree is, the greater is the bleſſing. Hence that promiſe, In the latter dayes (ſaith God) I will pour out my Spirit; you ſhall not only only have some drops, and still dews, but strong showers, rivers and torrents flowing down from Heaven, upon the dry and parched ground, upon the barren wilderness, to make it like Eden, the Garden of God; such Rivers shall run into you, till you shall have Rivers running from you. He that believeth on me (saith Christ, John 7. 38.) out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water: This he spake of the Spirit, which they that believe on him should receive.

Verse 16. With him is strength and wisdom; the deceived and the deceiver are his.

The former instance was in the works of Nature; now Job instanceth in civil things, shewing the providence and power of God acting mightily in them: With him is strength and wisdom.

We had these words at the thirteenth verse [With him is wisdom and strength] so we translate in both. Why doth he (only two verses put between) repeat the same thing again? He had said, ver. 13. With him is wisdom and strength; here, With him is strength and wisdom: Why doth he touch so often upon this string?

Note from it, First, That all repetitions are not useless and vain.

Repetitions in Scripture have not only an elegancy in them, but a profitableness in them. That's one thing.

Secondly, From the matter, With him is strength and wisdom. (That's the point.) It is no small matter that he repeateth, and it teacheth us thus much,

That we need to hear often of, and meditate often upon, the power and wisdom of God.

When we have learn'd that lesson once well, we have learned a great many lessons: When the heart is but assured and settled in this truth, and can make the inferences, and draw out the conclusions which flow from those premises, we have profited very much in the knowledge of God.

But further, we may answer. The reason why Job repeateth what he had so lately asserted, may be this, because he beginneth upon a new subject: and therefore as he put this Preface [With him is wisdom and strength] to those former Instances, so now giving Instances of an higher nature, he renews that Doctrine, With him is wisdom and strength. He would have the thoughts of men close fully with these Attributes of God. As if he had said, I shall speak to you of such things as you will never believe, nor honour God in the manifestation of them, unless your hearts be very well setled upon this foundation, that with him is strength and wisdom.

Hence observe, That great truths must be ushered, or led in with great thoughts of God.

As in prayer, when weighty petitions are made, we find the Saints raising up their hearts, and bearing up their spirits to high thoughts of God: so when any great doctrinal truths are laid before us, usually there is somewhat prefaced about the greatness of God, which may cause us to reverence and adore such truths. The Prophets, Thus saith the Lord, or, Thus saith the Lord of hosts, was as if they had said, We speak his words, who is able to make them good.

Or lastly, Job speaks this only in a way of acclamation, as being lifted up and ravished with the meditation of Gods Greatness, Power, and Wisdom. And therefore as he had said, so he saith it a second time, With him is wisdom and strength. He is the strong God, the wise God: This, Rhetoricians call (Epiphonema) a raising up of the voice and spirit, in acclamation to the truth of that which is spoken. When the Apostle had exhorted the Saints to rejoyce, he adds, And again, I say, rejoyce: so here, did I say the Lord hath wisdom and strength? I will say it again, with him is wisdom and strength.

Epiphonematicōs dictum, cum eo sane est robur & ratio. Mere.

But though the words in our Translation are the same with the thirteenth verse, yet the Hebrew differs. In the thirteenth verse the words are Chochmah and Geburah; but here, Ghoz and Tosiah; which though they bear the same interpretation in the English, yet they have a greater force in the Original: For the former signifies not only irresistible strength, but excellency and dignity joyned with that strength: so that it imports a person cloathed as much with dignity and honour, as with strength and power (Psal. 29. 1.) Give unto the Lord glory and strength; that is, give unto the Lord a strength which is glorious. Jerome translates this word often by Imperium, sometimes by virtus, noting in both, an Imperial sovereignty or power.

Ita fortitudinem significat, ut etiā dignitatem, præstantiā, honorem & excellentiam connotet. Hieronymus vertit imperium sæpè, virtus. 7o. Honor regius.

The latter word signifies not only wisdom in general, but the highest and purest wisdom, the most sublimate and refined wisdom, the very quintessence and spirit of wisdom: Again, it signifies not only the quintessence, and extract of wisdom, but being and existence: As if he had said, with him is being, substance, permanency: divers of the Rabbins translate so, and so doth Mr. Broughton, He hath the force, and all that is; all being is contracted and brought unto God, for he is the first being, and in him all things live, move, and have their being. Now here is much more then we had at the thirteenth verse, With him is force, and all that is; that is, the being and subsistence of all creatures is contained in God. God is his own being, he is self-being, self-existence; and all existence or being is derived from him. This is the highest Elogy of God. Thirdly, It signifies not only the first being, but the most excellent being, the being and subsistence (so some of the Rabbins render it) of the High-Priest, of Kings and Emperours, a being in sovereign authority; fix your thoughts upon the noblest subsistences, such, and infinitely more noble then such, is the subsistence of God. With God is being, with him is the most glorious being; all the excellent beings that are scattered through the world, are summ'd up, and united in God; yea they are all but so many streams, and beams, issuing from this ever-flowing Fountain and glorious Sun of being. Fourthly, This word signifies also the rule, or the certain law of wisdom and judgment: not only that wisdom which acts in man, but the rule by which that wisdom acts. The reason of government, or the measure by which all things are to be governed, lyes in the bosom of this word. Here also another shining truth breaks forth from under the clouds of this expression; With him is such wisdom as is the rule and measure of all things which are done in wisdom. Job being to speak great things of God, that the deceiver and deceived are his, that he looseth the bonds of Kings, &c. had but need to put this preface to it, With God is the measure, the reason of all things.

Tuscijah denotat subsistentiam eminentissimam qualis est dignitas regalis.

Peril. Robore quidem valet, sed interim etiam certa lege & ratione ac æquitatis formula omnia gubernat. Prima justitiæ & juris Origo est optima & santissima Dei voluntas partī quia ille jus habet in omnia quippe quæ ipsius sunt. Coc.

Thus we have found these words in the Original, far more fruitful and extensive in sence, then those used for strength and wisdom at the thirteenth verse.

From the last interpretation, take this Note,

That the will of God, or God himself, is the rule of all things.

God hath not a rule without him, but within him, it is himself. In this he differs from the best of men: Man hath a rule, but the rule is one thing, and the man is another; the Law is one thing, and the King is another: but God and his rule are the same; his will and his law are himself; this renders him excellent in dignity, The Lord over all. Tyrants make their will their law; But what is their will? Their will is crooked, a leaden, Lesbian rule, which turneth and changeth, and will fashion it self to any occasion, or immergency: their wills are distorted and turned this way and that way, even every way. And therefore it must needs produce tyranny for a man to make his will his rule, because his will hath not an everlasting rectitude and straitness in it. But the Lord makes his will a law, and there is no tyranny, nothing but justice and equity in it. It is impossible for any law to be made so strait as the will of God is; it is impossible to give a rule so holy as Gods will is. If we could have a supream Magistrate, whose will were as holy, just, and good, as any law, it were reason his will should be the law: but this cannot be; therefore it is the prerogative of God alone, whose will is (as we have described) the original of justice, and so more then a law, which is but the measure of justice. The counsels of God are without consultation, his decrees without deliberation: he hath all wisdom without study or experience; all knowledge and evidence of things without discoursing upon premises, or drawing down conclusions. And whence is this? but because with him is this certain rule which cannot err. The Pope challengeth to himself, that, though he may err in his private actions as he is a man, yet as he is (in Cathedra) seated in the Apostolick chair, as he is the visible head of the Church,

Church, he cannot err; his will is the rule: we see what rule it is, by the rules which it hath given. Who can say that is clean, which brings forth an unclean thing; or strait and true, which brings forth that which is crooked and erroneous? Sinful actings speak sinful men, and his actings have been sinful enough to speak him (what is written of him) The man of sin. The actings of God have been so holy, that they declare him The holy God; and his wayes so wise and just, that they proclaim his Wisdom to be the unerring rule of justice. With him is strength and wisdom.

Job having thus premised the unsearchable wisdom and insuperable strength of God, giveth a proof of both in the next words,

The deceived and the deceiver are his.

שגג Ignoravit שגה In Hiphil errare fecit.

The deceived.] Is passive, A man misled through ignorance or inadvertency: The deceiver, is active; he consults and plots to catch the simple in his snare: Yet the word may signifie also to seduce ignorantly; for as all are deceived through ignorance (he is not deceived, who knows that he is) so some deceive through ignorance; supposing they give good counsel, and hold out the truth, when they are wrapt up in, and blinded with the darkness of error. And though most deceivers deceive knowingly, and intend to do the evil which they do, yet ignorance causeth some to deceive; and did they know better they would not do so bad. But under what notion soever any man is deceived, or becomes a deceiver, the Text entitles them both to God.

Ex Hebræis multi per facientem errare Satanam nimis arcte intelligunt.

The deceived and the deceiver are his.] I shall open two things about it.

1. Who are the deceived and the deceiver.
2. In what sence they are said to be his, that is; the Lords.

There are some, who by the deceiver, understand the Devil, who is indeed the great deceiver and impostor: he wrought the first deceit in the world, and to deceive is his continual trade in the world. Men do but use deceit in their Trades and Transactions; but the Devils trade and all his transactions are deceit. Yet we must not restrain and narrow up this Scripture to him only. God considereth that great deceiver, and all that are deceived by him. But Job discourseth of men, not of devils; and then the deceivers and the deceived are of two sorts.

1. In matters of Religion, or in spiritual things.
2. In matters of the world, or in civil things.

In matters of Religion, there is much deceiving, and many are deceived: Christ foretells it will be so. (Matth. 24. 24.) There shall arise false Christs, and false Prophets, and shall shew great signs and wonders, in so much that (if it were possible) they shall deceive the very elect. But though it be impossible for them to deceive the elect, yet their attempt shall not be without too much success. For, Take heed (saith Christ to his Disciples, ver. 4, 5.) that no man deceive you, for many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ, and shall deceive many. Their deceits shall prosper. Paul (Tit. 1. 10.) speaks of deceivers who subvert whole houses: not by outward violence, but by cunning craftiness, they overthrow their faith, and turn them from the truth: thus they deceived whole families.

Secondly, There is The deceiver and the deceived in civil things, or in matters of the world. And these are of two sorts.

Non solum hæc quæ loquitur Job, de Judæo-Syrianis intellexerim sed de omnibus erroribus tũ in politiâ & civitatibus regendis, tum in domo, &c. Merc.

First, In commerce and trading: Thus we read (Prov. 11. 1.) Of the false ballance, which is an abomination to the Lord. And the Prophet Micah brings in the Lord disdaining at these deceivers, (Chap. 6. 11.) Shall I count them pure with the wicked ballances, and with the bag of deceitful weights? for the rich men thereof are full of violence, and the inhabitants thereof have spoken lyes (he means Exchange-lyes, Warehouse-lyes, Shop-lyes, the lyes of the seller, or of the buyer) and their tongue is deceitful in their mouth.

Secondly, In matters of government and policy, about which the greatest deceits and jugglings have been exercised in all the ages of the world. What crafty Councellors suggest, simple plain-hearted men are taken with, and often misled to their own destruction. In Absalom's rebellion there went two hundred men out of Jerusalem that were called, and they went in their simplicity, and they knew not any thing, namely, of Absolom's intent of aspiring to his Fathers Throne: They were meerly catcht, and surprised with his wilely insinuations. Politicians are skill'd to put fair vizards upon foul faces, and cover their wicked designs with honest pretences. These are State-sophisters; their study is to put fallacies and cheats upon the common people. All these deceivers, and they who are deceived by them, are comprehended under this general affirmation, The deceived and the deceiver are his.

How his?

The Hebrew is rendred, or rather paraphrased three wayes. First, They are of him. Secondly, To him. Thirdly, From him. We translate, They are his, and that may include all three. Yea, there is a five-fold his, which I may hint to clear this point.

לו Ejus vel ei vel ab eo est errans & errare faciens. Merc.

First, His by creation.
Secondly, His by possession.
Thirdly, His for use and service.
Fourthly, His by way of dominion, or disposal.
Lastly, His by way of special affection and appropriation.

The two former of these are too little for the point: For, to say the deceived and the deceiver are his, by creation, is indeed to say nothing peculiar to this point: for so is the earth, and the sea, and the storms, and the winds, every thing is his, they are all Gods creatures. And secondly, to say they are his by way of possession, that he is the Lord and Proprietor of them, this also is too little, for so (Psal. 50.) All the beasts of the forrests are his, and the cattel upon a thousand hills. To say no more of this deceiver, and the deceived, then you may say of the beasts of the field, or of the fowls of the air, or of the fishes in the sea, that the Lord is the maker and possessor of them, is below the purpose of Job, and the honour of God. And as these two are not enough, so the fifth way of being his, is too much, for they are not his by way of special affection and appropriation. That's too great a priviledge for the deceiver and the deceived: for so only (among men) the Saints are his. These are Gods peculiars, and beloved ones, as he speaks of his people Israel, to Moses, Exod. 19. 5. Now therefore if ye will obey my voice, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people, for all the earth is mine. And though it be possible for many that are deceived, and for some who deceive at present, to be his, even in this way of special appropriation; yet this were too high a sense to give this Text; therefore we shall take the his in the third and fourth sences. They are his; that is, his to use, or he makes use of them: and they are his to dispose; that is, he disposeth and ordereth, both the deceiver and the deceived, to his own righteous ends and holy purposes.

Both which may be more fully demonstrated, by these following interpretations.

First, He knoweth them: so the vulgar reads it, He knoweth the deceiver, or the deceiver is known to him, and so also is the deceived: As if he had said, The Lord is acquainted with the deceiver, though he thinks that he walks in a mist, or is wrapt up in a cloud, though he flatter himself that no eye sees him; yet whether he be a deceiver in matters of Religion, or in matters of Trade and State-policy, God knows what he is; he whose seven eyes run through the whole earth, sees him throughly. For when it is said, that the Lord knows the deceiver, it is not meant only thus, that he knows his name or person, There goes a deceiver, there's a false heart, there's a head full of errors and rotten principles; but the Lord knoweth with what artifices and fetches, with what devices and projects, by what wayes and engines, he compasseth and carrieth on the trade of deceiving. He knows also by what misrepresentations, false glosses, and semblances of truth, the deceived have been intrapt and drawn into the snare. To do this is one of the highest acts of wisdom. To discern how, and wherein another hath been deceived, shews as much soundness of understanding, as not to be deceived. Any fool commits, or runs into error, only a wise man finds it out; Eccles. 1. 17. I gave my heart to know wisdom, and to know madness and folly. Solomon studied as much to know folly, as to know wisdom. Only truth discovers falshood, and right the wrong.

Ipse novit. Vul.

Novit quâ arte quo ardu fallit decipiens, cujus rei ignorantiâ vel inanimadvertentia falsa pro veris amplectitur errans, quod non nisi per sapientiam fieri potest. Merc.

Secondly, deceiver and the deceived are his, sounds thus much, That God will make them both to be accountable unto himself.

himself. A master saith to his steward or servant, You shall give me an account of these actions and expences; so saith God to the deceiver, and the deceived, you shall answer for what you have done, you that deceive shall be sure to pay for it; and you that are deceived shall not escape a tryal and a censure, for your carelesness and your folly: you should have look'd better to it, twas your duty to prove all things and to hold fast that which was good. Some are deceived in civil things, and are blameless; It is their affliction to be deceived, not their sin: but there is no man that is deceived in spiritual things, and is blameless; there it is every mans sin not to know his duty, and not to try before he approves. The same word in the Greek signifies both to prove, and to approve; implying that no man ought to approve any thing before he hath proved it. It is no honour to a man to approve that which is true, before he proves it: but he that approves an errour before he hath any proof of it, runs himself into a double sin: First, of being deceived: Secondly, of not so much as considering whether he were or no. But which way soever a man is deceived, whether through ignorance or idleness, whether because he could not find the truth when he searcht for it, or because he would not be at the cost and pains to search for it, whether it were this or that by which he is deceived, God will reckon with him about it; much more then will he reckon with deceivers, whether they have deceived simply, or upon design, though these last shall be deepest in condemnation. God will arraign all impostors and cheaters, all mountebanks and corrupters of truth, whether in spirituals or in civils; They are all his, and they shall stand before him to receive according to their deeds of darkness and deceit.

Neq; permissiõ tantũ Domini hoc Scriptura tribuit, ut quidam putant, qui sapientiorũ spiritu factio videri volunt. Merc. Job vult indicare divina providentia fieri, quod quidã errant, quidam vero alios decipiãt & in errores inducant.

Thirdly, The deceiver and the deceived are his, that is (as some understand it) he permits and suffers deceiving and deceit to be in the world; it is from his sufferance that there are any such. This is a truth, though not all the truth; The Lord doth not will any deceit, yet there can be no deceit whether he will or no; it is possible, yea very easie for him to hinder both the deceiver and the deceived, but he is not obliged to do it, neither is he pleased to do it: he doth not alwayes give check to deceivers, nor doth he at all times set a bar in their way. He alwayes hinders errour morally, by declaring against it; but he doth not alwayes hinder it powerfully and effectually by acting against it. Thus the deceiver and the deceived are his by permission: but this is not all, they are more his then thus. For,

Fourthly, The deceiver and the deceived are said to be his, because he ordereth and disposeth them; he sendeth out deceivers, and giveth men up to be deceived. He is active in this dispensation, yet free from the least touch of pollution. He is not the author of the deceit, though he be the orderer and disposer of it. Mr. Calvin gives his judgement upon the place to this effect, roundly and clearly. To say (saith he) that God doth only permit men to deceive, and to be deceived, is a very cold expression, and speaks little, yea it is a derogation to the honour of God; for the Lord in infinite wisdom and holiness, disposeth of the errours of men, and of those that lead them into errour.

There are four things, in which the providence of God moves to the ordering of this disorderly work of man.

First, He orders the persons, who shall deceive, and who shall be deceived; Hence it is said (*Matth.*24.) that the false prophets, and the false Christs, arising in the latter times, should (if it were possible) deceive the very elect. Then the elect are persons exempt; deceivers may distemper them, but they shall never poison them.

Secondly, When or what time any shall deceive or be deceived, is also ordered by God. We read that Satan was bound for a thousand years, that he should not deceive the nations (Rev. 20.) It was God that bound him. Satan must be in a chain of divine providence a thousand years, and after that he must be loosed a little season. He that bound him loosed him; and as he bound him that he should not deceive, so he loosed him to deceive the Nations. But how doth Satan deceive? Not immediately by himself; the devil doth not come above-board (as we speak) he doth not walk in his own likeness, and appear as he is, that would terrifie men, rather then deceive them; but he acts by transforming himself into an angel of light. He stirreth up the spirits of men, to deceive, as he stirreth them up to vex and persecute those who will not be deceived: as the devil is said to cast those witnesses of the truth into prison, who are imprisoned by men at his instigation (*Rev.*2.10.) so he is said to deceive and lead those into errour, who are misled by men at his instigation. It was the devil who filled the heart of Ananias, to vent a verbal lye; and the devil fills the hearts of deceivers to vent and maintain doctrinal lies. The times of these deceivers are in the hand of God; he hath set down the term when they shall begin, and how long they shall continue their ensnaring Trade.

Thirdly, God orders how far any man shall deceive, or to what degree his deceit shall prevail. Hence the Apostle speaking of deceivers, men of corrupt mindes, reprobate concerning the faith, concludes, but they shall proceed no further (2 Tim. 3.9.) As the maliciousness, so the deceivableness of men would know no bounds, if God did not bound it. But because he doth, therefore though they would, yet they shall proceed no further. No man can do good till God assists him, and no man shall do hurt when God will stop him.

Thus far the Lord is active in ordering the deceiver, and the deceived. That Scripture is clear for it (1 *King.*22.22.) Ahab was deceived, and the false prophets deceived him; Whence was it? The deceivers and the deceived were under the hand of God. Micaiah spake it out plainly, as Ahab had desired (1 King. 22. 19, 20.) I saw the Lord sitting upon his Throne, &c. And the Lord said, who shall perswade Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth-Gilead? &c. And there came forth a spirit and stood before the Lord, and said, I will perswade him. And the Lord said, thou shalt perswade him, and prevail also, go forth, and do so. Now therefore (saith the Prophet) the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets. The Lord hath done it: He was active in it, yet full of holiness and truth in himself, as well as of justice and wrath against Ahab. Because Ahab hated the true Prophet, therefore he is given up to the teaching of false prophets. Here was more then a bare suffering: God, as a Judge, put a lying spirit, as his executioner, into the mouths of those lying prophets. They who like not plain-dealing, are justly flattered into destruction. The Apostle speaking of that gross deception under which the Jews then lay, and still lye to this day; ascribes it to God by Scripture Authority, According as it is written, God hath given them the spirit of slumber; eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear unto this day, (Rom. 11.8.) And the Lord takes it upon himself in down right words, (Ezek. 14.9.) If the Prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord have deceived that Prophet. Not that the Lord did instil or infuse errour into the Prophet; he is the God of truth, he is the author of truth, and therefore cannot be the author of errour; he is the revenger of errour, and therefore also he cannot be the abetter of it. Yet the Lord saith, I have deceived him. Observe (saith Calvin) God slinks not into a corner, saying I permitted it, and suffered it, I drew a curtain between me and the world, and let men do what they pleased, No, but he standeth in the open light, and saith, I have deceived that Prophet. The man of sin is prophesied coming with all deceiveableness of unrighteousness, in them that perish, because they received not the love of the truth: For this cause God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lye. The delusion is of their deserving, but of Gods sending: They deserve it because they never loved the truth, and God sends it because he ever loveth justice.

And as he sends these spiritual delusions, so he likewise sends political delusions. When a people are deceived and led away from the wholesome rules of government, when they have State tricks put upon them: We may conclude as the Prophet doth, when Egypt was seduced (Isa.19.14.) The Lord hath mingled a perverse spirit in the midst thereof, and they have caused Egypt to erre in every work thereof. Nations, through the just judgement of God, run into errour after errour, and stagger like a drunken man in his vomit, till they fall into the pit, and into the snare of some utter desolation.

Further, The deceiver and the deceived are his; that is, the Lord improves both, to serve his own ends, to bring about his counsels, and promote his glory. We think nothing nothing serves the ends of God but the publication of truth; yes, the publishing and spreading of errours serve his ends too, and bring his purposes to pass. Carnal reason startles at this, and cannot make it out. But go into the sanctuary, and learn what this meaneth: remember Jobs preface, With him is strength and wisdom, and you will be satisfied. The preface makes the doctrine easie: and who is not convinced that there is infinite wisdom, and a strait rule in him, who can regulate the irregularity and crookedness, the errours and absurdities of man? Who can find out the depth of his wisdom, who is able to make such improvements out of folly, and give an advantage to truth, by the breaking out of falsity? Doth not the glory of God shine bright in this? The question is put by Augustine, in his 22. book of the City of God, Why doth not God remove and sweep sin and errour out of the world? He answers, It is better, and an act of greater power to make good out of evil, then not to suffer evil to be: As it is one of the highest acts of grace in man, to render good for evil: so it is one of the highest acts of power in God to draw good out of evil. We may well conclude, wisdom and strength are his, whom the craft and skill of men to deceive cannot circumvent, and whom the sillines and folly of men in being deceived cannot disappoint. In how clear a light doth God dwell, yea how clear a light is God, who makes his way without one wry step through all the mists and darkness of this world? It argues an infinite soveraignty in God, that he doth his work by that which seems to work against him. Deceivers do the work of God, though they intend nothing but their own.

For first, God would have his people tried, and he tries them by those who attempt to deceive them. (Deut. 13. 1,2.) If there arise among you a Prophet, that speaks unto thee, saying, let us go after other Gods, &c. Thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that Prophet, for the Lord your God proveth you. Here is the account which God gives, why he lets deceivers go abroad, and take their scope among his people, It is to prove his people. The Apostle gives the same reason, (1 Cor. 11. 19.) For there must be also heresies among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest among you. It would never appear either what false principles corrupt the hearts and understandings of men, or what truth and sincerity are lodged there, if the Lord did not let out deceivers and false prophets, to open their packs of lies in their sight or hearing.

Secondly, God would have us, not only hold truth, but be zealous for the truth, and contend earnestly for the faith which was once delivered to the Saints: He therefore sends out some to oppose it. Some are busied in spreading deceits, that we may learn to be more busie in withstanding them, or more watchful in avoiding them. When we hear that there are Cut-purses in a crowd, every man looks to his purse; so when we hear that deceivers and impostors are in the Church, and that they come with such an effectualness of deceit, that if it were possible they should deceive the very elect, this must needs awaken all to look to themselves; will you not try what ye receive, when ye hear there are deceivers, and teachers of false doctrine are abroad, as well as teachers of the truth? and that there are blind guides, as well as Seers gone forth? If nothing but truth could possibly be offered, our care and pains to prove what is offered might be spared: Neither would it be needful for us to pray unto Christ (the great Prophet) to keep us in his truth, but only to give us faith to receive, and wills to obey his truth. But seeing there are deceivers abroad, shall we not examine before we receive? shall we not weigh and try all in the balance of the Sanctuary, by the touchstone of the word, ere we believe it?

If any ask, Why are so many misled into errour, and poisoned with unwholsom doctrine? why doth not God preserve, and antidote all places against these infections? The Prophet Ezekiel hints us an answer (chap. 14. vers. 7.) God punisheth one sin with another. When men continue in sins of practice, God lets them fall into sinful opinions. He justly blinds their eyes against his truth, who harden their hearts against his fear, and put the stumbling block of their iniquity before their faces. A second reason is given by the Apostle (2 Thes. 2.) He had said, vers. 11. God shall send them strong delusion, the reason follows, it is, because they received not the love of the truth: The understanding may submit, while the affections stand out. It is easier to receive truth, then to receive the love of the truth. And how much truth so ever we receive without love to it, leaves us still under the wrath of God. The wrath of God is visible in his judgements; and this is judgement in perfection, to be given up to strong delusion. Those are the sorest punishments which are made of sins. They are punished with the belief of errour, who love not truth. False doctrines are fit plagues for false hearts. And as they shall be beaten with many stripes, who know their masters will and do it not, so also shall they who know it, and love it not; and indeed these and the former are the same. The reason why any doth not what he knows, is because he doth not love it; and he that loves it, will do it, for love is the fulfilling of the commandment.

By all it appears, how the deceiver and the deceived are Gods. Mr. Broughton hath put the sum of these several interpretations into his translation. By him, and from him, and for him, are deceivers and deceived. From him, that is, he sendeth them. By him, that is, he suffers and orders them. For him, that is, they promote his glory, and serve his ends, either to try and discover who are faithful, or to punish those who are false.

Take one note by way of inference from the whole. If the deceiver and the deceived are the Lords, then surely they who lead others into truth, and they that are led into truth, are his much more. Truth teachers, and truths receivers, lye, as, in the bosom of God, and are his by special approbation; They are to him as the apple of his eye, as his precious jewels; They are his Scholars, he teacheth them; he teacheth those that teach truth, and they who learn truth are taught of him; The Lord feeds them with knowledge and understanding; He maketh them to lye down in green pastures (of sound doctrine) he leadeth them beside the still waters of spiritual consolation. He will open the gates of salvation, to a righteous nation who love the truth, (Isa. 26. 1.) They are his, and none shall pluck them out of his hands; they shall not be left either to the cunning craftines of deceivers, or to the rough violence of oppressours. And though such as publish and receive the truth may suffer for it, yet they shall never loose by it. Truth is such a commodity as never broke the buyer, what ever it cost him.

VERS. 17, 18.

He leadeth Counsellours away spoiled, and maketh the Judges fools.
He looseth the bonds of kings, and girdeth their loins with a girdle.

JOB insisteth upon his former argument, to illustrate the power and wisdom of God. He had done it in natural things at the 15th vers. He withholdeth the waters, and they dry up. He did it in civil and spiritual things, at the 16th vers. The deceived and the deceiver are his. In this context he enumerates more distinctly, the several sorts and degrees of men, whom the Lord by the wonderful administrations of his power and wisdom, sets up or casts down.

In the former verse we heard of deceivers in Religion, and of deceivers in policy: of Church-deceivers, and of State-deceivers. The instances given here are about the latter: we may call them State-hereticks, deceiving, or being deceived in the ministery of justice, to Kingdoms and Commonwealths. And because the intent of Job is to shew the mutations of States and Kingdoms, therefore he speaks of those who are the chief supporters, the most eminent pillars of States and Kingdoms. Of these he names, 1. Councellours. 2. Judges. 3. Kings; in whose miscarriages whole Kingdoms miscarry.

Versibus his quinq; describitur Monarchiæ status Labefactatio atque eversio. Merl.

It is here observable in general, that Job being to describe the providences of God in the world, doth not meddle with small matters, as what God doth to a private person, or single families; but he deals in those which are most eminent, the transmutations of Kingdoms, which fall within the observation of the whole world. If a particular man be undone or ruined, his next neighbour takes notice of it, but it is scarce known in the next village: But when Kingdoms are ruined, all States and Kingdoms ring of of it, such events are the talk and wonder of the Nations round about.

Secondly, He doth not instance in the founding and establishing of Kingdoms, wherein yet the wisdom and power of God are very glorious; but in their destruction and putting down. And the reason is, because we take greater notice of God in pulling down, then we do in building up; we observe him more when he killeth, then when he maketh alive; his withdrawings are more noted then his presence, and we are more sensible of our privations, then of our injoyments. The Sun is more looked at in an ecclipse, then when it shineth with purest lustre.

Further, He giveth instance in these, because we are apt to cast the miscarriages of Kingdoms upon second causes. It was the pride of such, the envy of others, the ambition of a third sort, or the unfaithfulness of a fourth, which undid all; we seldom look up to the hand of God, while we complain so much of men. In all changes here below, Job carrieth our thoughts directly to God, He leadeth Counsellours away spoiled: Do not stay enquiring how weakly Counsellours advised, or how foolishly Judges gave their sentence, it is God that doth all these things, He leadeth Counsellours away spoiled, and maketh the Judges fools, &c. More distinctly,

He leadeth.] The Hebrew is, he makes them go, he makes them go whether they will or no: he leadeth them from the height of their dignity, into a despised condition. No man hath any mind to such a motion.

Counsellours.] Counsellours (as the word is ordinarily taken) are such as give advice in publick affairs; they chalk out the way for action; that's the proper work of counsel; Counsel is to lay the design, and to cut out the means, how businesses are to be carried, how to be mannaged, then others are called to execute. Counsel tables order the affairs of the whole world: they give the rule, and draw the method, they appoint the instruments and set the time how all shall be done. A Counsellour is like the Pilot at the helm, steering the vessels course, (Prov. 11. 14.) Where no counsel is, the people fall, but in the multitude of Counsellours there is safety. Hence when Job would set forth the destruction of a people, he tells us that God leadeth Counsellours

Διάγω βουλευτὰς αἰχμαλώτους. Sept. Ducit consultores captivos.

Away spoiled.] The Hebrew is variously interpreted. The Septuagint saith, He leadeth them away as captives. Then the sence riseth thus, That the Lord takes the wise Counsellours of the earth, as prisoners in war; when they in their counsels and designs have set themselves against his Throne and Kingdom, when they have been devising devices against his people; then the Lord comes out with his Army, conquers them, and leads them captive. When Christ ascended upon high, (Psal. 68. 18.) He led captivity captive, or, He captivated captivity; that is, he led those captive who had captivated his people; or he led his people, who were miserable captives to Satan, into a blessed captivity to himself. And as he led captivity captive, so he can lead liberty captive, making those who injoyed the greatest liberty, even Counsellours themselves, his captives.

There are three wayes in which this leading Counsellours spoiled and captivated may be understood.

De gradu dignitatis dejicit. Drus.

First, Spoiled of their honour and reputation. It is as easie as it is usual with the Lord, to spoil those of honour in the world, who use their counsels and their power against those whom he honours. It is as great an affliction to cast them out of the hearts of men, (especially of good men) as out of their estates. The hand of God is in nothing more visible then in making them a detestation among men, who were the delight of men. Honour is one of the richest spoils that can be taken from any man, especially from Counsellours; who alwayes do as much with their reputation, as with their reason, and can do nothing with all their reason, when once they have lost their reputation.

Sapientes hujus seculi optato fine dejicit. Pin.

Secondly, He leadeth them away spoiled of their hopes and expectations, spoiled of the booty and of the prey which they designed to themselves; they thought of rich advantages by spoiling others, but they are led away spoiled. To which sence the words are well expounded, He doth cast the wise men of this world from their wished end: They who presumed and promised themselves great spoils, become a spoil. Eliphaz treateth at large of this point, (Chap. 5. 12.) He disappointeth the devices of the crafty, so that their hand cannot perform their enterprise.

Hebræi spoliatos mente & judicio exponunt. Merc.

Thirdly, These Counsellours are often spoiled, not only of their honour and credit, of their ends and hopes, but also of their wits and wisdom. They whose wits and wisdom continue as high and quick as ever, may yet be disappointed in their counsels, and loose both their ends and honour: But the Lord doth sometimes spoil the wise of wisdom, and knowing men of understanding. The Hebrew Doctors delight most in this interpretation, He preyeth upon the wisdom of the wise; they think themselves able to outreach and outpolicy all the world: Yet God blasts their gifts, and darkens their understandings, he puts them out of their wits, and makes their judgements injudicious. He gives them up (as he did those Gentiles, who waxed vain in their imaginations, Rom. 1. 28.) to a reprobate mind, to an unjudging, or an unapproving spirit. They who knowingly put darkness for light, and light for darkness, evil for good, and good for evil, wrong for right, and right for wrong, shall do it at last for want of knowledge. They who act against their light, shall not have light to act by. And as some counsellours are thus spoiled for a punishment to themselves, so not a few are spoiled that they may be a punishment to others. For this cause they are disabled to resolve what is safe for a people, and what is unsafe; what may be for their uniting, or what for their dividing; what for the setling, or what for the disturbing of affairs. (Psal. 75. 5.) The stout hearted are spoiled; so we read, but some translate, They are spoiled of their stout heart: The stout hearted, the strong are spoiled; the strong man may be spoiled by a stronger: that's a good sence, but it is more elegantly rendred, they are spoiled of their stout heart, that is, the Lord takes their heart out of their bosom. Daring men, who fear nothing, are turned into Magor-missa-bibs, fear round about; their stout hearts are taken from them; and then, they are so far from being a terrour to other men, that they run from the shadow of a man: Their courage is down, they cannot give a child a confident look, much less look dangers or enemies in the face. Now, as the Lord spoils Souldiers and warriours of their stout hearts, so he spoileth Counsellours of their cunning and politick hearts, of their wise hearts; the politick hearts are spoiled, or, they are spoiled of their politick hearts. Rabbi Moses (as was noted) readeth this text so; he bringeth wise men into a spoil of their wisdom, that is, he takes their wisdom as a prey: and as a man that is spoiled, is sent away without a peny in his purse, or a garment upon his back, so these wise Counsellours are sent away without any wit in their heads, or prudence in their breasts. One of the Greek translatours, (both the Hebrews and the Greeks joyn in this sence) gives it thus, He leadeth away Counsellours to uncounsellableness, or he leadeth them away (saith another) into penury or poverty of counsel, they have not so much as a peny worth of counsel about them, if one should come to ask it of them. The Vulgar Latine comes near this sence, rendering thus, He leadeth the Counsellours into a foolish end, or, into a foolish conclusion of their business; that is, he brings their counsels to such an end, that they shall be accounted fools and unwise men, by all men of wisdom.

Spoliati sūt fortes corde, q.d. privati animo animositate & fortitudine.

Διάγων βουλευτικὰς εἰς ἀβουλίαν. Symach.

Adducit ut prædā. Tyg.

These three wayes we may understand this text, that God leadeth Counsellours away spoiled. All which are wrapped up in a fourth, he brings them into straits and difficulties, like captives in chains, and so drags them after the chariot of his triumphing providence, drawn by his own infinite wisdom and strength: And thus they become a spectacle of scorn or pity to all beholders.

Further, Consider that these Counsellours may be of two sorts. First, Such as give evil counsel against a Kingdom or State, these are usually led away spoiled of their honour, and of their hopes, of their ends, yea and of their wits. Secondly, Such as give good counsel, and that with all their might, and the best of their understanding, yet, even these are sometimes led away spoiled of all: So that though they would, yet they shall not be able to direct or deliver those that trust them and depend upon them. Hence Observe,

First, A spirit of counsel is the gift of God.

It is a special gift of God to be able to give good counsel: it is a great gift of God, to be willing to receive good counsel. I scarce know which is the greater, to be willing to receive good counsel, or to be able to give it. Many can give good counsel, who will not receive it: To give or to receive are the gift of God.

Secondly Observe, Kingdoms and States fail, when counsels fail.

Jobs scope is to shew the alterations that are in Kingdoms: now as by the Majesty of Kings, the wisdom of Counsellours, the prudence of Judges, the eloquence of Orators, and valour of Souldiers, Kingdoms flourish and are established; so by the taking away or decay of these, Kingdoms decay and come to nothing, or to that which is next to nothing, a chaos of confusion. This judgement is threatned, (Isa. 3. 4.) In that day the Lord will take away from Jerusalem, the stay and the staff, the whole stay of bread, and the whole stay of water. There is a twofold staff of a people, there is a natural staff, and there is a civil staff; the natural staff is bread and water, which by a Synechdoche are put for all the necessary supports of a natural life. The removal of these is ruine; yet God when he intends ruine, takes away other stayes besides these. The same Prophet proceeds in this sad narrative, He will take away also the mighty man, and the man of war, the Judge, and the Prophet, and the Prudent, and the Ancient, the Captain of fifty, and the Honourable man, and the Counsellour. Thus the Lord takes away the civil staff and stay of a people, that is, men inabled for publick services. And when these foundations of humane society are out of course or removed out of place, down comes the roof and highest pinnacles of the most potent Commonwealths. For as when vision, that is, the word preached, faileth, the people perish; (the preaching of the word is called a vision, either because the word was received by vision from God, or because in it, the Lord is seen, and his truth is discovered to us.) Now (I say) as when this vision faileth, the people perish, that is, their souls perish, the spiritual part perisheth, they perish in the capacity of a Church: So when counsel fails, the people perish in their civil capacity, as they are a politick State or Commonwealth. Learn hence, what need we have to pray for the maintenance of these stayes. God in judgement may lead our Counsellours away spoiled, and then we are spoiled.

Thirdly Observe, The ruine of Kingdoms is not from chance and fortune, but by the decree and purposes of God.

He leadeth Counsellours away spoiled. He in mercy giveth Counsellours, to establish and preserve Kingdoms; and when either Counsellours abuse their wisdom, or when a people abuse the blessings which God giveth, or hath restored to them by their Counsels, then he takes them away, he spoileth the Counsellours that the people may be spoiled. We sometimes wonder that Counsellours have no more wisdom, we should rather be humbled that our selves have no more goodness. Usually a people are first spoiled of goodness, before Counsellours are spoiled of wisdom to give advice, or are successless in what they advise. If God doth this, we cannot complain: When he gives Counsellours, he is not indebted to do it; and when he takes them away he is provoked to do it; he takes them not away whilest good counsels are received, or while we are thankful to him for the good we receive by counsel. When the Lord would destroy Egypt, he spoiled the Counsellors of Egypt (Jer. 19. 11, 12, 13.) Surely the Princes of Zoan are fools, the counsel of the wise Counsellors of Pharaoh is become brutish; How say ye unto Pharaoh, I am the son of the wise, the son of ancient Kings? The Prophet discovers their degeneracy from their ancestours. And whence was all this? Was this from the turning of fortunes wheel, as heathens used to speak? No, vers. 17. Because of the Counsel of the Lord of hosts, which he hath determined against it. The Lord had a Counsel, and his Counsel was against Egypt, therefore the Counsel of the wise shall not help Egypt: For the Princes of Zoan shall become fools, and the Counsel of the wise Counsellours of Pharaoh brutish. When the most proper means of safety cannot save, nothing can. And though Counsellours themselves continue wise, yet they shall have no better success then fools. Achitophels Counsel was in an ill matter, yet it was the best Counsel that could be given to facilitate the ends of Absalom, but the Lord turned it into foolishness: The event is the same, whether God turn (as he did Achitophels) wise Counsel into foolishness, or (as it follows in this text) the wisest Counsellours into fools; both these are alike easie to God and fatal unto man.

And he makes the Judges fools.

Some expound this as a repetition of the former clause. A Counsellour may also be a Judge; so they are coincident terms. But rather take them distinctly, for here are three Officers specified: First, He who is supream, the King: Secondly, They who are subordinate, the Judge, and the Counsellour. Now as He leadeth Counsellours away spoiled, so he makes the Judges fools.

The Judge (as distinguished from the Counsellour) is one who administreth justice according to law. Judges are servants to the law, and rulers to the people, Gen. 19. 9. This fellow came in to sojourn, and he will needs be a Judge; he will govern and give us the rule, he will take upon him to teach us what to do, say the Sodomites to Lot. After the death of Joshua, the supream Magistrate in Israel was called a Judge, till Saul was elected King. Here the Judge is a subordinate Magistrate, placed under Kings.

He makes the Judges fools.] Not by any positive act, infusing folly. But God may be said to make Judges fools, two wayes. First, By not enlightning their understandings, and leaving them in the dark. Secondly, By overreaching their understandings, and outwitting them in the light. It is usual amongst us, to say, of a very wise man, he will make such a one a very fool if he deal with him: Not that he puts folly into the man, or withdraweth wisdom from him, but he doth so much overpoise him in parts, that when he deals or argues with him, he will appear but a child or a very fool. Those Israelites that went to search the land of Canaan were doubtless no dwarfs, yet when they saw the huge sons of Anak, they looked on themselves like grashoppers. A tall man is but low of stature; A rich man but poor; A wise man but a fool, in comparison of him who greatly excels in stature, riches or wisdom. We may take this text either of a privative act, the Lord withdraws and withholds the light, so that the Judge cannot see the rule of the Law, and then (like a fool) he errs in judgement; or of a superlative act, for though the Judge retain his light, yet the Lord makes a fool of him. Who can tell how much the wisdom of God exceeds the wisdom of man, when the Apostle tells us, that the foolishness of God is wiser then men? 1 Cor. 1. 25. If the foolishness of God (namely that which vain men count foolishness) be wiser then men, then surely the wisdom of God will soon make the wisest among men fools indeed.

Again, Job doth not say, He makes fools Judges; that the Lord doth sometimes (Isa. 3. 4.) I will give children to be their Princes, and babes shall rule over them: The Prophet speaks not of children in age, for Josiah was a child, and but eight years old, yet a great blessing to the Kingdom of Judah; but he means children in understanding. The fore-thought of that, troubled Solomon, Eccles. 2. 19. I hated all my labour which I had taken under the sun (saith he) because I should leave it unto the man that shall be after me, and who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man or a fool? Rehoboam proved a foolish Prince. Now as God to punish a people makes fools Judges, so which is more, He maketh Judges fools; let them be as wise as they will, he outwitteth them, and catcheth them in their own devices.

The Vulgar Latine reads it thus, He brings the Judges into astonishment, or amazement. The Septuagint, He brings them into fear and trembling: Both note the same thing, that the Lord casts them into a consternation of spirit, and then they fall upon erroneous and foolish determinations. (Isa. 19. 14.) He mingleth a perverse spirit in the midst of them. They turn giddy, or are giddy with turning, and know not well what to do, or which way to resolve.

Judices in stuporem, Vulg. in pavorem, Sept. in conturbationē mentis.

Hence Observe, First, That the wisest men are not always wise.

God

God can make Judges fools. As wisdom is the gift of God, so is the continuance of it: And unless we receive a supply of wisdom from God, we shall quickly turn fools, and do things rather like mad men, then like men of reason and understanding. We want daily wisdom for our daily work, as much as we do daily bread for our daily wants.

Secondly, Failings in judgment are in judgment from God; or, God in judgment makes men fail in judgment.

It is a high judgment of wrath, to disable men from judging in reason.

This God doth, both to punish the sins of Judges, and of those for whom they judge. When a people trust in the wisdom of their Judges, when they make them God, of whom God hath only said, Ye are Gods; then God makes them less then men. (Acts 12.) When Herod made an Oration, the people cryed, The voice of God, and not of man. Judges should give glory to God, as Herod did not, and so was consumed of Worms; yet God may send a Worm into the counsels and resolutions of the Judges, and eat them out, because of such cryes among the people.

Lastly, It is matter of comfort to consider, that the Lord can make Judges fools: That (as Mr. Broughton translates this verse) He brings Counsellors to badness, and Judges to stark madness. We need not fear what wise men act against us, while the only wise God acteth for us.

Job goes on, and gives an higher instance then in Judges and Counsellors.

Verse 18. He loseth the bond of Kings, and girdeth their loins with a girdle.

He loseth.] The Hebrew is, he openeth or untieth the bond of Kings.

מוסר יסר. Rad.

The bond.] The word signifies any thing that knitteth, or holdeth together. Sometimes it is put for discipline and correction: The Greek expresseth instruction and correction, both the parts of discipline, by one word.

Quod est constringere aut ligare vinculo aut quacunq; institutione aut arctiore disciplina, quam Graci παιδείαν vocant. καθιζάνων βασιλεῖς ἐπὶ θρόνου. Sept. Catenam regum solvit, q.d. e vinculis eos evehit ad regnum. Tharg

We may take this bond two wayes. First, Passively, and secondly, Actively.

First, Passively, and then by the bonds of Kings, are understood those bonds wherewith Kings are bound. So the Chaldee Paraphrast translates, He bringeth Kings from bonds to the throne; that is, Kings who have been bound, captivated, and brought very low, he raiseth up again: The Septuagint runs upon that sence, Placing Kings in their thrones; as speaking of those Kings who had been put out, or put off from their thrones; these the Lord re-inthrones, or sets up again.

And then in correspondency to that understanding of the word [Bond] the latter clause of the verse [And girdeth their loins with a girdle] is to be understood in a good sence. He giveth them strength and honour, he settleth their affairs and crowns, after greatest shakings and depressions. A BOND is for punishment, a girdle is both for strength and ornament. A girdle is the emblem of power; and to gird a man is as much as to give him power: So that when 'tis said, He girdeth their loins with a girdle, the meaning is (according to the sence given of the former clause) he strengtheneth them in their Kingdom, State, and Government, and restores them the obedience of their people; thus the phrase is used (Isa. 45. 5.) concerning Cyrus, I girded thee though thou hast not known me; that is, I set thee upon the Throne, I established thee, and confirmed thee, I put thee into that high condition, though thou little thoughtest that it was I who did it. There is a profitable truth in this interpretation. Kings are delivered from bonds, and set upon their thrones by the special providence and power of God.

But if we view this Text with the Context more strictly; the scope of the whole lodges our thoughts in another sence. For Job is setting forth the judgment of God upon Kingdoms, in the judgments which he brings upon Counsellors, Judges, and Kings. Therefore we cannot with any sutableness to the Context (though the thing be in it self a truth) understand it of a work of deliverance, in loosing the bonds of Kings, and re-establishing them upon their Thrones. Here then we must take the word bond, actively, and so we may expound it two wayes.

First, For those bonds with which Kings illegally bind their people. Such are the bonds of oppression and tyranny: And so the meaning of, He looseth the bonds of Kings, is this; God by his mighty power breaks, or by his wisdom untyes those bonds of oppression, with which Kings attempt to enslave their people; such were the bonds of Rehoboam, whose resolution was (though it was a rash one) to bind his people in bonds; and when they petitioned him, complaining of heavy burthens laid upon them in his Fathers dayes, praying, that now his yoke might be made easier: Easier, saith he, nay it shall be made heavier; Whereas my Father made your yoak heavy, I will add to your yoke; my father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions; my little finger shall be heavier then my fathers loins. I will publish such Edicts, and put out such Proclamations, as shall be so many chains, bonds and fetters upon you, to tye you faster, and hold you closer in subjection then ever you were to this day. This sort of bonds, the Lord breaks, he looseth the oppressing bonds of Princes. When they act the Tyrant, not the King, and in stead of ruling, vex a people; when they will not let their subjects enjoy such liberty as becomes men, or Christians, then he looseth their bonds. Kings and people too, joyn sometimes (though in vain) to break the bonds of God. (Psal. 2. 1, 2.) Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing? The Kings of the earth set themselves, and the Rulers take counsel together: And what is it upon? It is this, Come let us break their bonds asunder, and cast away their cords from us: What? Will Christ subdue us to his Laws? Will he lay bonds upon us, and make us slaves under the Scepter of his Government? Come, Let us break these bonds, and cast these cords from us: let us get out our necks from this yoke, and our shoulders from these burdens. We are a free people, our tongues and our consciences are our own, who is Lord over us? Thus people and Kings conspire to loosen the bonds which Jesus Christ, the King of Saints, and King of Nations, chargeth upon them for their good; they will not abide such bonds, not they; but they must, for they do but imagine a vain thing. But when Kings and Princes, out of the pertinatiousness and pride of their spirits, or out of an ungoverned resolution in government, say, that they will lay bonds and tributes, impositions and services upon their people, which make them groan; then the Lord takes counsel in Heaven (and it is not in vain) I will break their bonds, (saith he) and cast their cords off from you, and he doth it. As Sampson brake the withs and bonds wherewith the Philistims bound him, so doth God those wherewith his people are bound, as a thread, as a thread of tow is broken, when it toucheth (or as the Hebrew is) smelleth the fire. Thus he wrought for his holy Name, and for his people in Egypt. Pharaoh said to his wise Counsellors, Come, let us work wisely, let us make bonds for this people, and bring them into perpetual servitude; they were first commanded to make brick, and then compelled to make brick without straw; they served with rigour. Here were bonds, but God loosened them, and by a mighty hand, and stretched out arm, delivered his people, drowning Pharaoh in the red Sea. Thus the bond of that King was loosened; and so were those of Rehoboam; for while he (as was toucht before) prepared bonds for his people, and thought he could never make them slaves enough, God in judgment stirred up another King, and ten Tribes of twelve departed from his obedience, and never returned again; neither did God permit Rehoboam to proceed in his attempt for the reducing of them, but took the revolt upon himself, saying plainly by the mouth of his Prophet, This thing is from me, 1 Kings 12. 24. Thus the bonds of that King were loosened, and himself was brought into straits, while he endeavoured unjustly to straiten those in whose just liberties he should have rejoyced. Those are the freest Kings who govern a free people; and the more free a people are, the more are they truly subject. Slavery doth either embase the spirits of a people, or heightens them to disobedience. Oppression makes a wise man mad; but none are so mad as oppressors, how wise soever they seem to be. When their bonds are loosed (as they shall) they loose more then they could get, should they continue fastened.

Activè vinculum quo illi alios vinciunt, significat sæpe tyrannide aut impotenti regũ dominatione liberari subditos dũ jugum excutiunt & è potestate tyranni eximunt. Merc.

Secondly, As Kings have oppressing bonds, so governing bonds. Wholesome laws are the peoples bonds; and it is both their duty and their liberty to be thus bound. It is a far greater bondage to be under no laws, then to be under hard ones. When every man doth that which is right in his own eyes, there is ſcarce any man will be found either doing or enjoying that which is right. Therefore let people take heed, leſt while they complain of the bonds of oppreſſion, that they do not throw off the bonds of ſubjection: Yet thus alſo God looſeth the bonds of Kings: He in judgment to Kings, and Kingdoms, leaves a people to forget their duty, and to withdraw from due obedience.

(a) Balthūm regum diſſolvit. Vulg. (b) Authoritatem & imperiū illis adimit. Merc. In Baltheo regnantis intelligitur gloria, in funere vero è regno depoſiti ignominia. Hieron. Aurum Baltheus inſigne fuit regum, clariſſimique magiſtratus, quare ſpoliari cingulo dicebantur ei magiſtratu & dignitate privabantur. Pined. (c) Baltheus non fuit inſigne regale, ſed militare. Bold.

The Vulgar tranſlateth (a) He unbuckleth or diſſolveth the belt of Kings; which is gloſſed to this ſence; (b) He diveſts them of regal power. The belt was alwayes a mark of honour, and ſome of the Learned obſerve, that it was anciently an emblem of Kingly power: And ſo the unlooſing of it muſt imply the taking away of that power. (c) The belt is taken here by others for the emblem of a Souldiers power only, not of a Kings. Hence girding, or putting on the belt, is as much as preparing for war: Gird up now thy loins like a man, ſaith God to Job (Chap. 38. 3.) when he challenged him to a diſpute, which is a verbal war. (Pſal. 93. 1.) The Lord reigneth, he is cloathed with majeſty: the Lord is cloathed with ſtrength, wherewith he hath girded himſelf. David giving charge to Solomon upon his death-bed concerning Joab, who had been his chief Commander, or the Generaliſſimo of his forces, ſaith, He put the blood of war upon his girdle, (or the belt, ſo Pagnine tranſlates) that was upon his loins, (1 Kings 2. 6.) Chriſt himſelf (Iſa. 11. 5.) is deſcribed, having Righteouſneſs the girdle of his loins, and faithfulneſs the girdle of his reins; that is, coming forth girded, or belted about, as a victorious Conqueror, with righteouſneſs and faithfulneſs. That's the meaning of that cooling meſſage (1 Kings 20. 11) Let not him that girdeth on his harneſs, boaſt himſelf as he that putteth it off; that is, do not ſing Victoria before the battel; the event of war is uncertain. And it was uſual, when commiſſion Officers of Armies were caſhiered and turned off, for any miſdemeanour, to take away their belt. There is a famous ſtory in Suidas about it, of one Auxenſius, a great Commander under Lycinius the Emperour; He reports, that when Lycinius came into the Court of his Palace, where there was a great Bath, and ſome Vines growing about it, with the image of Bacchus ſet up among the Vines: The Emperour had Auxenſius draw his ſword, and cut off a bunch of Grapes, which as ſoon as he had done, he commanded him to offer it at the feet of Bacchus, which was as much as to acknowledge him to be a god: Auxenſius anſwered, I am a Chriſtian, I will not do it: What? not do it upon my command, ſaith the Emperour, then you muſt quit your place: With all my heart, Sir, ſaid the Chriſtian ſouldier; and, in token of it, put off his belt; which was as much as the giving up of his Commiſſion, and went away with joy in that ſuffering for Chriſt.

According to this tranſlation and uſe of the word, He looſeth the bond and belt of Kings, the ſign is put for the thing ſignified; and the meaning riſeth thus, God caſteth down Kings, not only from their Soverainty and Regal power, but from their Military power. He takes not only their Crown from their head, and their Scepter out of their hand, but the Belt and Sword from their loins: So that as their people refuſe to give them any willing ſubjection, ſo they are diſabled to compel them.

Non ſolum regali diademate illos eruit, ſed etiam Baltheo quod eſt ſimplicis militis inſigne, i.e. illuc eos abjicit, ut nec militis quidem nomine digni reputētur. Bold.

Hence obſerve, Kings are in the hands of God, to ſet up, and to caſt down, as himſelf pleaſeth.

By me (ſaith God) Kings reign, and Princes decree juſtice, Prov. 8. 15. and when Princes refuſe to decree juſtice, God can ſay it, and effect it, Ye ſhall not reign. (Iſa. 45. 1.) Thus ſaith the Lord to his anointed, to Cyrus, whoſe right hand I have holden to ſubdue Nations before him, and I will looſe the loins of Kings, &c. God ſet up Cyrus King, to put down Kings, yet he ſaith, I will looſe the loins of Kings. Cyrus was the Inſtrument, but both the deſign and the ſucceſs was of God. Kings cannot make bonds ſo faſt, either to ſtrengthen themſelves, or ſtrait their people, as God can looſe them. There are four bonds which the Lord uſually looſeth, when he chaſtens the pride and ſin of Kings.

Firſt, The bonds of their Authority, that their word is not reverenced, nor received, as before. Where the word of a King is (ſaith Solomon) there is power: Yet when God is angry, he can render their word powerleſs.

Secondly, He looſeth the bonds of their riches and Revenues: Riches are a ſtrength to Kings: Riches are the ſupport, as well as the fruit of peace; and they are the ſinews of war: When treaſure is gone, power ſtayes not long behind. Money anſwers all things; and when that fails, Princes ſeldom receive contentful anſwers. God ſends a Moth upon the publick treaſure, and that eats aſunder many bonds and obligations.

Thirdly, Which is ſtronger then the former two, God looſeth the bond of a peoples love and affection unto Kings. Love is the bond of obedience, both to God and man. Princes ſit faſteſt in the affections of their people. That King who hath the hearts of his Subjects, hath their hands and their purſes too at command. Jehoram out-lived, or rather, never lived in the love of his people, and he died undeſired (2 Chron. 21. 20.) Some have ſaid, let them hate while they muſt fear: But that fear is ſafeſt which ſprings from love.

Oderint dū metuant.

Fourthly, The Lord looſeth the bonds of their Leagues, Allyances, and Confederacies with forreign Nations: They ſhall not ſtand faſt by covenants with men, who break the covenant of their God. Through this judgment of God, Kings have been oftner entangled, then ſtrengthened with Leagues. Thoſe Leagues and Alliances, ſpoken of by Daniel (Chap. 11.) between the Kings of the North and of the South, proved ſnares to catch, rather then helps to uphold one another.

Theſe bonds, or what bonds elſe ſoever, the Kings of the earth make, either to ſupport themſelves, or oppreſs their people, are looſed by the power of God. As there is no bond of God ſo ſtrong, but the heart of man will attempt to break it; ſo there is no bond of man ſo ſtrong, but the hand of God can break it, He looſeth the bonds of Kings.

And girdeth their loins with a girdle.

In the firſt interpretation of the former clauſe, This girding of the loins of Kings with a girdle, was taken in a good ſence, namely, for the ſtrengthening of their State. But in purſuance of the ſecond interpretation, which hath appeared moſt agreeable to this Text, The girding their loins with a girdle, undergoes a very different conſideration, and may be taken two wayes.

Per cingulū aliqui vires innuunt, cingulo enī lumbi præcinguntur, in quibus virium ſedes & robora. Druſ.

Firſt, As a girdle is oppoſed to a belt: A girdle is of ordinary uſe, a common part of cloathing: Every man weareth a girdle; but every man doth not wear a belt; that hath ſomewhat of honour in it. And ſo the ſence is this, He looſeneth the belt of Kings, and takes off their ſword, ſo that they cannot carry on their wars: And then, He girdeth their loins with a girdle; that is, he brings them into a low or common condition.

Habitus hominis abjectiſſimi ut opponitur Baltheo, quī reges ornat. Pined.

Secondly, A girdle, and girding with it, ſignifies, not only a common, but a ſervile, or captivated condition. So ſome expound the words here, as an alluſion to that cuſtom which was amongſt the Perſians: (one of the Rabbins is clear for it, and frames his comment upon that notion.) The Kings of Perſia were wont to gird thoſe with a girdle, whom they had taken captive; and they miniſtred unto, and attended thoſe great Kings, being girt with a girdle. Now, That to be girt about the loins is a poſture of ſervice, is clear alſo in Scripture, being a Metaphor taken from the uſage of the Eaſtern countreys, where, wearing long garments, they girded them in all preparations for travel, or labour. Gird up the loins of your minds (ſaith the Apoſtle, 1 Pet. 1. 13.) that is, be in a readineſs to ſerve the Lord. When Chriſt went to waſh his Diſciples feet, John 13. He took a towel and girded himſelf. And when he would ſhew how bleſſed thoſe ſervants ſhall be whom their Lord, when he cometh, ſhall find watching; He tells them (Luke 12. 37.) Verily I ſay unto you, that he ſhall gird himſelf, and make them to ſit down to meat, and will come forth and ſerve them. And again, when he would prove that no man, by all his watchfulneſs and diligence, can deſerve any thing at the hand of God: He puts a query, Luke 17. 7, 8. Which of you having a ſervant plowing, or feeding cattel, will ſay unto him, when he is come from the field, go and ſit down to meat, and will not rather ſay unto him, make ready wherewith I may ſup, and gird thy ſelf and ſerve me, &c. According to this approved uſe of the phraſe, Job's ſence is this, He looſeth the bonds of Kings, and girdeth their loins with a girdle; that is, they who ruled others, are forced to obey, and from Commanders are turned into ſervants: So low

the Lord hath sometimes cast the mightiest and highest Princes of the world.

Præcingit fune lumbos eorum. Funis nomine vilitas zonæ denotatur qua plebeiæ conditionis homines uti solent. Bold. Pro zona funiculus.

The vulgar translateth yet more low, He girdeth their loins about with a rope; which is the meanest matter and making of a girdle: they shall not only have a girdle for a belt, but a rope instead of a girdle: So that word is rendred (Isa. 3. 24.) by the same Translator, The wanton and delicate Dames of Israel, shall have, in stead of a curious girdle, a rope; to note the extream turn which God would make in the state of those proud women; and thus he can abase the pride of the greatest men.

Let that be the Observation upon the whole matter,

God sometimes doth, and he always can bring those that are highest in worldly dignity, into the extreamest depth of worldly misery.

Rulers become captives; they who sat on Thrones, live in prisons; the royal belt is laid aside, and a common girdle, yea girding with sackcloath, taken up by the mightiest earthly gods, when the God of Heaven is angry. The greatest changes are incident to the greatest persons. Nebuchadnezzar's dream was full to this point (Dan. 2. 10.) He forgetting it, sends for the Magicians and Astrologers to tell him, both what his dream was, and what the interpretation of it; but they could not. There is not a man upon the earth (say they) that can shew the Kings matter; therefore there is no King, Lord, nor Ruler, that asketh such things at any Magician or Astrologer: none can shew it unto the King, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh. But unto Daniel the secret was revealed by God; and before he revealed it to the King, he makes this preface almost in Job's stile and language, but fully with his spirit and intent, blessing God, because wisdom and might are his, and he changeth the times and seasons; he removeth Kings, and setteth up Kings; he giveth wisdom unto the wise, and knowledge to them that know understanding, &c. (ver. 20, 21.) Then he tells Nebuchadnezzar his dream, and the interpretation thereof. A goodly image it was, yet degenerating and gradually abasing from a head of gold, to a breast and arms of silver, thence to belly and thighs of brass, to legs of iron, and feet of iron and clay. All these represented some Kings and Kingdoms falling, and others rising upon their ruines, till a Kingdom doth arise which should never fall (ver. 44.) In the same prophecy (Chap. 4. 10.) we have the Kingly power described by a goodly tree, the height whereof reached unto Heaven, under which the beasts of the field had shadow, and the fowls of the Heaven dwelt in the boughs thereof, &c. But, Behold a watcher, and an holy one, came down from Heaven; He cryed aloud, and said thus, Hew down the tree, and cut off his branches, and shake off his leaves, and scatter his fruit; so the body of this flourishing tree vanished to nothing, only the stump of his roots were left in the earth with a band of iron and brass. This vision is also interpreted (ver. 24, 25.) by the loosing the bond of that great King so much, that he was driven from men, and took up his lodging with the beasts of the field, and was made to eat grass as Oxen, and was wet with the dew of Heaven. God, to shew that he can throw the most potent Monarchs, into the lowest condition of men, speaks of this Monarch, as thrown into the condition of beasts: Being (as our late Annotators have observed upon the place) either stricken mad, and so avoided mans company, or being cast out for his tyranny, he wandred among the beasts, and eat herbs and grass. These visions are cleerest manifestations, that God cuts down Kings, and Kingdoms, even to the very stumps (as we say) to the very roots, and sometimes pulls up root and all.

And, that God hath actually done thus to the greatest Princes, all Histories are full: There is no truth hath received greater testimony then this. The records of Scripture, give us high instances of it (Judg. 1. 6, 7.) Adonibezeck, a great King, was taken prisoner by the Army of the two Tribes, Judah and Simeon, and They cut off his thumbs, and his great toes: The eminency of the judgment draws from him an acknowledgment of his own former cruelty, and of the present justice of God upon him, Threescore and ten Kings, having their thumbs and great toes cut off, gathered their meat under my table: as I have done, so God hath requited me. He cut off their thumbs, that they might be disabled from handling Arms, or fighting with him; he cut off their great toes, that they might be disabled to run from him, or escape by flight. Suppose these were petty Princes, yet their number was great; and the hand of God was seen greatly, both in casting them from their dignities, and in catching him at last, who had captivated all them. And as those Heathen Kings, so also some of the Kings of Judah, who were of Gods special anointing and setting up, were miserably afflicted, and brought into bondage, by the special counsel of God. Take the example of Zedekiah (2 Kings 25. 6, 7.) whom, when the Army of the Chaldees took the City, They pursued, and took, brought to the King of Babylon, who gave judgment upon him; and they slew the Sons of Zedekiah before his eyes, and put out the eyes of Zedekiah, and bound him with fetters of brass, and carried him to Babylon. How sad a spectacle was here? A King of Judah, the Ruler of Gods chosen people, in fetters of brass? When the latter Greek Empire was overthrown by the Turks, that great Family of the Paleologi (in which the Empire had long continued) came to that lowness, that some of the Royal blood became Servants, and ordinary Tradesmen. In them the observation of the Preacher was fulfilled (Eccles. 10. 7.) I have seen servants upon horses, and Princes walking as servants upon the earth. Sapor, King of Persia, took Valentinian, the Emperor, prisoner, and used him as a stool for himself to step upon, when he mounted into his saddle. Sesostris, King of Egypt, subduing divers Kings, compelled them to draw his Chariot. The Roman Historians give frequent testimony, that in the flourishing state of that Imperious Commonwealth, conquered Kings and Princes were dragg'd at their Chariots in triumph. Victorious Tamerlane, having overthrown and taken Bajazet, the Turkish Emperor, shackled him in fetters of gold, caused him to be shut up in an iron cage, made in the fashion of a grate, and so carried him like a wild beast, as he marched through Asia, to be scorned of his own people. Henry the fourth, Emperor of Germany, having been oft worsted in battel, was at last reduced to such exigents, that he had not wherewith to buy him bread, but was forced to come to the great Church at Spires (which he himself had built) and there beg to be a Chorister, that so he might get a small stipend to keep him from starving; but could not obtain it: which repulse caused him to bespeak the standers by, in the words of lamenting Job (Chap. 19. 21.) Have pity upon me, O my friends; for the hand of God hath touched me. The weight of these miseries brought him shortly after to his grave; but he found none so humane as to put him in, for he lay unburied five years, no man daring to do it, because the Pope had forbidden it to be done. These examples (more might be added) are clear expositions of, or experiments rather of this Scripture. Let the great men of the earth hear and fear, and do no more presumptuously; let them take the counsel of Christ (Psal. 2.) be wise therefore now, O ye Kings, and be instructed ye Judges of the earth: Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoyce with trembling: Kiss the Son lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little: There is no striving by the most glorious Princes of the earth, with him who is the King of Heaven, and Lord of glory.

Pezet. Mellificii Hist. part. 3.

Take two Corrollaries from the whole. If the Lord do thus toss Kings like tennis-balls, and hurl whole Kingdoms into ruine; if he befools the Judges, and spoils the Counsellors of the earth, surely he will not spare inferiors and weaklings, who strengthen themselves against him. If God deal thus with Kings, what will he do with subjects? He that smites Princes, will he let a people pass unpunisht? God hath in all ages set some Kings and Princes on the scaffold, and made them eminent in sufferings, as well as in dignity, that others beholding the justice of God, might glorifie him, and humble themselves. Hence we may argue, as Christ did in his own case; If it be thus done to the green tree, what shall be done to the dry? If the Lord hath been thus severe against the tallest Cedars in Lebanon, and against the Oaks of Bashan (Kings and Monarchs of the world) that are exalted and lifted up: Shall not low and dry shrubs (inferiour persons) feel the axe and stroke of his anger, when they sin contemptuously against him? Even these are often as proud, unjust and oppressive, according to the line of their power, and the length of their hand, as they who have longest hand, and largest power. It is an admirable dispensation, when God layes his rod upon the back of Kings, to warn mean men. The children of Princes are usually corrected (for their faults) by correcting the children of Plebeians in their presence; their Tutors and Governors do only put them in fear, and make them know discipline, by the smart which others feel. What shall we say then, when God corrects the Children of Kings, yea Kings themselves, in the sight of the common people, that they may be warned and learn discipline?

Secondly, If the strength of Kings cannot hold out against the anger of God, how shall the weak stand before him when he is angry? That argument in the Prophet (Jer. 12. 5. If thou hast run with foot-men, and they have wearied thee, then how canst thou contend with horses?) may be inverted here; if God hath contended with horses, and they could not weary him, how easily will he run with footmen? The stateliest Palaces, and strongest Thrones of Kings, have been consumed or thrown down at his word: Then what will become of cottages and common mens estates, when he speaks against them? When the Lord hath once (as lamenting Jeremy complains, Lam. 2. 16.) in the indignation of his anger despised the King and the Priest, his indignation will make quick dispatch of the rest, who follow their steps in sin, or partake in their transgression.

VERS. 19, 20, 21.

He leadeth Princes away spoiled, and overthroweth the mighty.
He removeth away the speech of the trusty, and taketh away the understanding of the aged.
He poureth contempt upon Princes, and weakneth the strength of the mighty.

JOB goes on in his enumeration of Instances, for the proof and clearing up of his grand Proposition. In the Context before opened we saw how God leadeth Counsellors away spoiled, and maketh the Judges fools; how he looseth the bond of Kings, and girdeth their loins with a girdle. Here we find him at the same work still, though upon other objects;

He leadeth Princes away spoiled, and overthroweth the mighty.

Ministrare in sacris aut politicis. Sacerdos princeps in quacunque dignitate constitutus.

There is a difference about the word which we translate Princes: At the seventeenth verse, He leadeth Counsellors away spoiled; and here, He leadeth Princes away spoiled: Spoiled (as was shewed before) of their ends, and of their hopes, of their power and honour, yea and of their wits and understandings, which causeth some to render it, He leadeth Princes into madness. Mr. Broughton, He bringeth Dukes to badness: And the vulgar, He leadeth Priests into dishonour, or spoiled of their honour. The Hebrew [Cohen] indifferently signifies a Prince, or a Priest, and is frequently used in the old Testament for both: And the Verb whence this Noun is derived, signifies to administer, both in political, and ecclesiastical affairs, and so either a Governour in the Commonwealth, or a Governour in the Church. It is put for a Church-governour, Isa. 28. 7. The Priest and the Prophet have erred, Psal. 99. 6. Moses and Aaron among his Priests. And for a State-governour, 2 Sam. 8. 18. Davids sons were chief Rulers: For both, Gen. 41. 45. The Priest, or Prince of On, Exod. 2. 16. The Priest, or Prince of Midian.

Three reasons are assigned, why those two dignities fell under one expression.

First, Because of old time, the Priest and the Prince were one person. The eldest in the family (before the giving of the Law) was both: And after the giving of the Law, together with all the ceremonial Institutes, the high Priest of Aarons order was a great Prince in Israel.

Secondly, The Priesthood in general was an office of honour, therefore it is expresst by a word of honour.

Thirdly, Because the Priests were unto God, the King of Heaven, as Princes are unto the Kings of the earth: Princes stand but a degree below Kings, and bear the great offices in Kingdoms; they are of Kings secret counsel, and know their hearts; they conveigh the mind of Kings to the people, and often as Commissioners represent their persons. Such (in their capacity) were Priests, in reference unto God; and are therefore called Gods nigh ones. This is it which the Lord spake (saith Moses, when the two sons of Aaron were slain by fire, while they offered with strange fire, Levit. 10. 3.) I will be sanctified in those that come nigh me, or in my nigh ones; such especially were the Priests; they approached to God, and received his mind, and were therefore said to speak from Gods mouth, and to preserve knowledge, even the knowledge of himself in their lips. God committed his secrets, and the mysteryes of his will, to the Priests first, and by their Ministry conveyed both unto the people: They were as the vessel, or cabinet, in which God laid up those precious treasures; The Priests lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth, for he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts (Mal. 2. 7.) God gave the honour of this title to the whole Nation of the Jews, they were called a Nation of Priests, (Exod. 19. 6.) Ye shall be to me a Kingdom of Priests, or a royal Priesthood: A Kingdom of Priests, for two reasons chiefly: First, Because God did esteem that people above all the people of the earth, he put an honour and a value upon them, therefore saith he, Ye shall be to me a Kingdom of Priests. And secondly, Because God communicated more of his counsels to that people, then to any other people, and they were more familiar with him then the rest of the world; even as the Priests were more familiar with God, and came nearer to him then the people. So that look what proportion the Priests among the Jews bear to the people, the same did the Jews bear to all other people of the world. We may take the word here in either sence, He leadeth Princes, or, He leadeth Priests away spoiled.

Ex omnibus regnis vos eritis mihi regnum nobilissimum familiarissimum amicissimum, quibus arcana & secretiora consilia revelabo.

As the word is rendred Priest, Observe,

First, That the holiness of the profession cannot keep the person from sin.

Priests provoke God, and therefore they are spoiled. Grace it self is not, much less is any outward vocation, a bar against temptation: And they who fall in temptation are near falling into affliction, whosoever they are. Which makes a second Observation,

They that are near unto God shall suffer when they sin; and the nearer they are, they shall suffer the more, because the nearer they are, the greater is their sin.

The Priests are among the spoiled, Jer. 14. 18. Both the Prophet and the Priest go about into a land that they know not; that is, they go into banishment, and are carried captives into a strange land. That Text hath a very different reading, for whereas the word which we translate go about, signifies also to trade or make merchandize, the whole is rendred to this sence: The Prophets and Priests together make merchandize of you, and you either discern it not, or do not regard it. This reading gives us a clear reason of that which is contained in the former. This shews their sin, and that their punishment. Those Prophets and Priests who sell souls in their own land, are justly sold as slaves into a land that is not theirs. (Lam. 2. 6.) The Lord hath despised in the indignation of his anger, both the King and the Priest; he puts King and Priest together, in suffering, because they were joyned in sinning. They who associate in doing evil, shall be associated in feeling it. And they shall feel most evil, when they do it, whose office is set up by God, and they put into office for the preventing of it: such are Kings and Priests. The Prophet Malachy reproves the Levites (Mal. 2. 8.) Ye are departed out of the way; ye have caused many to stumble at the Law; ye have corrupted the Covenant of Love; that is, ye have been false, base, and unfaithful in your office: your selves have gone out of the way of truth and holiness, and ye have hindred those who would have walked in it. It was your duty to preserve the Covenant made with your Tribe, but ye have corrupted it. This is your sin, and I will tell you your judgment: Therefore have I also made you contemptible and base before all the people. Unsavory salt is fit only for the dunghill, the seat of contempt.

As the word is rendred (Prince) in our Translation, Observe,

That the honour of man is no shelter against the wrath of God.

As

As the holiness of the Priests office cannot do it, so neither can the power of the Princes office. Princes are called the Shields of the earth (Hos. 4. 18.) Her Shields (or, her Rulers, as we render) with shame do love, Give ye. They are (indeed) the Shields of the earth, but they cannot shield themselves against the assaults of Heaven. Princes should be Shields to protect men from the oppression of man, but they cannot protect themselves against the justice of God. The Prophet (Isa. 43. 14.) tells the people when they were in fear, Thus saith the Lord your Redeemer, the Holy one of Israel, For your sake I have sent to Babylon, and have brought down all their Nobles; the Hebrew is, I have brought down all their bars: Faithful Nobles are the bars of a Kingdom and Commonwealth, to keep out evils: It is their duty to bolt out impiety against God, and unrighteousness towards man: And as they should be a bar of equity against these evils of sin, so a bar of security to keep out the evils of trouble. Now (saith the Lord) I have sent to Babylon, and have brought down all those Nobles, who were as bars in the way to hinder your deliverance from, and return out of captivity. Those Nobles (it seems) were cross bars, they lay cross the way of the people of God, to hinder their passage out of Babylon, therefore God destroyed them. When Nobles, or great Princes, bar up the liberty of Gods covenant-people, their nobility and greatness will be no bar against their own misery. He leadeth Princes away spoiled, and

He overthroweth the mighty.

סלף Supplantare inflectere, mutare, dejicere, deturbare.

Here is another act of Divine power. That God is omnipotent, proves he can do all things; but the doing of them is a visible proof of his omnipotency.

To overthrow, Imports utter ruine: He doth not only shake and displace; but he shakes them to pieces, roots them up, and layes them flat.

He overthroweth the mighty.] Princes are among the mighty ones of the earth, yet some Princes have no great might; but how mighty soever Princes are, down they must, whether they will or no, when the Almighty wills it.

איתן Robustus fortis a rad. אתר quæ vox affert fortitudinem quandam, quæ non permittit se tractari, & duritiem quæ pertinaciter resistit. Fluvios Ethan.

The Hebrew word signifieth the most confirmed strength, even that strength which seems to laugh at opposition, and to have outgrown all fear of being weakened, or overpower'd. Great and impetuous Rivers are set out by that word (Psal. 74. 15.) Thou driedst up mighty Rivers; or, Rivers of might; Rivers which nothing can stand against: What can withstand a swelling torrent? The weight and violence of water beareth down all before it: no bonds, no bounds of mans making can stay it. Yet the Lord can; he, and he only, beareth down the waters; or he drieth them up: He either drieth up mighty Rivers, or stoppeth their course, while they are running with full streams, in a full career.

Hence learn, First, That all strength and might is weak, before the strong and mighty God.

He overthroweth the mighty (1 Sam. 2. 9.) by strength shall no man prevail: When we conclude the probabilities, whether a party shall prevail or no, we count upon their strength, we reckon their numbers, we enquire what Armies they have in the field, what Garrisons in Cities, what Friends and Confederacies abroad, yet in all this we reckon not upon that which will do the thing, strength cannot do it; by strength no man shall prevail, The Lord overthroweth the mighty: whatsoever strength we have to assist us, or to oppose us, the Lord is stronger.

There is a five-fold strength, the overthrowing of which mightily declares the strength and might of God.

First, The strength of the body. God overthroweth the most robustious and giant-like men, the sons of Anak are but grashoppers to him; they (who as we speak) have bodies of brass, he crusheth before the moth. Goliah had a mighty strength of body, and yet the Lord overthrew him: Sampson had a mighty strength of body, yet when the Lord withdrew from him, he was overthrown. Then remember the Prophets counsel (Jer. 9. 23.) Let not the strong man glory in his strength, but let him that glorieth glory in the Lord, who overthroweth the mighty.

Secondly, God overthroweth the strength of riches: Riches are a strong tower. The same word in the Hebrew signifies strength and riches, because a mans strength is computed by his riches: A rich man is a mighty man in the eye of the world; and so is a worldly rich man in his own eyes. Yet, as the strength of body within us, so the strength of estate without us, is soon blasted by the breath of Gods displeasure. Then, take the counsel of the Apostle James (Chap. 1.) Let the brother of high degree rejoyce in that he is made low (that is, low in his own thoughts; rich men are usually fuller of high thoughts then they are of earthly treasures) the rich man hath cause to rejoyce when he is low in himself, knowing that as the flower of the grass he shall pass away. Riches and rich men pass away of themselves; how much more when God blows upon them and drives them away.

Thirdly, He overthroweth the mightiness of honour: Many fortifie themselves with great earthly Titles, but these are but paper walls to the batteries of Heaven. Haman's honour among the people, and favour with the Prince, could not save him, when God frowned.

Fourthly, He overthroweth the mightiness of authority; that's distinct from honour; a man may have great titles, and yet but little authority. Mean men have sometimes great commands, they may have authority over those who are above them in honour. But though the might of authority be in conjunction with the mightiness of honour, the Lord overthroweth it. So that he who could (as the Centurion in the Gospel) say to this man, Go, and he goeth; to another come, and he cometh; to a third do this, and he doth it, may at last (as our Proverb speaketh) command his man, and do it himself. When once commands are slighted, authority is overthrown. God who gives weight to the word of a man, can also make it light; he shall speak, and none regard.

Fifthly, God overthroweth the mightiness of courage: He makes the valiant faint, and the man, whose heart was like the heart of a Lion, to run, like a Coward, at the shaking of a leaf: God who saith to them that are of a fearful heart, be strong, fear not (Isa. 35. 4.) and maketh the feeble to be as David (Zach. 12. 8.) This God can say to the strong, be ye afraid; and to him that was as David, be thou feeble: He that overthroweth the couragious, can also overthrow courage.

Thus the strength of body, the strength of riches, the strength of honour, the strength of authority, and the strength of courage, are all overthrown by the strength of God. Who can conceive how much strength God hath, who is stronger then all these strengths? And as the Lord alwayes overthroweth the mighty, and gets the day of them, when he engageth with them; so he desires to engage with them. Mighty men seem to be some match for God; and the fall of these makes God more known as he is Almighty. Hence that of the Prophet (Isa. 2. 12.) The day of the Lord of hosts shall be upon, Whom? he doth not say upon the low, weak and poor; but it shall be upon, every one that is proud and lofty, and upon every one that is lifted up? What day of the Lord is this? It is the day of the Lords judgment, the day of his wrath: when he contendeth with a people, then he picks out the great ones chiefly, to contend with. His day shall be upon all the cedars of Lebanon, and upon all the oaks of Bashan, and upon every fenced wall; that is, upon men, who are, in the account of the world, tall like Cedars, strong like Oaks, high like Towers, invincible like Walls of brass; with these the Lord will be dealing in his day: and (ver. 17.) The Lord alone shall be exalted in that day; as if he had said, these men were exalted before; now the Lord overthrowing them, he himself shall be exalted. For the Text may be taken two wayes; he shall be exalted either as the Agent, that is, it shall appear that he alone hath overthrown these mighty ones: Or secondly, the Lord alone shall be exalted; that is, he will come into the place of those mighty men; these carried it in the eye of the world, as the only great ones; now the Lord comes into their place, they shall be exalted no more, his Name shall be exalted, and his only. When God appears in his greatness, none appear great but he: When he exalts himself, none will pretend to exaltation. The Lord alone shall be exalted in that day.

I shall give you four Corrollaries or Deductions from this Proposition, The Lord overthroweth the mighty.

First, Then, fear not the mightiest enemies. God is Almighty, the weakness of God is stronger then men; seeing ing God is described overthrowing the mighty, if we keep close to him, we need not fear to be overthrown by the mighty.

Secondly, If the Lord overthroweth the mighty, Then trust not in the mightiest friends. When great seconds, and assistants appear on our part, then we think we are safe; but what can mighty men do for us, if the Almighty God be against us? As was further shewed (Chap. 9. 13.) Unless the Lord withdraw his anger, the proud helpers do stoop under him; the helpers of strength stoop, unless upheld by the strong God. As therefore we ought not to fear the worst of foes, so not to trust upon the best of friends, because they are mighty.

Thirdly, Let no man rejoyce, or boast in his own strength; though that five-fold strength, before spoken of, meet in him, yet let him not trust upon it. He that breaks them single, can break them combined. A threefold, yea a fivefold cord, is easily broken by the arm of omnipotency.

Fourthly, (Which was toucht, vers. 18.) If God overthrow the mighty, how soon can he overthrow those who have no might? You that are weak and poor in comparison of the mighty Princes and Nimrods of the world; you (I say) have cause to fear and tremble before the mighty God: As they said, (2 Kings 10. 4.) Behold two Kings stood not before him, how then shall we? So we may say much more of the Lord, two Kings, yea hundreds of Kings, Nobles and men of might, have not stood before him, how shall worms, and weaklings wrastle it out, and contend with him?

Verse 20. He removeth away the speech of the trusty, and taketh away the understanding of the aged.

This verse gives us another act of Gods power, towards the altering and subverting of States and Commonwealths. Kingdoms are much upheld by the eloquence of Orators, and by the wisdom of the Ancient. God makes these two removes, when he would remove the beauty and blessing of a Kingdom. First,

He removeth away the speech of the trusty.

The Hebrew is, He removeth the lips of the trusty. The same word signifies lips and speech, because the lips are the instrument of speech (Gen. 11. 1.) All the earth was of one speech, or of one lip; that is, they all spake one Language. He removeth the speech of Labium ponitur pro loquela.

The trusty.] The word hath a double reading, according to a double derivation in the Hebrew. For some derive it from a root which signifies to speak. Taking it so, the sence is, He bereaveth Orators of their eloquence; or (as Mr. Broughton, closer to the letter) He bereaveth the Orator of lips, He makes them like men dumb, or tongue-tied, who were once all voice and tongue.

Thus Job toucheth upon all those evils which hasten the ruine of a people; one whereof, and that a great one, is this, when God takes away speech from men, whose very trade it is to speak. When God threatened to break the staff of Israel, he saith, I will take away the eloquent Orator (Isa. 3. 3.) Kingdoms, with all their blessings, are as much, if not more, upheld, or cast down by tongues, then they are by hands.

God is said to remove, or take away the speech of the Orator, two wayes.

First, When he takes the Orators away; his picking such out of Councils by death, hath had a sad presage in it, of the approaching funerals of publick prosperity.

Secondly, When though he leaves the speakers, yet he disables them to speak: When though he leave the Orator, yet he takes away his Oratory, so that he cannot deliver himself with any command over the attentions and affections of his hearers: That's the excellency of Oratory, to carry the heart by the ear; to make every sentence perswasive; every word a nail, or a goad; a nail to fasten resolution, or a goad to quicken unto action. It was said of a Grecian Orator, who was also a great Souldier, that he thundred and lightned, moved and awakened all when he spake. But if God once take away the speech of the Orator, he may speak his hearers into a sleep.

Pericles (Olympius propter eloquentiam dictus) fulminabat, intonabat, confundebat Græciam. Plutarch. in vita Peric.

Hence observe, First, That ability of speech is a special gift of God.

He removeth and taketh it away, therefore he giveth it. (Exod. 4. 10.) We find Moses eloquent only to tell God he was not eloquent: He speaks very rhetorically to excuse his service for want of Rhetorick. Lord (saith he) I am not eloquent, neither heretofore, nor since thou hast spoken unto thy servant (neither yesterday, nor to day; that is, not at any time) but I am slow of speech, and of a slow tongue. But how doth the Lord answer him? The Lord said unto him, Who hath made mans mouth? As if he had said, Seeing I make the mouth, which is the instrument of speech, or the shop wherein words are made, I also can make the mouth eloquent, and give thee words to speak. The Lord argues further with Moses, Who maketh the dumb? Is it not I the Lord? I who make the dumb, can make thee speak, and speak eloquently too: I can give thee a flowing tongue. Therefore be not afraid to go on my errand: I, who send thee, will store thee with language to do the errand about which I send thee: It shall be given thee in that same hour, what to speak.

Secondly observe, Man is not master of his own tongue.

God takes away the lip of the Orator. They (Psal. 12. 3, 4.) bragged much of their tongues; surely they thought if any thing was their own, their tongues were, they could speak what they list, Who is Lord over us? say they: Yet they found a Lord over their tongues. God is Lord of the tongue two wayes,

First, Because he will bring every one to an account for his tongue: Those boasters (Psal. 12.) thought themselves exempted from any such controul, Our tongues are our own, who is Lord over us? Who hath any thing to do with what we speak? Who shall audit us for words and syllables? Yes, there is one will do it to a syllable. God gives the rule what we shall speak, and he will call every one to a reckoning for what he hath spoken.

Secondly, God is Lord of the tongue, in reference to the power of speech. Man cannot speak what he would, or when he would (Numb. 23. 11, 12.) Balak had hired Balaam to curse the people of God; and Balaam had a good will to it, if ever man had; but Balak found Balaam in another note, he only published the glory of Israel, and propheſied their highest blessings. Balak was extreamly troubled at this; and saith, What hast thou done unto me? I took thee to curse mine enemies, and behold thou hast blessed them altogether. As if he had said, What Balaam? Art not thou master of thy own words? I called thee to curse, and not to bless; didst not thou understand what my business was? I knew Israel was fenced enough, and too much, with blessings: How is it, that when I sent for thee to blast them, that thou hast blessed them altogether? art thou bribed on their side? or knowest thou not, that I am able to promote thee to honour? Speak, man, the sudden fate of this numerous people, and fear not: Why hast thou gone so contrary to my design? What saith Balaam? He answered and said, Must I not take heed to speak that which the Lord hath put in my mouth? Balaam seems to reply from his conscience. 'Tis the duty of every man to take heed to speak that which the Lord puts in his mouth. But Balaam was only overpower'd: If God would have suffered him to speak what Balaak had desired, his own conscience had never stood in his way: He that opened his Asses mouth a little before to reprove his madness, now shut his mouth from uttering that wickedness. The Lord (saith he) hath blessed them, and I cannot reverse it: As if he had said, I have been tugging at it, and labouring to curse them, but I cannot do it. The Lord restrained his heart, and bound his tongue, that he could not form a curse, and now he puts it off with this fine language, Must I not take heed to speak that which the Lord hath put in my mouth? No man ever came with fuller purpose to curse the Israel of God then Balaam did, but his tongue was not his own, he could not.

לנאמנים a rad. אמן quæ est constantia, fidelitas, stabilitas in dictis & promissis. Qui digni sunt quibus fides habeatur. Auth. Catenæ.

So much upon that rendring of the Text, He bereaves Orators of their eloquence.

We translate, He removeth away the speech of the trusty: And so the word is derived from a root, which signifies constancy, fidelity, truth, stability in word or deed: Men so qualified, are worthy to be trusted, and only they. But though it is easie to say, who a trusty man is, yet it may be doubted still who is here meant by these trusty men: Yet considering Job's scope, we may well conclude, that he speaks of of men either actually trusted, or worthy to be trusted with the mannagement of publick affairs. Some Magistrates are not only Governours over the people, but Feoffees for them. Thus the Free-holders of England in their respective places, chuse the Members of the House of Commons in Parliament, as their Trustees, and commit the protection of their estates and liberties into their hand: Of such Trusty men, or of men thus Trusted, we may well interpret this text. And as of these Counsellours whom the people chuse, and Trust; so also of those whom Kings and Princes chuse for, and trust with great offices and employments.

But how doth God remove away the speech of such men: What? doth he make them speechless, or strike them dumb? he can do that; but here (I conceive) the removing of speech may be taken two wayes, first, only, for an abating of the ability of speech; so that they who would, cannot give counsel, either with that clearness of judgement, or freedom of language, which they have sometimes shewed. Secondly, For the changing or turning of the tenour of their speech. When a man speaks unlike himself, contrary to what he hath spoken, when he speaks, as if he were not the same man, then his speech is removed. When a man, who once spake for the truth of God, speaks against it: When he that once spake for the rights, and just liberties of men, is now heard speaking against them: When they who in every speech were wont to advance those counsels which tended to the peace and safety of Kingdoms, shall upon all emergencies speak that which doth but lengthen out their trouble and danger, Then know the speech of the trusty is removed. The speech is never removed till the heart be. The mind is first changed, and then the words. As the manner of speaking shews of what countrey we are, Thou art a Galilean, and thy speech bewrayeth thee: so the matter which is spoken discovers of what part we are. We may say to many, you are thus or thus, for your speech bewrayeth you: and to some, You are removed from the cause you once appeared in, for your speech is removed: you have certainly turn'd tables, and changed your interest, for your language is changed, and your discourse runs counter to all you did before.

This is the removing of speech.

But how can we attribute this to God? I answer, God changes or removes the speech of the trusty, not by making them unconstant and unfaithful, but by leaving them to their own unfaithfulness and unconstancy: All men (even the best of men) have a seed of unfaithfulness, or a principle of apostacy in them, and if God leave them to themselves, they are quickly turned aside. No man knows what his heart will do, till he is tryed.

The time of temptation is the time of discovery. Changes in the providence of God, make the changeableness of mens mindes, both visible in their actions, and audible in their speeches. For

This change or remove of speech, ariseth two wayes.

Sometimes from fear. Some are surprised and arrested with dreadful forecasts, what will become of them, and their estates, what of their wives and children, if they stand to former professions and engagements. Fear is a very bad counsellour. Fear hath removed the speech of the trusty more then once.

Secondly, The speech of the trusty is removed through hopes and gifts. Expectation will change a mans opinion, much more will somewhat in possession. How many have lost or alter'd their tongues by being felt in the hand, (Deut. 16. 19.) A gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous. That expression in Moses of perverting words, doth excellently answer and expound this in Job of removing speech. And whereas Job saith only that the speech of the trusty is removed, Moses saith, the words of the righteous are perverted. He that was right and went right before, even his words are perverted by a gift. The ancient adage said of such, The ox is upon their tongue, that is, money or worldly respects hath silenced them: The reason of that speaking was because the figure of an ox was anciently stampt upon their money; we say the black ox treads upon some mens toes; we may say, the white, or the red ox treads so hard upon many mens tongues, that either they will not speak at all, or not as they did. We read that Demosthenes, a great Orator, being to speak upon a business of consequence, came to the bar with a scarff or muffler about his neck, and said he was not able to speak, he was troubled with a Quincey; to which some of the wits of the time answered, That the Orator was sick of the money, not of the Quincey. Bribes had swell'd his throat, that he could not plead. Thus the speech of the trusty is removed, when some unrighteous bias will not suffer them to speak what they should, or carries them to speak what they should not.

Πῶς ὑπὶ γλώττῃ.

Non Anginâ sed Argentangina correptum Oratorẽ dicentes. Plutar.

Yet further, Some understand the trusty, of (men trusted with the souls of men) the Priests and Prophets of those times. The word may be well translated, truth-speakers, or messengers of truth, God removeth their speech.

First, When they whom he had sent with promises of mercy in their mouths, are now commanded to thunder out threatnings and denunciations of his wrath; when they to whom God hath said, Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, have now no messages, but sad ones, no visions, but of amazement and desolation.

Commutat promissiones suas factas per prophetas, in comminationes, vel efficit ut qui læta polliceri solent nihil jã nisi tristia prædicent. Philip.

Secondly, the Lord removeth away the speech of these trusty ones, by leaving a people to the speech of those who are untrusty. When the Jews would not receive the faithful Prophets, God gave them up to the teachings of false Prophets. Speech is removed, when the speakers are thus changed.

Thirdly, God changeth or removeth the speech of Truth-speakers, by forbidding them to speak. God doth sometimes silence the sincerest Prophets. When men will not obey what they speak, God will not let them speak, (Ezek. 3. 26.) I will make thy tongue cleave to the roof of thy mouth, that thou shalt be dumb, and shalt not be to them a reprover, for they are a rebellious house. As men when their sin is at the highest, say to the Prophets, Prophesie no more; so when judgement is at the highest, God saith unto the Prophets, Prophesie not. The wrath of God is extreamly hot, when flattering Prophets are sent to cry, Peace, peace, where there is no peace, and to daube up sinful men with untempered morter: 'Tis also as hot, if not hotter, when God puts a bar upon the lips of his faithful Prophets, that they shall no longer denounce his war against sin, or convince the sinner. The peace of a people cannot be long liv'd, when once the speech of the trusty is thus or thus removed.

Take two brief deductions from all.

First, There is no depending upon the faithfulness of man. God removeth away the speech of the trusty. Surely men of low degree are vanity, and men of high degree are a lye, (Psal. 62. 9.) they that have done and spoken right to day, may speak and do wrong to morrow. Man is a mutable creature in his qualification, as well as in his constitution. Both his natural, and his moral endowments, are as mortal as his life is: And in many, these die and go to the grave before their Masters.

Secondly, If the speech of the trusty be so often removed, Then, we must judge of what is spoken by a standing rule, not by the person speaking. It is an evil, and a soar disease under the sun, that good counsels are refused, because some have a prejudice against the person: And it is a worse evil, when all, even evil Counsels are received upon the good esteem we have of the person. We must look to the matter, not to the man, both in the things of God, and in the things of men; there is neither wisdom nor safety in taking any thing upon trust, especially when we hear that God in judgement removes away the speech of the trusty. Whosoever speaks, if he speak truth, it ought to be embraced. And though an Achitophel, an Oracle of wisdom on earth, or Angel from heaven, speak what is false, 'tis our duty to reject it. The wisest men are not alwayes wise, neither do the prudent alwayes understand their way. The holiest men are not holy in all things, neither do they who are real friends to truth speak all truth. Paul (Gal. 2.) found Peter faultering in his speech, and giving not only counsel but example that was not right. The ancient Fathers, men of profound judgement and understanding in the Scriptures, have erred, and misdelivered the mind of God. Whole Councils (which are a collection of wise and learned men) have had their mistakes. We may conclude as the Prophet doth (Isa. 2. 22.) Cease ye from man, whose breath is in his nostrils, for wherein is he to be accounted of? The honest and the wise, the holy and the just, the eloquent and the trusty, are not always to be trusted. For, God removeth away the speech of the trusty, who (possibly) may be all these.

Sapientes senes vocantur licet sint juvenes, propterea quod sapientia utplurimũ in senibus invenitur. Rab. Dav.

And taketh away the understanding of the aged.

Understanding is so proper to the aged, or men of years, that an understanding young man, deservedly draws upon himself the honour and account of many years; as an old man very foolish, is young-old; so a young man very wise, is old-young.

Age ordinarily heightens understanding, and experience maturates and improves natural parts, as was shewed at the twelfth verse: yet they whose understandings have had the greatest advantages of experience, may act without understanding, yea against, not only experience, but reason. Some mens understandings are enfeebled with age, and themselves are old children rather then old men: that's the judgement which this text holds out unto us.

The word which we render understanding, signifies to taste, or the sense of tasting, and it is frequently translated from the sense to the understanding, because (as was shewed at the 11th verse) the understanding tasts a doctrine, or a proposition, whether it be true or false, as the mouth or palat tasts meat, whether it be sweet or bitter. This word is very comprehensive, signifying (as some critical Rabbins teach us) counsel, judgement, wisdom, reason, both the argument and decree upon which any thing is done, as also the discretion with which it is done. Grammarians tell us that the due and proper accent of every word, is in the Hebrew called [Tagnam] because the accent doth give as it were a right taste of the sense, and so leads to a right understanding of the word. When the holy singer invites all to that glorious banquet, (Psal. 24. 8.) O taste and see that the Lord is good, he means, understand how good he is. The same inspired heart prayes in this language, (Psal. 110. 56.) Teach me good judgement and knowledge, that is, give me a true taste and relish of heavenly truth, Prov. 11. 22. As a jewel in a swines snout, so is a fair woman without discretion or understanding. Beauty without brains is a loathsome deformity. In the book of Ezra, the Chief or President of a Council, who ordereth and moderates the whole proceeding there, is thus expressed, The Master of Taste. He had need to have a quick internal palate, who must taste all men, and all matters, as the President of a Council must.

This taste, this understanding, or whatsoever moral excellency comes within the compass of this word, God taketh away sometimes from the aged, or from men (who for that service) are of the most perfect age.

Hence Observe, First, Our understandings are at the dispose of God.

He gives understanding to the simple, and he can take it from the subtile. Old men are not always wise: Not only because some never had wisdom, but because many loose the wisdom which once they had. And this is a loss which we sustain from no hand but the hand of God. Man may take our riches and worldly estates from us, and make us poor, but God only can take our understandings from us, and make us fools. Men can empty our purses, but God, and God only can empty our brains.

Quos perdere vult Jupiter hos dementat.

Observe Secondly, That when the Lord will destroy a people, he takes away the understanding of the ancient.

Heathens said, God bereaves them of understanding, whom he designs for destruction. Now as this is a sad presage of ruine to the party himself, so likewise of ruine to those who have relation to him. And as it is a judgement upon a people when Princes refuse the aged, and follow young Counsellours: So it is the same, if not a greater judgement upon a people, when God takes wisdom from old Counsellours, and leaves them to act like young ones. A young man without understanding cannot do so much hurt as he that is aged: His youth leaves his advices under question and discussion. But when old and experienced Counsellours, who have travelled in affairs many years, and have got the reputation of wise men, prove like empty casks without any filling of wisdom, they quickly undo all with authority, and unsuspected. No marvel then if God put this among his marvellous judgements, (Isa. 29. 14.) Therefore, behold, I will proceed to do a marvellous work amongst this people, even a marvellous work and a wonder. See how attention is raised, here is, Behold, and then, Behold I will do a marvellous work, and then, a marvellous work and a wonder: And what it is? The wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid. No man wonders to see some men without wisdom, they were never guilty of it: But to see wise men unwise, and prudent men (such I mean as have given long proof of their prudence) without understanding, here's a wonder. As we say, young men may die, but old men must; so young men may be wise, but old men should: and those old men, who have once been thought wise, are seldom thought otherwise of, though God have indeed taken away their wisdom. Now there are no fools do so much mischief, as they who are thought to be wise. A fool that is wise in his own conceit only, endangers no body but himself, for no body will trust him. But a fool that is wise in the conceit of others, may endanger thousands, for all are ready, not only to trust, but adore his foolship. It would not be so great a judgement to have understanding taken from the aged, if the reputation of it were not still left upon them. It is a soar scourge to a land, when God, as the Prophet threatens (Isa. 3. 2.) takes away that staff, the prudent and the ancient, that is, young men who are wise, as well as ancient wise men. But it is a soarer scourge, when he takes away the prudence of the ancient: So that those ancient men, who used to be prudent, become light and precipitate in their counsels. When stayed and sober-paced men, run headlong, all, both things and persons, are like to run headlong with them. By such mens fooolish counsels, the wise and just God brings the honourable into contempt, and the strong to weakness; and when all this is done, there is nothing wanting for the ruine of a people, but their actual ruining. The next verse shews us God doing both these.

Vers. 21. He poureth contempt upon Princes, and weakneth the strength of the mighty.

This verse (I say) is a continuation of the former argument: giving us yet more prognosticks of the approaching ruine of Kingdoms and Common-wealths. He had said (vers. 19th) He leadeth Princes away spoiled, now, He poureth contempt upon Princes. As understanding is most proper for the aged, so is honour for Princes, and strength for the mighty. God, to make his judgements exact, punisheth them in that which is most peculiar to them. He poureth contempt upon Princes, &c.

Solet effusio magnã profusi liquoris copiã denotare. Pined.

He poureth contempt.] That is, he makes them very contemptible. To pour out any liquid, implieth plenty of it; as the pouring out of the spirit, a plentiful giving of the spirit. When the spirit was poured out (Act. 2.) The bystanders said, these men are full of new wine: No saith the Apostle, these men are not drunken (as ye suppose) but this is that which was spoken by the Prophet Joel, And it shall come to pass in the last dayes (saith God) that I will pour out of my spirit upon all flesh, that is, they shall have abundance of my Spirit. So, Isa. 44. 3. I will pour out water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground; that is, they shall have much spiritual refreshing, who now are quite destitute of it: such are there shadowed out by the thirsty and dry ground. Again, (Zech. 12. 10.) I will pour upon the house of David, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the spirit of grace and of supplication. And as pouring, applied to the spirit, implies a great measure of the spirit, so in any other. Psal. 42. 4. When I remember these things, I pour out my soul in me: The pouring out of the soul is the pouring out of sorrows; and to pour out sorrow, is to be exceeding sorrowful: So the pouring out of fury, notes an excessive fury, Ezek. 20. 33. And when David as a Type of Christ complaineth (Psal. 22. 14.) I am poured out like water, his meaning is, all my bodily strength and comforts are departed. Whatsoever is poured out, poured in, or poured upon us, be it good or evil, we have enough of it. Much contempt is their portion upon whom contempt is poured. Here it is poured upon them, upon whom a little is very much, נדב Liberales, munificos denotat, quod liberalitas & beneficentia principes maximè deceat. Nadib est homo liberi spiritus, non invitè & coactè sed sua se voluntate impellens ad honesta & laudabilia. Merc.

Upon

Upon Princes. Princes are vessels of civil honour; yea many Princes are fountains of civil honor, they pour honour upon others; how great a turn is it, when contempt is poured on them, and they filled with dishonour! Some are so contemptible, that they are not sensible of contempt: but nothing touches Princes so soon as contempt doth. 'Tis worse to them to be despised, then to be destroyed; and they can easier part with their lives then with their honour. Here then is the very pinch of Princes, contempt, especially if they be Princes of Noble and Princely spirits: Such are pointed at in this word, which properly signifies munificent, liberal and free-hearted; Princes are, or should be so. Liberality or munificence is the vertue and honour of Princes. Such a free Princely spirit God expects from the meaneſt of his people toward his service (Exod. 35.5.) Take ye from amongst you an offering unto the Lord, whosoever is of a willing heart, let him bring it. A true worshipper is not thrust and driven on by an outward written law, but findes a law written in his own heart: He (as it is said of Araunah) like a King gives to the King. David prayeth, Uphold me with thy free spirit, (Psal. 51. 14.) 'Tis this word: the spirit of the Lord is a Noble, free, Princely spirit. It is free two wayes. First, Subjectively, or in it self, giving out freely and liberally to us. Secondly, It is free in the effects, Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty, it makes us free. They who have received this spirit, serve the Lord freely, and judge his service freedom. Hence (Psal. 110. 3.) all the people of God are expressed by this word, a Princely people; Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, they shall be willing as Princes, liberal as Kings, they shall give up soul, body, name, estate, all to Jesus Christ. They who have felt the day of divine power, are not acted by humane power, by the coercions and ordinances of men; they are under no constraint, but that of the love of Christ. Worldly Princes have that in their name, which the Saints have in their nature. And because many worldly Princes have so little of that in their natures, which they have fully in their name, true Nobleness, I mean, and freeness of spirit to do good and defend those who are good, therefore God poureth contempt upon them.

Hence Observe, First, If Princes use not their honour for Christ, Christ will pour dishonour upon Princes.

1 Sam. 2. 30. Them that honour me I will honour, and they that despise me shall be lightly esteemed. When Princes act unlike themselves, God makes them unlike themselves, vile and contemptible. The Apostle speaks of himself and of his fellow Apostles in (1 Cor. 4. 9.) I think that God hath set forth us the Apostles last, as it were appointed unto death; for we are made a spectacle unto the world, and to Angels, and to men. As the Lord suffers his Saints to have contempt poured upon them by the world, and to be made a spectacle of scorn; so he himself poureth contempt upon the greatest of worldly Princes, he setteth them as upon a theater or open stage, that all may behold and look upon them, and say, Thus hath God done with the men who had no delight to honour him. Since thou wast precious in my sight (saith God of his meanest people, Isa. 43. 4.) thou hast been honourable, that is, altogether honourable in thy self, and honoured by all men who know thy worth: and when once highest Princes are vile in the sight of God, they become dishonourable, even altogether dishonourable in themselves, as also in the eye and esteem of all men who know their unworthiness. And when Princes are thus become dishonourable, they are within a step of becoming miserable. The Psalmist had no sooner said, He poureth contempt upon Princes, but presently it follows, and causeth them to wander in the wilderness where there is no way, (Psal. 107. 40.) When Princes are under contempt, they are uncertain of their course, they are entangled in their counsels, they are in a maze, and know neither their way, nor their end, but are at their wits end, and at their honours end, both together. We have a Prophecy of a glorious Kingdom, (Isa. 32. 1.) Behold a King shall reign in righteousness, and Princes shall rule in judgement, &c. Then (vers. 5.) The vile person shall no more be called liberal, or Prince. Nabal shall not glory in this title Nadib. Nabal is a fool, and Nadib is a Prince. In that Kingdom, fools or vile persons shall no more be honoured nor adored like golden Idols. Men shall be known what they are, and called what they deserve. Then, Princes who misapply their power, and refuse to be nursing fathers to the Church, then, Princes who bring not their glory to the new Jerusalem, and submit not their crowns unto the Lamb, even all they who are a terrour to the good, and praise them who do evil, shall no more be named gracious Lords, but shall go forth with everlasting shame (instead of a crown) upon their heads. Swelling titles will be no Sanctuary against those vials of contempt, ready to be poured out upon all contemners of Christ, and opposers of his throne, for ever.

Secondly Observe, They that have received much honour from God, shall receive much shame from him, if they abuse their honour.

Proportional to the honour they have received will the contempt be which they shall receive. God doth not drop, but pour honour upon Princes; therefore he will not drop, but pour contempt upon them by whole buckets full, it shall come down as a sweeping rain. As they who have had, not only as Moses speaks of his, doctrine dropping as the rain, and speech distilling as the dew, but Gospel knowledge pouring down upon them; these shall not have some drops of anger, but God will pour out his anger and his fury upon them, if they are unfruitful, or bring not forth fruit meet for his (their Masters) use. They that have but a drop or two of the word, shall have comparatively but a drop of judgement. That's the reason why it shall be easier for Sodom and Gomorrah, for Tyre and Sidon, then for Bethsaida and Chorazin, at the day of judgement, Matth. 11. 22. Justice looks to the measure, as well as to the matter of sin, in pronouncing punishments. He poureth contempt upon Princes,

And weakneth the strength of the mighty.

The Hebrew is, He weakneth the girdle of the mighty. The Vulgar and the Septuagint are very bold with this text, in their translations, giving a sense hardly reconcileable to the Original. He relieveth those that are oppressed, saith the one: He healeth those that are humble, saith the other: Both wide enough from our reading, He weakneth the strength of the mighty. The word signifies rivers and torrents, which run with a mighty force. He looseneth the strength or girdle of the mighty: the same word notes a girdle and strength, because a girdle causeth strength, or is an advantage to put out our strength; for though now men usually ungird themselves when they go about strong labor, yet in those times it was not so; Job speaks according to the custom of those Eastern Countries, who (wearing long garments) when they prepared for travel or labour, girded up themselves, that so they might be more nimble and expeditious. Job had said, vers. 19. He overthrow the mighty; here he saith, He weakneth the strength of the mighty. There is a difference between these two: There, he bringeth a greater power, and so overthroweth them. As 'tis said in the Gospel, though a strong man armed keep the house, yet when a stronger comes, he spoils him. But here 'tis said, He weakneth the strength of the mighty, that is, he abateth or draweth out their strength. As the waters of a great river, being drawn out by sluces, the strength of the river is weakned: So the Lord drains and draws out the strength of mighty men, and weakens them. It is storyed, that when Cyrus besieged Babylon, which was encompassed with a mighty river, the river Euphrates, he made many sluces and cuts, which fetched out all the water from the river, and so surprised them in the height of security, they thinking the place impregnable, and having also a propheſie, That the city should never be taken till the river proved their enemy. Thus the Lord, he sluceth out the strength of the strongest men, their personal strength, the strength of their arms and legs; their relational strength, the strength of their friends, allies, and confederates; so some understand this place: There is a girdle of strength wherewith one Nation is tyed to another, such are leagues of amity and mutual aid: The Lord weakneth this strength also, and makes them who were a help, a hurt unto their neighbours. He saith, Gird your selves, and ye shall shall be broken in pieces; gird your selves, and ye shall be broken in pieces; take counsel together, and it shall come to nought, Isa. 8. 9, 10. The strength of all creatures associated, is too weak for the single strength of God.

Hence Observe, All the strength of man is at the pleasure and dispose of God.

He overthrows strength, not only by overpowering it, but by unpowering it. He can alwayes bring more strength then we have, or lessen the strength which we have. As we cannot master Gods strength, so we are not masters of our own. Sampson's strength was a terror to the Philistims; but as soon as God was gone from him, his strength was gone, and then they despised him, who before trembled at him; and called him out to make them sport, whose presence had so often spoiled their sport. How many mighty men hath God weakned? How many invincible Armies and Armadoes of men (as proud men have stiled them) hath God conquered? How many potent Kingdoms and Commonwealths hath God reduced to confused heaps? Once hath God spoken, yea twice have I heard this, that power belongeth unto God; also unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy (Psal. 62. 11, 12.) 'Tis safest for us to fly to this mercy, seeing we can neither fly from, nor stand before this power. Thou hast a mighty arm, O God, strong is thy hand, and high is thy right hand, (Psal. 80. 13.) The weakness of God is stronger then man: And before God all mans strength is turned into weakness. All the Instances which Job hath already given, prove this great truth, That with God is wisdom and strength; and least any should think it is not yet proved enough, he is ready in the two next verses to give us yet a further, and (if a clearer may be) a clearer proof.

VERS. 22, 23.

He discovereth deep things out of darkness, and bringeth out to light the shadow of death.
He increaseth the Nations, and destroyeth them: he enlargeth the Nations, and straiteneth them again.

WE have seen, in the former context, how large a testimony Job hath given of the power and wisdom of God; producing many proofs which speak both no less then infinite. And because those were particular and personal, therefore he giveth us (in these two verses) two more which are general, and National. He discovereth deep things out of darkness. He increaseth the Nations, &c. Here's providence unlocking secrets, opening those things which were sealed up: these acts are attended with sutable effects, The increasing and destroying, the enlarging and straitening of the Nations.

Verse 22. He discovereth deep things out of darkness.

גלה עמקות
De revelatione occultorum propriè usurpatur. Profundatenebris obducta & aperta sunt. Pined.

The word properly signifies to unfold that which is wrapped up, or to manifest that which is hidden. Deep places are hidden places. God discovereth those things which are most hidden, even deep things out of darkness: Deep things, and darkness, are put together, because that which is deep is dark. The further we remove from the fountain of light, the more darkness prevails over us; and therefore every degree of deepness adds a degree of darkness; all depth being downward, and so a departure from the Sun. In the beginning darkness was upon the face of the deep (Gen. 1. 1.) but darkness is alwayes in the bottom of the deep, He discovereth deep things out of darkness, that is, the remotest, lowest, and most retired depths. These deep things may be referred to two heads.

There are deep things of God: And deep things of men.

The deep things of God are, First his thoughts (Psal. 92. 5.) O Lord, how great are thy works? and thy thoughts are very deep: so deep, that all the line of mans understanding is not able to sound or fadom them. The thoughts of God are his Decrees and Counsels; he doth not think to resolve, but his thoughts are his resolutions. The thoughts of God are so deep, that the Apostle (with a mixture of amazement and adoration) cries out, O the depth (Rom. 11. 33.) Secondly, The deep things of God are his Word, containing either Doctrines to be believed, or Prophecies to be fulfilled. The Word of God hath its shallows, and it hath its depths: there a Lamb may wade, and there an Elephant may swim.

Secondly, There are deep things of men; which are of divers sorts.

First, His Word is deep. Though the words of men float upon their tongues, yet Solomon assures us, that The words of a mans (that is, as the word imports, of an excellent mans) mouth are as deep waters (Prov. 18. 4.) A wise prudent man speaks Oracles; and when you hear the sound, and understand the Grammatical sence, you do not presently reach the depth of what is spoken. As some speak shallowly, so they hear shallowly; they dive not into those deep waters which flow from a wise mans mouth. He speaks wisdom in a mystery, or mysteries of wisdom.

Secondly, There is a depth in a man, deeper then his words, and that is, the depth of his thoughts (Psal. 64. 6.) Both the inward thought of every one of them, and the heart is deep. The heart is often put for the inward thought; but here, the inward thought is an act of the heart; and the heart is the faculty, or power of thinking: Counsel in the heart of a man is like deep water (Prov. 20. 5.) The heart of man is a great deep, so deep, that none can find it out but God himself, Jer. 17. 10. I the Lord search the heart, &c. What man (saith the Apostle, 1 Cor. 2. 11.) knoweth the things of a man (that is, those things which lye in the heart of man) but the spirit of a man which is in him? Some men flatter themselves, that God himself cannot find out the things of their spirit: Hence that woe in the Prophet (Isa. 29. 15.) Woe unto them that seek deep to hide their counsel from the Lord. Doubtless they had some hopes to hide their counsels from God, else they would never have sought to hide them. They shewed themselves foolish enough in seeking to hide them; but they had proclaimed themselves more fools in seeking to hide them, if they had been convinced they could not. But though no depth of mans heart can hide his counsel from God; yet many men have depth enough in their hearts, and to spare, to hide their counsels from men.

Thirdly, There is in man a depth of doctrine, or opinion; which is also called the depth of Satan (Rev. 2. 24.) As many as have not known the depths of Satan: Those depths of Satan were the dark opinions, and false doctrines of seducers: These called their opinions depths, or profundities: And the holy Ghost addeth an Epithete, depths of Satan. As if he had said, you call your opinions depths, and so they are, but they are such depths as Satan hath brought out of Hell; they are the whisperings and hissings of that Serpent, not the inspirations of God. The doctrine of Antichrist (that great Merchant of error) is called a mystery of iniquity (2 Thes. 2. 7.) A mystery is a truth shut up, or lying in the deep: The deep and dark mysteries of the wicked, will God reveal, vers. 8. For he discovereth deep things out of darkness.

Darkness may be taken two wayes. There is a natural darkness, which is only the privation of natural light: And there is a metaphorical darkness, which is the privation of moral light. This darkness is in many through their ignorance; and darkness is made by others through their knowledge. The infinite knowledge of God makes a darkness to hide his ways and counsels in, and so doth the knowledge of men. They keep their projects and purposes under the vails and visors of specious pretences, and studied secrecies. Out of all this darkness God discovers deep things.

The latter clause of the verse is but an heightning of this, He bringeth out to light the shadow of death.

Shadow of death, is taken two wayes.

First, For extream danger.

Secondly, For extream darkness.

For extream danger, Psal. 23. 4. Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, that is, in deadly danger, yet I will fear no evil.

But here, shadow of death, is put for extream darkness. The grave is a place of darkness; and things that are buried lye in the dark. (Job 34. 22.) There is no darkness, nor shadow of death, where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves; that is, the workers of iniquity cannot be hid in the thickest darkness. The shadow of death is the highest, the most superlative degree of thickest darkness: As if Job had said,

God

God doth not only bring deep things out of darkness, but the deep things out of the greatest darkness; out of that darkness that is as deep and dark as the grave.

When counsels lye so deep, that the persons who have laid them, have not so much as any jealousie they shall be discovered; when counsels lye so deep, that others have no hope that ever they should be discovered; yet then the Lord discovereth them, and this is to bring out to light the shadow of death.

Hence observe, First in general, All things are known unto God.

He that makes all things known, must needs know all things: And he that makes those things known, which are most unknown, cannot but know those things which are easily known. He that can expound a riddle, can tell the meaning of a plain saying; and he that discovers deep things out of darkness, cannot but see those things that lye in the open Sun. Unless God were infinite in knowledge, he could not make these things known. (Eccles. 7. 24.) That which is far off, and exceeding deep, who can find it out? The Wise man sends a challenge to the wise men of the world, to find out the wisdom of God: That's the thing which is far off, not only from our senses, but from our understanding. That's it which is exceeding deep. Deep, deep, as the Original expresseth it; deep to men, deep to Angels, and too deep for both. Who can find this out? No man can find any thing of it by his own light: and there are none who receive light to find it all out. God is light, and he dwells in light: and as he hath no darkness at all in him, so nothing is dark to him. He perfectly knows his own creating wisdom: Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in his sight, but all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do. Many things are covered as to the eye of the world; they have masks and clouds cast over them, which eyes of flesh cannot see through; but these are all naked before the eye of God: yea they are as manifest and open to his eye, as a body is, when dissected by the hand of a skilful Anatomist; he sees our bowels, and knows whether we are sound at heart or no. It is not the fairness of the skin, the cleanness of the outside, will deceive him; if there be any spots upon the spirit, he discerns them; God needeth none to tell him what is in the heart of man, he makes his way into the depths of that darkness with his own eye.

Secondly, Observe, As God knows deep things, so he makes them known.

What is always open to himself, he sometimes revealeth unto man. God discovers both the deep things which himself or man doth or speaketh.

First, He revealeth the deep things which himself speaketh. Unless God expound his own word, all our glosses will but corrupt it: For, No Prophesie of Scripture is of any private interpretation (2 Pet. 2. 20.) By private interpretation, the Apostle means not the interpretation of one or of a few private men, for possibly, one or a few and he or they not invested with any publick commission, may give a true sence of Scripture, when many, and they called to a publick office, mistake and go wrong. But by private interpretation, he brands that comment which flows from a mans own brain, or fancy, without the consent of other Scriptures, or the teachings of the Spirit. No Scripture, whether Doctrinal, or Prophetical, is of any such private, that is, humane interpretation. Man with all his wit, learning, and parts, cannot interpret the Word of God, only the Spirit of God can, or they can, who are assisted by the Spirit.

So much the Text in Peter now cited, holds out clearly in the letter; and yet some of the Learned give another expression of it. For the words shew us rather the authority and original of the Scriptures, then the way of their interpretation. The Apostles scope being to prove, that the Prophets did not declare their own private opinions, but the mind of God, in what they spake. And that therefore the word of prophecy, as the Apostle adviseth in the former verse, is to be heeded carefully. The words following lead us also to the same sence (ver. 21.) For the prophecy came not in the old time by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the holy Ghost. The Prophets were the Interpreters of the mind of God to the people; not the messengers of their own minds. The false Prophets vended their own dreams, and ran of their own heads before they were sent; therefore their prophesies were of a private interpretation; that is, they opened only that to the people, which themselves were authors of; so did not the true Prophets. They said, Thus saith the Lord; or as Paul, We have received of the Lord, that which we deliver unto you. From all it appears, that the Apostle is speaking of the pedigree, not of the exposition of Prophetical Scriptures. Yet the truth is as evident for the one as for the other. As the Scripture it self is not the interpretation of mans mind; so neither is any true interpretation of Scripture from the meer mind of man. The Spirit of God (in man) searcheth all things, even the deep things of God, 1 Cor. 2. 10. And without the Spirit, man cannot find any thing of God; no not that which lyeth uppermost, or most in sight.

Again, He revealeth the deep things which himself doth. Surely the Lord will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants the Prophets (Amos 3. 7.) The secret intended by the Prophet, was the decree and purpose of God to bring evil upon that Land, to take away the voice of mirth and gladness, and to make them an astonishment, an hissing, and a perpetual desolation. The secret of such decrees God reveals to his Prophets, that they may warn the people, either to prevent or prepare for the evil which is to come. When God was about to destroy Sodom, he saith, Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do? Gen. 18. 17. God revealed the rising and fall of the Kingdoms of this world, the rising and fall of the Kingdom of Antichrist, the making of the Kingdoms of this world, the Kingdoms of the Lord, and of his Christ; all these the Lord revealed by the Spirit unto the Apostle John, by him collected into that book called The Revelation. In the eighth of Daniel (vers. 13.) Christ is stiled Palmoni, which we translate, a certain Saint, but in the Margents of our Bibles we put, The Numberer of secrets, or, a wonderful Numberer. Christ is the Numberer of secrets, he tells them over, and hath them all (as we say) at his fingers ends: he can give an account of them at an instant, both how many they are, and what they mean. When Nebuchadnezzar desired to hear the interpretation of his dream, Daniel ascribes all to God, He revealeth the deep and secret things, he knoweth what is the darkness, and the light dwelleth with him; Dan. 2. 22.

Besides these deep and dark things which concern future events, the Lord revealeth also the deep things of doctrine, the supernatural mysteries of Religion; the Incarnation of his Son, the Resurrection of the body, the mystery of justifying Faith, and of the new Birth, which are absurdities to Nature; these are all revealed in the Word of God to our ears, and by the Spirit of God to our hearts.

Secondly, As the Lord revealeth the deep things which himself doth, or speaketh, so also the deep things of mans doing, or speaking, whether they be good or evil. Though the sinner go as deep as hell, yet himself, and his sin, are under the eye of God. Thou (saith the Psalmist) hast set our iniquities before thee, and our secret sins in the light of thy countenance. When God intends to punish iniquity, he is said to set it before him, but whether he do or no, it is before him. And as our secret iniquity is always before him, so he sometimes sets it before men. (Eccles. 10. 20.) Curse not the King, no not in thy thought; and curse not the rich in thy bed-chamber; for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter. Solomon warns those who wickedly conspire against Kings, and persons in authority, to consider, as their sin, so their danger; for though they carry the matter never so closely, God can make it known: 'Tis hard for a man to conceal his own thoughts (when the mind is full it may quickly run over at the mouth) but 'tis easie with God to find out a way for the revealing of our thoughts. A bird of the air shall carry the voice: But what's the voice of a thought? Or, how comes a bird into the bed-chamber? The bed-chamber is the securest place; and a thought is the most secret act? What can be more secret then a thought? Who can hear the sound of our thoughts, or understand their language? We say, Thought is free. Thoughts fall not under the cognizance, or censure of any Court. That which fears no evidence, fears no ſentence: Yet God, to whom our thoughts are evident, can ſend in evidence againſt our thoughts. A bird of the air ſhall carry the voice of that which hath no voice. It is a proverbial ſpeech, to note, that by the moſt unlikely means, if other means fail, God will reveal thoſe curſes, and reveal them ſpeedily. As if he had ſaid, Rather then ſuch ſecret wickedneſs ſhall be undiſcovered, God will make birds ſpeak, and chamber-doors ſpeak, the ſtone out of the wall, and the beam out of the timber ſhall ſpeak, rather then ſilence ſhall cover ſuch a wickedneſs. More diſtinctly, when he ſaith, A bird of the air ſhall carry the voice, he implyes two things: Firſt, That it ſhall be revealed by ſome unexpected means, or by means as little ſuſpected for the doing of ſuch a thing, as a bird is. As, when Balaam went on ſinfully, the dumb Aſs, ſpeaking with mans voice, forbad the madneſs of the Prophet: Balaam little dreamt of ſuch a reprover; and theſe ſhall as little dream of ſuch a tale-bearer. Secondly, This phraſe of ſpeech implyes, that the matter ſhall be revealed by ſome ſpeedy means. A bird ſhall do it: The Meſſenger ſhall not go, but run; he ſhall not run, but fly; a Pegaſus ſhall be the Poſt, he ſhall have wings added to his feet; he ſhall have wings inſtead of feet. The Angels are deſcribed with wings in Scripture, to ſhew their ſpeed; a winged Meſſenger ſhall be diſpatcht on this errand. Once more, as ſome refer this diſcovery purely to the providence of God, ſo others to the policy of Princes, who have their ſpies flying like birds in all places; men no more feared to carry the report of what is ſpoken, then a bird is. They have their intelligencers in every bed-chamber, men no more feared to carry the report of what is ſpoken, then the chamber-doors are. In the ſame ſence that Kings are ſaid to have long hands, we may ſay alſo that they have long ears: They have long hands, becauſe they can uſe means to ſtrike thoſe that are far from them: and they have long ears, becauſe they can uſe means to hear thoſe who are far from them. But whether we take this, or the former interpretation, the point is equally performed; for even thoſe diſcoveries which are made by men, are ordered and brought on by the wiſe and holy providence of God, who doth ſo hate evil, and all the works of moral darkneſs, eſpecially the curſing of Kings and lawful Magiſtrates, that he will diſcover them out of all the deeps, either of natural or artificial darkneſs.

Principes & potentiores ſunt auritiſſimi, vix quicquam fit aut dicitur quod ipſorũ cognitionem fugiat. Jun.

Further, God bringeth good things as well as evil, juſt and holy actions, as well as ſinful and unjuſt, out of the deeps of darkneſs: Many works of light lye in darkneſs: Many excellent things are under concealment. David's integrity lay in the dark, yet God brought it forth as the light, and his innocency as the noon-day. God is not unrighteous, to forget or conceal, either our labour of love, or labours in holineſs, though men do.

Laſtly, How great an experiment hath God given us of this truth, in that grand diſcovery which he hath made to to the world (in this latter Age) of another world? A great part of the world, even ſo great as bears the name of a new world, was a deep thing of darkneſs, to this part of the world, for many and many ages and generations. No man ſo much as dream'd of ſuch Nations as are now diſcovered. The ſurface of thoſe huge Countreys was as little known to us as the center of the earth is: yea it was judged a kind of hereſie in ancient times, to ſay there were Antipodes. But now 'tis known, that the feet of our Brethren have walked oppoſite to the ſoles of our feet; and we have not only experience, but light of reaſon enough to evince it. God hath made Art a key to Nature, and hath diſcovered many deep things out of that darkneſs to us, which our fore-fathers never ſaw. Thus we ſee, that deep things, both Divine and humane, and theſe both practical and natural, are fetcht out of darkneſs by the mighty power, and unſearchable wiſdom of God.

There are three wayes by which God makes diſcoveries of evil plots, or practices, lying in deepeſt darkneſs.

Firſt, By the confeſſion of the perſon, whoſe head hath contrived, or his hand acted them. Evil in the heart drops out at the mouth; and this two wayes.

Firſt, By queries and queſtions put to the guilty. Such are often entrapt in their own anſwers, and their own tongues are a witneſs againſt themſelves. As ſpeech bewrayeth whence men are, ſo what they have been doing: (Prov. 20. 5.) Counſel in the heart of man is like deep water; but a man of underſtanding will draw it out. He draws it out by queſtions and examinations. When thoſe black waters will not flow out of themſelves, they are pumped up by the art and induſtry of others.

Secondly, A confeſſion of theſe deep things out of darkneſs is made by the workings of a mans own Conſcience. When Conſcience is touched, and beginneth to ake, that will tell tales: It is hard for a man, at ſuch a time, to keep his own counſel. It was the caution of an Ancient, Be afraid of doing any thing which is ill, though there be no witneſs but thy ſelf: If thou couldſt do it, thy Conſcience taking no notice of it, thou mighteſt poſſibly keep it ſecret; but whatſoever thou doeſt, is done in the eye of Conſcience, therefore take heed. We have a ſaying, That murther will out; and if nothing elſe bring it out, Conſcience will: Conſcience will examine a man as ſtrictly as any Inquiſitor in Rome. And as men, examined and tortured by ſevere Inquiſitors, confeſs what they would not; ſo alſo do they who are examined and put upon the Rack by their own Conſciences.

Turpe quid auſurus, te ſine teſte time.

Secondly, God revealeth deep things immediately by his own Spirit: As the Spirit revealeth the holy counſels of God to us, ſo the moſt ſecret evil deſigns and counſels of men. (2 Kings 6. 11.) When the King of Syria could take no counſel, but it was preſently diſcovered, he might well be caſt into a ſuſpition, that ſome about him were falſe to him, and held correſpondence with the enemy, Therefore (ſaith the ſtory) the heart of the King of Syria was ſore troubled for this thing; and he called his ſervants, and ſaid unto them, Will not ye ſhew me which of us is for the King of Iſrael? And one of his ſervants ſaid, None, my Lord, O King, but Eliſha the Prophet that is in Iſrael, telleth the King of Iſrael the words that thou ſpeakeſt in thy bed-chamber. The Spirit of God revealed the deep counſels of the Syrian King unto the Prophet, and the Prophet revealed them to men.

There is a third way which is more common, by which the Lord diſcovers deep things out of darkneſs, and that is, by wonderful providences; he makes ſome acts of his own providence as keys, to unlock the ſecrets of men; as hands, to pluck off the vails; as winds, to diſpel the clouds, and ſcatter the miſts which hid their actions, or intentions. In the hiſtory of Joſeph we have an admirable demonſtration of this: It was a ſecret, a deep thing of darkneſs that his Brethren conſpired againſt him, they ſold him into Egypt, and brought his torn coat home all bloody to his Father, which cauſed the plain-hearted old man to conclude, That ſome evil beaſt had devoured him. Thus the matter was locked up; yet God makes ſeveral acts of his providence as keyes to open it. Firſt, Famine pincheth Jacob and his Family; then Joſeph's Brethren muſt into Egypt; and after one journey, they muſt make a ſecond; and then Benjamin muſt be detained, and Simeon bound; here was a ſtrange ſeries and ſucceſſion of providences, till the whole matter was diſcovered. The Gunpowder-plot was a deep thing of darkneſs, a ſtrange monſter (Cui lumen ademptum) which ſaw no light, not only becauſe it never took effect, but becauſe it was kept ſo cloſe a long time, under oaths, and ſtrongeſt concealments, that there was not the leaſt ſuſpition of it; yet by a ſtrange providence God diſcovers this deep thing out of darkneſs: A Letter written with uncouth expreſſions, and by miſtake put into a wrong hand, was the occaſion of bringing all to light. Latter times have given us great experiences of this: The beſt intelligences have we have had of ſecret counſels have been from their cabinets, who contrived them.

Take four Corollaries from this.

Firſt, Be afraid to do, or to plot any evil ſecretly: The Lord diſcovers deep things out of darkneſs. Uſually they who do things that are not fit to be ſeen, conceive they are not, or ſhall not be ſeen either in doing them, or when they are done. Flatter not your ſelves in this vain hope; you may caſt a vail upon them a while, but out they will at laſt.

Secondly, Be not afraid of the ſecret plottings of evil men, or of the deep things of their darkneſs; how deep ſoever the wayes and counſels of men are laid, yet they are all above-board to God. Suppoſe enemies are taking counſel againſt us, yet we have a powerful friend behind the hangings, who hears every word they ſay, and ſets down in a book every reſolve they make, and will in fitteſt ſeaſon, both diſcover, and diſappoint them. Let this be encouragement couragement to all the faithful; their Father in Heaven knows and over-rules the darkest designs of wicked men on earth.

Thirdly, When men are plotting, let us be praying. David knew Achitophel could give desperate and deep counsel against him, therefore he prayeth, Lord turn the counsel of Achitophel into foolishness: As if he had said, Lord, thou knowest what he hath advised, I do not; he is plotting against me, Lord take notice that I am praying unto thee. Plots were never any match for prayer; nor the counsels of the wicked able to stand before the supplications of the righteous.

Fourthly, No mans uprightness shall be always hid: God will clear the innocent, for he discovereth deep things out of darkness; he that manifests the guilt of all, will also manifest the innocency of his. There is seldom any eminent or singular good thing done in the world, but it falls under misconstruction, and often such glosses are given as corrupt the contexture of sincerest works; for the conclusions of malice are ever like those of Logick, following (deteriorem partem) the weaker and worser part. How often is holiness miscall'd hypocrisie, and zeal vain-glory? How often is contending for the faith, misjudged faction; and contending against error, humour? In the midst of all these dark thoughts of men, concerning our works, this may bear up our hearts, that as God knows them what they are, so he will make them appear as they are. The Lord Christ comforts his Disciples against all the calumnies, and misapprehensions of the world, though they should be called Beelzebubs, and made as black as Hell by traducing pens, or tongues; yet saith he (Matth. 10. 25.) Fear them not, for there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed; and hid, that shall not be known: Which words may have a double aim.

First, To deter the Disciples from concealing the Word of God for fear of men. As if Christ had said, Be ye bold and constant in delivering the message which I shall put into your mouths; declare to the world the whole counsel of God; keep not back, conceal not his truth, betray not his cause by a cowardly silence: for whatsoever plausible excuses you may make, to palliate and hide this lowness and falseness of your spirits, yet at length all will out; and though you would not declare the truth of God to his glory, yet God will declare the whole truth concerning you, to your shame; as the madness of your persecutors shall be manifest, so also shall your fearfulness; therefore fear them not: What I tell you in darkness, that speak ye in the light, &c. for what ye do, or forbear to do in darkness, shall come to light, with the reasons of it.

Secondly, These words aim at the support of the Disciples under the slanders and spiteful opinions of men, when they fully and couragiously declare and preach the Word of God. As if he had said, Your innocency may be hid, and your righteousness unknown; you may be called Beelzebub, and Devil, for speaking the truths of God; yet I will take a time to put off these ugly disguises, and render you even to the eye of the world such as you are, upright and honest men, my zealous and faithful messengers: for I assure you, there is nothing covered, that shall not be revealed: and therefore your faithfulness to my cause and Gospel shall not; do ye reveal my hidden truths, and leave it to me to reveal your integrity, how much soever it may be hidden. Upon the same ground that wicked men are to fear, godly men are not to fear: Wicked men have cause to fear, because their evil deeds shall be made manifest; and godly men are not to fear, yea they are to rejoyce, because their goodness and good deeds shall be made manifest: All their uprightness, and faithful intentions, for the promoting of the honour of Christ, and advancing the Gospel, shall be set in the open light.

Yet further, Though we should do much good, which is in the dark too, or hidden from our selves (for there are, as sins, so, in a sence, good works of ignorance) or if we should have forgotten the good which we have done knowingly, yet the Lord will redeem our works out of this darkness also; the darkness I mean, whether of our own ignorance or forgetfulness. Neither secrecy, nor inscience, nor oblivion, our own, or others, can long cover a good work; let it be only our care to do good; it is the care of Christ, that no good which we have done shall be lost, or left in perpetual darkness. God makes many discoveries of deep things out of darkness here, and he will make an universal discovery at last: As that Apostolical caution against rash judgment clearly imports: (1 Cor. 4. 5.) Judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who will bring to light the hidden things of darkness (whether good or bad) and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts (whether just or unjust) and then shall every man (who is praise worthy) have praise of God. The Apostle in this aims rather at the encouragement of the Saints, whose best actions are often hid, then at the terror of the wicked, who desire and hope that their evil actions shall be always hid. Thus we see how God discovers dark and deep things. In the next verse we shall see him altering and disposing, turning and changing great things, even the Nations of the earth.

Verse 23. He increaseth the Nations, and destroyeth them; he inlargeth the Nations, and straiteneth them again.

Here are two acts of providence, like checquer-work: a white and a black: An act of mercy, and an act of judgment; an act of the right hand, increasing and inlarging; and an act of the left, destroying and straitening Nations. God doth not only abase particular persons, how great soever they are (Loosing the bond of Kings, and pouring contempt upon Princes, &c.) but he hath a controversie with whole Nations and Kingdoms, they shall be abased and smart under his hand, if they go on provoking and sinning against him.

Non solum Dei suæ potentiæ ac sapientiæ documenta præbet, in his quæ unius vel alterius regis sunt, sed in universa aliqua multitudine & numerosissimo populo. Merc.

He increaseth the Nations.] The word which we translate to increase, hath a double derivation. Some take it from a root, which signifies to augment, or multiply. Others take it from a root, which signifies to err, or wander, and in construction, to deceive. Hence some render, He deceiveth the Nations, and destroyeth them: So the Septuagint; and it is a truth, God deceiveth the Nations, he leaveth them to their own mistakes, or to the evil counsels of others, and then destroyeth them. Destruction is usually let in by misapprehension. The judgment of God upon the outward estate begins at a judgment upon the understanding. Seldom hath any Nation perished, but they see they have been befooled, and that they refused their own good before they were deprived of it. As the Text may bear this translation, so the truth flowing from it, is very useful.

But because the ordinary acception of the word runs fairest, He increaseth the Nations, &c. I shall insist only upon that.

When God made the world, he said to man, yea to every thing that had life in it, and so power of increasing, Increase and multiply: A word from God makes the creature multiply. The increase of every thing is from God, as well as the constitution of it. There is a threefold increase. First, In number; God said to Abraham, I will multiply thy seed as the sand of the Sea, and as the Stars of Heaven; and it was so. Secondly, He increaseth Nations in riches and plenty; he blesseth their basket and their store; they lend to others, and do not borrow. Thirdly, He increaseth Nations in honour and reputation; they are the head, and not the tail; the sheaves of their neighbours round about, fall down to their sheave. Such honour is promised the Jews, That ten men shall take hold out of all languages of the Nations, even shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew, saying, we will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you, (Zach. 8. 23.) Thus the Nations are increased by a word of blessing from the mouth of God.

And as he increaseth, so he destroyeth. The decayes of Nations are from God, as well as their improvements are. God declareth his power by pulling down, as well as by raising up; by killing, as well as by making alive; by destroying, as well as by increasing.

This destruction is wrought two wayes, openly, or secretly. Sometime God is a moth and rottenness to a Nation, he destroyes them silently, and unseen (Hos. 5. 12.) they decline and moulder away, they know not how. Sometimes he is a Lion, and as a young Lion unto a Nation, he will tear and go away, and none shall rescue (Hos. 5. 14.) he destroyeth them visibly, by Diseases and Plagues, by Famine and the Sword. By some one, or by all these, he destroyeth them, till, as he threatned the Jews (Isa. 6. 11.) The Cities be wasted without inhabitants, and the houses without man, and the Land be utterly desolate.

The last branch of the verse is of the same importance with the former.

He inlargeth the Nations, and straiteneth them again.

There is a different reading, for some render the former as an act of judgment, He scattereth, or subverteth the Nations; and the latter as an act of mercy, He restoreth them again. Thus he banished the Jews into Babylon, and after seventy years brought them back to their own Land. We understand the former clause as an act of mercy; the latter of wrath and judgment.

Subversas in integrum restituit. Vulg. 70. שטח Significat expandere vel extendere sicut cum aliquid expanditur ut explicetur. Longè latèque super faciem terræ propagat & dilatat eas. Drus.

The Original word signifies, to expand, or stretch a thing forth. When God increaseth a Nation, he inlargeth their borders, and, having multiplied their number, gives them more room. As the inlargement of the Church is described by the Prophet (Isa. 49. 20.) such is the inlargement of Nations. The children which thou shalt have after thou hast lost the other, shall say again in thine ear, The place is too strait for me; give place to me that I may dwell. As Bees swarm when the Hive is overcharged, or as Rivers overflowing break their bounds, so do the Nations of the earth, who are compared to great Rivers. God sometimes opens these flood-gates, and lets them out like a mighty torrent. The irruptions of the Gothes and Vandals, of the Huns and Heruli, are famous among Historians. And as barbarous Nations spread out themselves because of numbers, so do other Nations by their power. The Babylonian, the Persian, the Grecian, the Roman Empires, extended the wings of their sovereignty all the world over.

נחה Duxit, deduxit placidè & sensim sicut pastor greges aut pater filium suum. Unde מנחה Quodlibet donum seu donarium honoris causa alicui oblatum, eò quod sensim & cum pompa quadam portetur. Rivet. Expandit eas super faciem terræ, & ducit eas in locum perditionis. Merc. ex R. Kinch.

Mr. Broughton translates, He spreadeth the Nations, and governeth them: So both parts of that verse speak mercy to Nations. Others of the Learned joyn in that translation. The Hebrew word beareth that sence most properly, signifying to lead, yea, to lead gently, peaceably and quietly, as a Shepherd leadeth his Flock, or as a father his child. Many offerings of the Jews in their ceremonious worship, were denominated from this word, Minchah, because they were brought in such an honourable way, and presented before the Lord. The providence of God leads all people; his own people are led by a special providence, as the Israelites were, in the day by a Cloud, and in the night by a Pillar of fire. The Lord alone did lead them, and there was no strange God with him (Deut. 32. 12.) The Lord in mercy led forth the people, which he had redeemed; he guided them in his strength to his holy habitation (Exod. 15. 13.) This interpretation runs fair. And while we in stead of he leadeth, render, he straiteneth them; we mean, he leadeth them into straits. As he spreadeth them out by prosperity, so he straiteneth them by affliction. In this variety of reading, the scope and general sence of the Text is the same, setting forth the irresistible power of God, in disposing Nations for the better, or for the worse, as he seeth cause, or as they give it him.

First, Observe, There is a vicissitude and change in Nations as well as in persons.

In this verse the scales go up and down, He increaseth the Nations, and destroyeth them; he inlargeth them, and straiteneth them again. Particular men, are sometimes up, and sometimes down; sometimes well, and sometimes sick; sometimes inlarged, and sometimes straitened. Now as it is with the parts, so with the whole; and though the world be a dissimular body, yet in one notion it is a simular body, being all alike in subjection to vanity and change. What Nation is there but hath suffered many changes? This Nation hath been a great example of it, and so it is at this day: And unless we humble our selves before God, and kiss the Son, least he be further angry, we have cause to fear greater changes then ever we have had. Who knows what changes a year, yea, a day may bring forth? These two things are out of all question: First, That we have deserved the worst of changes. Secondly, That the face of affairs looks as if we should every day change for the worse, till we come to the worst.

Secondly, Observe, All the changes in Nations are from God.

He increaseth and straiteneth them; his providence (not fate) watcheth over them, to order all their motions. As the motions of single persons, so the motions of whole Kingdoms are ordered by a higher hand. Divine providence acts upon every stage of worldly affairs in the world. There is a wheel in a wheel; Gods wheel moves in all the wheels of the creature: States cannot do what they please, and go on after their own pleasure; God governs the Governors, as much as those who are governed. He leadeth them into wayes of peace and prosperity; he also leadeth them into wars and troubles. We have both expreſt (Jer. 31. 28.) Like as I have watched over them, to pluck up, and to break down, and to destroy, so will I watch over them, to build and to plant, saith the Lord. No people in the world did ever find God more increasing, or straitening them then the Jews did: They were as set upon a Beacon, for all the world to look and gaze at: They were Gods peculiar treasure; yet he cast them out as dung, or dross. He increased them in number, in riches, and in honour. When the severest courses were taken to diminish them (as in Egypt by slaying the males) he then increased them: yet the hand of God was as eminent in destroying, as increasing them. More then six hundred thousand came out of Egypt, all whose carkasses (excepting two) fell in the wilderness. God increased them again in Canaan; they were almost innumerable, when David numbred them; yet he destroyed and wasted them by the Babylonians. After their return from Babylon, they grew mighty again; at last God sent the Romans, who took their City and Temple from them: And how they have been scattered and emptied ever since, the Records of ancient times, and the experiences of this declare. What God did, and hath done, with the Nation of the Jews, he hath also done in many other Nations, and can do in all. He can lift them up, or cast them down; give them a being, or no being; a well-being, or a miserable being, at his pleasure. The absolute sovereignty and greatness of God, will bear him out in these great works, upon the greatest Nations. What's the greatness of any one, or of all Nations put together, to the greatness of God? Behold (saith the Prophet, Isa. 40. 15.) the Nations are as the drop of a bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the ballance. A bucket full of water is no great matter to the Ocean; what then is a drop? All the weight that can be put into a pair of ballances is not much; what then is the light dust, which hangs about it? We know that bears no weight at all. It is no more for the great God to move the greatest Nation upwards or downwards, into an increase or a diminution, then to blow away the smallest dust. And as if a drop, or a dust were too much, the seventeenth verse assures us, that All Nations before him are as nothing; and they are counted to him as less then nothing and vanity. Nor can God ever want means to increase, or destroy whole Nations, who made the whole world without means: Cannot he speak a Nation into any thing, who spake the world out of nothing? When a people increase in sin as much as in sovereignty, and are straitened in obedience and thankfulness to God, who hath enlarged them, then he reduces them to their former nothing.

Job hath not yet done with this argument; as he had told us of the judgments of God upon greatest persons before he spake of Nations; so now having spoken of the judgments of God upon Nations, he descends, in his conclusion, to those again which God sends upon eminent persons, in the two last verses of this Chapter.

VERS. 24, 25.

He taketh away the heart of the chief of the people of the earth, and causeth them to wander in a wilderness where there is no way.

They grope in the dark without light, and he maketh them to stagger like a drunken man.

THese two verses are the continuation and conclusion of Job's Argument, lifting up the power and wisdom of God in his dispensations towards men.

In the former part of the Chapter we have discussed what God doth to persons, and what to Nations. Here Job turneth his speech upon a point which he had touched before, He maketh the Judges fools, or turneth their counsels into folly: Now, He taketh away the heart of the chief of the people of the earth,

He taketh away.] Some read, He changeth; Others, He removeth, or cauſeth to decline. The Hebrew will bear either of thoſe readings, He taketh away

The heart of the chief of the people of the earth.

The heart is the chief piece in any of the people of the earth: And here he taketh away the heart of the chief of the people of the earth. 'Tis ſad when the chief part is taken away from the chiefeſt of the people.

Cor permetaphorâ ſignificat mediũ & interius cujuſq; rei, per ſynechdochen omnia quorũ ſedes eſt in corde, mens, voluntas, &c. Pined.

The heart under a natural conſideration is that noble inſtrument of life ſeated in the midſt of the body: by a metaphor it ſignifies any thing which is ſeated in the middle, or toward the center, becauſe the heart is ſo placed in the body. And by a Synechdoche, the heart is put frequently in Scripture for the motions of the heart, or for whatſoever acteth there. The underſtanding, will, affections, purpoſes, reſolutions, or courage of man, any or all of theſe are expreſſed by the heart, becauſe any or all theſe are wrought in, or iſſue from the heart.

To take away the heart, hath reference chiefly to theſe three things.

First, He taketh away the underſtanding, and leaveth men to the guidance of ignorance: and then they are hurried by guſts of paſſion, not ordered by the dictates of reaſon. God benights their minds, their fooliſh hearts are darkned, and ſo they become vain both in their imaginations and reſolves: The chief of the earth are then neither able to give good counſel nor recieve it; they who formerly were as Oracles, betray a feebleneſs of judgement, and the graveſt States men prove infants in underſtanding. All wholſom remedies, and proper expedients for their own good, or the publick ſafety, are taken from them when God taketh away their hearts. This was further ſhewed at the ſeventeenth verſe, whither I refer the reader.

Secondly, The heart is put for the will. Some interpret this text, rather of the will then of the underſtanding: God is ſaid to take away the will, when he takes it off from what it was ſet upon before, and cauſeth it to move and encline to another object. (Prov. 21. 1.) The Kings heart is in the hand of the Lord as the rivers of water, he turneth it whitherſoever he will. By the heart we are to underſtand the will of Kings; turning properly concerns the will: The will putteth it ſelf out to proſecute what the underſtanding dictates: The will uſually walketh in, or after the light of the underſtanding: God works ſo effectually in the heart of the chief of the people of the earth, that though their underſtandings give them light to walk in ſuch a way (whether it be a falſe or a true light or way, is not the point here) yet he can take their wills off from it, and turneth them whitherſoever he will. As the perſons of Kings are in the hand of God to protect them, ſo their wills are in his hand to guide and over-power them. They who are maſters of men, are not maſters of their own will. A King who rules others, is not under his own rule. The ſimilitude is very elegant, God turneth his heart even as the rivers, or ſprings of water: Rivers of water are led by their channels, you may draw them this way or that way by cutting out water-courſes. When the will of any one of the chiefs of the earth runs ſtrongly in ſuch a conſtant ſtream, God can ſtop it, cut out ſluces (as it were) and give it a new channel, he can empty the ſtream of a Kings will, into a channel of his own making, and cauſe this river to run upon what ground he pleaſeth. Some of the Ancients obſerving what ſtrange courſes the hearts of moſt Kings have run, turn the interpretation of this text into another channel, telling us it muſt be expounded of the Saints who are ſpiritual Kings. Do you think, ſay they, that the heart of Pharaoh, Antiochus, Herod, or of Julian, was in the hand of God? Doth God turn the heart into the wayes of blood and perſecution againſt his people? ſurely ſuch mens hearts are in the hand of the devil, not of God: ſo they argue. But by their leave, we are not afraid to ſay, that even the hearts of wicked Kings are in the hand of God; yet he hath no hand in their wickedneſs, unleſs to bound it. The wills of the moſt wilful Princes are flexible and moveable at the will of God, even while they move, yea ſpurn againſt it: he makes them ſubject to his ſecret will, while they are rebelling againſt his revealed will. They will not do the latter, but the former is done upon them whether they will or no. Some men are ſo wilful that they turn their whole ſoul into will; there is nothing of reaſon or underſtanding, nothing of love or affection appears in them, but all of will: Their ſouls are loſt in their wills: yet theſe wills God findes out and diſpoſeth of. The will of Princes (ſaith a heathen) is ſtiff and ſtrong, unready and unwonted to the direction of others. They who are full of power think all muſt obey their wills; therefore to make their wills either ſubject or obedient, argues tranſcendent power. The wills of moſt men are ready to follow the wills of Princes, as the ſhadow doth the body: therefore to make their wills follow, is the work of God (Eccleſ. 8. 4.) Where the word of a King is, there is power; and who may ſay unto him, what doſt thou? Princes will not be ſtopped but by a ſuperiour power; their priviledge is great, and many times the violence of their ſpirits greater. As Pilate, when ſome adviſed him to alter the inſcription upon the croſs of Chriſt, anſwers, What I have written I have written, it ſhall ſtand: ſo the chief of the earth ſay, what we have done, we have done, what we have reſolved, we have reſolved. Yet God who is chief above all the chiefs of the earth, taketh away, or removeth the hearts of the chief of the earth, they ſhall not alwayes will what they would. A good man doth the evil which he would not, and evil men do the good which they would not. God cauſeth them to will that the thing ſhall be done, though they have no will, either to the thing or to the doing of it.

Nec me fugit quàm durus & verè inſolens ad recta flecti regius nolit tumor. Senec. Act. 1.

Thirdly, The heart is put for courage and fortitude. God takes away the heart under this notion; he can make the moſt valiant men cowards, and pull down the higheſt ſpirits. As he gives women the courage of men, ſo he can make men leſs then women in courage (Amos 2. 14, 15.) The Prophet ſheweth God taking away, not only fighting courage, but flying courage (ſo ſome underſtand that text) The flight ſhall periſh from the ſwift, they ſhall not have a heart to ſhift for themſelves: they once made ſure of it that they had legs to run, though no hands to fight, but their flight ſhall periſh, they ſhall not have ſo much ſpirit left as to run away. The fighting courage of Iſrael was quite ſunk, (Joſh. 7. 5.) The hearts of the people melted, and became as water, that is, their courage failed. And it is threatned as a judgment, (Lev. 26. 36.) I will ſend a faintneſs into their hearts: And what ſhall the effect of this be? The ſound of a ſhaken leaf ſhall chaſe them, and they ſhall flee as fleeing from a ſword: they ſhall not only flee at the beating of a drum, at the ſound of a trumpet, or at an Alarm to the battel, but at the ſound of a ſhaking leaf, Deut. 28. 65. The Lord ſhall give thee a trembling heart.

Any of theſe wayes, the heart is in the hand of God; he can make an underſtanding heart fooliſh, a reſolved wilful heart flexible, and a ſtout couragious heart faint and fearful. He that had a heart like a lion, ſhall quake and be (as we ſay) white-liver'd at the real appearance, yea at the ſhadow of danger. Thus the Lord ſheweth his mighty power among the chief of the earth, in taking away their hearts.

Put as quod cor Juliani impiiſſimi in manu Dei fuit? abſit, ſed de illis dicit, qui regnant ſuper peccata. Hieron. in Pſal. 137.

God in Scripture calleth upon man to give him his heart: My ſon give me thine heart. This act of God in the text is a chaſtening of the former neglect.

Hence Obſerve, God taketh away their hearts, who will not give up their hearts unto him.

If we graciouſly give our hearts unto God, he will not judiciarily take our hearts from us. We never have our underſtandings, our wills, our courage, ſo much in our own cuſtody, as when we reſign them to Gods keeping. God would ſo order them in us and for us, that we ſhould have the command of them, were they once at his command. But if when he calleth, Give me thine heart, we or any of the chief of the earth ſay, no, we will not give our hearts to thee, not our underſtandings to judge for thee, not our wills to ſubmit to thee, not our courage to act for thee: Then ſaith God, I will take away your hearts from you; you that uſe your underſtandings, your wills, your courage againſt me, ſhall not have them to uſe (Hoſ. 7. 11.) Ephraim is called a ſilly dove without heart: then the chief of the earth are like ſilly doves (though indeed ravenous Harpies) when God taketh away their hearts. The Saints are innocent doves, without gall; and the wicked are silly doves, without a heart. God threatneth his people to send them such Chiefs, Chiefs without an heart, (Isa. 3.4, 12.) I will give them children to be their Princes, and women shall rule over them. He doth not mean children in age, or women in sex; for some women are of masculine spirits, and have done valiantly. 'Twas Deborah, a woman, who said, O my soul thou hast trodden down strength; no man ever spake more like a man: Some children in years have acted like the aged, Josiah did so. So then the Prophets meaning is, I will give them rulers that shall be as little in understanding, as children are in stature, their reason shall scarce be a cubit high; I will give them Chiefs, that shall be as timerous as women naturally are: Their courage shall scarce serve them to see their own bloud without swooning, much less to venture their blood in any honourable service. Thus God takes away the hearts of the chief of the people, when either they or the people refuse to give God theirs.

Again, The Hebrew is, He taketh away the heart of the [Heads] of the people of the earth. The Leaders and Governours of a people, are their Heads: That's the language of the old Testament every where. It is ill when the heart is taken from the heels or lowest of the people; but how miserable is it, when the heart is taken from the heads or highest of the people. A people whose heads have no heart, are upon the matter headless. A heartless head, is no better then no head.

Lastly Observe, All mankind is not of one rank.

We have here the people, and the Heads of the people. As the natural body is distinguished into superiour and inferiour, into noble and ignoble parts, so is the political body: As that body is a monster, which is all head, or whose head is too big for the body, so is that which hath no head, or a head too little for the body. Where all govern there is no government, and where all are chief there can be no order. And as God hath appointed some to the dignity of Headship, for the preservation of order, so it is their duty who are Heads to preserve order. The head takes care naturally for the whole body, the head sees for the foot, and respects the little finger. Magistrates are rulers over the persons of the people, but they are servants to the good of the people. A people ought to serve their rulers, yet rulers are the greatest servants. As it is the duty of all to serve them, so it is their office to serve all. He taketh away the heart of the chief, or, of the heads of the people. And what then?

None of the works of God are without effect; when he acteth, somewhat will come of it. Here is a threefold effect following this judiciary act of God in taking away the heart of the chief of the earth.

First, They wander in a wilderness where there is no way.
Secondly, They grope in the dark without light.
Thirdly, They stagger like a drunken man.

The first of these effects is laid down in the latter clause of the 24th verse.

He causeth them to wander.] The word which we translate, to wander, signifies both corporal and mental wandering; the errour of the foot, and the errour of the mind. 'Tis put for corporal wandering (Gen. 20.13.) When God caused me (saith Abraham) to wander from my fathers house; and again, Gen. 37.15. 'Tis put for mental wandering, Psal. 119. ult. I have gone astray like a lost sheep, seek thy servant; Isa. 63.17. O Lord, why hast thou made us to erre from thy wayes?

But that which is most considerable here, is the act of God, He causeth them to wander; This intimates an efficiency: Hence 'tis questioned, How doth God cause man to wander? God doth not lead man into false wayes: nor doth he hinder man from going in those wayes which are good and right; thus God causeth no man to wander: And yet he doth more then barely permit or suffer man to wander; he is active in it, He caused them to wander. For the clearing of it, I answer,

First, God judgeth and pronounceth such unworthy of light, who have abused it; or that he should clear their mindes with the knowledge of his truth, who have not obeyed his truth, but held it in unrighteousness.

Secondly, Upon the passing of this dreadful sentence, he withdraweth or withholdeth his light from them. They must needs wander who walk in darkness; and unless God continue his light, we return to our own darkness. The setting of the Sun is enough to make the surface of the earth and the air dark, because they have no inherent light: God needs not infuse darkness into us, to make us dark, we in our selves are nothing but darkness.

Nō quod in falsitatē eos inducat, sed quia lumen suū iis subtrahit ne veritatm cognoscant, &c. Aquin.

Thirdly, Having withdrawn his light, God proceeds to an act of tradition, delivering such up into the hands of their own dark lusts and black affections, yea he delivers such up into the hand of Satan, who is the Prince of darkness, and who hath darkness enough to cast into the mind of man, till it be filled with darkness. If our Gospel be hid (saith the Apostle, 2 Cor. 4. 3, 4,) it is hid to them that are lost, in whom the God of this world hath blinded the eyes of their mind, lest the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ, who is the Image of God, should shine unto them. Satan is Gods executioner: the God of this world blindes their eyes who see not the offered light of God: and the more it is offered and neglected, the more he blindes them, and the more they wander. They wander who never saw the light, but they wander most dangerously who are blinded with the light, or because they abused it.

Fourthly, The Lord is said to cause men to wander, because he ordereth the objects and occasions, the means and manner, the steps and degrees of their aberrations. They who wander most out of the way of obedience, cannot wander out of the eye and way of providence. The providence of God is ever in its way, even in reference to them who wander out of the way. They who act most confusedly, indisposedly, and erroniously, are kept in a due course and method, as to the purpose and design of God. The Prophet Isaiah (chap. 20.20.) speaks of a bridle that shall be in the jaws of the people, causing them to erre or wander. A bridle is rather to keep in the way then to carry out of the way. The place is of difficult interpretation: most expound it of the power of the Babylonians, which being put into the jaws of the Jewish nation, caused them to wander out of their own countrey into captivity, yea and caused many of them to erre and wander from the way of holy doctrine and worship. However, we may allude to that Scripture for the clearing of the point in hand, though we make no proof of it. The bridle of providence is in the jaws of many men, even in the jaws of the heads of the earth, causing them (as Job speaks here) to wander; and yet while they are wandering, that bridle rules and holds them within the compass of divine pleasure. Thus the Lord who guides his people in his own way, causeth many to wander in a wilderness where there is no way, and yet guideth them in their wanderings. For as the darkness is no darkness to God, so the wilderness is no wilderness to God: his providence is in a clear way to the fulfilling of his own counsels, how much or how long soever he causeth men to wander from theirs.

In a wilderness.] We are not to take this wilderness literally, as if the meaning were, that God bringeth men into deserts and wasts, as he did Israel his people fourty years together. To wander in a wilderness is a proverbial speech, and implies these two things.

First, He is said to wander in a wilderness, who is ignorant of his way, or knoweth not how to direct and make his course: we say, The man's in a wood, when we perceive one intangled in speech or action. Hence,

Secondly, To wander in a wilderness, notes improbability, yea extreamest difficulty of attaining our end. A man that is in a wide vast wilderness, gives himself for lost, every step may be backward as well as forward: As he knows not where he goes, so he knows not whither he goes: He is in a wilderness, who knoweth not his way, or despaireth of his end.

תהו Inanitas, vacuitas, confusio, res informis, errare eos facit in invio vel inani ubi nullus sit difficultatū exitus. Pined. Mente destituti vias & rationes ineunt incōmodas & perniciosas.

The Original word is Tohu. Moses hath it to express the Chaos, Gen. 1. 1. The earth was without form and void: Before God planted the world, all the world was a wilderness, a place without form, it had no method in it: Creation methodiz'd that rude heap, and drew the wilderness into a garden. A wilderness notes any state or condition without shape or order: and those men wander in a wilderness, who wanting the true leadings of humane reason, and a divine rule, run dangerous and pernicious wayes, both to themselves and others: He that goes in such wayes, goes out of his way, yea (as the next clause of of the verse speaks) he goes without all wayes. They wander in a wilderness

Where there is no way. The way is to be understood as the wilderness, metaphorically: The word signifieth, not only a way which we tread with our feet, but the way which we tread with our actions: A right course of life is the way of man. These (through the just judgement of God) wander in a wilderness where there is no way; that is no plain, no right, no beaten way, unless beaten by the sons of Belial, or by the travellers to the land of trouble and darkness. When God takes away the hearts of men, they run strange courses, and go wayes which wise men never went; the foot of honesty or of justice, treads not their paths. They who go in such wayes, go in a wilderness where there is no way.

Observe from this effect, First, That the very mistakes and errours of men are from God.

First, Spiritual mistakes, or mistakes in spiritual things, (Isa. 63. 17.) O Lord, why hast thou made us to erre from thy wayes (so the Church crieth out) and hardened our heart from thy fear? God made them to erre when he did not effectually shew them the truth; he hardened their hearts when he did not soften them. God left them a while to the conduct of their own lusts, because they had long refused the conduct of his Spirit. They vexed his Spirit (vers. 11.) and therefore he gave them up to their own spirits (Psal. 81. 12.) All the motions of man are aberrations, when he moves without, or against the Counsel of God.

Secondly, Mistakes in civil things (which is the business of this text) are from God too. God took away the heart of Rehoboam, and then rejecting good counsel, he wandered in a wilderness where there was no way. Wherefore the King hearkened not unto the people, for the cause was from the Lord, that he might perform his saying, 1 King. 12. 15. The Lord left Rehoboam to the pride of his heart, and to the blindness of his mind, and then he ran into that extream mistake, which lost him ten parts of his kingdom.

Secondly, From the connexion, He taketh away the heart of the chief of the earth; and what followeth, They wander in a wilderness where there is no way, Observe, When the heart is disordered, the whole man is disordered.

Put the heart out of frame, and all is out of frame: The heart is the prime mover in man, whether it be to do good or to do evil. Therefore the work of conversion beginneth at the heart, or is the giving of a new heart: God doth not give a new hand, or a new eye, a new tongue or a new foot, but a new heart, because he knows that if once the heart be new, the whole man will be renewed. If the heart be setled, all is setled: His heart is fixed (saith the Psalmist) and he shall not be afraid. The heart runs before the foot stirs, either into the wayes of sin, or from the approach of danger. The heart is Pilot and guide (under God) of mans life and way. Where God takes away the heart, he never stayes himself; and he that hath not a heart within him, nor God near him, may do any thing rather then what he ought, or go any whither rather then where he should. He that is deserted of God intangles himself at every step, he is in a wilderness, and the further he goes, the more he is out of his way. As it was with Pharaoh, God took away his heart, he would not hear the counsel that was given him to let the people go, and then he wilder'd himself from day to day, till he was utterly ruined, every step he took was out of the way of his own safety and honour.

Thirdly Observe, They that will not take Gods wayes, shall be carried where there is no way.

God sheweth man his way, Go here (saith God) it is a way of holiness; go there, it is the way of justice; come hither, this is the way of truth: Thus God beckens and invites man into his way. If we say, no, but we will walk in our own wayes, then God resolves, seeing you love to go out of my way, you shall go in a wilderness where there is no way; you shall meet with bushes, thorns and briers to scratch and vex you; yea, you shall meet with wild beasts, with Scorpions and Serpents, to sting and devour you. God meeteth those that rejoyce and work righteousness, even those that remember him in his wayes (Isa. 64. 5.) But Bushes and Briers, Serpents and Scorpions shall meet those who turn from the wayes of God, even those who rejoyce in and work unrighteousness: These run into danger, as fast as they run into sin. There's no safety out of Gods way: many have died in Gods way, but no man ever perished in it. It is said of Abraham, (Heb. 11. 8.) That he went out he knew not whither. The Saints go at Gods call where there is no way, that is, no way known to them, but yet they are assured there is a way cut out and measured for them, by the wisdom of God: Abraham was sure of a good way, and of a good end, yet he went he knew not whither. Abraham knew he had God for his guide, though he knew not a step of the way he was to go. It becometh us to follow God blindfold; blind obedience (in that sense) is good, but due to none but God. Faith bids us do that, for which we can give no reason but this, we are commanded to do it. So some expound that of David, (Psal. 119. 104.) Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path; he doth not say, the word was a light unto his eyes, but a light unto his feet. The word is a light to the eyes, that is, it shineth to the understanding; yet the word is sometimes a light unto our feet, when it is not a light unto our eyes, that is, God will have us go where we cannot see our way. Answerable to that of the Apostle (2 Cor. 5. 7.) We walk by faith, and not by sight; Faith hath a light for our feet, but not to our eyes. Full vision swallows up faith in heaven: And the more vision we have on earth, the less we act by faith. Believers have not a clear sight, but they have a sure guide. Wicked men would be thought to see much, but their sight leads them out of the true way, or into the wilderness where there is no way, but that of sin, nor end, but that of sorrow. Here is the first effect of Gods taking away the heart of the chief of the earth, they wander in a wilderness where there is no way. We have two other effects, vers. 25.

Deus requirit ut sinamus nos ab illo duci quâvis videamur per invia duci. Dum enim ille dux noster itineris fuerit nostros pedes diriget quâ via nos ducat tenebras. Pined.

Via fidei est obscura non aperta & clara visionis.

Vers. 25. They grope in the dark without light, and they stagger like a drunken man.

מישׁשׁ Palpavit, tetigit, tangendo explo-ravit. Descriptio hominis cujus mutatus est cor, & meas aut erepta aut conturbata vehementer. Sanct.

They grope in the dark without light. The word signifies to find out or prove our way by feeling, this we call groping. In the dark, hands or staves are to us instead of eyes. A blind man though he be in the open Sun, yet he gropes for his way, for he wants the light of his eyes: a man who hath the light of his eyes, yet wanting the light of the air, and being in outward darkness, even he must grope his way, (Job 5. 14.) Eliphaz describing the judgment of God upon the men of the world, saith; They meet with darkness in the day time, and grope in the noon day as in the night, that is, in things that are clear and evident they are puzzled, and know not which way to turn themselves, when the way lies strait and is without turnings. It is a great judgment of God, when in businesses that are as clear as day, men stand beating their brains, and troubling themselves, as if they were in the dark. It is very ill to want light, but it is worse to have light, and not to use it. These grope in the dark without light.

There is a twofold darkness; First, Natural, that is not here meant. Secondly, Metaphorical; and that is of two sorts. First, The darkness of ignorance. Secondly, The darkness of trouble or of affliction. We may understand the text, of darkness in either of the two latter senses; they grope in the dark, that is, in the darkness of ignorance, or, in the darkness of trouble. Rather joyn both together, they are in trouble, and they are ignorant, not knowing which way to get out, and clear their way.

But why doth he say, They grope in the dark without light.

Light and darkness are contrary, what agreement is there (saith the Apostle) between light and darkness? Though there be no agreement between light and darkness, yet sometimes there is a mixture of light and darkness; some darkness hath some light in it; that's it we call twy-light, the dusk of the evening or of the morning, there is a time when it is not perfectly dark, yet the light is gone, the Sun is down. Such a day is described in the book of Zechary

Zechary, A day which shall be neither dark nor light, but it shall be between both. It is mercy, that when we have not a clear light, yet to have some glimmering, or appearance of light. The judgment here is, They shall grope in darkness without light; that is, they shall have pure darkness.

Hebraïs usitatum est dum vim & ponâus asserre volunt sententiæ affirmativæ, addunt contrarii negationem. In tenebris & non in luce, i.e. in tenebris omnis lucis expertibus.

The Hebrew is yet somewhat more emphatical. They feel darkness, and not light. Repetitions with a negative are frequent in Scripture, to shew a vehement negation (Amos 5. 18.) The day of the Lord is darkness, and not light. Isa. 38. 1. A message was carried to Hezekiah; Thou shalt die, and not live; that is, thou shalt surely dye. John 1. He confessed, and denied not; that is, he confessed strongly or peremptorily. So here, They feel darkness, and not light; that is, they feel extream darkness, or the extremity of darkness, the greatest darkness imaginable.

Two things I shall observe from this (taking the passage as an expression of the judgment of God upon a sinful people.)

First, They who abuse light shall be deprived of light.

He taketh away the heart; then they wander, and then they grope in darkness without light. They had light, yet acted like men in the dark, or like blind men: They walked in darkness when they had light. Hence God pronounceth against them, You shall grope in darkness, and have no light. God threatned his ancient people the Jews with this dreadful plague (Deut. 28. 28, 29.) I will smite thee with madness, and blindness, and astonishment of heart; and thou shalt grope at noon-dayes, as the blind gropeth in darkness; and thou shalt not prosper in thy wayes. Light is the gift of God; he giveth, and he taketh it away. As when he created the world, there was nothing but darkness, and he said, Let there be light, and there was light; so he saith now to persons, yea to Nations, who are in light, and have abused the light, the light of the Gospel, or the light of outward prosperity, Let there be darkness upon them, and it is so. He can make light without darkness, and darkness without light. Take heed of sinning against light, lest ye grope in the dark without light. Those sins leave the soul, yea the whole man in greatest darkness, which are committed in or against the greatest light.

Secondly, Observe, That persons forsaken of God, and covered over with darkness, are useless and unfit for any thing.

He that is in the dark cannot act. Prov. 4. 19. The way of the wicked is as darkness; they know not at what they stumble: They who know not at what they stumble, know not where they go. A blind man fears in a plain way, and goes sometimes confidently where there is greatest danger: Wicked men are blind; they know not whither they go, nor what they do. He that knows not what he doth, may too late know what he hath done; and he that knows not whither he goes, may know too late whither he is gone; having stumbled often, he falls at last into that pit of darkness, from whence he shall never see nor find his way out. Remember the counsel of Christ (John 12. 35.) Walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you; for he that walketh in darkness knoweth not whither he goeth: They who know not where they go, know not whither they go: If our way be hidden from us, so also is our end. This is the second effect which follows the taking away of the heart, They grope in darkness without light.

The third effect is,

He maketh them to stagger like a drunken man.

Ebrietas est turbatio capitis, subversio sensus, repulsus linguæ, procella corporis, naufragium castitatis, insanis voluntatis. Aug.

They who are overcome with wine, or strong drink, are unable, not only to manage businesses, but to order themselves. Drunkenness is the disturbance of the brain, and the overthrow of our senses. Drunkenness maketh a storm in the tongue, and a tempest all the body over. Drunkenness drowneth reason, and maketh shipwrack of chastity. There is a mental, as well as a corporal drunkenness: A dry drunkenness, as well as a wet drunkenness. Sober, grave, discreet, and prudent men, who by their wisdom and judgment have overcome all oppositions, and carried all before them, even these shall stagger and reel too and fro, not knowing where they are, or upon what ground they stand.

The wrath of God taketh away the reason of man. The drunkards reason is suspended: We say commonly, they are beasts; and we call drunkenness a beastly sin, because such act more like beasts then men. I (saith the good Prophet, Jer. 23. 9.) am like a drunken man, because of the Lord, and because of the words of his holiness: That is, I do even stagger and reel, I am as a man astonished and senseless at the apprehension of Gods displeasure, and because of that cup of his fierce indignation, which his holy Word threatens against an unholy people. The Prophet was as a drunken man, while he foresaw a cup in the hand of God, the wine whereof was red with wrath; how drunken then were they, who were made to drink it, dregs and all to the very bottom? Of such Isaiah speaketh (Chap. 29. 9.) They are drunken, but not with wine; they stagger, but not with strong drink: For the Lord hath poured upon you the spirit of deep sleep. Men sin greatly against God, when they are drunken with wine; and God punisheth man greatly, when he makes him drunken without wine: when he takes away the heart, and leaves sober men to act and personate the drunkard.

To clear which, I shall shew you a seven-fold parallel between a man who hath too much drink in him, and no heart in him; God having taken away his heart.

First, They who are drunken, think every thing moves and reels; the very earth seems to totter under them, and the whole world to turn about them: Whereas indeed, 'tis only their heads that turn, and themselves that reel. 'Tis so with many great Politicians and Chiefs of the people: God in judgment taketh away their hearts, and then (to their apprehension) every thing turns. They fearfully suppose sometimes, that all turns against them; and sometimes flatteringly, that all turns for them. This giddiness of their heads, must needs produce giddy counsels, and unsettle all they set themselves unto. God took away the heart of Cain, and then in this sence also, as well as in the letter, he dwelt in the land of Nod, that is, in a trembling moving land: yea, Cain thought every mans hand was turned against him to slay him, so soon as God was turned from him, Gen. 4. 14. Pharaoh's suspicious head forecast great dangers to himself from a people, who intended him no harm. These Israelites (saith he) will surely turn from me, and joyn with my enemies: This unjust and groundless fear, put him upon such counsels, as proved the just ground of his own overthrow.

Secondly, Drunkenness makes the object appear double or crooked to the eye. For as he that looks upon objects through the water that is without him, so he that looks upon them through the watry liquor that is within him, sees that which is strait, as if it were crooked, and that which is single doubles in his sight. Thus when the Lord powreth a spirit of penal drunkenness upon the wisest in the world, the straitest and justest actings of righteous men are judged crooked and indirect; what they do with greatest simplicity and plainness, is counted doubling, yea, juggling with God and man. Christ himself was called a deceiver by such a generation. And Paul speaks of himself, and his fellow Apostles, we are, as deceivers, yet true. And as the actions of others, so their own dangers and enemies seem double, yea treble, and twenty-fold, to what indeed they are. Troubled imaginations are a distorting and a multiplying glass, to every work, thing, or person they look upon.

Thirdly, Drunkenness dims the bodily eye. The mental eye of these men is so dimmed, that they cannot discern between right and wrong, between good and evil. They put light for darkness, and darkness for light; bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter. Their minds are blinded, and their understandings as much disabled from knowing what is just, as their wills and affections are from chusing and embracing it. The Prophet (Isa. 28 7.) reproving drunkenness in the letter, saith, They have erred through wine, and through strong drink are out of the way; the Priest and the Prophet have erred through strong drink, they are swallowed up of wine, they are out of the way through strong drink; they err in vision, they stumble in judgment. Now as men that are corporally drunk, wear out their wits, drown their brains, weaken their judgments, and when they are actually drunk are not able to make any judgment at all; such dotards do they proceed, who are intoxicated with the wine of divine revenges. The Prophet describes them fully (Isa. 19. 14.) The Lord hath mingled a perverse spi- rit in the midst thereof, and they have caused Egypt to err in every work thereof, as a drunken man staggereth in his vomit. They who err in every work, must needs draw them into error, who work by their direction. If the blind lead the blind, both fall into the ditch. They who have lost their own eyes, will make but ill guides for others.

Fourthly, A drunken man defiles and pollutes himself with his own vomit; he pours that out loathsomly, which he poured in delightfully. Thus also men left of God, defile whatsoever they put their hands or tongues unto: They continually vomit up the filthiness of their hearts, the pride, the cruelty, the injustice, the baseness of their spirits, in all they speak, or act: Their best counsels are like shameful spewing upon all their glory, as the Prophet speaks (Hab. 2. 16.) Their stink, and their ill savour goeth up when they do great things (Joel. 2. 20.) And the greater the things are which they do, the greater is the stink that goeth up: Their own dung, or vomit, is of a better savour, then their designs and workings are. Plain-hearted Jacob was afraid that the fraudulent and cruel dealings of his two sons, Simeon and Levi, would make him stink among the inhabitants of the land (Gen. 34. 30.) Cruelty and treachery are odious, both in the sight of God and man, good and bad; they are so in the good, whosoever commits them; and they are so in the sight of the bad, if any commit them but themselves.

Fifthly, Drunkenness doth not only empty men of reason, but filleth them with passion, it makes them mad and furious: We say of some, they are mad-drunk. This effect of drunkenness is often visible in the counsels and wayes of men deserted, and dishearted by God; they become raging mad; they like Jehu, drive furiously, they fume and foam, they make all both weary and ashamed of their company. Why do the heathen rage (saith the Psalmist) and the people imagine a vain thing? 'Tis a fit of this drunkenness that makes them so. The inhabiters of the earth being drunk with the mystical wine of Babylonish whorish fornication, rage against Christ and his Laws: yea, then they are full of the fury of the Lord, lying like a wild Bull in a net at the head of every street, Isa. 51. 10.

Sixthly, The Text tells us, that drunkenness makes men stagger, they cannot keep their feet, nor stand their ground. Such a judgment God sendeth upon wicked men; their minds are full of irresolutions, they are not able to stand to their own purposes and promises; they stagger from this part to that, from this side to that; they change interests as fast as there is any change in affairs, or outward accidents; now they are for the truth, and presently they oppose the truth; they are like the double minded man, of whom the Apostle James speaks, Unstable in all their wayes.

Lastly, Drunken men often run upon their own ruine. We have a saying, That drunkards seldom take hurt; the meaning is, they are not sensible of the hurt they take; they indeed take hurt oftner then any men, and run desperately upon their own death. Thus men left of God run courses as unsafe, as they are unjust: And while they make too much haste to save, destroy themselves. They rush like Balaam upon the swords point; and while they are most afraid of trouble, no advice, scarce any force of friends can keep them off from it. They will stagger till they fall; and fall so, that they can never rise again. We may find many parallels of it abroad, and among our selves not a few. Do we not see men groping in the dark without light, wandring in the wilderness where there is no way, staggering like drunken men? It were easie to give particular examples of these three effects in all Ages and Histories of the world: But I shall conclude with three general Instances held out in Scripture.

The first is that of the Apostle concerning the Gentiles, (Rom. 1. 21.) They knew God (they had light) but they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful, but became vain their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened: They obscured the light which God gave them in the creature, or benighted themselves in the day time of natural light: And what followed? Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools. They wandred in the wilderness of their own lusts and vile affections, where there was no way: They groped in the darkness of a reprobate mind, without light. They staggered like a drunken man, from one evil to another, being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness, full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity, whisperers, &c.

Secondly, We read another parallel in the whole Nation of the Jews (Rom. 11. 8, 9, 10.) God hath given them the spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear unto this day; that is, in the stile of Job, he hath taken away their hearts; and have not the Jews wandred ever since in a wilderness where there is no way? Have they not groped in darkness without light?

Thirdly, Take the instance of all apostate Christians, according to that grand Prophecy of the Apostle (2 Thes. 2. 11, 12.) They had the light of truth shining to them, but did not receive the love of it: For this cause God shall send them strong delusions, that they should believe a lye; they should be seduced and led into a wilderness of error; they should grope in the dark without light, and stagger from one lye to another, from one false way to another, like a drunken man, till they fell into that bottomless pit of destruction; as the Apostle shuts up that dreadful Prophecy (vers. 12.) That they all might be damned, who believed not the truth, but had pleasure in unrighteousness. God takes away the heart of the chief of the people of the earth, in reference to civil things; he also takes away the heart of the people of the earth, in reference to spiritual things; wandring, groping, tottering, are the effects of both. When God doth the former, Kingdoms wander, grope and totter: when God doth the latter, Churches do so: By the former, the outward glory and beauty of mankind decayeth; and their inward, by the latter. Churches and Kingdoms, the bodies and souls of men, decay, dye and perish for ever, when God taketh away their hearts. And when he in justice doth this (as when he doth it, he alwayes doth) then he declares (which is Job's scope in this whole discourse) that with him is wisdom and strength, and that he also hath counsel and understanding. And lest any should think that Job had all this while told stories, and spoken at random, he assures us in the next words, that he had spoken only what his own experiences and observations gave testimony unto: Lo, mine eyes hath seen all this, &c.

CHAP.

CHAP. XIII. Vers. 1, 2, 3, 4.

Lo, mine eye hath seen all this, mine ear hath heard and understood it.
What ye know, the same do I know also, I am not inferiour to you.
Surely I would speak to the Almighty, and I desire to reason with God.
But ye are forgers of lyes, ye are all Physitians of no value.

HE Friends of Job charged him with ignorance of God, and of his wayes: To refute which, he made that excellent confession, both of the Power and Wisdom of God, in the Chapter foregoing, and concludeth his discourse upon those points, at the beginning of this, with an attestation to all, from his own knowledge and experience. Some joyn the two first verses of this thirteenth, to the last of the twelfth Chapter, beginning this at the third verse. And they who consent to their standing, as a part of the thirteenth Chapter, yet interpret them as a transition, or passage to the matter here further discussed and enlarged.

Caput malùm ordiri à ver. 30 sed transitio est. Merc.

Lo, mine eye hath seen all this, mine ear hath heard and understood it.

As if he had said, To assure you that all is true which I have spoken and asserted, mine own eyes and ears are witness. We may give you the sum of his reasoning thus:

That which I have clearly seen, that which I have received from good hands, and from approved Authors, that which I have fully understood to be, is a truth.

But the whole matter, which I have declared in the former Chapter, is such, as mine eye hath seen, mine ear hath heard, and my understanding hath fully apprehended.

Therefore those things are true, and ought to be received by you as truths.

Lo, mine eye hath seen all this, &c.

Triplex cognitio, 1. oculorum per experientiam, 2. auris per traditionē, 3. intellectus per discursum.

Here is a threefold knowledge laid down in this verse:
First, Knowledge by experience, Lo, mine eye hath seen.
Secondly, Knowledge by tradition, or by teaching, Mine ear hath heard.
Thirdly, Knowledge by discourse, Mine ear hath heard and understood it; that is, I have understood what I have seen and heard.

Lo, mine eye hath seen.] The eye is taken in Scripture two wayes.

In oculis mens & ratio intelligitur, qua, quæ cognovimus vidisse dicimur. Sanct.

First, Figuratively, So it is put for the understanding; because as the eye is the light of the body, so the understanding is the light of the mind. An ignorant man is a blind man, how clear sighted soever the eye of his body is (Deut. 29. 4.) The Lord hath not given you an heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear unto this day. Here are three faculties, and three acts: First, The heart to perceive. Secondly, The eye to see. Thirdly, The ear to hear. The heart is sometimes put for the whole inward man, and then the eye and the ear are taken properly for the organs of the outward man: But we cannot interpret Moses so, for though the Lord had not given them an heart to perceive, yet they had bodily eyes to see, and ears to hear, they were neither deaf nor blind sensitively: so then, the two latter expressions import no more then the first; he hath not given you eyes to see, he hath not given you ears to hear; that is, you are utterly shut up in blindness and ignorance, or you have not hearts to perceive (Luke 24. 31.) Their eyes were opened, and they knew him. They saw before, but they did not see discerningly, or with the light of their understandings. The business of the Gospel is to open the eye, to turn from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God (Acts 26. 18.) That is, to convince the understanding, that a state of sin is a state of darkness, and that the grace and favour of God to sinners is light; that, to be under the power of sin, is to be under the power of Satan; and that it is both our duty and our happiness to turn to God. To see these things, and these our understandings only can see, is to have our eyes opened.

Some understand the Text in Job, of the eye, in this tropical sence, and then it is coincident with the latter clause, the eye is the understanding. But rather take it literally, for the corporal eye, and so the eye importeth experience and observation, which come in, or are entertained at the eye.

Mine ear hath heard.] The ear is the sense of discipline, knowledge enters at this port, when that of the eye is shut up, either by a defect in Nature, or by accident. They who are born blind, may be bred great scholars; the ear can let in learning enough without the assistance of the eye. Hearing is a nearer servant to the understanding, then seeing is.

Mine ear hath heard.] The ear hears, either by instruction from man, or by revelation from God, of which Eliphaz spake (Chap. 4. 12.) Now a thing was secretly brought to me, and mine ear received a little thereof. Here I conceive Job intends the former, having learned what he here avouches, from men learned and knowing in the wayes of God.

Further, We may take both sight and hearing more largely, and then the whole is no more but a vehement affirmation, that Job did understand what himself had affirmed, as also what his friends had so largely argued. As if he had said, I very well perceive what ye (my friends) have said, and indeed they are not new to me, experience hath taught me them before, and I have heard of them often, they are the received principles of wise and godly men, even such as I have seen, heard and understood, before ever I convers'd or changed a word with you. And so these three expressions, I have seen, heard, and understood, are but an amplification of the same thing, either implying, that he understood them as clearly, as if his eye had seen them; or that which way soever any mans understanding can be helpt, his had, even by the ear, and by the eye, both which had contributed their best furtherance, to furnish him with those notions. Lo, mine eye hath seen, &c.

Vidi, audivi, intellexi, asseverationem continent & amplificationē rei benè perspectæ ac eadem res per eandem vocem & synonimiam repeteretur. Bold.

Hence observe, First, That our senses are inlets to the understanding.

Job placeth the understanding last, Mine eye hath seen all this, and mine ear hath heard and understood it; or understood it by the service of mine eye, and of mine ear. The senses of the body are advantages to the mind: The eye doth not see for it self, or for the body only, but the eye sees for the understanding: The ear doth not hear for it self, or for the body only, but the ear heareth for the understanding. The right use and diligent improvement of sense, improves us both in knowledge and in holiness. While we look with the eye upon what God doth, while we attend with the ear what God speaks, we learn who God is, and what we must be. As the eye and the ear are servants to sin, so they are servants to grace: They are alwayes servants to sin in wicked men, and sometimes they prove so in good men: An eye not watched takes in vain objects: Thine eye (saith Solomon) shall behold the strange woman, and thine heart shall utter perverse things: The eye carrieth the message to the heart, and presently corrupts the spirit with the object which it beholds, if the object be corrupt. Hence the counsel of Solomon (Prov. 23. 31.) Look not upon the wine when it is red, when it giveth his colour in the cup: Look not upon the wine; Why not? Will the colour hurt us? Yes; The colour of the wine will stain the eye, and the eye will stain the heart. As sad objects go quickly from the eye to the heart (Mine eye affecteth mine heart,

Lam.

Lam. 3. 51.) ſo do luſtful and vain objects; they being taken in at the eye, do both affect and infect the heart in a moment. Let not theſe ſenſes which the Lord hath given us for natural uſes, to the body, and for ſpiritual uſes, to the ſoul; let not theſe (I ſay) be abuſed, or turned to the diſſervice of the body (much leſs) to the deſtruction and damnation of the ſoul.

Secondly, Job having ſpoken with much plainneſs and confidence in the former Chapter, about the diſpenſations of God, clears it here, that he had not ſpoken by rote, or without book, or tumbled out what he could not prove: No (ſaith he) mine eye hath ſeen all this, mine ear hath heard and underſtood it.

Note from it, It becometh us to be well aſſured our ſelves of what we teach unto others.

He that inſtructeth another ſhould firſt be inſtructed himſelf, and ſhould have, not only a ſound of words at his tongue, but ſound knowledge at his heart. As it is the duty of him that inſtructeth others, to practice what he ſpeaks; ſo, to be well aſſured of what he ſpeaks: As his life ſhould hold forth a pattern of that doctrine which he delivereth, ſo his underſtanding ſhould hold the model of that doctrine which he delivereth: Thou that teacheſt another, art not thou taught thy ſelf? 'Tis ſinful not to do what we teach; or to teach what we do not know. A good man will adviſe no more then he will do; and a wiſe man will ſay no more then he underſtands. Job was much aſſured that he knew what he taught his friends, when he affirms in the next verſe, that he knew as much as any of his friends.

Verſe 2. What ye know, the ſame do I know alſo; I am not inferiour to you.

Secundum ſcire vel ſcientiam veſtram & ego novi.

The Hebrew is, According to your know or knowledge, is my knowledge; I am not below you in knowledge; Take knowledge in the matter, or in the meaſure, I am not inferiour to you. I know the ſame things which ye know; I have extended my knowledge to as many particulars as you, and I know every particular as fully, and am as clear in it as your ſelves.

But doth not Job play the boaſter? Doth not pride put forth its head at his tongue, while he ſpeaks ſuch language as this?

Job ſpake this ſence, and almoſt the ſame language at the third verſe of the twelfth Chapter, where he ſaith, I have underſtanding as well as you, I am not inferiour to you; yea, who knoweth not ſuch things as theſe? Thither I refer the Reader for the meaning of this ſeeming, unbeſeeming boaſt. I ſhall here only anſwer in general, that Job ſpeaks not this ambitiouſly, or arrogantly, as they do, who love to live in the ſound of their own commendations; who, if others commend them not, will not fail to commend themſelves: What know ye that I know not? Neither doth he ſpeak this in contempt of his Friends, as if he ſlighted or undervalued them: Job knew it to be, not only uncivil, but ſinful, to trample upon the reputation of his Friends; to ſpeak high words of himſelf, and baſely of other men. Job ſpeaks this, not becauſe he delighted in it, but becauſe he was neceſſitated to it. The Apoſtles Apology may be his (2 Cor. 11. 5.) I ſuppoſe I was not a whit behind the very chiefeſt Apoſtles (here Paul ſpeaks in as bragging language as Job doth) but I am become a fool in glorying: 'Tis folly to do ſo, yet he hath enough to vindicate his own wiſdom, while he ſpake like a fool; even this, You have compelled me. If any ſhould ſay, Job became a fool in glorying, he had the ſame to ſay of his Friends, which Paul had of the Corinthians, You have compelled me, you have put me upon it, I could not avoid it; while you have laid me low, and ranked me, not only among ignorant men, but even among the beaſts; was I not forced to ſtand up for my ſelf, and tell you plainly, that I know as much as you, and that I am not inferiour unto you? Some, in contempt of their Teachers, are ready to ſay, what need we hear Sermons? we know as much as the Preacher can tell us? Job was not unwilling to hear the counſel of his ſervant, much leſs did he contemn the counſel of his Friends. So then, Theſe words are a neceſſitated vindication of himſelf, he could not ſo forſake his own honour and reputation, as to let it lye in the duſt, for fear he ſhould ſeem proud in ſpeaking for it. Though all ambitious contending with others, is odious, yet no man ought to betray the truth, or his own integrity, leſt he ſhould be counted contentious. He buyes the opinion of an humble and of a peaceable man too dear, who either payes the Faith of God for it, or his own credit.

Non dicit hæc arroganter & ambitioſè, ſed ſumma neceſſitate impulſus. Pined.

Verſe 3. Surely I would ſpeak to the Almighty, and I deſire to reaſon with God.

The word which we tranſlate [Surely] is not only a particle of aſſertion, but of illation, rendring a reaſon of what was ſaid before. Some render it here, not Surely, but Therefore I would ſpeak to the Almighty; as if he ſaid, I am aſſured that God is good and juſt, and I have found men harſh and unequal to me, Therefore I will ſpeak to the Almighty.

אולם Non ſolum eſt particula aſſertiva ſed illativa, cauſam reddens.

There is alſo a different tranſlation of the whole verſe, thus, Surely I would ſpeak for the Almighty, and I would reaſon for God. And ſo he confutes the ſuſpition of his Friends concerning him, and their confidence of themſelves; as if he had darkened the glory of God, and they only were the aſſertors of it; as if he had oppoſed God, and they only had ſtood up to defend and maintain his cauſe. You think that you only have ſpoken on Gods ſide, and that I have ſpoken either to his diſſervice, or for my ſelf, but indeed, I would ſpeak for God, I deſire to maintain the juſtice, honour, holineſs, mercy, and goodneſs of God as much as any of you all; and I would as readily engage for him, as you or any man elſe; I would ſpeak for the Almighty, and I would plead for God. We cannot have a better cauſe to plead then Gods; nor can any give us a better fee. It is our duty to be Advocates for God, though we have nothing for our pains; how much more, when all that we have already, we have from him; and what ever we ſpeak or do for God and his cauſe, ſhall ſurely be remembred: God keepeth a book of remembrance of what the Saints ſpeak one to another, concerning their own caſes or troubles: then much more doth he keep a book of remembrance, when (according to this tranſlation) they ſpeak for the Almighty, and plead for God.

Profectò ego pro omnipotente loquar & diſceptare pro Deo forti volo. Jun.

But the ſence runs more generally with our tranſlation, I would ſpeak to the Almighty, and I deſire to reaſon with God. And then the meaning is, as if Job had ſaid, I ſee I ſhall avail or profit my ſelf but little by any further conference with you, therefore I deſire to turn my ſelf to God, from whom I am ſure of a good anſwer.

Again, Job ſeemeth to comply with what Zophar had ſpoken (Chap. 11. 5.) O that God would ſpeak, and open his lips againſt thee! Job accepts his wiſh; You have ſaid, O that God would ſpeak, I deſire no other; I alſo would ſpeak to the Almighty, I would reaſon with God; what in your account would be my puniſhment, I ſhould receive as a great happineſs; yea I make it my requeſt, that I may ſpeak with the Almighty, and that I might reaſon with God, Thus he declareth the confidence which he had in the goodneſs of his cauſe, as alſo the clearneſs of his conſcience, both which were ſuch as did not fear, no not the preſence of God himſelf.

And I deſire to reaſon with God.

This part of the verſe is of the ſame intendment with the former. The word ſignifies to reaſon by way of formal diſpute, where arguments or mediums are held out, upon which we conclude the truth of our opinion, or poſition. The Jews call Logick by this name.

יכח Eſt ratione & argumentis utra citraque habitis veritatem inquirere. Dialectica Hebræis dicitur חכמה הויכוח ars arguendi, quod ἔλεγχον Græci dicunt.

The Septuagint do ſomewhat allay and modifie the words, ſuppoſing Job too bold and free in this offer; therefore they add, I would reaſon with God, if he pleaſe to give me leave, or if he will accept of me in it: The ſupplement is pious, and is to be underſtood in all expreſſions of this nature. What any man at any time deſires of God, he muſt do it with ſubmiſſion to the will of God, unleſs God hath already declared his will concerning that deſire.

Septuaginta addunt, Si voluerit piè & urbanè, q. d. ſi illi accepta fuerit hæc mea diſputandi & loquendi voluntas. Iun.

But ſuppoſe God ſhould have hearkened to Job, and granted him this requeſt, could Job make any improvement of it? Is it poſſible for duſt and aſhes, for fleſh and blood, to proſper in a contention with the Almighty, or to reaſon the caſe with God, and carry it? Yea, is it poſſible for man to ſpeak at all with the Almighty, or to reaſon with God?

I anſwer, Job ſpeaks thus, not as if he thought that God and he could perſonally, or, as we ſay, hand to hand, ſpeak together, together, and reason out the case. 'Tis true, God sometimes hath spoken with man; but then it was in a humane shape (Gen. 18. &c.) And when it is said that he spake with Moses face to face, as a man speaketh to his friend, Exod. 33. 11. yet Moses did not, nor indeed could he, see the face of God (vers. 20.) God manifested himself familiarly and plainly to him; this was speaking face to face. So, all that Job desires, is but a liberty to open his mind freely to God, and to receive answer from God in what way he should appoint. As if he had said, I had rather speak with God himself, then with you my friends, and I doubt not but I shall find at last a more favourable hearing from him, then I have yet had from you.

Non ipsius accusandi sed criminationis vestræ refellendi gratia, causam meam apud ejus tribunal agere desidero; non ut ejus judicia disputarē: velim, sed ut vestros errores destruerem. Aquin.

Again, Job doth not desire to reason, or speak with God as an Adversary, but as a Judge: He had no controversie with God, but he applyes himself to God for the determining and ending of the controversie which he had with his Friends.

Lastly, Job did not suspect that there was any the least error in the proceedings of God with him, but his hope was to make it appear, even before the Tribunal of God (if he could be admitted thither) that his Friends had erred in their proceedings with him, and opinion of him. Hence Observe,

First, That man naturally seeks refuge, when he finds himself oppress,

Job found himself oppress upon earth, therefore he hath recourse to Heaven. This Text is Job's Appeal. When the Apostle Paul found himself overborn by the clamours of the Jews, he saith, I appeal unto Cesar: We, in such a condition, may appeal to Christ. When we are pinched by men, Faith turns to God. And, that is one of the advantages which the Saints gain by their hard usage in the world, and the troubles of this life; they converse more with, and draw nearer unto God, who is the comfort of our lives. We are never happy in our distances from God; and when we are near him, nothing can make us unhappy.

There are three things in God, which may encourage us to communicate our condition, and spread our cause before him.

First, The clearness of his understanding: He knoweth all things and persons, and he knoweth them infallibly. 'Tis a misery to be bound to the award of blind Judges, or of those who will not see. There is no ignorance at all in God, neither can any thing pervert his knowledge. That which deters hypocrites, invites the sincere into the presence of God, his omniscience. They can daub up their matters with men, but God looks through all their morter, and searcheth that which they would not have seen at all, the heart. Our hearts are as open to him as our faces are; and our thoughts as conspicuous as our actions. Now (I say) that which discourageth hypocrites, incourages the upright in heart, though they have many sins and corruptions about them, yet they know God knoweth that their corruptions are a burden to them, and their sins their sorrow: They know, he knows also the integrity of their hearts, and the state of their cause. God is such a Judge as needeth none to inform him, neither can any, by misinformations, mislead his judgment.

Secondly, As God knows the right state of our cause, and of our hearts, so he will do us right; he cannot be deceived, neither will he deceive; he rewardeth every man according to his works. And as he commands his Ministers, to say unto the righteous, it shall be well with him, so he will say nothing but well unto the righteous. Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?

Thirdly, God is patient, he hears us out: He will not snap us up, or cut us off in the managing of our cause. As he hath a piercing eye, so a patient ear; yea, it is no burden to him to hear, how much soever he hears; though we are long in drawing out our minds, even so long as would be tedious unto men, and tire the ear of an Angel, yet God bids us say on, and speak out all. Thus the unerring knowledge, the unstained justice, and the unwearied patience of God, may invite all that are upright into his presence, Who would not speak unto the Almighty, and desire to reason with him? And so we do in prayer and holy meditation, in the secret disputes and reasonings of our souls. In all these we speak to the Almighty, and he hath promised to give us answer to our doubts, ease and satisfaction to our spirits. Though God doth not appear visibly to us, or make answer audibly, yet when we speak in faith, and with sincerity, he answers us really, and the effect is often made as clear to our experience, as if God had condescended to a free conference face to face.

Secondly, Forasmuch as Job, after all these arguings with his Friends, being still unsatisfied, desires to reason with God, Observe, That when we cannot get satisfaction from men, we may yet expect it from God.

The reason of all things is in God; and though we must not reason with him, as contenders, yet we may and ought, as learners. As it is the honour of Christ, that we should go to him for salvation, so for instruction. He is our Prophet, as well as our Priest; our Oracle as well as our Advocate. He speaks to us, as well as for us. What man cannot teach us, he will: We may carry our doubts from friend to friend, from Preacher to Preacher, and yet remain unresolved. As some sicknesses of the body are the Physitians reproach, he cannot remove them; so some distempers, and trouble of mind are (in that sence) the Preachers reproach, he cannot cure, or quiet them: yet, both body and mind may find remedy in speaking unto the Almighty, and in reasoning with God. 'Tis a fault in many, that they are so slow in asking God, and so forward in asking men. We should ask God before men, and make him not our refuge only, but our choice: We should speak to the Almighty, not only when men give us no answer, but before we seek their answer. It becometh us upon any doubt to inquire, first, of God by prayer, and to hearken what he will say to us in it. Many have had their scruples and troubles taken away by an immediate work, or moving of God upon their hearts; and 'tis sweetest and most refreshing when we have it so. It is the will of God that we should use means, and take advice, both of Christian friends, and of the Ministers of Christ; God often goeth forth with their counsels, and makes them prosper: But if he withdraw his help from men, and appear not in their teachings, it is to draw us out yet more in seeking to be taught by him, and in desiring that he would give us our comforts with his own hand, and tell us good tidings of peace and mercy with his own mouth. So he may be said to do, when after prayer and wrestlings with him, we find our spirits inlightened with the truth, or refreshed with the comforts we have been seeking for.

Thirdly, Observe, That an upright heart is not afraid to reason with God himself.

The Justice and Majesty of God, which make rotten hearts tremble, make the righteous rejoyce: It glads them not only that God is gracious and merciful, but that he is just and holy: Sing unto the Lord (O ye Saints of his) and give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness, Psal. 30. 4. The remembrance of Gods holiness, fills them with joy who are holy. Such love to reason with God, as much because he knows them, as because he is ready to pardon them. A godly man knows himself so sinful, that he needs the grace of God to pardon him; and yet he knows himself so sincere, that he fears not the justice of God should behold and try him. We say that is a good piece of cloath, or stuff, which the Merchant offers to a clear light; that is a good piece of gold which the Pay-master willingly brings to the ballance and touchstone: So it is an argument of soundness and integrity, when the soul sets it self in the sight of God, who is light, and whose eye discerns what every one is; who also hath a ballance and a touchstone in his hand, to weigh all men, and to try what metal they are. David prayeth as hard to be searched, as to be saved (Psal. 139. 23, 24.) Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me. He knew he was a sinner, and he was assured God knew he was not wicked: had he been wicked, he would have had little mind to be searcht; or had his way been evil, he had never called to have it tryed. They that are deformed, or foul-faced, hate the looking-glass. And every one that doth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved (John 3. 20.) The Word of God, which is doctrinal light, deters sinners, how much more doth God himself, who is essential light? The sinners in Zion (saith the Prophet) are afraid, fearfulness hath surprised the hypocrites: who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? who among us shall dwell with everlasting burnings? Isa. 33. 14. But the Saints in Sion, they, who (as the same Prophet describes them in the next words) walk righteously and speak uprightly, they rejoyce in God as he is an everlasting burning, and as he is a devouring fire, for they know he will neither devour nor burn them. God, who is a devouring fire to wicked men, is a reviving sun to those who fear his name, Mal. 4. 1, 2.

Vers. 4. But ye are forgers of lies, ye are all Physicians of no value.

But] or, For (so it may be rendered) ye are forgers of lies, &c. This verse giveth a reason why Job would not continue any further debate with his friends, but apply himself to God. Ye are forgers of lies. Lying words can no more cure the mind, then improper medicines can heal the body: And he that speaks lying words, gives not only improper, but poisonous medicines to the mind.

Ye are forgers of lies.] This is a severe charge and a high one. To tell lies is bad enough, but to forge lies is far worse. The word signifies to dispose or put any thing into exquisite order and method: As if he had said, You are composers of lies, you have the art of it, you are lie-makers, master-workmen at the trade, the chief of liars. It notes also the putting of one thing upon another, or the fitting them together, which is a further aggravation, you (which is the custom of common liars) put this lie upon that, and fit one to another, as a Joiner doth board to board in one frame. The Italian reads, ye are hatchers of lies, you gather up without order whatsoever comes next to hand for the strengthening of your cause. But forging doth properly belong to a Smith, who puts his Iron in the fire, to heat, and mollifie it, that he may work it with his hammer into what shape and form he pleaseth. Thus liars do: they find a matter which is not shap'd fit for their turn and purpose, therefore they put it into the fire of their own imaginations, or into the flames of malice, and there they heat it, and then with their wit they hammer and fashion it, and make it up into an instrument to wound the honour and reputation of others. So David complains (Psal. 50. 19.) Thou givest thy mouth to evil, and thy tongue frameth deceit. And again (Psal. 119. 69.) The proud have forged a lie against me.

טפל componere concinnare q. d. vos estis compositores & quasi Architecti mendaciũ: significat etiã unum applicare alteri ut fabricantes solent. Hos Augustinus vocat fabulones i.e. qui fabulas vanas contexerint. Aug. Conf. lib. 3. c. 6.

Observe from the propriety of the word, which he useth to aggravate the greatness of their sin.

That to be a plotter or contriver of sin is worse then to be an actor of it.

As every good action is by so much the better, so every evil action is by so much the worse, by how much it hath more, either of the head or heart in it, (Psal. 5. 9.) Thou hatest the workers of iniquity, (Mat. 7. 23.) Depart from me ye that work iniquity. You that set your wits on work, you, who as it were keep a shop to work evil in, and make trade of it, depart from me. They that will not part from sin, must depart from God, whether they will or no. The best of Saints on earth, do that which is sinful; but they are (as we may say) bunglers at it in comparison of these who make it their work, or make a business of it.

The Saints do evil as natural men do good, or perform holy duties; these do but slubber over holy duties; and they (in this sense) do but slubber over evil, they have not the skill, that hellish skill, to form it up and make it a curious piece. Here lies the spirit of wickedness: That sin is most ugly and deformed in the sight of God and of those who are godly, which is contrived and compleated with greatest exactness and curiosity.

Ye are forgers of lies.] A lie may be taken two wayes. Either more largely, for any falsity or untruth: Or secondly, more precisely and strictly, for that which is spoken, not only falsely, but knowingly, and with an intent to deceive. To lie, is to go against our own mindes, or to affirm a thing which we are assured is not so. Job doth not charge his friends with lies strictly taken, as if they had knowingly spoken that which wa false, or as if they had done it with an intent and purpose to ensnare him: Such lying continued in, is inconsistent with godliness, and any one act of it strikes at the vitals of godliness. His friends supposed, and were very confident that they spake truth, and their aim was to instruct, not to entangle him by what they had spoken. As that which is well-spoken, is often ill-taken; so, that which is ill-spoken, may have a good intent. 'Tis possible for a man to speak that which is false, with more honesty then some speak the truth: so did these friends of Job, who though they cannot be altogether excused, yet they must not be rashly censured. To clear up the matter yet further, consider, that There is a threefold lie, as was shewed at the third verse of the eleventh Chapter.

First, A verbal lie, When we either make an untrue relation, or being asked, give a false answer to the question. Such was the lie of Ananias, (Act. 5. 3.) Why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the holy Ghost? The Apostle asked himif he sold the land for so much; yea, for so much, said he, when his own heart gave his tongue the lie for saying so.

Secondly, There is a practical lie, When we act against what we speak, and unsay with our lives what we say with our lips: Many a mans hand gives his tongue the lie, and his works speak the falsity of his words. Lying is very abominable when it is only a tongue-craft, but it is then most abominable, when it is also a handy-craft.

Thirdly, There is a doctrinal lie, So is every errour and unsound opinion. False notions are a lie in the understanding: The judgement mislead, misleads others. The Lord by his Prophet reproves such liars, (Ezek. 13. 9.) Mine hand (saith the Lord) shall be upon the Prophets that see vanity and divine lies; that is, lying doctrines, as is expounded (vers. 22.) Because with lies ye have made the heart of the righteous sad, whom I have not made sad, and strengthened the hands of the wicked that he should not return from his wicked way, by promising him life. The Apostle John concludes against this sort of lies, (1 John 2. 21.) No lie is of the truth, that is, no doctrinal lie, either about matters to be believed, or to be done, either concerning the mysteries of faith, or the rules of a holy life, is of the truth. Nothing but truth can flow out, or follow from that which is true; as that old rule in logick teacheth us. Many lies have a likeness to truth, and most lies are so bold as to claim kindred and alliance to the truth, but no doctrinal lie doth indeed receive life or breath or any thing from any doctrinal truth, much less from him who is essential truth: To both which we extend S. Johns negative conclusion, No lie is of the truth.

Ex veris possunt nil nisi vera sequi.

The lie which Job chargeth upon his friends in this place, is not a verbal lie, no nor a practical lie, but a doctrinal lie, as if he had said, You have taught and maintained an errour, though you have so great an opinion that you have all truth on your side, and that you are only upon the side of truth.

Mendacium eo referendũ est, quod neque rectum in cõsulãdo nec in admonendo modũ teneant, sed inutilibus & importunis cõsiliis & orationibus utũtur. Pin.

But how doth it appear that his friends had forged doctrinal lies, or maintained errours?

There are four things observable in their discourse with him, which give evidence to this accusation.

First, Because to defend the justice of God they concluded Job guilty: They knew not how to reconcile it, that God should be righteous in laying such afflictions upon him, unless he were unrighteous; this was a doctrinal lie. The severest dealings of God with man in outward things, are no infallible marks of his disfavour, as hath been cleared more then once from the subject of this Book.

Secondly, He might charge them with forging of lies, because when they professed they came to mourn with him and to comfort him, (Chap. 2.) they, in stead of comforting him, made him mourn, and in stead of wiping off his tears, caused him to weep. Their words were gall and vinegar, not oyl and honey, as he both expected and needed. They spake much of the law, much of justice, but not a word, or but very little of free-grace, and mercy, and when they did, they did so cloud and clog it with conditions, and legal restrictions, that the poor man could not at all lift up his head in any solid consolation. They were not careful to state his case right, or else it was hidden from their eyes, notwithstanding all their care: hence it was that they spake so much at random, as if they had not minded his condition, and laid load upon, instead of easing his wearied soul.

De lege multa, de gratia nihil loquebantur. Mere.

Thirdly, He calleth them forgers of lies, becauſe Zophar had charged him with an affected curioſity in ſearching into the ſecrets of God, and in prying into thoſe things which he would have hidden, Chap. 11. For, while he puts him that chiding queſtion, (verſ. 7.) Canſt thou by ſearching find out God? Canſt thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? He intimates plainly that Job had been attempting to ſearch out God, and had hopes to find him out unto perfection: This he ſpeaks out, verſ. 12. For vain man would be wiſe, though he be born like a wilde aſſes colt. As if he had ſaid, Thou haſt an itch to be wiſe beyond ſobriety, thou haſt a moneths mind to feed thy fancy with hidden myſteries, the open truths of God will not ſerve thy turn: Whereas indeed, Job only deſired to have his cauſe cleared up to his own ſpirit, and to ſee the reaſon why God contended with him. He did not curiouſly intrude himſelf into the counſels of God, but ſought that he might be better fitted to anſwer the call of God.

Fourthly, He taxeth them as forgers of lies, becauſe they thought he only made a ſhew of holineſs, but was really wicked and falſe at heart. Is this thy fear (ſaid Eliphaz) Is this thy hope? Is this thy uprigheneſs? ſee what an upright man thou art: Here's a goodly profeſſion. While they charged him unjuſtly with hypocriſie, which is a practical lie, he juſtly charged them with errour, which is a doctrinal lie. If any man ſaith that himſelf is ſo holy that there is no ſin in him, he lies (ſaith the Apoſtle John, 1 Epiſt. chap. 1.) and the truth is not in him: and if any man ſay of another, becauſe he is outwardly unhappy, that he lives in ſin, and hath no goodneſs in him, this man lies too, and hath not that particular truth in him, which would teach him not to judge of mens perſons by events. Theſe things laid together might ſtir up the paſſion of Job to that high and unfriendly language againſt his friends, Ye are forgers of lies, and ye are all Phyſicians of no value.

There are two ſorts of Phyſicians, the one in a proper, the other in a metaphorical ſenſe. A Phyſician properly taken, is a Student in nature, and learned in the temper, conſtitution and parts of the body: his buſineſs lies either in the preventing or curing of bodily diſeaſes, which are enemies to the life and ſubverters of the ſtrength of man. Jobs friends were not Phyſicians in this ſenſe, or if they were, yet he oppoſeth them, not in their Philoſophy, but divinity: And their errand to him, was not to heal the diſeaſe in his fleſh, but to remove the ſorrows and diſtempers of his ſpirit. His friends were his Phyſicians in a figure. In the ſame ſence that the ſoul is ſaid to be ſick, and the mind diſeaſed, the ſoul and the mind have their Phyſician. The Soul-phyſician doth not give counſel for the preparing of medicines, but his very counſels are the medicines, his word (that being the word or mind of God) is both the purge and cordial: Such Phyſicians Jobs friends would have been, but he complains of them, that, either their medicines were ſpiritleſs, and had no effect at all, or elſe that they wrought too violently; and hence it is that though he call them by an honourable name, Phyſicians, yet he abates it by an undervaluing Epithete, Phyſicians

Of no value.] The word is uſed, though not in the ſame conſtruction (Zach. 11. 17.) Wo to the Idol ſhepherd. Some render there to the ſhepherd of an Idol, or of a vain thing: others, Wo the ſhepherd of no value, or who is good for nothing, unleſs it be to feed upon, and devour the flock. The word Elil, ſignifieth vanity or falſhood, it ſignifieth alſo an Idol, ſome ſay from the root Al, in Engliſh, not, and ſo Elil, is as much as nullity, or nothingneſs. Idols are nullities, an Idol is nothing in the world, (1 Cor. 8.) and to ſay that a man is an Idol Phyſician, is all one, as to ſay, he is no Phyſician, or a Phyſician of no value. Rabbi Levi notes that the duplication of the letter lamed, ſhews the extream nothingneſs that was (as to this purpoſe) in theſe Phyſicians.

There are divers conjectures among interpreters about the reaſon of this ſtile.

Some thus, Phyſicians of an Idol, that is, you are to me like thoſe Phyſicians who undertake to cure a dumb Idol, a ſtock or a ſtone: For as they that give phyſick to an Idol, or apply medicines to a liveleſs Image, cannot profit it at all, or cauſe it to live, ſo you have done no more good to me then if you had beſtowed all your potions and medicines upon an Idol, for I am not at all healed nor recovered by them.

Medici Idoli, i. e. ſicut medici qui curant Idolũ, truncum aut ſtipitẽ, qui quãvis multa adhibeant pharmaca nihil efficiunt. Pined.

Secondly, One of the Rabbins tells us from the Talmud, that Alal, ſignifies the ſinew in the neck, or the neck bone, and ſo it is a proverbial ſpeech; when they would expreſs a vain boaſting Phyſician, they ſay he is a Phyſician of the neck-bone: he that undertakes an impoſſible cure, is as one that undertakes to ſet the neck-bone, which our Engliſh proverb puts among impoſſibles, If you have broke your neck, come to me, and I will ſet it. This ſenſe may have ſome admittance here. As if Job had ſaid, You are as Phyſicians of the neck-bone, you promiſed to do great matters, to reſolve my doubts, and eaſe me of my ſorrows, but I ſee (the way you go to work) it is impoſſible to be done. If a man, ſaith the Apoſtle (Gal. 6. 1.) be overtaken with a fault, ye that are ſpiritual reſtore ſuch a man in the ſpirit of meekneſs. The word in the Greek ſignifies to ſet a bone, put him in joynt again, handle him gently and tenderly, reſtore him with a ſpirit of meekneſs, ſo it becomes a ſpiritual Phyſician.

Apud Thalmudiſtas אלל eſt nervus colli, qui ſi læſus fuerit nunquam poſtea curari poteſt, unde medici אלל dicti, qui quod promittũt præſtare nõ poſſunt. R. Sol.

Thirdly, A Phyſician of no value, or an Idol Phyſician, is a Phyſician who can do no more good then an Idol, which is none at all. The Pſalmiſt ſaith of Idols, They have eyes and ſee not, hands and handle not, ears and hear not, feet and cannot walk; that is, there is no help to be had from them. Jobs friends gave him cauſe to call them Idol Phyſicians in this ſenſe alſo. As if he had ſaid, A ſtatue upon a wall, or the picture of a Phyſician, an Apollo cut in a ſtone, or an Æſculapius in a wood, might have cured me as much as you have done: yea you have rather done me hurt then good. Whereas a man ſhould be not only a Phyſician, but a God to man, you are not ſo much as men, ye are but Idols; your words help me no more then a ſtock, or a ſtone, which cannot give to him that is in want, nor refreſh him that is weak.

Medici Idoli, i. e. veluti Idola mortua ſine ſenſu ſine auxilio, ut lapideus Apollo, aut ligneus Æſculapius. Homo homini Deus.

Fourthly, We may take the words in a more mollifying ſenſe. Ye are Phyſicians of no value, that is, you are unskilful Phyſicians, you have neither brought that credit to your ſelves, nor that comfort to me which I expected; your art hath failed you, and your practice is unſucceſsful.

There are four things that make a Phyſician of no value, or his labour of no effect, and all theſe did meet in Jobs friends.

Firſt, When a Phyſician doth not fully know the name or nature of that diſeaſe, under which his patient labours. We ſay, If a diſeaſe be known it is half cured; whereas he that doth not know it can never cure it, unleſs by gueſs or accident. Such cure as Empericks, not as Phyſicians, if they cure at all.

Secondly, As a Phyſician ſhould know the name and nature of the diſeaſe, ſo, that he may be a Phyſician of value, he muſt know the cauſe of the diſeaſe. The cure is found in the cauſe: to diſcover whence the diſtemper grew, and what the occaſion of it was, directs unto the remedy.

Thirdly, He is a Phyſician of no value, who giveth hurtful medicines, medicines that are unſafe and noxious, ſuch as rather kill then cure.

Vanus medicus eſt qui etſi bona medicamẽta ægrotoexhibuerit, non habita tamẽ ejus corporis vel morbi ratione, &c. Merc.

Fourthly, Suppoſe the medicine be in it ſelf good, yet if it be not rightly applyed, or not applyed at a right time, the effect is loſt. A man may do as much hurt by giving a good medicine, as by giving an ill one: For as we ſay of food, that which is one mans meat is another mans poyſon, ſo much more of phyſick, what is one mans help is another mans death. Theſe four things muſt concur in a good Phyſician, and a failing in any of them makes a Phyſician of no value.

Jobs friends (in ſome degree or other) failed in all theſe. They did not ſee into the nature of his trouble: they thought it to be a puniſhment from the revenging hand of God as a Judge, whenas it was but a tryal or a temptation from the chaſtening hand of God as a father: They did not diſcern the true cauſes of it, they thought it was for the diſcovery of his hypocriſie and of the juſtice of God: whereas it was for the diſcovery of his ſincerity and of the goodneſs of God: They prepared ſome medicines of unſound ingredients; as that God will ſpeedily give outward good things to ſuch as are good. And laſtly, lastly, those that were sound they misapplyed: Thus Job was wounded with their salves; made sick with their medicines; and his very Physitians were a disease unto him.

Hence observe, First, From the allusion, That the soul hath its sickness as well as the body.

The soul hath its Feavers, Consumptions and Imposthumations: There is not any disease of the body, but some have curiously found out a parallel distemper in the soul. Solomon in his prayer at the dedication of the Temple, calls every one to know the plague of his own heart. Tis hard to know our own spiritual diseases; but it is harder to know the diseases of other men's spirits.

Secondly, Observe, Good counsel and wholesome instruction is as physick and medicines to the soul.

Animæ egrotantis medicus est oratio.

As the Word is meat, so medicine too: The Word is meat to feed and refresh the healthy soul, and the Word is medicine to cure and raise the soul that is weak and sickly. There is no soul-disease, but we may find a remedy for it in the Word. The Lord (saith the Prophet, Isa. 50. 3, 4.) hath given me the tongue of the learned (What learning was it? was it the learning of Philosophers? No, it was this) That I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary. There is a word which will ease the soul of its burthen, and cure the soul of its disease, if it be spoken in its season.

Thirdly, Observe, He is a soul-physitian of no value, who makes wrong application of truths, as well as he who applyes that which is false.

To preach the Law and the terrors of it, to preach the Justice of God and the severity of it, these are truths; but for a man to preach these to a poor broken soul, to a soul that lyeth languishing and trembling under the hand of God, to a soul that hath the pillars of its comfort shaken with the breakings in of divine wrath, this man is a Physitian of no value. For though the things are true, yet they are ill tim'd and applied; such a soul should have supports and cordials from the Covenant of grace, to refresh his fainting spirits; such a one should have the oyl of gladness poured into his wounds, his belly should be filled with the strongest wine of consolation. On the other hand, when a soul is stubborn in impenitency, or high flown with presumption, going on in the pride of his heart, yet saying, I shall have peace: to apply promises of mercy, the glad tidings of salvation, the freeness of grace to such a soul, may be its hardening and undoing: Though mercy may be tendered to the ungodly, for God justifieth the ungodly; yet we must not say to a man, that perseveres in his ungodliness, that God will justifie him, but that God will condemn him. The worst of sinners may be saved, but we must let him know, God will not save him in his sin. Woe unto us, if we cry peace to those who make war with God. To deal gently with such, is to be cruel both to theirs and our own souls. Such must be thundred at, as Paul did at Elymas (Acts 13. 10.) Thou child of the devil, and enemy to all righteousness: This was the language even of Paul, who preached the grace of the Gospel as high as ever man did. To flatter those that persevere in sin, is to destroy them: smooth words to the wicked are as drawn swords. The doctrine of the law, and the doctrine of free grace, must be preached distinctly, and set out in their several natures, and rightly applyed to their proper objects. We may be Physitians of no value, while we prescribe that which in its own nature is wholesome physick. The Word of God must be rightly divided: Every soul must have his own portion. The childrens bread is not for dogs: And though they who are dogs in the fence of their own unworthiness, may gather up the crumbs that fall from, yea may eat the whole loaf (whole Christ) which is upon the childrens table; yet they who are dogs indeed ought not to be offered a crumb of it. The Prophet Ezekiel reproves the false Prophets severely for misapplying the threatnings and promises of God; for giving bread to the dogs, and throwing stones at the children. Will you pollute me (saith God, chap. 13. 19.) among my people? How is God polluted? He is infinitely above all pollution. He is polluted when any shall make him the author and maintainer of their lyes, or when they speak so of his truths, that they incourage any in their pollutions. We pollute the Word of God (yea God himself) when we misapply it, to favour and side with the pollutions of evil men; or when we do not apply it to ease and revive the spirits of good men Will ye pollute me among my people, to slay the souls that should not die, and to save the souls alive that should not live? The souls that should not dye, are said to be slain, when we threaten where we should promise; and we save the souls alive that should not live, when we promise where we should threaten. Though the unskilfulness or unfaithfulness of man cannot make the faithfulness and counsels of God of none effect, either by slaying one soul, of whom he hath said, live; or by saving one soul, of whom he hath said, dye: Yet they whose words run knowingly cross to the word and will of God, are justly charged with slaying those whom God will save; and with saving those whom God will slay. As they who willingly scandalize a brother by any, to him doubtful, practice, are said to destroy him for whom Christ dyed (Rom. 15. 15. 1 Cor. 8. 11.) because they do as much as in them lyes, to destroy and cause him to perish, for whom Christ dyed; though indeed it be impossible for such to perish, or be destroyed. So also are we to expound the Prophet, these do what in them lies to slay the souls that should live, though indeed such shall not be slain: and this, if any thing, is to be, as Job rebukes his Friends, A Physitian of no value: An Idol, a no Physitian, or one as good as none: seeing it were as good to do never a whit, as never the better.

Job having thus reproved his Friends, and made an appeal to God, gives them advice in the next words, not to speak a word more, unless it were to better purpose then what they had already spoken. O that you would altogether hold your peace.

VERS. 5, 6, 7, 8.

O that you would altogether hold your peace, and it should be your wisdom.
Hear now my reasonings, and hearken to the pleadings of my lips.
Will you speak wickedly for God? and talk deceitfully for him?
Will ye accept his person? will ye contend for God?

JOB having shewed his Friends their error in what they had spoken, desireth they would speak no more, unless they could do it to better purpose: He calls upon them aloud to stop their mouths (vers. 5.) and to open their ears (vers. 6.) being men (as he conceived) more fit to learn then teach. He presseth this counsel by divers arguments: two of which we have in this Context.

The first at the close of the fifth verse, And it should be your wisdom. The Argument lyes thus, It is best to do that which will be your wisdom if you do it. But to stop your mouths, and open your ears, to be silent and hear, will be your wisdom: Therefore you were best to follow my advice, and hold your peace.

A second Argument is contained in the seventh and eighth verses; and it is drawn from the sin and danger of it, in case they should proceed to speak as they had done; Will ye speak wickedly for God? &c. He seems to reason with them thus, It is not good for you to go on in sin and wickedness: But in speaking thus, ye sin, and do wickedly: Therefore it is not good for you to go on in speaking thus: Be ye therefore silent, and attend unto what I have now to say.

O that ye would altogether hold your peace.

O that ye.] The Hebrew is, Who would give this to you? Or, O that some body would bestow this gift, the gift of silence, upon you, unless you had a happier gift in speaking. Quis det ut tacendo taceretis?

That ye would altogether hold your peace.] The word which we translate, to hold the peace, or, to be silent, signifies properly, to dig, or plow the ground, to be very busie; and by an Antiphrasis (frequent in the Hebrew tongue, which imployes many words to contrary senses) it signifies, to do nothing, and to be silent, to be altogether idle: so they are, who neither do, nor speak. Further, Here is more then a bare wish for silence; here is an inforcement of it, O that ye would altogether hold your peace: The letter is, חרש Fodit, aravit, per antiphrasin, nihil egit; siluit.

O that you in being silent, would be silent; or, O that you would be most silent in silence. Job thus strongly bespeaking the silence of his Friends, may have a threefold reference; or, at least, he referreth to some one of these three things.

First, To the speech of Zophar, at the third verse of the eleventh Chapter, who had thus reproved Job, Should thy lyes make men hold their peace? Here Job replyes, as if he had said, You told me that it was uncomely, my lyes should make men hold their peace; or that no man could hold his peace at my lyes; but surely you have spoken such lyes (so he charges them in the verse foregoing) and have talked so much at random, that it would very well become you to hold your peace, and to be as mute as fishes: to speak no more, will be your best Rhetorick; or rather, you will speak most when you speak no more; your silence will be more perswasive then your speech hath been.

Secondly, This desire of perpetual silence, may have reference to that seven dayes silence which we read of in the second Chapter of this Book; when Job's Friends came to mourn with him, and to comfort him; the Text saith, that They sat down seven dayes, and no man spake a word to him. Now saith Job; Ye held your peace a great while when you came to me; truly it had been very well for me if you had altogether held your peace; and I would you would now remember your first posture, and as you began with silence, so conclude: sit and say nothing. O that you would altogether hold your peace.

Thirdly, We may refer it to the whole matter of the contest between him and his Friends: As if he had said, For asmuch as by all that you have spoken, you have not at all abated my pain, nor resolved my doubts, nor comforted my spirit, nor done me any good, I wish you would give over speaking. Seeing your speech is so fruitless, I wish you would be speechless: O that you would altogether hold your peace: And whereas you have gained no reputation of wisdom by speaking, you may by forbearing to speak, as it follows in the Text,

And it should be your wisdom.] Properly there is no wisdom in silence. Silence is a privative, at least a negative. As dumbness is a total, so silence is a temporary privation of speech: But wisdom is a positive, and among habits the most excellent habit. He that is really a fool, is a fool though silent; he is not wise, because he hides his folly. So that, when Job saith, It should be your wisdom, his meaning is, this would be your wisest course; of the two you would shew your selves wiser men by silence, then by talking at such a rate of indiscretion as some of you have done. Silence may be the covering of folly; but no silence can be the cure of it: or silence may cause others to think we are wise; but it cannot make any man wise. (Prov. 17. 28.) Solomon giveth us that rule, Even a fool, when he holdeth his peace, is counted wise; he doth not say he is wise; but he is counted so: he is counted wise, because he hath this happiness, not to discover his want of wisdom. Yet further, as a fool may gain the reputation of that wisdom, which he hath not, if he be but wise enough to hold his peace; so a wise man may shew the wisdom which he hath by holding his peace, when speaking is unseasonable, or when himself may learn by giving others, who are wiser and more able then himself, the greater liberty of speaking. It is a good piece of learning to learn not to speak, as well as to speak well: Nature teaches us to speak; Art teaches us to speak well; but Vertue and Grace teach us not to speak. A wise man will be silent as a learner, that he may be fitted to speak as a Teacher. The Apostles Canon concerning women, hath its use in respect of many men, Let them learn in silence, 1 Tim. 2. 11.

Atque utinam taceretis, ut putaremini esse sapientes. Vulg.

Discamus prius non loqui, ut post modum ad loquendum ora reseramus, & post multum silentium ex discipulis officiamur magistri. Hieron in 3. cap. Eccles.

Hence observe, First, That in some cases it is wisdom to be silent.

Solomon tells us (Eccles. 3. 9.) that there is a season for silence, Every thing is beautiful in his season; so is silence, and so is speech. It is a great part of prudence to know when to be silent, and when to speak. There is, (saith he) a time to keep silence, and a time to speak: When it is a time to speak, silence is our folly; and when it is a time to keep silence, speaking is our folly. There are seven special seasons of speaking, and seven of silence.

The seven seasons of speaking are these,

First, (Which is a general) When by speaking we may bring glory to God, and do good to our brethren.

Secondly, When we have an opportunity to vindicate the honour and truth of God.

Thirdly, When we may relieve the credit of a brother that is wronged.

Fourthly, When by speaking, we may instruct or direct those that are ignorant.

Fifthly, When we may comfort and support those that are weak.

Sixthly, When we may resolve and settle those that are in doubt.

Seventhly, When we may duly reprove and convince those that do evil.

At such times as these we have a season to speak; and then it is our sin, or our weakness, nothing at all of wisdom, to be silent.

There are also seven special seasons of silence, and then it is our wisdom not to speak. Such as these,

First, It is never in season to speak, till we have a call. Tis as impertinent to be busie with our tongues, as with our hands, in other mens matters, unless they, or the providence of God, or our present duty, bespeaks us.

Secondly, It is a season to be silent, when we are not rightly informed in or about the state of the matter or question, to which we must speak: Such shall do well to speak their own doubts, but they are unfit to give others resolution. He must be a master of the question, who makes a determination upon it: And until he hath the compass of it in himself, he can never draw it to a good conclusion.

Thirdly, When we know the state of a question, yet we must not speak without a sutable preparation, either actual, or habitual: Be not rash to utter a thing before God or man. The Apostle James bids us be swift to hear, and slow to speak; yet we must not hear till we are prepared, then much less may we speak.

Fourthly, It is a season to be silent, when what we speak is like to be a snare unto our selves. When they hate him that rebuketh in the gate, and abhor him that speaketh uprightly, when they afflict the just, and turn aside the poor in the gate (Amos 5. 10, 12.) Then (vers. 13.) the prudent shall keep silence, for it is an evil time. But must not evil times, or the worst evils of worst times be spoken against, lest we bring our selves into an evil snare? Must we never speak, but when we are sure to come off well, and save our skins? Yes, at our peril we must speak, when there is greatest peril: So did the ancient Prophets; so did the holy Apostles: Yet (though another interpretation may be given of that place in the Prophet, making the silence of the prudent in evil times to be their acquiescence in the evils of punishment, which God brings; not their quietness with the evils of sin, which men commit: And so their silence is opposed to murmuring against God; not to their speaking against, or reproof of men) yet (I say) we may be silent from reproving men. First, When there is no probability, that the evil which we bring our selves into, shall be ballanced with any proportionable good to others. Secondly, when those sins have been sufficiently witnessed against already; so that men sin, not for want of light, but directly against it. In such a time as this, we have no obligation to run upon our own danger. That's the rule of Christ (Matth. 7. 6.) Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rent you. Where we see, as Christ will not have his Word offered some sort of obstinate hardened sinners (shadowed under the names of swine and dogs) lest they should abuse it; so lest they should abuse those that bring it. He provides, as for the honour of the Gospel; so for the safety of those who publish the Gospel.

Fifthly, As it is a season for silence, when the passions and corruptions of others are up; so when our own passions or corruptions are up. It had been better for meek Moses to have held his peace, then to have spoken when the people provoked him to anger: for then he spake unadvisedly with his lips. Passion is an ill counsellor, and as bad a speaker. A man is not fit to reprove, or speak angerly, when he is angry. Storms at the tongue are never so seasonable, as when there is a calm upon the heart: He was a wise man, who when he saw a man angry, would advise him, to say over all the letters of the Alphabet, before he ventured to put any two of them together, or speak a word.

Sixthly, It is a season for silence, when men are not capable of what we speak. Words are lost, not only upon a meer sot, a fool, a madman, but upon such as are indisposed to hear them. Abigail saw it was no time to speak to Nabal when he was drunken, and his heart merry with wine, Therefore she told him nothing less, or more, till the morning light, 1 Sam. 25. 36. Christ tells his Disciples (John 16. 12.) I have many things to say unto you, but you cannot bear them now. The now, was not seasonable, therefore Christ was silent.

Seventhly, It is a season of silence, when what we speak may be a grief and burthen to the spirits of any, especially of those that are already afflicted. We must not make the green wound bleed afresh; nor at any time speak to the wounding of any whom God would have us heal. In these cases it is our wisdom to hold our peace.

There are three sorts of peace-holders.

First, There are some who hold their peace, and it is their cunning; they are silent upon design: It is not their wisdom, but their craft; they will say nothing, lest they should discover themselves.

Secondly, There are others who hold their peace, and it is their weakness: They speak not, because they cannot speak, either what they ought, or as they ought.

Thirdly, There are those who hold their peace, and it is their wisdom; as in the cases before alledged.

Secondly, Observe, Speech discovereth what we are.

Eloquere ut te videam.

When Job saith, if you would hold your peace, it should be your wisdom, it was an argument, that the speech of these men had discover'd their folly: We may see what men are by what they speak, as well as by what they do: And by these two, all of man, that is knowable by man, may be known. What we are in being, the same we are in acting and in speaking, if we act or speak our selves. Man is made as visible by what he speaks, as what he speaks is audible. Speech is the image of the soul, or the looking-glass of the mind. As we may see our faces in a glass; so others may see the face or representation of our spirits upon our speech. The fashion of the body shines by reflexion in the glass; and the form and frame of our hearts is reflected from our lips. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks: And as we take vessels, or glasses, and knock upon them, that by the sound we may perceive whether they be whole or crackt; so the sound which we make discovers whether we be crackt or sound: The crack in the glass would not be seen easily, if it were not heard; and many a mans folly and ignorance would not appear, could he but keep his own counsel.

Oratio est imago vel speculum animi: ut vir est, ita ejus oratio.

Job, having laboured to speak his Friends into silence; now labours to gain audience whilst himself speaks.

Verse 6. Hear now my reasoning, and hearken to the pleadings of my lips.

Both the parts of the verse are of one interpretation, only the sence is heightened in the latter.

יכח Correptionem, confutationem, reprehensionē, objurgationē denotat, ut apud Græcos ἔλεγχος. Non imperiosè jubet sed vehementer optat. Pined.

Hear now my reasoning.] The word which we translate reasoning, signifies also, reproof, redargution, correption, or conviction.

We may take it for any discourse by way of argument, wherewith a man doth either defend what himself, or reprove what others have done or spoken.

The form of speech is imperative, or by way of command; yet we are not to take it, as if Job, in a Lordly tone, imposed silence upon his Friends: Though his language was Imperative, yet his spirit was not Imperious. His words carry a vehemency in counsel; not the authority of a command: As if he had said, O that I could obtain thus much favour from you, that, forbearing a while to say any more, you would now hear what I have to say.

And hearken to the pleadings of my lips.

To hearken, is more then to hear; for it imports a man purposely setting himself in a posture to hear, or taking pains to hear; we may see the attention of the mind in the composedness of the body. He that hearkens puts himself into a learning frame. Careless behaviour shews a careless hearer. The word here used, notes mind and body in a readiness to catch any thing that is spoken; or the attention and intention of the ear and heart together.

To the pleadings of my lips.] Or, To the chiding of my lips: As if he had said, I must deal sharply, severely and plainly with you; I must speak home, and tell you your own. Some conceive that Job useth this word, to meet with the conception of his Friends concerning what he had spoken. Come (saith he) I know you think I have been too sharp all this while; that I have been rather chiding then disputing; well, if you have that opinion of my former discourse, let it be so; now come on, hear my chidings once more; hearken to my earnest pleadings. Or (as others) to that Apologetical narration, which I make for my self.

Hence observe, First, It is the duty of a man to make defence for himself, and to apologize in his own cause.

He that is innocent must not let his integrity lye stained, or blotted, and not stir his tongue to vindicate and disasperse it. It is a duty to stand up for one another who is wronged, much more for our selves, we being nearer to our selves then to any other.

Secondly, It becomes us, not only to hear, but diligently to hearken unto them, who desire to set themselves right in our thoughts.

Some ears thirst for slanders, and can greedily drink in an ill report of their brethren, yet, will not have the patience to hear their defence. 'Tis hard to possess those with the truth of a mans cause, who are prepossessed with an ill opinion of him. Love thinks no evil of others, and is not willing to hear it. Justice thinks no evil of others, till it hath heard it; and concludes no evil of others till it hath heard them. As the Judge must hear what the witness can say against the party accused; so what the party accused can say for himself: In this sence, that of the Apostle James should obtain with us; Be swift to hear, slow to speak, and slow to wrath, Jam. 1. 19. We should be more forward to hear what a man can plead in his own justification, then we are to speak to his condemnation; we should be more forward to hear him, then to be wroth and angry with him.

Thirdly, Man accounts it a dishonour, if he be not heard and hearkened to when he speaks.

Not to hear a mans words, is within a degree, as disgraceful, as to give him disgraceful words. 'Tis ill when we only give another the hearing, who speaks the truth; but it is worse, when we will not so much as give him a hearing. Some hear much, and do not regard it; others regard so little, that they do not hear; either of these is a sleight put upon man. Now if it be a dishonour to man, to be slighted when he speaks; what a dishonour do they put upon God, who slight what he speaks? How often (as Job here with his Friends) doth God plead with man for audience? (Psal. 81. 8.) Hear, O my people, and I will testifie unto thee; O Israel, if thou wilt hearken unto me. How often did he send his Prophets, with, Hear now the word of the Lord? And when after these, his own and his Prophets wooings for attention to the words of his counsel and command, he found the people stopping their ears, and refusing to hear, how doth he again open his mouth in wrath, and thunder out words of cursing and consumption, which whether they would hear, or whether they would forbear, they must both see and feel. Neither God nor man can bear it, to speak and not be heard. Hear now my reasoning (saith Job) and hearken to the pleadings of my lips.

Job having made his preface, and called for attention, enters upon the matter of his reproof.

Verse 7. Will ye speak wickedly for God? and talk deceitfully for him?

Jam incipit dicta sociorum refutare. Merc.

In this, and the next verse, Job doubleth his words; and that he might make them hear twice, he speaks the same thing more then once. Will ye speak wickedly for God? is the same with, and talk deceitfully for him? Will ye accept his person? is the same with, Will ye contend for God? In the heat of his discourse, he doth not only propose, but press; not only speak, but repeat what he had to say over and over. Will ye speak wickedly for God? and talk deceitfully for him? When we earnestly oppose what another saith or doth, we say, Will ye, will ye?

הלאל דוברו

Will ye speak wickedly for God?] The letter is, Will ye speak iniquity for God? There is a threefold reading of that clause, Will ye speak wickedly? First, Of God? Secondly, To God? Thirdly, For God? Mr. Broughton takes the first, Will ye speak unright of the Almighty? Wee the last, Will ye speak wickedly for God? The sence comes near to one in all three. The Septuagint render it as an argument why they should take heed what they spake, because of the person before whom they spake. Do you not speak before God? and will ye speak deceitfully in his presence? Do you not know where you are? Remember that you are in Gods presence, he sees, and he hears you: Do you think that none hears you, but I that am a poor creature in pain and misery? The great God of Heaven and earth heareth you. Do you not speak before God? and if you believe you do, will you speak deceitfully? This sence is very savoury, useful and close; but this reading is too wide for the Original text: Which though it may bear such an exposition, yet it cannot bear such a translation.

Numquid non coram Deo loquamini, & ante conspectũ ejus proferetis dolum?

The words are clearer according unto our reading, Will ye speak wickedly for God? That is, Will you strain the truth for his sake? Will ye reproach me under pretence of honouring God? Job's Friends had great thoughts of God, doubtless they had; yet, their mistake was great, when, to set up the glory of God, they darkened the innocency of man: In speaking thus, they spake wickedly for God. As if Job had said, Speak righteously for God as much as you will; so I desire to speak for God as much as you; but you are so transported in defending the righteousness of God, that you care not how you wrong me: The cause of God needs no such Advocates: He will never thank you for condemning me, to justifie his dealings with me: He is righteous in afflicting me; and I am not wicked because afflicted.

Dum ejus defenditis justitiam me accusatis ut impiũ: itane Dei causa agenda ut ejus gratia mihi sitis iniqui? Merc.

Hence Note, First, That a good cause may be ill mannaged; and we may exceed our duty, while we are doing it.

There is no greater duty then to speak for God; yet it is possible to speak sinfully when we speak for God. That zeal is without true knowledge, which obscures one truth, while it is clearing up another.

Secondly, Observe, We must take heed we break not the rules of justice and charity to man, while we maintain the justice or truth of God.

Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, is the first and great Commandment; and the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thy self: We cannot express our love to God, while we shut out love to man. God hath no delight in such love: And that doctrine which dis-joyns the love of God and man, is a lye for God. The Vulgar reads the Text clearly to that sence, though with too much variation from the Original, What? hath God need of your lye? The truth of God hath no need of our lye against man: We may bespeak many at this day, who undertake the Cause of God, or at least pretend they do, What? hath God need of your slanders, or of your passions? hath God any need of your anger, of your revilings, wrath? The wrath of man works not the righteousness of God. It is a dishonour unto God to be helped thus. As we must not do evil, that good may come to our selves; so we must not do evil, that good may come to God, Rom. 3. 8. The Apostle rejects the very thought of such a design, with a kind of horror and detestation; for he had no sooner repeated that impudent and blasphemous slander (some affirm that we say, Let us do evil, that good may come) but presently he blasts both it and them, with this dreadful judgment, Whose damnation is just: If they deserved damnation, who put such an opinion upon the Apostles, what do they who practice it? They who suppose themselves such skilful Alchymists, in drawing good out of evil, that (to try their skill) they will do evil, hoping to draw good out of it, shall find at last, that they have drawn damnation upon themselves by that tryal. But some may object, Doth not the Apostle confess at the seventh verse, that he had done evil for that end; and that having attained a good end, he thought himself excused for the evil of his way: If the truth of God hath more abounded through my lye, unto his glory, why yet am I judged as a sinner? It seems then the Apostle had told lyes for the upholding of truth; and that the truth of God had abounded to the glory of God through his lyes. I answer, The Apostle doth not speak those words in his own person, or in the person of a godly man, but in the person of a profane Objector, whom he confuteth: As if he had said, Some man possibly may plead thus for his sin; The truth of God hath gained by my lye; and if so, why am I judged as a sinner? They are shining sins indeed, which cause the glory of God to shine more bright. Can I be a looser where God gains? Surely I cannot. I may rather encourage my self to do evil (as we (saith the Apostle) are also affirmed to say) that good may come. So then the Apostle doth but repeat and refute what some said for themselves, and of the Apostles; he doth not in the least affirm it of himself. God often brings good out of the worst of evils; but that's no thank to those who commit the evil. Evil can produce nothing naturally but evil; it is a Divine power and wisdom which overmasters it unto good. The way which God hath taught us to glorifie him by, is to do that which is good, and to speak the truth; and though he can raise glory to himself out of the evil which we do, and out of the lyes which we publish; yet he never calls for our evil, or for our lye, to raise his glory. The Psalmist assures us (Psal. 16. 2.) My goodness extendeth not to thee: And if God hath no need of our goodness, surely he hath no need of our evil: He wants not our help, though he bespeaks it, and may command it: Why then should any man speak wickedly for God?

And talk deceitfully for him? Or, Talk deceit for him.

The sence is the same as before. The word which we translate deceit, is a Noun, and signifieth hope frustrated, or the deceiving of expectation. A Bow which carries the Arrow false, is thus expresst, a deceitful bow, because it frustrates the Archers aim, sending the Arrow beside, or above the mark. It signifies also a man that is slow of foot, dull, and lazy, a man of a flegmatick and unactive spirit: A slothful man is a deceiver, he deceiveth himself, and he deceiveth those that imploy and set him a work: He doth his own business but by halves; and if any trust him, he will deceive them wholly.

Piger dicitur איש רמיה Quia decipitur ipse spe & frustrantur qui ei quicquam committunt. Coc.

Job giveth yet a further charge upon his Friends, in the expostulation of the next verse.

Verse 8. Will ye accept his person? will ye contend for God?

Will ye accept his person?] There is a different reading of these words. Some thus. Will ye put your selves into the room or place of God? Will ye personate God? So the word bears; signifying, as to accept, so to sustain or represent another person. Will you take upon you the place of God, or stand in his stead? Will ye be as Gods Deputies and Vicegerents, as if you had commission under the great Seal of Heaven, to deal thus with me? Or will ye take the office of God upon you, to judge the heart, and of the secrets which are lodged there? You judge me an hypocrite; let me profess what I will of my own integrity, let me produce the fairest proofs of my uprightness, yet you judge me an hypocrite, and conclude me a wicked man: Will ye thus take the sole priviledge of God upon you, and judge my heart?

נשא In hac phrasi, non tollendi sed accipiendi notionem habet. Nasa sustinere, sustentare, eo quod patroni clientum personam quodammodo sustentant. Bold. Faciem Dei accipere est personã Dei agere & representare & ejus vice ac munere judicandi fungi. Philip. Fresb.

Hence observe, They that take upon them to judge the heart, or to judge of that which doth not appear, take upon themselves the place of God.

Num? i! Deus indiget vestro mendaci? Vulg.

The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked, who can know it? (Jer. 17. 9.) Man cannot know his own heart, much less can he know the heart of another man. God takes that honour to himself (vers. 10.) I the Lord search the heart. Only he that is invisible, is able to see into that which is invisible. Christ gives a rule for judgment: Judge not according to the appearance (John 7. 24.) yet we must not judge of that which doth not appear; we must search before we judge, because many things are not, either in regard of good or evil, as they appear; but if nothing appear after searching, we must suspend our judgment. That which doth not appear, must be left to the judgment of God, at his appearing; so the Apostle directs (1 Cor. 4. 5.) Judge nothing before the time: What is the time? The next words shew it, Till the Lord come; that is, till he come to judgment. But must we reserve all judiciary proceedings to that day? No, Magistrates must do justice; and therefore they must judge every day. His meaning then is, judge nothing which doth not appear: He takes not away civil judgment upon proof (as some have abused that Text) but only that judgment which hath no proof; as the Apostle explains himself in the sequel of that dehortation. Judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the heart. As if he had said, That kind of judgment you must refer to the day of judgment; you must not judge of things hidden in darkness, or of the heart of man; ye may judge the works of men, or whatsoever shews it self in the open light.

We read, Will ye accept his person? Here two things are to be opened: First, What it is to accept a person. Secondly, In what sence the Friends of Job might be said to accept the person of God; or how his person may be said to be accepted.

The letter of the Original is, Will ye accept, or lift up his face? This phrase, of lifting up the face, hath a threefold different use in Scripture.

First, God is said to lift up his own face; and that intimates favour and kindness to man (Numb. 6.26.) The Lord lift up his countenance (or face) upon thee, and give thee peace: That is, the Lord bless thee, and do thee good.

Secondly, Man is said to lift up his own face; and that noteth boldness and confidence, (Job 11. 15.) Then shalt thou lift up thy face without spot: That is, thou shalt not be afraid to look any man in the face.

Thirdly, Man is said to lift up the face of another; either the face of another man, or (as here) of God himself: and this signifies alwayes extraordinary favour; sometimes illegal favour. (Gen. 32. 20.) Jacob sends a present unto Esau, and saith, Peradventure he will accept, or lift up my face: So (Deut. 28. 50.) the Lord threateneth his ancient people, that he would send such enemies among them, as should not regard the person (so we translate) or not lift up the face of the old: An old man full of gray hairs, and venerable gravity, shall have no more regard then a child, or a beardless boy. The honourable man, is the man eminent in counsel, or whose face is lifted up (Isa. 3. 3.) The Lord threatned that he would make the Priests contemptible, because they had been partial in the Law, or because they had accepted faces in, or against the Law (Mal. 2. 9.) that is, because they had done, or required such and such things to be done; not because the Law required them, or because they saw it was the will of God in the Law, but because they saw it was for their own advantage and convenience: They perverted the Law, both in opinion and practice, to pinch or favour men as they pleased. 'Tis said of the jealous man (Prov. 6. 35.) that he will not regard (or not accept the face of) any ransom; that is, he will not be moved by any gift, to spare him that hath dishonoured his bed.

Transfertur ad res inanimatas ut cum quis rē aliquā revereri & permagni æstimare videtur, non tam rei dignitate, quam peculiari aliqua ratione, aut spe lucri permotus. Pined.

More distinctly, To accept a person, consists in these two things. First, When to those who are like, we give an unlike judgment. Secondly, When to those who are unlike, we give a like judgment: To do this, is to be partial, and to accept persons in judgment. Liberality or bounty is not obliged to give like to those who are like; but Justice is. We may give as we will; but we must judge by a rule. God elects according to what is in himself; but he judges according to what is in us, or according to what we have done. When Jacob and Esau were yet unborn, neither having done good or evil, God loved Jacob, and hated Esau: This was not accepting of persons, because the Lord did this, not as a Judge, but as an Elector; so the Apostle states it (Rom. 9. 11, 12, 13.) He loved the one, and hated the other, though both were alike, That his purpose, according to election, might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth. Thus God elects persons; but he is no respecter, or accepter of persons; for, In every Nation he that feareth God, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him, Acts 10. 34. God will not ask any man what countrey-man he is, or of what kindred he is, before he accepts him; For the Scripture saith, whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed, for there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek: for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him (Rom. 10. 11, 12.)

Prosopolepsia definitur, siquis paribus imparia, vel imparibus paria tribuat. Coc.

But if this be to accept persons, how could Job charge his Friends with accepting the person of God?

For the clearing of this Query, I shall shew first negatively, how we are not to understand it; and then affirmatively, how we are.

First thus, We are not to understand it, as if Job's Friends imagined that God had need of their favour in his cause; The usual reason, why the persons of men are accepted, is, because their cause cannot bear them out; he that hath a good cause never desires to have the sentence carried by any byas to his person; but he that distrusts his cause, useth all the means he can, he turns every stone to ingratiate his person, or, as we say, to curry favour with the Judge. Job and his Friends knew well enough, that (as the Apostle affirms out of the Psalm, Rom. 3. 4.) God must be justified in his sayings, and overcome when he either judgeth, or is judged: The justice of his cause will carry him out against all men, Yea every mouth must be stopped, and all the world become guilty before God.

Secondly, As God needs not any respect or favour to his person from the creature; so it's impossible that God should receive more respect or honour from the creature then doth belong to his person: We may quickly out-act our respects to the best of men, and offer them more then they are fit to receive: but God is infinitely exalted above all our praises, and is fit to receive more then we can offer. The Psalmist indeed saith, that the Israelites flattered God: When he slew them, then they sought him, and they returned and enquired early after God: nevertheless they did flatter him with their mouth, and they lyed unto him with their tongues, (Psal. 78. 36.) But could they flatter God? Man is flattered when that is ascribed to him which he hath not; or when he is applauded for what he hath, beyond the worth of it. God cannot be flattered thus: He is as much beyond flatterings, as he is beyond sufferings. The Jews, then, are said to flatter God, not because they applauded him by fair speeches more then was his due; but because by fair speeches they hoped to prevent what themselves did deserve; or they flattered God with their own promises, not with his praises. They sinned against him, and he slew them; and when the sword found them, they sought God, they creep'd to him, and fawn'd upon him, they came as with ropes about their necks, confessing they were worthy to dye, yet humbly begging for life; and if God would but sheath his sword, and spare them, O what manner of men would they be in all holy conversation and godliness. Thus they flattered God with their mouth, while their hearts were not right: They made great shews of repentance and turning to God; but they meant no such thing: this was their flattery; neither can the Lord be flattered any other way. And as he cannot be flattered by over-praising him, so his person cannot be accepted by over-respecting him.

So then the meaning of Job, in charging his Friends with accepting the person of God, is only this, that he conceived his Friends so zealous in lifting up the glory of God, that they cared not under what temptations and disadvantages they left him poor man; they did not attend the law of love and pity towards him, in conjunction with the law of love and honour towards God. As if he had said, You see me miserable, and you know God is just (I know he is so too:) Hence you infer, God being just, he would never punish me thus, if I were not unjust. This to advance the righteousness of God, you suspect me of wickedness; and to maintain his truth, you charge me with falseness of heart, and secret hypocrisie: The former is your duty, but the latter is your sin; will ye thus reject my person, that ye may accept his?

Hence observe, First, That to accept persons in judgment crosseth the rule of justice.

'Tis injustice to accept the person of God (in the sence explained) how much more to accept the persons of men? The Apostle professeth strongly, (2 Cor. 5. 16.) Henceforth know we no man after the flesh; yea though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth know we him no more; that is, we do not respect him for any fleshly consideration. That was once our error, we expected a Christ in outward pomp, and worldly splendor; we looked for a Christ in robes of royalty, and in the majestick state of earthly Princes; we were offended at his meanness and poverty, because we saw no form nor beauty in him; but we have learned to think and judge otherwise of Christ. Now, if it be a sin, or besides our duty, to respect Christ after the flesh, how much more any Christian? We may argue so here, here. If it be a sin to accept the person of God, or by inclining to him to wrong men, how much more to accept the person of man, or by inclining to one man to wrong another. Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: Thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty (Lev. 19. 15) As if he had said, ye cannot do that which is right in judgment, if ye respect the person of any man, high or low, rich or poor: Some, possibly, may respect the person of the poor (though usually respect of person is given to the rich) but the Law of God is so exact in this point, that if a poor man (or a man in forma pauperis) contend with, and sue him that is rich, yet, thou shalt not do the rich man wrong, and say he is rich, he can bear it well enough; no, but if his cause be right, though his adversary be poor, let the rich man have his due. Magistrates are not called to do acts of charity, but of justice. Laws are made without respect of persons; but they are seldome executed without respect of persons. While the Law is moulding and framing, the Legislators know not what particular persons shall fall under it; therefore it is made without partiality or respect of persons. But the Judge too often remembers and studies the person as much or more than the Law: His friend, or his kinsman is in the cause; such a man recommends the business to him, who hath done him a courtesie, or may do it hereafter: Such a great man is concerned in it, who may do him an ill turn, or make an unpleasing representation of him at Court, and in the Princes ear. These considerations corrupt the Judge, and turn him aside in judgment.

Secondly, Observe, We accept the person of God, when under the title of doing him right, we wrong man.

Some are zealous for God to the hurt of their brethren: And while they can suppose themselves acting for God, they care not what they act against man. Such a spirit the Prophet describes (Isa. 66. 5.) Your brethren that hated you, that cast you out for my names sake, said, Let the Lord be glorified: As if he had said, while you shew hatred towards your brethren, you say it is in love to God; while you cast their persons out of your society, you say it is for the Name of God: and that the Lord (say you) may be glorified, we must not spare any man, brother, or friend, one or other. So (Jer. 50. 7.) All that found them have devoured them (he speaks of those that went to seek God with their faces towards Zion, who sought to worship God in the exactest manner) and their adversaries said, we offend not: (They thought they might eat up a man, with as little offence to God or man, as to their own stomachs, when they had this to say for it.) Because they have sinned against the Lord, the habitation of justice, even the Lord, the hope of their fathers. These men have sinned against God, and we hope we must not bear with such: If we did not find them in an error, did they not wrong God and his truth, we would not do thus; but we offend not, for they have sinned against the Lord, the habitation of justice, even the Lord, the hope of their fathers: They concluded they might use them as they list, when they had this plea, it is for the Lord. That's the reason of Christs premonition (John 16. 2.) They shall cast you out of the Synagogues; yea, the time cometh, that whosoever killeth you will think that he doth God service. 'Tis possible for men to seem inflamed with a zeal for God, while they put their brethren into flames.

And as this is true in regard of the persons of men, so of their doctrine: Some say, God is honoured by such an opinion, and therefore it must needs be right. Papists maintain the doctrine of free-will, and tell us it is that God may be glorified; how else (say they) can we answer those exhortations and commands to repent and obey his voice, if man have not free-will, or a power to obey? Were it not a mock if God should bid man do that which he cannot do? Therefore that the honour of God may not be stained, the will of man must be advanced.

Arminians hold universal redemption, or that Christ died equally for all men. Now as the Papists pretend zeal for God in maintaining free-will, lest he should seem to mock in his commands; so these maintain universal redemption, lest God should seem to mock in his promises; For, say they, God offers grace and mercy, forgiveness of sins and life eternal unto all; hence they argue, if Christ dyed not for all, he doth but delude us in making these offers: Thus out of a respect to the person of God, they destroy the truths of God. For the truth is, man hath no free-will (before conversion) either to obey the commands of God, or to believe his promises; and yet the Lord in unspeakable wisdom and justice, yea and in mercy too, commands him to obey, and presents him promises to believe. These administrations of God are not arguments of mans ability, but of his duty; and while God in them shews man his duty, he conveys an ability: he doth not bid a person unconverted obey and believe, because he hath an inherent power to do them; but because out of his free love and grace in Christ he intends to give him that power. And therefore the expedient for the removing of the former difficulties, is not to be found in the free-will of man, but in the free-grace of God: who though he requires what we are not able to do, yet enables us to do what he requires. If we seek other helps to ease us of these scruples, we shall be convinced at last, to have overthrown the truth of God, while we would be thought zealous for his honour: And that is the sin of accepting the person of God, whom we can never honour enough, either in his person, works, or truths. Will ye accept his person?

Will ye contend for God?

It is not a fault, but a duty, to contend for God; to contend for God with our tongues, and to contend for God with our hands (Jude 5. 23.) Meroz was cursed, because they came not to the help of the Lord against the mighty. Therefore when he saith, Will ye contend for God? He doth not blame them for the matter, their taking Gods part; but for the manner in which they did it. As if he had said, If you will ingage as patrons of Gods cause, and contend for him, you must do it so as becomes the cause of God; you must not, to gratifie God, oppress the poorest man.

Secondly, We may give this sence, Do ye contend for God? That is, do ye think God cannot maintain his own cause without you? When Gideon had destroyed the Altar of Baal, and Joash his father defended the action, Joash saith, Will ye plead for Baal? will ye save him? if he be a God, let him plead for himself, because one hath cast down his altar (Judg. 6. 25.) You need not trouble your selves, for if Baal be a God, he will do well enough; he will set himself right, and maintain his own divinity. In that sence also Job might here speak to his Friends, Will ye contend for God? Do you think he is Baal, one that cannot save himself, and manage his own cause? Doth he need you? He being the true God will plead for himself: therefore hold your peace, and hear what I have to speak. You have spoken wickedly for God, and talked deceitfully for him: You have so accepted his person, and contended for him, that he will give you no thank for your labours. Job yet proceedeth to give some further Arguments, why they should forbear to speak, and give him further audience.

VERS. 9, 10, 11, 12, 13.

Is it good that he should search you out? or as one man mocketh another, do you so mock him?
He will surely reprove you, if ye do secretly accept persons.
Shall not his excellency make you afraid, and his dread fall upon you?
Your remembrances are like unto ashes, and your bodies to bodies of clay.
Hold your peace, let me alone, that I may speak, and let come on me what will.

JOB still persists pressing his Friends to silence, and requiring audience for what he had to speak. The ninth and tenth verses are an appendix to, or an inlargement of his second Argument, which began at the sixth verse. There he expostulates, Will you speak wickedly for God? and talk deceitfully for him? Will ye accept his person? Will ye make such adventures? and run such hazzards as these? Here he diswades them from it. Is it good that he should search you out? (ver. 9.) if he do, you will have the worst of it: for, he will surely reprove you, if ye do secretly accept persons, vers. 10. If you give wrong judgment for God, you shall not escape the just judgement of God.

you

His third argument is grounded upon the Majesty and greatness of God, vers. 11. Shall not his excellency make you afraid? &c.

His fourth, upon their frailty and weakness, vers. 12. Your remembrances are like unto ashes; and will you who are but dust and ashes speak thus, not only before, but concerning the high and the holy God?

From all these premises, he draws the wish of the fifth verse, O that you would altogether hold your peace, into a conclusive charge at the 13 verse, Hold your peace, &c.

Vers. 9. Is it good that he should search you out?

The sense of this phrase (is it good?) was given at the third verse of the tenth chapter. Good is here put for profitable or advantageous.

Some refer it to God, and expound it as if he had said, Do you think it will be profitable for God to seek after you, to draw you to his party, or to the patronage of his cause? Mistake not your selves. God doth not want your help; he can maintain his cause, though he see not you for his advocates, though he make not you of his counsel. But I pass this as too strained an interpretation.

Nũquid existimatis utile Deo futurũ quærere & ascíscere vos in suæ causæ patronos? Non bene cedet nobis si factũ vestrũ discusserit & propius inspexerit ac diligentius expenderit. Merc.

For Job intends this directly to his friends: and while he saith, is it good that he should search you out? his meaning is, it will be ill for you. It will be so far from your profit or benefit, from your ease or credit, that you will find it both your loss and your shame, if once God come and search you out. If God look more narrowly into this business, you will get nothing by it but a chiding, as is expressed in the next verse, He will surely reprove you.

Investigare, scrutari.

The word signifies not only to search diligently, but to search judiciarily, or as a judge searcheth and tryeth a man or his cause. Job speaks of himself under this language in the exercise of his Magistracy, (chap. 29.16.) The cause which I knew not, I searched out. If any, under the law, enticed their brethren to idolatry, saying, Let us serve other gods, Then (saith the Lord by Moses, Deut. 13.14.) shalt thou enquire and make search, and ask diligently, &c. Man searcheth what he doth not know; God knoweth all things, and yet he searcheth. He doth not search to inform himself in what he knoweth not, but he searcheth to inform or to assure us that he doth know. David prayeth, search me O Lord, and know my heart, (Psal. 139.23.) yet he confesseth (vers. 1.) O Lord, thou hast searched me and known me; yea he knew God knew him without searching. There are no secrets to God: He knows by immediate intuition, not by discourse or inquisition.

So then, Job speaks of God after the manner of men, who make enquiries that they may know, and search that they may find.

But why would it not be good, or what hurt would it be to his friends, if God should search them out? I answer, Job supposed that his friends had not dealt fairly nor sincerely with him; and though he could not find out the unevenness of their spirits towards him, yet God could: He saw perfectly that they did not move upon right principles, that there was more of anger and animosity, then of zeal and charity in their discourse; that they had a desire rather to conquer him, then to comfort him; and that they were more busie in judging his person, then in applying remedies to remove his grief. Now, when God upon the search should find out such ill matter as this against them, could it be good to them? Surely such a discovery as this could not gain them either reward or approbation. Is it good that he should search you out?

Hence Observe, First, God is able to search out and discern the hearts and secret wayes of all the children of men.

He knows not only what we do, but with what heart and for what ends we do it. His eyes (do not only see, but) consider, his eye-lids (do not only behold, but) try the children of men, (Psal. 11.4.) The eye-lids of man do not see at all, they only protect and fence the sight of the eye: But to shew that God is all sight, and all eye, his very eye-lids are said to do more then see, to try the children of men. O Lord (saith David in the place lately cited) thou hast searched me, and known me. Man searches man, and cannot know him, for, what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man that is in him? (1 Cor. 2.11.) but the Spirit of God knows what is in man, he hath a threed which leads him unerringly, quite through the labyrinth of mans heart. Thou hast known me, all over, thou knowest my down-sitting and up-rising, that is, whatsoever I go about or take in hand: Yea thou understandest my thoughts afar off; that is, before I think them, or before they are born.

We cannot draw a curtain between God and our souls, nor spread a vail of secrecy over any of our actions. The wayes of a man are before the Lord, and he pondereth (as in a ballance) all his goings, (Prov. 5.21.)

Secondly Observe, It will be little to the profit or credit of hypocrites and evil doers, when God comes to search them.

Christ quickly espied among all his guests, the man that had not on him the wedding garment; and as soon as Christ spake to him, he was speechless. He was condemned in himself, because he had not prepared himself.

Three things arise from this consideration by way of corollary.

First, Take heed of sin, for God will search you out. Moses tells the two Tribes who desired to take up their inheritance on the other side Jordan, that if they should prove false to their own proposals, their sin would surely find them out. But doth sin make search for the sinner? or will sin discover and betray it self? When he saith their sin would find them out, his meaning is, the revenging hand of God for sin would find them out. When we feel the effects, and receive the rewards of sin, our sin findes us. Many lose both the sight and memory of the sins they have committed; but their sins keep the sight of them, or will follow them (as the hound doth the fleeing game) upon the sent, till they have found them out.

Secondly, It is good for man to search himself before the Lord searches him, or because the Lord will surely search him. It will be our wisdom to bring our own works to the touchstone, for God will; to travel into our own hearts and over our own lives, for God will. Let not any region of thy self be (terra incognita) an unknown land to thy self, for God walks through thee every day. God threatned to search Jerusalem with Candles, because they had not searched themselves by the clear sun-shine of his word. A sin of ignorance committed is less then a sin against knowledge; but to hide a sin we have committed, or to be wilfully ignorant of it, encreases it.

Lastly, It is best for us by humble confession to make our sins known to God, seeing God doth search out our sins, and will know them, whether we will or no. Concealment doth not hide the eye of God from sin, but the mercy and pardoning grace of God from the sinner. The disguises which we put upon the evil which we have done, cannot make them less visible to, but more ugly in the sight of God. To assure that, is Jobs scope in the next clause of this verse.

Do as one man mocketh another, do ye so mock him?

Proprie est illudere, mẽtiri, decipere mentiri illudendo, vel illudere mẽtiendo.

The word signifies to illude, to lie, to deceive; to lie that we may deceive, or to deceive by lying. One man, or (as the propriety of the Original founds) one poor, weak, sorry, sorrowful man, may thus mock and deceive another; but can weak, sorry, silly man put cheats and deceits upon the strong, the wise, the only wise God?

But may we conceive that Jobs friends had any such design in hand, or that they were contriving a plot against God?

'Tis equally as vain and sinful to strive with God by our wit, as it is by our strength; and we can as soon overcome him, as over-reach him.

Neither did Job impute this to his friends, that they set themselves industriously to deceive or mock God; yet he might speak thus,

Sæpe inter disputandũ spectamus non quid quisq; sibi propositum esse dicat, sed quid ex ipsius oratione consequatur. Merl.

First, Because they handled the cause with weak and improper arguments, such as had only a shew of reason or divine authority in them, not the substance or reality of it; which imported, as if they supposed God himself would be taken with appearances and very similitudes: to be so, is indeed to be mocked and deceived. Upon this account Job chargeth them with mocking God. Neither is it against the laws of disputation to put such inferences upon anothers assertions or argumentations as may possibly flow or follow from them, though the arguer be free and far enough from any such intendment.

Secondly, Because they (undertaking to plead the cause of God) might seem to deal like those Advocates, who to draw on their clients, and multiply their own fees, tell them their cause is good, and that they doubt not of the day. Which though it were most true in regard of God and the cause it self he had in hand with Job, yet it was not true in regard of the grounds upon which his friends managed it and held it forth.

Referendum videtur ad incorruptū Dei judiciū, quod depravari detorqueriq; à recto humanâ persuasione aut fraudulētia non potest. Phil.

Thirdly, He might speak thus, because they appearing as witnesses against him before the tribunal of God, might seem to deal like those witnesses who give a wrong testimony to mislead the judge, that he may give sentence against the innocent: thus an earthly Judge may be mocked or deceived. But (saith Job) do ye think to mock or deceive God thus? Do ye think because you have given such a hard testimony of me, and say I am wicked, that he will take your word, and condemn me upon it? Do ye hope, either to corrupt and darken his understanding that he cannot see the right, or to over-perswade his will to act against what he sees, and to overthrow the right? please not your selves with these mis-representations of me and of my cause to God: for he will quickly look through all the false colours you have laid upon it, and the fallacies that are in it; and you will find at last, that you have deceived your selves, not God, by all your insinuations of my deceit and hypocrisie towards God. As one man mocketh another, do ye so mock him?

Hence Observe, First, Man may be mocked and deceived by man.

That's supposed by Job. As the strength of man prevails over humane strength; so also doth the wit and understanding of man prevail over humane wit and understanding. And as some men are in reference to strength, so others are in reference to understanding, children. You may mock and cosen them, impose upon and delude them, even as if they were a company of little children.

Vulgus plerumq; credit omnia quæ à magnis hominibus audit.

As many wise men are led by the multitude, so the foolish multitude are easily led by any one, who is great in power, or eminent in reputation for wisdom. Two hundred men went after Absalom in their simplicity, and they knew not any thing, (1 Sam. 15. 11.) They were not of his councel, nor privy to his conspiracy, he deluded them into treason. Simon Magus bewitched the people of Samaria, giving out that himself was some great one, to whom they all gave heed from the least unto the greatest, saying, This man is the great power of God, (Act. 8. 9, 10.) But he did but mock them. Such impostors and mountebanks have in all ages put cheats upon simple people, not only in matters of State, but of Religion. Popish Priests and Jesuites have been greatest designers and actors in Soul-mockeries: by these, God hath sent strong delusions among them who have not received the love of the truth, and they have believed lies.

Secondly Observe, God cannot be mocked by man.

Gal. 6. 7. Be not deceived, God is not mocked. Man never deceives himself so much, as when he thinks or attempts to deceive God. He often takes the wise in their own craftiness, but the craft of the wisest never took him. In vain (saith Solomon) is the net spread in the eye or sight of the silly bird: If a weak man see the snare, he will not come into it: There is no snare can be spread out of the eye and sight of God, and therefore he will never come into any snare. And as it is an impossible thing, so also a thing extreamly perillous, to go about to mock God: so much the Apostle infers from this principle: For he had no sooner laid down my conclusion, God is not mocked, but presently he subjoyns, Whatsoever a man soweth, that also shall he reap. Our actions, good or bad, are like the seed sown, the reward of them is the harvest reaped; such as the seed sown is, such shall the corn reaped be: God will not give them a harvest of wheat and barly, who have sown tares and cockle. Many evil works are rewarded by men with good, and most good works are rewarded by men with evil: but God is not unrighteous, either to give us good for evil, or evil for good. For though God bestows some common temporary benefits upon mankind in common, making his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sending rain on the just and unjust, Mat. 5. 45. yet he bestows no special nor eternal favours upon them; and a time will shortly come, when they shall not enjoy those which are common, and temporary.

Thirdly Observe, We may be found mockers and dishonourers of God, while we think we are serving and honouring him.

A good end will not excuse us while our way is unwarrantable.

Lastly Observe, We may be judged to do that which our actions speak, though we be far from such intentions.

Jobs friends had no such wicked purpose in their hearts as to mock God, yet Job had reason to charge them with it.

They, who having been enlightned fall away, are said to crucifie to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to open shame, (Heb. 6. 4, 5, 6.) And they who sin wilfully after they have received the knowledge of the truth, are said to tread under foot the Son of God, and to count the blood of the covenant as an unholy thing, (Heb. 10. 26, 29.) Yet, possibly, neither of these do it formally and professedly. It is rare to hear of a Julian openly blaspheming the name, and spurning against the honour of Jesus Christ. Yet in effect, and by way of interpretation, all they do it, who depart from the known truth, and give themselves up (after conviction) to the wayes and lusts of their own hearts.

Job having disswaded his friends from accepting the person of God, and from speaking wickedly for him, proceeds on to shew them the danger of it in case they should dare to do so.

Vers. 10. He will surely reprove you, if ye do secretly accept persons.

He will surely reprove you.] As if he had said, You must not expect favour at the hands of God, if ye accept persons by shewing them unlawful favour: Will not the Judge of all the earth do right? Arguendo arguet.

He will surely reprove you.] The Hebrew is, In reproving he will reprove you. Which noteth two things. First, The certainty of the action; and Secondly, The severity of it. First, Certainty, God will do it. We translate, He will surely, or without doubt he will, there is no question to be made of it, you shall be reproved. Secondly, Severity. In reproving he will reprove, that is, he will throughly reprove you, he will not do it to halves, no, he will rather do it double, as the words are doubled, in reproving he will reprove you; you shall have it both surely and severely.

Reprove them! for what? He will reprove you for your unjust dealing, for your iniquity: the latter words of the verse clear that sense, He will reprove you, if ye do secretly accept persons, that is, he will reprove you for accepting persons. As (John 16.) the Spirit is promised to come into the world, to reprove or convince the world (that Greek word answers this in the Hebrew) he shall come to reprove the world of sin, convincing them that they have sinned, and shewing them what the desert of sin is.

Further, This reproving may be taken two wayes. There is a verbal reproof, and a penal reproof; a reproof by speaking, and a reproof by acting or inflicting punishment: both these wayes we are to understand the text, He will surely reprove you, you shall have it both by words and blows.

Job in this seems to prophesie: for the event made good what he speaks, as we read in chap. 42. of this book vers. 7. where the Lord, upon the conclusion of this debate, thus bespeaks the friends of Job, My wrath (he means Eliphaz) is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends, for ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath. Here is a reproof. Job I say, did, as it were, prophesie what would come upon them, that surely sooner or later, God would take them into his hand, and give them a sound chiding, for their unsound arguing.

Hence

Hence Observe, First, Sinners shall not escape the reproof of God.

This reproof (for the clear understanding of the point) may be taken two wayes.

First, For a stop to what they would act: Thus he doth very frequently reprove sinners, staying them from a progress in their sins. (Gen. 31. 24, 42.) When Jacob departed from his Uncle Laban, Laban pursues him, but the Lord (ver. 24.) overtakes Laban, and tells him in a dream by night, Take heed that thou speak not to Jacob either good or bad. Jacob tells him in plain terms, God rebuked, or reproved thee yesternight (ver. 42.) It is the word in the Text: As if he had said, Thou camest forth with a purpose to make me serve thee still, but the Lord hath reproved thee, he hath stopt thee in this design, and forbidden thee to speak either good or bad; that is, that thou speak not any thing to me, either by way of threatning, or of promise, to draw me back, and bring me to thine house again. We read of this reproof (Psal. 105. 13, 14, 15.) When the people of the Lord were few, and strangers in the Land, and did wander up and down from one Kingdom to another people, he suffered no man to do them wrong; yea, he reproved Kings for their sakes. He reproved Kings, this reproof was a stopping of their intendments, he would not suffer them to wrong his people. When Israel was mad in following Idols, the Lord saith, I will hedge up thy way with thorns, and make a wall that she shall not find her paths, (Hos. 2. 6.) It is an allusion to beasts, who are ready to break out of their pastures: the hedge stops or gives a turn. God in pursuance of his Covenant, and with a gracious meaning to a revolting people, hedges them up by affliction to stop them from undoing. It is a mercy to be kept out of the pound, though it be by a thorn hedge, sharpest troubles. This stop the Lord doth often give, though he doth not alwayes give it unto sinners: He sometimes lets them run on to fill up their measure of sin, and to receive their full measure of punishment. Reproof for sin is a great favour; though the Lord be angry with us for what we have done, yet it is a favour that he will not let us do more, and so make our selves more vile and miserable.

There is a second way of reproof which all sinners shall certainly meet with. All sinners are not stopt in their way; but all sinners shall be blamed for going out of the way. Though the fact proceed, yet they shall be convinced that there is a fault in the fact; and that it is an evil and a bitter thing to sin against the Lord (Psal. 50. 21.) the hypocrite is described going on in sin, and flattering himself that God was like himself. But what saith the Lord, I will reprove thee, and set thy sins in order before thine eyes. Some men are afraid to reprove, many are unable to reprove: or if they be neither afraid, nor unable, yet they may be unwilling to be at the pains and trouble of reproving: But the Lord will not forbear his reproof: God is not afraid of any mans great looks; nor doth he want ability to reprove and convince the stoutest sinners. He will convince the whole world, and stop every mouth; he will make every one know what he hath done, and acknowledge that he hath done amiss. Ordinary men, yea Ministers, may flatter a people in their sins; and the Lord may leave them to such a judgment, that when they hate those that reprove in the gate, at last they shall have none to reprove in the gate: they shall have none but flatterers, even such as dawb with untempered morter, and sow pillows under their elbows, crying peace, peace, where there is no peace: Thus they shall fatten them up with flatteries against the slaughter of the great day; a mans own heart and conscience is not alwayes in a case to reprove him. It is said of David, as soon as he had cut off the lap of Saul's garment, His heart smote him, that is, his Conscience reproved and checked him: It is a happiness, that when others reprove not, conscience doth: But though conscience fail too, yet God will not; God is greater then our consciences, and when conscience is asleep, God neither slumbereth nor sleepeth, and at last he will awaken conscience too.

So that which way soever we are flattered, whether by men, or Satan, or by our own consciences, yet God will surely reprove. Many are upheld by false testimonies in an opinion of their good estate, whenas their estate is stark naught: For as there is a threefold testimony for the soul, to assure it of a true peace, The water, the blood, and the spirit; so in allusion we may say, that to flatter a man into an unsound peace, there is a threefold testimony, 1. from the world, 2. from Satan, 3. from a mans own heart; these three joyn together to deceive the soul into a most dangerous security; but when they have done their best (which is indeed worst for us) to hide us from our selves, the Lord discovers all; no sinner shall escape his reproof; or if he escape it a while here, it is in judgment, and he shall not escape it when the Lord comes as Judge.

Secondly, Take it for reproving by punishment, and then Note,

That no impenitent sinner shall escape the vengeance of God.

The wrath of God is revealed from Heaven against all ungodliness, and unrighteousness of men (Rom. 1. 18.) Tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doth evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile (Rom. 2. 9.) There is a certain Decree gone forth, and the word is ratified in Heaven, that every sin shall be punished; punished either in the person that doth commit it, or in his Surety. The wages of sin is death, and that either the sinner must receive, or Christ, upon whom our sins are laid. He will surely reprove thee, if &c.

Thirdly, Observe, God will reprove and punish sinners severely; he will do it to purpose when he doth it.

If we come under his hand, we shall feel his hand; if he rebuke us, we shall know he rebukes us; Thou hast chastised me (saith Ephraim, Jer. 31.) and I was chastised. (Gen. 2. 17.) In the day thou eatest thereof, dying thou shalt dye (which we translate) thou shalt surely dye: There is a certainty and a severity in it; thou shalt have a through death, death in thy body, and death in thy soul; a temporal death, and an eternal death. There is a severity to those that continue in their impenitency. Some reprove as if they did not reprove; their reproofs are soothings rather then reprovings. Eli did not surely reprove; he in reproving did not reprove; he did rather smooth then rebuke his sons; his words did rather incourage then humble them: If we compare, 1 Sam. 2. 23. with chap. 3. 13. we shall find what account God gave of his reproofs. Eli (1 Sam. 2. 23.) comes to his sons, and saith, Why do ye such things? for I hear of your evil doings by all this people. Nay my sons, for it is no good report that I hear, ye make the Lords people to transgress. And then telleth them, If one man sin against another, the Judge shall judge him; but if a man sin against the Lord, who shall intreat for him? Here is a reproof; and, indeed, there is a great deal in it; but it did not come up to the nature of the sin of those men; he should have stormed and thundred upon them; he should have made his sons ears to tingle, and their hearts to tremble: and because he did not, therefore (Chap. 3. 13.) the Lord sent a message to him by Samuel, Behold I will do a thing in Israel, at which both the ears of every one that heareth it shall tingle, &c. Because his sons made themselves vile, and he restrained them not; or (according to the Hebrew) frowned not upon them. He either smiled, or looked too pleasingly upon his sons, when he reproved them: this caused God to frown upon Eli, and brought sore displeasure upon his family. It is good for us to reprove as God reproves. Great sinners must have great reproofs: Some must be saved with fear, pulling them out of the fire; we must cast them into the fire, that they may escape the fire: Pitiful cruelty is better then cruel pity. Some in dealing both with the sinful practises and erroneous opinions of men, handle them as men handle thorns, as if they durst not touch them; this fatteneth sin, and confirmeth error: For as a cold and heartless petitioner invites a denial, so a cold and heartless reprover heartens the sinner. The way to cure some souls is, to beat them black and blew with reproofs, as the word used somewhere in the Epistles of Paul signifies. Paul exhorts Titus to rebuke the Cretians sharply (or cuttingly) that they may be sound in the faith (Tit. 1. 13.) Sores must be cut and lanced, before they can be healed. God reproves severely, as well as certainly. He will surely reprove you.

If ye do secretly accept persons.

Etiamſi etiam perſonam accipiatis. Jun. Si occultè & per hypocriſin, &c. Merc.

As if he had ſaid, You may cover the matter, and put pretences or colours upon it, but God will find you out. Some tranſlate the Original by although, which makes the ſence clearer, Although ye do accept perſons ſecretly, though ye carry it cunningly, or hypocritically: Yet, &c. Many ſin, as it were, by art, and are skilful to do evil: They can draw a fair skin over a putrified ſoar, and make the blackeſt and moſt deformed actions appear beautiful: The Phariſees were indeed corrupt and rotten carkaſſes, yet they looked like painted tombs; they were but rotten poſts, yet they were gilded over. Herein lyes the cunning of ſinning, to do it ſecretly.

certiſſimè vos arguet ſiocultè in gratiam cujuſque diſcreditis à recto. Tyg.

Others render this clauſe cauſally, He will reprove you, becauſe you do ſecretly accept perſons: The cloſe carriage and contrivance of your ſin, will cauſe you greater ſhame. Job ſpeaks not thus, as if they ſhould eſcape the reproofs of God, who accept perſons openly: But Firſt, Becauſe men ſometimes do it openly, and are not reproved. As if he had ſaid, You may perhaps do this ſo groſſly, that every man ſees it, and yet no man reprove or puniſh you for it, but though you do it ſecretly, God will reprove and puniſh you for it.

Secondly, It may have this meaning, If you do it ſecretly, men cannot puniſh you: for they judge and puniſh only thoſe things that appear: Juſtice muſt proceed (ſecundum allegata & probata) according to what is alledged and proved. So that if you ſecretly accept perſons, men cannot deal with you; but God can: He will find you out, and make you ſmart for it.

Hence Obſerve (I have opened before, what it is to accept perſons, therefore I ſhall not ſtay upon it.)

Firſt, That to accept perſons is a provoking ſin.

He will ſurely reprove you, if you do ſecretly accept perſons. The accepting of, or the ſhewing favour to a perſon, may be as great a ſin as the oppreſſing of a perſon. And the reaſon of it is,

Firſt, Becauſe the oppreſſion of one perſon is alwayes joyned with the accepting of another: And therefore though the very act of accepting a mans perſon, or the ſhewing more favour to a man then is due, may ſeem to have no fault, or but a ſmall one in it; yet becauſe the favour you ſhew to one, doth redound to the wrong, or preſſion of another, the ſin muſt needs be exceeding great.

Secondly, It is a provoking ſin to accept perſons, becauſe it is a ſin that cannot be committed, but with a great deal of reſolvedneſs and premeditation. A man muſt know both perſons and cauſes before he can properly be ſaid to accept perſons. So that this is not a ſin which a man falls into through inadvertency, or infirmity: Now, that which puts a great aggravation upon any ſin, is, to do it knowingly, and premeditately. The more of our underſtanding or of our will is mixed with any ſin, the more ſinful it is; I know no ſin which hath more of either, then the accepting of perſons hath. Therefore God will ſurely reprove thoſe who accept perſons; what ſin ſoever eſcapeth, that ſhall not; you cannot plead an excuſe for it; nor is there any cloak for this ſin. It cannot be committed out of ignorance or infirmity, but upon will and election.

Thirdly, As the accepting of one perſon is a wrong to another; ſo it is ſuch a wrong as a man can have no repair for. He that hath the wrong, knows not where to go to be righted. The accepting of perſons is a ſin againſt all Laws, and yet we can hardly find any Law againſt it.

Fourthly, They who ſit in judgment, perſonate and repreſent God himſelf; and therefore while they accept perſons, they make God a partaker, yea an actor in that which he moſt hateth.

And as this is a great ſin in civil judgment, ſo in ſpiritual. This St. James ſhews (Jam. 2. 2, 3, 4.) If there come one into your aſſembly, with a gold ring, in goodly apparel, you have reſpect to him, and ſay unto him, ſit thou here in a good place; and there come in alſo a poor man in vile rayment, and you ſay to the poor, ſtand thou there, &c. Are ye not then partial in your ſelves, and are become judges of evil thoughts? We muſt not have the faith of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the Lord of glory, with reſpect of perſons. The Apoſtles reſolve for himſelf and his fellow Apoſtles, is (2 Cor. 5. 16.) Henceforth know we no man after the fleſh; that is, we accept no mans perſon, in regard of any outward intereſt, as to the ſwaying of our judgment, to think well or ill, highly or meanly of them. External relations and differences muſt bear no weight at the Goſpel beam. It is as dangerous (if not more) to accept perſons in ſpiritual, as in civil judgment; and the Lord is a ſevere revenger of both.

But ſome may ſay, If it were between man and man, ſo to accept perſons, the Lord might be angry indeed; but will not God favour an accepter of perſons, when it is in favour to his own cauſe? No, he will not. That's the caſe here, Will you (ſaith Job) accept the perſon of God?

Hence obſerve, God will not bear it, that we ſhould wrong the meaneſt man for his ſake.

Neither indeed can we do him right by doing injury to others. This doth infinitely advance the holineſs and purity of God; and convince the falſeneſs and wickedneſs of man. The Judges and Magiſtrates of the earth will do right between man and man, in an ordinary caſe, between ſubject and ſubject of equal rank; but if it be the Kings caſe, or if ſome great perſon be intereſſed in it, how apt are Judges to lean towards greatneſs, and to give ſentence with the Prince, though they lay it heavy upon the people. Now if God himſelf will not endure that any creature ſhould be wronged, under a pretence of doing him right: How ſhall any men be born out, who favour the great ones of the world, to the prejudice and undoing of inferiours? The Lord proteſts (Iſai. 61. 8.) I the Lord love judgment, I hate robbery for burnt-offering: See how he reproves thoſe who were very zealous to promote his cauſe. But is it blame-worthy to be zealous for God? No, Their zeal was good; but the means they uſed to expreſs it, was evil. They robbed men, the better to enable them to bring offerings to God. They oppreſt their brethren, that they might be liberal at the Temple. God teſtifies againſt this, I hate robbery for burnt-offering. Woe to thoſe who rob men to inrich God. Some now promote preaching, and perhaps will ſet up a Lecture out of the overplus of their unjuſt gains. Though it be an excellent work to maintain the preaching of the Goſpel, yet their work is bad enough, who gripe and graſp unjuſtly, and think to ſalve it by this, they are very liberal toward the promoting of the Goſpel, this is to bring robbery for burnt-offering. Others extort and grate in their dealings, who pleaſe themſelves with a purpoſe to be charitable to the poor; they will build Almſhouſes, and give much in their laſt wills to good uſes: The Lord hates robbery for charity, as well as for burnt-offerings: He rejects what we give, either to him, or to his poor, if we give what we have unduly gotten.

Thirdly, Job ſaith, He will ſurely reprove you, if ye ſecretly accept perſons.

Then Obſerve, Secret ſins, even heart-ſins, are known unto God.

The Lord by Nathan tells David, Thou didſt it ſecretly, but I will do this thing before all Iſrael, and before the Sun. Secret ſins ſhall have open puniſhment; that which is done (whether good or evil) in a corner, God will proclaim upon the houſe top: Remember this, you that can ſin ſmoothly and fairly; that can (when you have eat up your brethren) like the Whore in the Proverbs, Wipe your mouthes, and ſay, we have done no wickedneſs.

I grant, that in ſome ſence ſecret ſins are not ſo bad as open ſins are: Yet there are conſiderations which render them worſe then open ſins. Secret ſins are not ſo bad as open ſins in two reſpects. Firſt, becauſe they give no ſcandal to thoſe that are good. Secondly, Becauſe they do not infect by example, nor incourage thoſe that are evil. Open ſins are both ſcandalous and infectious; ſecret ſins are neither. But if a man ſin ſecretly, upon deſign to hide his ſin, or hoping to carry it ſo, that God ſhall not find him out, this ſecreſie increaſes ſin, and ſhall have the greater condemnation. He that ſins openly, appears to men what he is; but he that thus ſins ſecretly, thinks that it cannot appear to God what he is, or he hopes that God will never make it appear what he is. This is a great aggravation upon his ſin, and therefore Job puts a mark upon it, He will ſurely reprove you, although you, or, if you do ſecretly accept perſons: Do it as privately as you will, that ſhall be no excuſe to you; though ſome ſecrecy may mitigate ſin, yet no ſecrecy can acquit us of ſin.

Job

Job goes on yet to humble his Friends, and to shew them their error: He adds two Arguments further in the eleventh and twelfth verses. The first is taken from the Majesty of God, Shall not his excellency make you afraid? And the second is taken from the weakness and frailty of man in general, and of themselves in particular. Your remembrances are like unto ashes, your bodies to bodies of clay: Will you then contend with God? will you sin against him?

Aliqui ex Hebræis שאתו flammam exponunt. Annon ejus ignis vos terret?

Verse 11. Shall not his excellency make you afraid, and his dread fall upon you?

It is queried what is here meant by the excellency of God. The Hebrew word is derived from a root which signifieth to lift up. And some of the Jewish Doctors tell us, that there is a word of this form, which signifies a fire, or a flame; and so the Verb Nasha, signifies sometimes to burn or to consume, as well as to ascend, because the natural tendency of fire is upward, ascending as it burneth. And so they give the sence thus, Shall not the fire of the Lord make you afraid? shall not the flame of God terrifie you? What flame? what fire? The flame of his anger here, and the fire of his wrath for ever. There is a fire in hell (whether material, or metaphorical, is not a question for this place.) Shall not that fire of God make sinners afraid? Are you able to dwell with those everlasting burnings, with that consuming fire? The Saints, who are acquitted from their sins, shall dwell with God, who is an everlasting burning: but wicked men, whose sins rest upon them, shall be as the stubble, suddenly burnt, though never consumed.

Statim ut se commoverit, turbabit vos. Vulg. Commotio ejus versabit vos. Sept. Elevatio ejus. Reg. Complut. Elevare se idem est quod surgere & se ad puniendum accingere, cum punit Deus dicitur surgere, egredi, moveri loco suo. Adventus vel commotio dominipœnas instigentis hostium strepite comparatur in Scriptura, Merc.

But I pass that. Another reads it thus, Shall not he, as soon as he moveth himself, make you afraid? When God begins to rise, mah must fall: So the words bear an allusion to Magistrates, who sitting upon the seat of Judicature, when they come to give sentence upon a guilty person, begin to stir themselves, to rise majestically, and to compose their countenances into an aspect of terror and severity. Thus when the Lord begins to stir and move himself, will not you quake? The splendor of Majesty, which sits in his face, dazles the eyes, and overcomes the strength both of men and Angels.

Alludit ad terrorem quem Deus apparens incutere solebat. Bold.

Others conceive Job referring to that custom of God in those ancient times, when he appeared in a Cloud, or by some visible sign to his servants the Prophets, and other holy men: When the Lord did so declare his presence, we find (as it hath been observed in former passages of this book) that the holiest men were surprized with fear, and trembling took hold of them. Hence that humble deprecation of Job (Chap. 9. 34.) Let not his fear terrifie me.

Ista commotio est levatio vel extollentia, quare alii legunt excellentia ejus turbabit vos, i.e. statim ut suam majestatem & excellentiam conspicuam fecerit turbabimini. Pined.

Further, This stirring up may very well stand with our translation: For the Hebrew, Nasha, from whence this word cometh, signifies to lift up, to advance and extol: as it signifies the stirring and moving of a person when he riseth or lifteth himself up; so also his dignity or excellency, a civil rising or highness, as well as a local. Dying Jacob calls Reuben his first-born, The excellency of dignity, and the excellency of power. The priviledge of primogeniture was very great. The first-born were as Princes among their brethren: And from this word, a Duke or a Prince is called Nasha, because he is lifted up, or exalted above other men. Hence also, in an ill sence, the pride and sinful loftiness of man is often expressed by this word: for pride is the lifting up of our selves above our place and degree: when we in our thoughts rise beyond what we are, or are over-conceited of what we are, this is pride. Thus Moses and Aaron are falsely taxed (Numb. 16. 4.) Ye take too much upon you; wherefore lift you up your selves above the congregation of the Lord? (It is this word) why do you make your selves better then others, or greater then you are? Is it not the pride of your spirits? So (Isa. 14. 13.) the pride of the Assyrian is described, Thou hast said in thine heart, I will ascend into Heaven, I will exalt my throne above the Stars of God. He was not so mad as to think that he could literally get up into Heaven, or that he could set his Throne above the Stars; but the phrase noteth out the excessiveness of his pride. He was the highest Monarch on earth, and it was no pride for him to think himself so; (it is not pride for a King to think himself the greatest man in his Kingdom, for he is so) but when he would be higher then man, and do that which exceedeth the state of a creature, here was pride. The excellency of God is that height, dignity, glory, and majesty which he hath in himself, above and beyond all creatures, Shall not his excellency

Make you afraid? The word signifies extream fear, such fear as doth swallow up and amaze. Psal. 18. 4. The floods of ungodly men; or (nearer the letter.) The floods of the sons of belial; that is, the abundant ungodliness of those who are most ungodly, vomiting out reproaches and threatnings upon me, made me afraid. (Hest. 7. 6.) Haman was afraid before the King and the Queen: when Esther told Ahasuerus that he was the man that had conspired against the Jews, he was so afraid, that he sunk under his fear. (Isa. 21. 4.) My heart panted, fearfulness affrighted me ('tis this word) the night of my pleasure hath he turned into fear unto me; such a fear seized upon me, as turned all my pleasure into dread and terror.

Put all these together, and there are four or five wayes in which the sence of this question [Shall not his excellency make you afraid] may be made out.

Objicit illis rerum adversarum impatientiã, sæpe enim correpta Deo, constantiam quam nunc sani & felices habere videntur, admittent. Aquin.

First thus, As if Job did suggest to his Friends how suddenly they would discover their own weakness and fearfulness, though they now insulted over him, if the Lord did but appear in his excellency and greatness to them, as he had to him. As if he had said, You think you shall never be in such a plight as I am, whatsoever God doth with you: But you shall find it otherwise; you will tell me another tale if God do but once shew himself against you, and do with you as he hath done with me: You can now trample upon me, and think I am a man of a very fearful spirit; but if the Lord do but appear in his excellency, your strength will be no more then mine. Shall not his excellency make you afraid, and his dread fall upon you, as it hath done upon me? That's one sence.

Gravissimã suis amicis comminatur supplicium. Pin.

Secondly, Some conceive that Job doth only threaten his Friends with the terror of the Lord, and with the breakings forth of wrath, which they were to expect for what they had done against him. Shall not his excellency make you afraid? Certainly it shall; that is, the Lords power and greatness will at last make you know, that you have handled his cause ill, and done me wrong in handling it.

Thirdly, Shall not his excellency make you afraid? may refer to what he had said before, You have accepted the person of God, but should not his excellency make you afraid to do it? Mens greatness may make you willing to flatter them (few flatter their equals, and none will flatter their inferiours) because haply your dependance is upon them, and your expectations from them: but should not the excellency of God make you afraid to flatter him? The excellency of men may provoke you to favour them, and wrong inferiours to serve their turns; but such excellency as is in God should make you forbear to do so. There are two reasons why it should. First, God is above all your flattery and favour, he needs none of your help: Great men may have need of lyes and flatteries: but God hath none. Secondly, As the Lord is above the flatteries of men, and hath no need of them; so he doth abhor and abominate them. Many men love to be flatter'd, you can do nothing so pleasing to them as that; yea, though you flatter them with the obscuring and dimming of the true lustre of others: but the Lord likes it not. Should not such excellency make you afraid?

Tenendum quod Job hoc versu non terreat amicos sed præpostere territos, metu eminentiæ vel magnitudinis Dei accusat. Coc. Judicatis secundum personam potiorem non ex perspectione causæ. Id.

Fourthly, Others interpret the Interrogation affirmatively, Doth not his greatness make you afraid? Yes, his greatness doth make you afraid: You fear the greatness of God so much, that you thereupon condemn me: you are so afraid that you should in any thing tax the justice of God, that you must needs tax me for unjust: As if he had said, Is not this the reason that you deal thus with me? Is it not because the excellency of God doth over-awe you; therefore you would rather offend on my part then on his; you would be sure (as you hope) not to displease God, whatever becomes of me: you think (possibly) thus with your selves, If we should speak less for God then is his due, he is so great that he can punish it; but if we speak less for Job then his due, he is but our equal, what can he do? we need not fear him. Thus many understand the words, not as if Job did threaten his Friends with, but as if he only told them, that they were over-much afraid of the dignity and excellency of God, and thereupon were weighed down in their judgments to speak they cared not how hardly of him.

Fifthly, Shall not his excellency make you afraid? That is, his excellency ought to make you afraid. (Mal. 1. 6.) A son honoureth his father; that is, a son ought to honour his father; it is the duty of a son to honour his father. So here, Shall not his excellency make you afraid? that is, his excellency ought to make you afraid. It is a due and an equal thing that you should be so kept in awe by the Majesty of God, that you should not speak or do any thing to the prejudice of man. Should not his excellency make you afraid?

Observe from it, First, That the Lord hath an excellency in him,

Excellency is an excess in any quality, or a gradual heightning of any thing or person above another. We are to consider this, that we may give God glory, and praise him (as the Psalmist speaketh) according to his excellent greatness. God hath an excess of goodness in him; not an excess, as excess notes superfluity, or more then needeth; but an excess, as it notes more then is in any other besides himself. The excellency of God may be considered two wayes, First, Absolutely, as it is an excellency in himself; Secondly, comparatively to all other excellencies. God is excellent beyond compare; they who have an excellency, have none like unto Gods, or none at all compared with God. The Prophet tells us, that The Nations are as a drop of a bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the ballance; yea, all Nations are before him as nothing, and they are counted to him less then nothing, and vanity, Isa. 4. 15, 17. Besides the greatest excellency of man is a fading excellency (Job 4. 21.) Doth not their excellency which is in them go away? Men go away not only as they are poor and mean, but as clothed with excellency, whether outward excellency, or inward excellency: the beauty of the body, learning, wisdom, eloquence, the endowments and riches of the mind, all these excellencies which are in them, go away? Journeyeth it not with them (when they make their journey out of the world?) as Mr. Broughton reads that place. And as the excellency of all men (I mean their worldly excellency) shall go away, so especially shall the excellency of the hypocrite (Job 20. 6.) Though his excellency mount up to the heavens, and his head reach unto the clouds, yet he shall perish for ever. Hypocrites make a great shew, they have not only the profession of Religion, but often the beauty of Religion shining upon them; there is a verdure and flourishiug greenness upon their wayes to the view of man: but though their excellency mount up to the Heavens, yet down they shall, they shall lye down, and everlasting contempt shall cover them.

Further, We may open the excellency of God under a threefold notion.

First, There is an excellency of his Being.

Secondly, Of his Attributes.

Thirdly, Of his Works.

In all these we should acquaint our selves with his excellency.

First, There is an excellency in the Being of God; creatures have a being, but not such a being as God hath. For

First, The Being of God is of himself. All creatures have their being of him, and from him. Creatures have a derivative being; God is Original Being, the first Being. Here is the excellency of his Being. It is said (Habak. 1. 7.) of the Chaldeans, That their judgment and their dignity, or (it is the word of the Text) their excellency shall proceed of themselves. But is any man the fountain of his own happiness, excellency or greatness? Can it be said of any in the world, that his excellency shall proceed of himself? In one respect the excellency of some doth: In another respect it doth not, it cannot. It cannot be said of any excellency in creatures, strictly, that it proceedeth from themselves, all comes from God. But take a creature in its reference to any, or all other creatures, and so the excellency of some proceedeth from themselves, and not from other creatures. Such is the meaning of that place, Their judgment and their excellency shall proceed of themselves; that is, they shall not depend upon other persons, or Nations, they shall not imp [illegible] out their wings with other mens feathers, nor shall they shine with a borrowed glory. Some Kingdoms do glorious things, but their glory proceeds from neigbouring assistances: But the Chaldean needed not to confederate with any. Thus a creatures excellency may proceed from himself, not from other creatures; but all proceeds from God: and the excellency only of God in his Being is from himself alone, independent upon the creature.

Secondly, Gods Being is to himself as well as from himself: And thus also he excelleth man, whose being is not to himself, but to another; for all things are and were created unto God. No creature was made to it self. The dignity of God is to himself alone: He indeed doth give out himself voluntarily, and so his Being is for the good of others; but he hath this prerogative, to keep all his Being to himself: As it is the holiness of man to put forth his being for God; so it is the holiness of God, that his Being is for himself; he doth and may do all things for his own glory, as man ought to do all for the glory of God.

Thirdly, Gods Being is an unchangeable Being: Man is in motion every day, either in his increase, or in his decrease; he is either growing, or he is decaying, both in his natural and civil state. Man hath no consistency, while he is, he continueth not what he was. Man is a shadow, he is alwayes turning; but with God there is no variableness; nor shadow of turning. The Psalmist sets out this opposition between God and creatures (Psal. 106. 26, 27.) They shall perish, but thou shalt endure; yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment, as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed; but thou Lord art the same, and thy years shall have no end.

Fourthly, Mans being in this life, it is not only changeable, but determinable. Gods is an eternal Being, he is from everlasting to everlasting. We are short-breathed, short-lived creatures; if we number three or fourscore years, we are counted wondrous old; and when we have numbred all our years, they are no number at all to the years of God.

Fifthly, Mans being is but a particular being: The Being of God is an universal Being; he is a Being in all things, and yet not included in any; a Being without all things, and yet not excluded from any.

Sixthly, Mans being is such as man may comprehend; one man can measure another. No man hath any such excellency in him, but another may be found to take the length, and breadth, and depth of it, even all its dimensions. But Gods Being is an incomprehensible Being, there is no measuring, either of his Nature, of his Counsels, or of his Wayes.

Seventhly, The Being of God is an absolute perfect Being. Mans being is respective and imperfect; though it be perfect in its kind, as such a creature, yet it is not perfect in all kinds: Somewhat may be taken from man, and added to him, and he a man still; but God is so perfect, that nothing can be added to, or taken from him; all things are laid up in him: He is the sum and comprehension of all those excellencies which are scattered in the creature, and he infinitely excels them all.

The result of all these, is excellency. God hath not only a Being as we have, but an excellency, a glory in his Being above all other beings: The being of the creature is no being, we are but Non-entities compared with God. I am that I am, is his stile. God is the highest Entity, the Entity of all Entities.

Secondly, The excellency of God appears through all his Attributes.

Man is wise. There are many wise men in the world: But is man wise as God? The wisdom of man is foolishness to God; and the foolishness of God is wiser then men.

Man hath knowledge, but doth man know as God? Man knoweth not as God knoweth, if we consider either the matter or manner of knowledge. Man knoweth but some parts and pieces of things; God knoweth all things: Man knoweth but in part; God knoweth fully: Man knoweth one thing by another, he must beat out his way by argument, and know by demonstration, descending sometimes from the cause to the effect; ascending at other times from the effect to the cause: But God knoweth all things in themselves; He knows by immediate intuition: He seeth causes in themselves, not by their effects; and he seeth the effects in themselves, and not from their causes.

Man is just. There are just men: But is any man just as God? O the exactneſs of the juſtice of God! There is no errour in his judgement, he will give to every man according to his work. Where's the man that gives to any man according to his works?

Man is merciful: but is he merciful as God? Hath man ſuch a ſtock of mercy as he? Hath man mercy for ever? Hath man multitudes of mercies? Mans mercies are cruelties compared with the mercies of God.

Man is patient; but is he patient as God? If God had no more patience then man, or then all men and Angels too, his patience would be ſpent out in a day, it would not laſt one hour, amongſt ſo many ſinnings and provocations, among ſinnings after ſo many warnings.

Man hath love, but doth he love as God loveth? ſo freely? ſo fully? ſo conſtantly? ſo without ends and deſigns upon thoſe he loves? Our love is hatred compared to the love of God.

What ſhould I ſay of the power, of the holineſs, of the faithfulneſs, of the bounty of God? What of every thing that is attributed unto God? He is ſo excellent in every one, that he is all excellency.

Thirdly, There is an excellency in the Works of God: what God is in Being, the ſame he is in working. He is (Iſa. 28. 29.) Wonderful in counſel, and excellent in working. Excellent in working, becauſe excellent in being. Exod. 15. 7. In the greatneſs of thine excellency, thou haſt overthrown them that roſe up againſt thee. (Deut. 33. 26.) There is none like the God of Jeſurun (that is, the God of Iſrael) who rideth upon the heaven to thy help, and in his excellency on the skie? God is ſaid to ride to the help of his people, becauſe he helps them ſpeedily; and he rideth in his excellency, that he may ſhew his ſtate and magnificence when he comes to help them. When God works in his excellency, we ſhall ſee the excellencies of God imprinted upon his works. Haſt thou an arm like God? ſaith Elihu to Job, or canſt thou thunder with a voice like him? Canſt thou teach like God? (ſaith he alſo). We may ſay to the worker, Canſt thou work like God? to the Teacher, Canſt thou teach like God? to the Souldier, Canſt thou fight like God? Now, as there is an excellency in the Being, Attributes and Works of God, ſo this his excellency ſhould ſtrongly affect and overawe our hearts: Should not his excellency make you afraid?

Hence Obſerve, The excellency of God ſhould keep men in a holy compoſure of ſpirit, in a holy care to pleaſe him, in a holy fear of offending him.

What? before the excellency of God, before a God ſo excellent in Being, ſo excellent in the manner of his Being, ſo excellent in working, and we walk looſely and careleſly? Let this excellency of his make us afraid. The Lord moſt high is terrible, (Pſal. 47. 2.) he is terrible becauſe ſo high. The Preacher in his deſcription of old men, ſaith, They ſhall be afraid of that which is high, (Eccleſ. 12. 5.) Old age loves to keep upon even ground, for fear of falling: But the youngeſt and ſtouteſt of men, they who are moſt ambitious of clambring unto high places, have cauſe to be afraid of the moſt high God, and when he diſcovers his highneſs they will be afraid. Men never fear that which is but equal to them; and until they conceive an excellency in God, they never fear him. David prayeth that God would be pleaſed to ſhew his excellency, his greatneſs and his highneſs to his enemies, (Pſal. 7. 6.) Ariſe, O Lord, in thine anger, lift up thy ſelf becauſe of the rage of mine enemies, for their ſakes return thou on high. Why would he have God to lift up himſelf and to return on high? The Lord is ever on high: The meaning is, Do thou declare thy ſelf to be on high, let thy excellency appear above all. Why? What will be the effect of this? So (ſaith he) ſhall the congregation of the people compaſs thee about; that is, they ſhall crouch and fall down before thee when thou appeareſt in thy highneſs. When Chriſt appeared in his highneſs, though but as a Lamb, upon his throne, all the congregation did compaſs him about, terrour and aſtoniſhment ſurprized them all: The kings of the earth and the chief captains, called to the mountains and rocks to fall on them, to hide them from the face of him that ſate on the throne, Rev. 6. 16.

Nonne quã. erigetur ipſe ſuper ſolium judicii, &c. Tar.

The Chaldee Paraphraſt gloſſeth this text of Job, Shall ye not be afraid when the Lord is lifted up, or ſet upon his throne of judgement? They who now ſlight the Lord, ſhall then tremble at the Lord, and before the preſence of his Majeſty, when he ariſeth to ſhake terribly the earth.

Laſtly, Foraſmuch as Job having charged his friends with accepting the perſon of God, and with ſpeaking falſly in favour of him, ſubjoyns in this verſe, Shall not his excellency make you afraid?

Obſerve, That all our undue ſpeakings and actings for, or in the cauſe of God, ariſe from our undue apprehenſions of God.

We conceive of God after the rate and proportion of a man, and meaſure him by our own ſpan. Hence it is that many in ſtead of adoring and fearing God, do indeed but play with him, and take the liberty of an ungovern'd boldneſs, both concerning his counſels and his judgements. What becomes of the excellency of God, when he is drawn down to the reaſon, and narrow'd, or rather nothing'd into the capacities of a creature? We never abaſe our ſelves as we ought, nor keep our diſtance, till we are rapt into the meditation of his divine excellencies and perfections. When David puts thoſe humbling, emptying queſtions, (Pſal. 8. 4.) What is man that thou art mindful of him? and the ſon of man that thou viſiteſt him? When he (I ſay) puts theſe queſtions, ſee where his heart was (verſ. 9.) O Lord our God, how excellent is thy name in all the earth! When he thought of the excellency of Gods name, he did not think himſelf worth the naming, What is man? while he thought who God was, he did not think himſelf worthy of one of Gods thoughts, What is man that thou art mindful of him? The Angels cover their faces before God; they adore, but they cannot bear his glory. They that know God, fear him, and they who know him moſt (ſo do Angels) fear him moſt. The more excellent any creature is, the more he fears the excellency of the Creatour. Shall not his excellency make you afraid?

And his dread fall upon you?

Pavor, timor, ad metũ ab externa vi aut authoritate incuſſum ſolet referri. Riv.

His dread.] The words bear the ſame ſenſe with the former, therefore I ſhall not ſtay upon them. His dread: The Original imports a fear riſing from ſome outward cauſe. Divine fear is cauſed three wayes; Firſt, by the rule or precept of the law. Secondly, By the penalty or threatnings of the law. Thirdly, By thoſe judgements which are inflicted for the tranſgreſſion of the law. We may underſtand the text of fear, by all theſe. Shall not his dread, the dread of the precept, which is ſo holy: the dread of the threatning, which is ſo terrible: the dread of the judgements of God, which are ſo exemplary, fall upon you?

Fall upon you?] The dread of God is from above, as lodged on high, and ſo comes down (as it were) with an advantage upon tranſgreſſours, (Rev. 11. 11.) It is ſaid that when ten parts of the city fell, fear fell upon the reſt. Fear fell upon them, as a ſtone from an high tower, and cruſht their ſpirits. The Apoſtle ſpeaks this notion, Rom. 1. 18. The wrath of God is revealed from heaven. As if heaven did open to let his wrath down, or to diſcharge it like a thunderbolt upon unrighteous men. The Spaniards have a proverb (which an interpreter remembreth upon this place) God hath the hill and the ſtones, which is as much as to ſay, God hath the upper ground of all creatures, and his wrath falls upon them as ſtones from an high place. We may contend with angry men upon even ground, creature with creature, but God hath the upper ground of all creatures, his wrath falls upon us. He hath the hill, yea he hath the wind and the ſun of us, he hath all advantages on his ſide, there is no ſtanding out againſt him.

Semper ex ſublimi loco pugnare adverſus mortales Deus dicitur; quod in Hiſpanorũ proverbio eſt: Ipſius mons & lapides ſunt. Pined.

Hence Note, Firſt, God is to be dreaded.

To be dreaded in the juſtice of his law, in the ſeverity of his threatnings, in the greatneſs of his judgements; from each of theſe, dread falls like a mighty milſtone upon the heads of unbelievers and obdurate ſinners. Juſtice appears with open face in the law, threatnings lie virtually in the law: judgements are ſeminally in the threatnings, and threatnings are viſibly in judgements. God is to be dreaded, when we hear the rule of the law; he is to be feared more, when we hear the threatnings of the law; he is to be feared moſt, when we hear or ſee thoſe threatnings executed in judgements. The man (saith Moses, Deut. 17.12,13.) that doth presumptuously (by sinning against the rule of the law) shall die (by suffering the penalty of the law) and all the people shall hear and fear, and do no more presumptuously.

Secondly Observe, The dread of God shall certainly fall upon sinners.

As it noteth a duty, that we should dread God, so an event that such as continue in sin, the dread of God will fall upon them. The dread of God will surely take hold of sinners, unless they get Christ to be their Saviour: No fence against the dread of God but Christ: For as one Scripture saith, The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all unrighteousness: So, another saith, He is Jesus that delivereth us from the wrath to come. There is no wrath escaping, but by a Mediator.

Vers. 12. Your remembrances are like unto ashes, and your bodies to bodies of clay.

This verse is an Antithesis to the words before. Job having perswaded his friends to silence, and to desist their unfriendly carriage towards him, by an argument taken from the excellency of God; now moveth them by an argument from their own weakness and infirmity; Shall not his excellency make you afraid? and his dread fall upon you? vers. 11. There he tells them who God is, and that they ought to stand in awe of him. Here in this 12th, he tells them what they are, and how they ought to be abased in the sense of their own frailty; Your remembrances are like unto ashes, your bodies to bodies of clay. Hold your peace, &c. Will you, who are clay and ashes stand it out against his excellency?

Your remembrances are like unto ashes.] The letter of the Hebrew is, Your remembrances are parables of ashes, or have the similitude and likeness of ashes in them.

There is much variety of opinion about the meaning of those words. Some expound them as a threatning against his friends: Your remembrances are like unto ashes, that is, your remembrances shall be brought to ashes, or, you shall be made like unto ashes. To bring one to ashes, is an effect of wrath; the fire of Gods wrath quickly consumes man to ashes. Ashes are a sign and a monument of extreamest anger. So the Apostle Peter speaks of Sodom and Gomorrah, in his second Epistle, chap. 2.6. Where, proposing Gods judgement upon those cities, he saith, And turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly. And the Apostle Jude, describing the destruction of the same cities, saith, They suffered the vengeance of eternal fire, they were turned into ashes for ever: For, as if that fire burned or were not quenched unto this day; he calls it an eternal fire: or the reason may be, because they went from one fire to another, from the fire which God rained down from heaven, to the fire which he hath prepared for the ungodly in hell: Historians speak of the marks of this vengeance of God upon Sodom and Gomorrah, as still remaining. Some call that place, The Region of ashes. And Josephus reports it, as the tradition of those times, that the apples of Sodom were fair and pleasant to the eye, as if fit to be eaten, but as soon as they were touched, they turned to ashes. Some Interpreters (I say) conceive Job hinting that judgement of God upon Sodom and Gomorrah, thereby admonishing his friends, that as God turned those cities into ashes, so if they should provoke his excellency, he could quickly deal with them, and make them an everlasting argument of his displeasure. Though I stay not upon this Exposition;

Yet because it contains a general truth, take one Note from it:

That, If God be provoked he can soon turn all into ashes, weaken the strength, and blast the beauty of man.

As the Lord speaks to Abimelech, Gen. 20. 3. Thou art but a dead man, because of the woman which thou hast taken; for she is a mans wife: As if he should say, I can quickly destroy thee, turn thee into the grave, tumble thee into the earth, though thou art a king and a great one. The Roman History speaks of Cæsar, that when Metellus the Tribune controlled his orders, about the publick Treasure, Be quiet (saith he) lest I lay thee dead in the place; yet correcting himself, he added, Young man, it is harder for me to speak it, then to do it; which he spake to mollifie the sharpness of his speech, as not proceeding from his nature, but his passion, and as being grieved at the harshness of his own language. If the Kings and Potentates of the earth speak at such a rate, that they can easier destroy men, then say they will destroy; how much more may God? This is really true of him who is the only Potentate, the Lord of heaven and earth, that it is as easie for him to destroy persons and nations, and to make their remembrance to be as ashes, as it is for him to say he will.

Some others speak higher (a), and interpret this text, as they say probably, of eternal fire: as if Job had threatned his friends with damnation. Shall not his excellency make you afraid? Your remembrances are like unto ashes, you shall be turned into hell, and sent to everlasting destruction. But I approve this less then the former. Job was displeased with his friends for their opinions concerning him: yet doubtless he had a better opinion of them, then to judge them under such a displeasure of God.

Thirdly, Your remembrances is expounded actively thus, the things which you remember (b), the reasonings, objections and records which you have brought out of the store-house of your memories against me, and would have remembred, are like unto ashes, utterly extinct and easily blown away. The word Remembrance, is used in that sence, (Exod. 17.14.) Where Moses is commanded to write a memorial against Amalek, that is to record somewhat as a remembrance against them: Records, and the officer that keeps records, are both expressed by this word, because they preserve the remembrances of what is past.

Though this hath a fair sense, yet it seemeth not to be so clear to the connection of these words, therefore I rather incline upon a fourth interpretation, (c) taking this remembrance more generally for any thing which is memorable in man; as riches, dignity, power, credit, learning, wisdom. As if Job had said, These things by which you hope to be remembred and become famous in the world, are but ashes; that is, mean, and of no consistence. (Prov. 10.7.) The memory of the just is blessed, but the name of the wicked shall rot. The memory, that is, when persons living in after-ages shall remember the just, they will bless them and highly esteem them; but the name and credit of wicked men shall consume as a rotten thing to nothing.

Taking their remembrance for that which was most memorable in them, We may Observe,

That the best things, those things which are most remarkable and memorable in man, are but vain, and subject to a sudden decay.

What men lay by, and esteem as a monument to posterity, or as a memorial to preserve their names to all generations, how often is it scattered like ashes in the air, or spilt like water upon the ground, which cannot be gathered up? Men for their remembrance, use to set up the most lasting materials, pillars of marble, or Pyramids of stone. It is said of Absolom, that he in his life time had taken and reared up for himself a pillar, and he called it after his own name, because he had no son to keep his name in remembrance: Yet that remembrance of his, proved like ashes, and so will all that whatsoever it is, which vain men frame or fancy to themselves to make them memorable and renowned among posterity or succeeding ages. Your remembrances are like unto ashes; which will receive a clearer evidence when I have a little opened the latter clause of this verse.

And your bodies to bodies of clay.

That is, As ashes are a fit parable or similitude to shadow out all the permanency or excellency of your remembrances, so a body or a heap of clay, is a sufficient parable or similitude of all the value and dignity of your bodies.

Your bodies.] The word (Gab) which we translate body, signifies any thing, which is high, lifted up and eminent, or the upper and superiour part of any thing. It is said (John 19. 13.) that Pilate sate down in the judgement-seat, in a place that is called in the Hebrew, Gabbatha. Seats of judgement are erected and set up in eminent places, ces, that so the Judge may be in the peoples view. According to which acceptation of the word, the meaning rises thus, That which is highest in you, your greatest elevations, are like to a lump of clay. And so the opposition stands fair between this and the former verse; there Job tells his friends, that the excellency of God may justly make them afraid. But what is your excellency? As your remembrances, or whatsoever is most memorable in you are like unto ashes, so all your excellencies, compared with the excellency of God, are but like a clod of clay.

(a) Forte etiam extremũ Gehennæ supplicium cineris nomine proponitur, vel significat mortẽ ignobilẽ. Pined.

Hence Observe, That which is most high and excellent in man, compared with the excellency of God, is but like to dirt or clay.

Quicquid in vobis est maxime memorabile & altum, si cum Deo cōparabitur nihil est. Jun. Eminentiæ vestræ dignæ sunt, quæ ad quisquiliarū & luti cumulos projiciantur. Bold.

All the dignities and eminencies of man are but fit to be swept to the dunghill when God is named. When Abraham a Prince, and a great one too, stood before the Lord, he hath no valuation for himself but by dust and ashes, Gen. 18. 27. We cannot but have low thoughts of our selves (what worldly and carnal heights soever we are in) when we truly remember the high God. There are three things upon which many men raise themselves very high, even to think themselves like the most High, as it is said of Lucifer. First, Their riches. Riches are not only a strong but a high Tower; this eminency is most like to clay, yea it is an eminency in clay or thick clay, as the Prophet speaketh (Hab. 2.) Secondly, Men think themselves very high if they get upon the pinacle of honour, from this height they look down upon, and despise all as underlings; yet this is but like clay too, how often have the greatest earthly honours been laid in the dust? Thirdly, Others are lifted up with their natural wisdom, their learning, parts and gifts. They who contemn riches and honour, are yet puffed up with a conceit of their inward endowments: yet as God will destroy all the wisdom of this world, so the wisdom of the best men in the world is foolishness compared to God. If some one creature hath such an excelling excellency, that other excellent creatures (as the Stars to the Sun) have no excellency in the presence of it, how much more are all created excellencies swallowed up at the thought of that excellency which is in God? must not all go for clay and ashes, when we have once mentioned him?

Gab est extātia clypei. Umbones vestri i.e. argumenta vestra sunt fragilia. Ista quæ vos ut diligētey observata commemoratis, & in me tanquam certa quædā axiomata decenatis, nō sunt solidiora quā cinis, et lutea propugnacula. Bez.

Further, The word signifies also the bosses of a buckler (Job 15. 27.) because bosses are the most eminent part of a buckler, being set out for the ornament of it. Thus some translate it here, The bosses of your bucklers, or your bucklers are like bucklers of clay. But what was the buckler of Jobs friends? their buckler was their arguments and their reasons, which they urged against Job. Arguments are amongst Disputants, their weapons, their sword and buckler. The third interpretation of the former clause, and this, comply fairly, Your remembrances, that is, the things you have remembred to or against me are like unto ashes, and Your bucklers, that is, your arguments and objections are like unto clay, weak and poor, however you think they are strong, impregnable and unanswerable. The Apostle useth a similitude which may give some light to this (1 Cor. 3. 12.) where he compares sound doctrine to gold, silver, and precious stones, but corrupt doctrine, to wood, hay, stubble.

Et corpora vestra corporibus luteis, i.e. acervis luteis. Redigentur in lutū cervices vestri. Vulg.

Thirdly, We translate, Your bodies, so the word signifies by a Trope, because the body of man stands upright, and is lifted up: Man doth not go groveling upon or toward the ground as a beast goeth, but he hath an erect figure and form, therefore his body is called Gab, that is, lifted, or raised up. Others render it by a part of the body, the back or the neck: So the Vulgar, Your necks which are lifted up shall be brought down to the clay. But I rather keep to our rendring of the word, by the whole body, then by a part or member of it; As if Job had said, Your bodies, which in regard of the figure and frame of them are lifted up, as if they did scorn the earth, are yet but pieces of earth and clods of clay; you trample upon earth and clay as things below you, yet you are no better then the things you trample upon, even earth and clay: and to them these bodies of yours must shortly be reduced and resolved into as their first principles, though now you look big upon me and carry it high.

Hence Observe, First, The body of man, how strong, how beautiful soever, is but a piece of earth and clay.

First, It is clay in regard of the baseness and meanness of it: earth is the meanest of the elements, the lowest and worst of all, so is the body the meanest part of man.

Secondly, It is clay in regard of the brickleness of it, it breaks quickly like a Potters vessel.

But it may be said, Why doth Job speak thus to his friends? Why doth he tell them that their bodies are bodies of clay? Did not they know that before? Need any man be told that his body is formed out of the earth, and that it turneth to the earth again? Especially needed these friends of Job, who were men of such knowledge and wisdom, yea of holiness too, needed they to be taught that their bodies were bodies of clay?

I answer, We may know many things which we are not affected with. There is a twofold knowledge of things: There is a knowing of things in the notion, or a speculative knowledge; and there is a knowing of things in the application, or a practical knowledge of them. Doubtless they knew this speculatively, but Job thought they did not know it practically. They would never (as he supposed) have been so stiff towards him, if they had remembred that themselves were clay. A man hath some knowledge wherein he differeth little from a beast, which hath no knowledge. The Prophet teacheth this for truth, (Jer. 10. 14.) Every man is brutish in his knowledge. A strange speech; it might rather be said, that every man is brutish in his ignorance; though a beast cannot properly be called ignorant, yet a beast hath no knowledge: How is it then that he saith, every man is brutish in his knowledge? It is because though every man knows that which a beast cannot, yet he doth not make that improvement of it which a man (especially which a Saint) should and might. This is a kind of brutishness in knowledge: And when he saith, Every man is brutish in his knowledge, it is a very large word, for are godly men brutish in their knowledge? surely no; then every man here, is every wicked man, and all such are brutish in their knowledge. Though a wicked man knoweth that his body is a body of clay, though he knoweth there is a God, and a Christ, and if you speak to him of these things, he will say, he knows them as well as you, yet he is brutish in the knowledge he hath of them all. Every wicked man is so; yea in every thing he knoweth and doth, he is brutish. I conceive also that place of the Prophet may take in godly men, in a mitigated sense, even they are brutish in their knowledge; Why? because they do not improve their knowledge to that height which they might, they do not that good, nor raise that glory to God by their knowledge, which the talents they are entrusted with, call for. The Apostle Jude concludes of wicked men, That which they know naturally, in that like brute beasts they corrupt themselves: and I may say, what the Saints know spiritually, if they corrupt themselves, or are corrupted in any of that knowledge, so far they know but like brute beasts: Therefore though this is a common lesson, yet it is but need to press it upon all, as Job here doth: It is not without cause that men are told that their bodies are bodies of clay. It is no easie-matter to know our selves in those things which are easily known. It is a good determination which one hath made concerning knowledge: First, He that knoweth not what he should, is a beast among men. Secondly, He that knoweth no more then needs must, is a man among beasts. Thirdly, He that knoweth all that he may know, is as a God among men: This third must be taken thus: He that knoweth all objects knowable within the compass of man, and he that beateth out the knowledge of those objects to the full, making the highest improvement of them, this man is as a God among men: and he may well be called so, seeing there are very few who ever arrived to this height about any one object of knowledge, and (I believe) never any one attained it in reference unto all.

Now while we find Job teaching this plain piece of knowledge, that our bodies are bodies of clay, it teacheth us three Lessons.

First, That man is a proud piece of flesh, and therefore hath need to be told that he is but clay.

Secondly, That pride ariseth either from ignorance, or forgetfulness of what we are.

David desired the Lord to teach him how frail he was, Psal. 39. Though David was a very holy and a knowing man, yet he knew not that plain point. Some think it so common a truth that no man needs be taught that man is mortal. One great reaſon why immortality is ſo little looked after, is becauſe our mortality is ſo little looked into. We know little either of the power of God, or of the weakneſs of man; and many who have ſome knowledge of theſe cannot be ſaid to make any uſe of them: their knowledge lies mouldring by the walls, they do not act the things they know; ſuch knowledge leaveth a man in a worſe condition then ignorance doth. Beſides, a man that forgets what he is, will be as proud as he that knows not what he is: Forgetfulneſs is a temporary ignorance: how much ſoever any man knows, yet he can uſe no more then he remembers, and 'tis ſeldom that he uſeth all that.

Thirdly, The meaneſt things in the world, are parables or ſimilitudes, fit to ſet forth what the outward ſtate of man is.

What the work of God is upon the ſoul, is not before us now. That's precious indeed both for matter and form, there are engravings and ſtamps upon the ſoul of a glorious excellency: But (I ſay) take man in his outſide, and then the meaneſt and pooreſt things in the world are parables of man, our bodies are like bodies of clay. The Apoſtle Peter calleth his body an earthly tabernacle, (2 Pet. 1. 13.) I know I muſt ſhortly lay down my earthly tabernacle: The body is a tabernacle, and that is an uncertain dwelling, it is not built as an houſe that hath foundations. And if you call it an houſe, yet it is not a houſe of marble, but of clay, Job 4. 19. Other Scriptures call it, an earthen veſſel, (2 Cor. 4. 7.) We have this treaſure (ſaith the Apoſtle, but it is) in earthen veſſels. They had the treaſure of all Goſpel truths, of Goſpel graces and of Goſpel gifts; theſe precious treaſures they carried about with them, but all in earthen veſſels: Yea, the body of man is not only called earthen, but whole man is called earth, and as if he could never be called earth enough, he is called earth three times over in one verſe, (Jer. 22. 29.) O earth, earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord: Which words, though they may well, and (poſſibly) moſt properly in that place be taken as an appeal (uſual in Scripture) to the whole body of the earth, yet they have a clear truth, as applyed to the bodies of men made of earth; all men on earth have earthen bodies, and moſt men have earthen mindes too, and ſo very earth, or earth, earth, earth, nothing but earth. It is reported in the French Hiſtory, that when an old Counſellor would needs depart the Court, and retire himſelf to a private life, the King deſired him to leave him his advice in ſome general rules, what to do in the government of the kingdom; at which motion he took a fair Paper, and wrote upon the top of the leaf, moderation, and in the middle of the leaf, moderation, and at the bottom of the leaf, moderation: His meaning was, as if he had ſaid to that King, Sir, if you would keep your kingdom quiet, carry the reins of your government moderately quite through. So here, if the queſtion ſhould be, what is man? and a blank paper were preſented me to ſet down Jobs opinion of him, I muſt write on the top of the leaf, earth, in the middle, earth, at the bottom earth: His remembrances are like unto aſhes, and his body to a body of clay.

Job having taken his friends down by theſe arguments, and cooled their ſpirits, thinks now they may be dealt withal, and therefore concludes,

Verſ. 13. Hold your peace, let me alone that I may ſpeak, and let come on me what will.

From the connection of theſe words, We may Obſerve,

That a man when he is humbled, is in a good temper to hear counſel.

Your bodies are bodies of clay, now, Let me alone, hold your peace that I may ſpeak; If you attend your own condition, you will the better attend my counſel. Pride of heart ſtoppeth the ear. They who have high thoughts of themſelves, think meanly of what is ſaid unto them by others. Were men low in their own eyes, they would embrace every advice that hath truth and holineſs in it.

At the fifth verſe Job ſaid, O that you would altogether hold your peace; here he turns his wiſh into a charge.

Hold your peace, let me alone that I may ſpeak.

But doth Job, as many, who becauſe they love to hear themſelves ſpeak, deſire others to hold their peace? Doth Job ſpeak thus becauſe he would have all the talk? Or becauſe he was reſolved to have the laſt word?

Job's modeſty and humbleneſs of mind may acquit him from ſuch imputations. This his forwardneſs to ſpeak, and importunity for audience, did both ariſe, not from his own deſire to ſpeak, but from a willingneſs to rectifie what his friends had ſpoken amiſs, and to ſet himſelf right in their opinions: or he adviſes them to hold their peace, leſt by ſpeaking as they had done, they ſhould loſe their peace. Many break not only the outward peace of others, but the inward peace of their own ſouls, becauſe they cannot (in this ſenſe) hold their peace. There might be much more peace then there is, in our hearts, in our houſes, in the Commonwealth, in the Church, if we could teach our tongues to hold their peace, when it is unſeaſonable to ſpeak. There is a time to be ſilent and a time to ſpeak; could we time our tongues well, how well might we time our actions; becauſe our words are ſo unruly, therefore our wayes are ſo uneven. Job ſaw it was time for his friends to hold their peace, and time for him to ſpeak: Therefore he ſaith, Hold your peace, let me alone that I may ſpeak.

But why doth Job add, Let come on me what will. A ſtrange kind of ſpeech. Doth it become a man to be ſo reſolute, or rather (as the words at firſt view import) ſo deſperate? Is not here the voice of deſperation? Would any wiſe man ſpeak ſo?

Let come on me what will.

The Vulgar tranſlateth this part of the verſe thus, Hold your peace that I may ſpeak what ſoever my mind ſuggeſteth to me, or Hold your peace, let me ſpeak what ſoever comes into my mind; as if Job would ſpeak any thing that came next, or floated uppermoſt in his phancy, ſo ſome gloſs the interpretation of the Vulgar, which is indeed diſhonourable to ſuppoſe of him. Shall we think that he cared not how he ſpake, who had ſo often reproved his friends for ſpeaking careleſly? Would he run headlong into that errour, which he had ſo ſeverely reprehended?

Tacete paululiſper ut loquar quodcunq; mihi mens ſuggeſſerit. Vulg. Loquar quicquid in buccam venerit.

Let come upon me what will.] The word [Let come] ſignifies to paſs over, or paſs upon; ſo then, I will ſpeak, let what will paſs upon me, is no more but this, let what cenſure ſoever paſs upon me, cenſure me how you will, I will ſpeak, or I will ſpeak how ever you take it.

Loquar & tranſeat ſuper me quid vis. Vatab. Quocunq; res ſit caſura pro me loquar. Bez. Loquar meo periculo quicquid tandē mihi ſit eventurū.

Or, It may refer to the determination of God, I will ſpeak and ſtand to his ſentence, let him paſs what judgement he pleaſeth concerning me, I am reſolved to maintain my cauſe: as we ſay in our language, when we are reſolved to do a thing, Fall back or fall edge I will do it.

Job in theſe words removeth a ſecond pretence which his friends made for what they had ſpoken.

Firſt, They ſaid, they did all for the glory of God, and to maintain his juſtice. As to that, he told them roundly before, that God needed none of their patronage, Will you ſpeak wickedly for God? will you talk deceitfully for him? He deſires not your lies to defend and uphold his cauſe.

There was a ſecond thing which his friends held forth as a ground of their counſels, and that was the tender care and compaſſion which they had of Job himſelf, leſt going on thus complaining, yea as they thought, thus blaſphemeing, the Lord ſhould bring ſomewhat worſe, then ever yet he had brought upon him. As Job therefore takes off the former pretence before, ſo he takes off this here: As if he had ſaid, You ſeem to be very tender of me, leſt God ſhould lay ſome further judgement upon me for maintaining my integrity, but I will ſpeak, come of it what will, at my peril be it, I will bear all the blame my ſelf, take you no care, have you but patience to hear me ſpeak, let all the trouble that may enſue be on my ſcore, I will be accountable to God for it. 'Tis true, Job being provoked ſpeaks this with ſome heat, and was deſirous rather to caſt himſelf wholly upon God then to hear his friends any longer.

Ego de me ipſo rationē reddā Deo & quicquid peccavero luā: Interim non ſine ſtomacho hoc dicit, ſed irritatus à ſociis & domino ſe malens committere quā tales nugas audire. Merc.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, An upright heart is very reſolute; I will ſpeak, and let come to me what will.

There is nothing that can make a man afraid, who is not afraid of himſelf. The righteous is bold as a Lyon. As one of the ancient Martyrs ſpake when his perſecutors terrified him him with threatnings, There is nothing (saith he) of things visible, nothing of things invisible, that I fear; I will stand to my profession of the Name of Christ, and contend earnestly for the Faith once delivered to the Saints, let come on't what will. It is said of Luther, when he was to go to the Meeting at Worms, that being informed by his friends that he had many enemies lying in wait to ruine him, Tell me not of it (saith he) for I will go, though there be as many Devils to assault me as there be tiles upon the houses. Thus the Apostle Paul (Acts 21. 10.) when some did weep and mourn over him, because it was propheſied that he should be bound at Jerusalem; Agabus had bound himself with Paul's girdle, and said, So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle; and thereupon they intreated him to forbear going up: Forbear? (saith he) No, I will go to Jerusalem, I am ready, not to be bound only at Jerusalem, but to dye there for the Name of the Lord Jesus: I'le put it to a venture. When once Hesters heart was set upon it to engage for the deliverance of the Jews, she would on, I will go in to the King, which is not according to the Law (I know I run an hazard) and if I perish, I perish: I am upon a good ground, and in a good cause, though I fail in some outward formalities, yet I will venture. Thus will an upright heart speak, thus will an upright heart do: An upright heart will both speak and do, let come on it what will; let the world be pleased or displeased; let the world frown or smile; let the world be angry or imbrace. And it is the same phrase in the Hebrew which we have (2 Sam. 18. 23.) when Ahimaaz would go and carry the tidings of Absalom's death unto David (Joab had sent Cushi with the message before, yet Ahimaaz would needs run after him) Let me, I pray thee, (saith he to Joab) run after Cushi: And Joab said, wherefore wilt thou run my son, seeing thou hast no tidings ready? But howsoever (said he) let me run; I have a mind to carry this message howsoever; that is, Let come on me what will. Even so saith the soul in its uprightness and resolvedness upon the wayes of God, though checkt with why would you do so? Howsoever let me go, though you think it is to no purpose, yet let me go on: Let come of it what will, I resign the issue wholly to God.

וידרמה Et sic quicquid.

Secondly, When Job speaks thus, Let come on it what will, you must know he had very good ground for what he spake, he knew whom he trusted; and trust him he would, though he slew him, as we shall hear him professing with his next breath.

Hence Note, An upright heart never feareth any hurt from God.

Non desperati verba sunt, sed bene potius sperantis de Deiope quia mox suæ spei rationem reddit. Merc.

You think I am running upon the spears point, even upon the displeasure of God; well, I'le try that; Let come on it what will, I have not one jealous thought of God: As one in sickness and pain, ready to dye, seeing his friends about him mourn, said, Do not trouble your selves, I know God will do me no hurt. Job was willing to bear any thing at Gods hand, even a slaying, and yet he believed he should not bear the weight of his little finger (as we say) upon the account of reproof. Job was not desperate, nor did he defie or dare God, as wicked men use to do: tell them of hell, they care not for hell; tell them God will be angry, they regard not his anger. A gracious heart cannot slight, and would not for a world willingly incur the least displeasure, or so much as a frown from God; a frown from God would go to his very heart. But he can speak out of the height of his confidence, that in any just thing he will on, and bear all the blame which God will lay upon him, being well assured, that God will lay no blame upon him at all from his anger or justice, though in his wise providence, he should lay a multitude of the soarest afflictions upon him.

But what is it which makes the Saints so resolute with God, that they fear not any hurt from God?

How can they fear any hurt from God, when they have so many promises of good from God? God hath not spoken one hard word against them all the Bible over; nor will he bear it that any should speak any thing but good concerning them. Say to the righteous, it shall be well with him. The Apostle assures us, That the Law (namely in the threatnings of it) is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly, and for sinners, &c. The Law was not set to bring any of the punishments which are threatned there upon the righteous and holy: The godly man needs not fear any hurt from the Law, because the Law is not made to punish or to condemn a righteous man, though it be set to guide and order the conversation of a righteous man: But the Law is made for the wicked, they have cause to fear all the terrors of it, and God will at last open the treasury of his wrath, and bring out all the weapons of his indignation that lye there, and strike them through. Now if the Saints fear not the threatnings of the Law, what need they fear any thing? Other parts of the word are full of their consolations: Yea whatsoever was written heretofore, was written for their learning, that they through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope, and so rest their souls sweetly in the arms of God, as in the arms of a tender Father. Why should they be afraid of any evil from God, who hath promised them so much good? Yea, that all shall work together for good to them: May not this make any good man say confidently, I will do my duty, come on it what will: What can come of it but good? because the Lord hath said, all shall work together for good; though happily I shall have a cross, it will be a good; though the Lord leave me to the cruel dealings of men, it will be good. But especially while we look up and consider what Jesus Christ hath done, what Christ hath suffered, what Christ hath undertaken, and stands engaged in on their behalf, they may well put themselves upon God, and appeal not only to his mercy, but stand to the utmost of his justice They may expect hard measure from men (and the best is, they can do well enough, let men do their worst) but as for all the hard measure they shall receive from God, I dare (as we say in our common speech) excuse them for a penny; I may say to any upright and faithful soul, such an one as Job was, Go on, let come on it what will, I will bear all the chidings, yea all the smart thou shalt ever hear or feel from God.

Job having by these Arguments, taken from the excellency of God, and his Friends baseness, prepared their minds to attention, and taken upon him a resolution to speak, speaks home in the next words, Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth, &c.

VERS. 14, 15, 16.

Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth, and put my life in mine hand?
Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him; but I will maintain mine own wayes before him.
He also shall be my salvation, for an hypocrite shall not come before him.

JOB resolved to speak in the former verse, and here he speaks indeed. But doth he not bite his own tongue? Or rather, Doth not his tongue bite him? while he saith, Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth? It is the Apostles great Axiome, founded in the Laws of Nature (Eph. 5. 29.) No man ever hated his own flesh, but loveth and cherisheth it, &c. Job speaks as if he hated, or were cruel to his own flesh; Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth, &c? But if we inquire into this speech, we shall find it an Argument, not of any hatred against himself, but of abundant love to, and faith in God.

The words in general set forth the temper and state of Job's spirit, or in what frame of heart he stood ready to speak unto God, having before resolved to speak: As if he had said, I am far enough from rage, or from despair; I am neither out of my wits, nor out of my hopes; I come to plead my cause with God, having my heart fill'd with strong confidence in God, resting and reposing my self upon him, and giving all that I have or am unto him: Let me speak (saith he in the former verse) and let come on me what will; at my peril be it; I will trust in God. And he seems to explain himself here; Do not think that I mean to tear my flesh, and to run violently upon my own ruine, when I said, let come on me what will; no, this was not the language either of fury or of despair, but of faith and confidence; (for as it follows) though he slay me, yet will I trust in him.

Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth?

First, There are some who conceive, that Job being in a commotion of spirit, upon some suggestion of the Devil to despair, despair, and to give up all for lost, did therefore indeed tear his own flesh, and seek to cast away his life; to which Job, recalling himself, answereth here, Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth, and put my life in mine hand? As if he should have said, O thou enemy, Satan, why dost thou tempt me thus? Why dost thou put me upon despairing thoughts? Why wouldst thou have me let go my hold of God? Why dost thou provoke me to carry my self as a mad man, tearing my flesh with my teeth, and even throwing my life out of my hand? This carrieth a fair sence, supposing such a temptation was upon him; and indeed there is no temptation so black and devil-like, but we may suppose the Devil presenting it to this afflicted soul.

Aliqui suspicantur Jobum respondentem & repugnantem hosti interius aliquid instillanti & ad se lacerandum stimulanti. Pined.

Secondly, The words may be expounded as an inquiry after the reason, or cause, why he indured such grievous afflictions: Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth, and put my life in mine hand? What's the matter that I am cast into such extremities, and put upon such grievous tryals as I am at this time? Wherefore am I not only counsell'd, but almost constrained by my bodily pains, and the troubles of my spirit, to seek ease in tearing mine own flesh, and in laying violent hands upon my body? If my gestures or speeches are unusual, so are my sorrows; the sence of what I suffer even makes me do I know not what, or what I know I should not do. Wherefore do I take my flesh, &c? That's a second interpretation, taken from the impatient postures of those who are in great afflictions. Such sometimes rend and tear their garments, so did Job in the beginning of this book, when he heard the first news of his sad calamities, yea such will sometimes tear or bite their own flesh, and gnaw their tongues. 'Tis said, that when the fifth Angel poured out his vial upon the seat of the beast, that his kingdom was full of darkness (that is, of trouble) and they gnawed their tongues for pain (Rev. 16. 10.) They gnaw their tongues when they are punished, who never smite upon their thighs, nor are pricked at the heart, because they have sinned.

Moris est affectis & indignabundis vestes & membra lacerare. Merc.

Existimatis me desperantis instar mihi velle mortem conscisere, at quorsum ego me lacerem, & mihi ipsi vitam eripiam? Sanct.

Thirdly, Others interpret the words as a denial of impatience, which his Friends had often objected against him: As if he had said, You think that I carry my self as a man that is desperate, tearing my flesh, &c. but you are much deceived in me; wherefore should I do a thing so unbecoming one that trusts in God, as I do? I trust in God; yea, though he should slay me, yet will I trust in him; I complain indeed of my own afflictions, sense of pain causeth me to doe so, but I do not complain against God, my faith and trust in him will not let me do so. Some conceive, that here Job answers the words of Eliphaz at the beginning of the fifth Chapter (ver. 2.) Wrath killeth the foolish man, and envy slayeth the silly one; wicked foolish men are so envious and unquiet in their spirits, that they even kill themselves with vexation; but why should I, what reason have I, who am assured of the good will of God to me, and am resolved to submit to his good pleasure? what reason have I to tear my flesh, or throw my life out of my hand?

נשא Est tollere, levare. Quare levo dentibus meis carnes meas? q. d. Ita confectus sum, ut quantus ego sum levare dentibus possim, & quasi uno bolo devorari. Pined.

There is a fourth interpretation, that Job in this query hath reference to his own weakness and leanness, to the decay of his strength and flesh; Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth? As if he should have said, I am so wasted and consumed, so far spent, that all the flesh I have will scarce make a morsel, a man may take it up in his teeth at once. Thus it is expounded by that (chap. 19. 20.) I am escaped with the skin of my teeth; I am nothing but skin and bones. So, Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth? Why am I brought thus low, thus lean? all my flesh will scarce make one mouth-full.

En anima mea stat super labia mea statim expressura videorque solis meis dentibus reliquam totius corporis carnem sustentare. Bold.

Lastly, Some render, not, Wherefore do I, but, Wherefore should I take my flesh in my teeth? That is, wherefore should I be cruel to my self? You think I utterly neglect my self, and have given up all my hopes; but I have not, I am not come to that pass yet; and I firmly believe I never shall. It is bad enough when we eat and devour one another; but it notes the worst of conditions, when we devour and eat up our selves. It is said of the fool (Eccles. 4. 5.) He folded his hands together, and eateth his own flesh. Who is this fool? and, how doth the fool eat his own flesh? By the fool (in this place) we are to understand the sluggard, or the slothful man; Folded hands are the emblem of idleness: The idle man, or the sluggard, folded his hands together; that is, he will not work, he will take no pains: Now he that will not labour, saith the Apostle, 2 Thes. 3. Neither let him eat. The sluggard will not labour, and therefore he eateth his own flesh, having nothing else to eat. But doth the sluggard indeed feed upon his own flesh? Is he a self-Canibal? will he indure the pain of eating his own flesh, who will not take the pains to get himself bread to eat? No, but he is said to eat his own flesh, because while he favours himself too much, he is cruel to himself, he starves himself; hunger eats his flesh, because he hath nothing to satisfie his hunger; or he is said to eat his own flesh, because through sloth, and the neglect of his calling, he is brought into want, and into such want, that if he will eat, he must eat his own flesh, for he hath got neither boyld nor roast, neither wet nor dry to sustain his life. Or lastly, he may be said to eat his flesh, while he foldeth his hands, because he grows vext and passionate against himself, when he sees into what straits and bonds his lazy folded hands have brought him. He is a fool indeed, that thinks folded hands will either fill his belly with meat, or his mind with content. So (Isa. 9. 20.) when the Prophet describeth the trouble of a people under the wrath of God, he shews, that at last they shall grow cruel to themselves, They shall eat every man the flesh of his own arm; that is, they shall be so forgetful of the Laws of nature and friendship, that they shall either vex their nearest friends, as he speaks in the former verse, No man shall spare his brother; or they shall vex themselves, who are nearer then any friend; no man shall spare his own flesh. Thus the Lord threatned the oppressors of his people, that he would at last make them feed upon their own flesh, and drunken with their own blood (Isa. 49. 26.) They who have been cruel against his servants, shall be unnatural to themselves; they shall either destroy and vex one another, or every man shall destroy and vex himself, till they are all utterly consumed. Job sees no reason, why he should do what such as these do for want of faith. Wherefore should I take my flesh in my teeth? I know my duty is to love and take care of my self; and I know God loves and takes care of me too. Some self-love is a vertue in all, a grace in some, it being the measure of that love we ow unto others, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thy self. And as a man is bound to take a special care of all those (within his compass) whom God loves, so he ought to be much more careful of himself, who hath received any evidence that God loves him: And hence it is (according to this exposition) that Job saith, Wherefore do I, or, should I take my flesh in my teeth? Shall I who have received so much kindness from God, and (notwithstanding these wounds) shall receive more, shall I, shall such a one as I be unkind to my self?

Lastly, These words (I conceive) carry in them a self-reproof: As if Job perceiving his spirit growing somewhat unquiet and unsetled, and himself ready to break out into passionate gestures, under the pressure of his continual troubles, did thus chide and rebuke down these commotions, Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth? Why am I thus impatient? O my soul, doth this become thee? or dost thou now walk by that rule of obedience which thou art to learn by the things which thou suffereſt? Is this the acting of a patient man? Is this to submit to the hand and rod of a father? In this sence David (upon the apprehension of some undue strivings and strugglings in his spirit) takes himself to task, schools and catechises his soul with serious questions (Psal. 42. 11.) Why art thou cast down, O my soul? why art thou disquieted within me? hope thou in God. David after these chidings bids his soul hope in God; and Job after these chidings makes highest professions of his hope in God, Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth, &c.? Though he slay me, yet I will trust in him.

Hence Observe, First, That in great afflictions a man is apt to afflict himself, and to add to his own afflictions.

When we have more upon us then we are well able to bear, we usually put more weight upon our selves. We scarce feel lesser burdens at all, and great ones we feel too much. When God smites us, we are ready to tear our selves.

Ut qui in cruciatibus carnes suas mordent allevari se sentiunt, sic ego dum hæc loquor. Chrysost.

Secondly, Consider the ground of this, why is it that men (as this phrase importeth) afflict themselves when they are afflicted? It is because they hope to find some ease in it.

Hence

Hence Note, That a pain of our own adding, seems to lessen our received pains.

And indeed it doth somewhat draw the mind from thinking of what it feeleth: Every trouble is the less to us, by how much we mind it the less; and if we could not mind it at all, it would be no trouble to us at all. For this reason, in extremity of pain, as in the Stone, Gout, Tooth-ach, men usually divert and turn off their thoughts, as much as they can, from what they feel, by discourse, and the company of friends; yea, we shall see them sometimes bite their lips, or their finger; such pain added to pain, gives some mitigation of pain.

Thirdly Note, It is sinful to be active in our own miseries, or to afflict our selves.

Wherefore should I take my flesh in my teeth? It is unnatural to do so. It is unnatural to take the fleth of others in our teeth, more to take our own; every man is nearer to himself then to any other: therefore a sin committed against our selves, is greater; because we sin against a nearer engagement. We ought to suffer chearfully from the hand of God or man, but we must not suffer from our own. No man must be his own carver, either in his comforts, or in his sorrows. We must let God alone to cut out, and measure our portion of both. Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth?

Fourthly Observe, A godly man will not take his own part, nor bear with himself, when he doth evil, or goes beside the rule, whether in active or passive obedience.

He is willing to receive counsel or reproof from others; and he is upon all discoveries of the naughtiness of his heart, his own reprover: he usually casts the first stone at his sin with his own hand, and blames himself more then any other man can, for his own secret distempers, or outward miscarriages. A carnal heart doth what it can to excuse its sin, or to flatter himself in it: but a holy heart doth both aggravate and rebuke its own sin: Wherefore am I so vain, so earthly? Why am I so proud, and so impatient? David needed no man to accuse him of his sinful envy at the prosperity of the wicked, he layes on load upon himself (Psal. 73. 22.) So foolish was I and ignorant, even as a beast before thee. He once indeed (being under a desertion) wanted a Nathan to bring his sin home to his conscience; but when he was come to himself, he could be his own Nathan: As for me (saith he, ver. 2.) my feet were almost gone: Why was I thus foolish? So Job here, Why am I thus unquiet? Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth, &c?

And put my life in mine hand?

Animam meam solicitus custodio, non secus ac rem pretiosissimam, quam nusquam tuto deponere, nec ulli credere audemus. Pined.

These words have the same meaning in general with the former. I shall only open the importance of the phrase.

First, Putting the life in the hand, is interpreted for a solicitous care of life: As if he had said, Wherefore do I keep life so close, as if I were loath to part with it? If God slay me I will trust in him. What need I take so much care of this life, to hold it in my hand? Let it go, I know it shall be well enough with me; if I lose this life, I shall find a better; for I believe in God. When a man would preserve and keep a thing safe, he carries it in his hand; he will not lay it out of his hand. And that is one reason why the Saints are said to be in the hand of God, and to resign themselves into his hand; Into thine hand do I commit my spirit: It is their desire to be in the hand of God; and Christ assureth us (John 10.) that we being in his Fathers hand, none can take us out. Holy Job knew his life, his spiritual life was in the hand of God, and that his going out of this natural life was but a passage to eternal life: Wherefore then (according to this exposition) should he so solicitously put his life into his own hand? We need not fear to part with that which the grace of God hath found.

Nomen animæ pro tota persona sumi potest, ut ponere animam in manibus sit ita debilitari ut homo stare pedibus non possit; sed manibus sustentetur, ad modum infantium. Bold. Volis extremisque innitens digitis vitam ago. id. Anima in manibus est, anima è corpore excessa, quæ enim in manibus habemus, extra nos sunt. Sanct.

Secondly, Others understand by life, the whole man; and so the putting of his life in his hand, notes bodily infirmity; as if being weak with sickness, he was forced to lean upon his hand. Wherefore do I put my life in my hand? That is, Wherefore am I brought thus low, that I do even go upon my hands? Little children before they can go upon their feet, go upon all four, as we say, they go upon their hands. The feet and legs are the pillars and supporters of the body. Job's pillars (saith this interpretation) shrunk under him, he must walk and live upon his hands. The learned Author quoted in the margin contends much for this sence: but I shall not stay upon it.

Thirdly, Wherefore do I put my life in my hand? Is (as another fancieth) a metaphorical speech, implying, that a man is dying, or near to death: The life of such a man sits upon his lips, or is come out into his hand, ready to shake hands with him, and return to God that gave it. As if he had said, my life is gone out of my body, I am in the state of death; or (as his words are also glossed) my life is so wasted and diminished, that it is scarce a handful. Why is it thus? Is it because Satan hopes that yet in the extremity of my affliction, he shall obtain his wish, and hear me with my last breath blaspheme God and dye? If that be his end, he shall miss his end; For if the Lord slay me, yet will I trust in him.

Lastly, We may expound the words yet more clearly and satisfactorily by divers other concurrent Scriptures, all which carry this plain sence, That putting of the life into the hand, notes only the exposing of our life unto peril or dangers. So Jephthah bespeaks the quarrelling Ephramites (Judg. 12. 3.) When I saw that ye delivered me not, I put my life in my hands, and passed over against the children of Ammon: That is, when I saw you deserted me, and would give me no assistance, I resolved to put it to an adventure; I put my life in my hands, and passed over against the children of Ammon: I went upon great disadvantages; my Army was not a match for the enemy, nor fit to meet them in the field; yet I ran that hazard: I put my life in mine hands. So (1 Sam. 19. 5.) when Jonathan pleaded for David before his father Saul, and told him what good service he had done for him, and what he had deserved of the Kingdom, he instanceth in that unparallel'd act of valour, when he undertook proud Goliah. He did put (saith he) his life in his hand, and slew the Philistine; that is, he put himself into a great danger: The Philistine was such a monster of men, that the whole Army of Israel trembled at his challenge; therefore surely a single man was in great danger to deal with him hand to hand: David doing so, put his life in his hand. The Witch of Endor is at this language with Saul (1 Sam. 28. 21.) I have put my life in my hand; that is, I have ventured my life in raising up of Samuel; this she said, because there was a Law lately made against Witches by Saul himself. Once more David useth the same expression (Psal. 119. 109.) My soul is continually in mine hand, yet do I not forget thy Law. The souls of the Saints are always in the hands of God, and it is both their safety and their honour that they are so. Why doth David say, my soul is in mine hand? had he call'd it out of the hand of God, and taken the care of it upon himself? Nothing less. His meaning is only this, I walk in the midst of dangers, and among a thousand deaths continually; I am in deaths often, my life is exposed to perils every day, yet do I not forget thy Law: I keep close to thee, and will keep close to thee whatsoever comes of it. Augustine upon that place doth ingeniously confess, that he understood not what David meant, by having his soul in his hands: But Jerome, another of the Ancients, teacheth us, that it is an Hebraism, signifying a state of extreamest peril. The Greeks also have drawn it into a proverb, speaking the same thing.

Est Hebraismus quo significatur vitam habere periculo expositam. Hier. Ep. ad Suniam. Ἐν τῇ χειρὶ ψυχὴν ἔχει. Græc. proverb. pro versari inter pericula. Quod manu portatur, facile excidit; facile etiam diripi potest & si servatur sola Dei protectione servari videtur. Mer.

But why doth the holding, or putting the life in the hand, signifie the exposing of the life to peril? There is a twofold reason of it.

First, Because those things which are carried openly in the hand, are apt to fall out of the hand, and being carried in sight, they are apt to be snatcht or wrested out of the hand. And therefore though to be in the hand of God, signifies safety, because his hand is armed with irresistible power to protect us: Yet for a man to carry a thing in his own hand, is to carry it in danger, because his hand is weak, and there are safer wayes of carrying, or conveying a thing, then openly in the hand. If a man be to ride a long journey with any treasure about him, he doth not carry it in his hand, but puts it in some secret and close place, where it may be hid, and so more secure. The Caldee Paraphrast, to express the elegancy of that place fore-cited out of the Psalm, gives it thus, My life is in as much danger as if it stood upon the very superficies or outside of my hand; as if he had no hold of it, but it stood barely upon his hand; for that that which is set upon the plain or palm of the hand, and not grasped, is in greater danger. Things safe kept, are hidden or held fast. There was a treasure hid in the field, which when the man had found, he went and hid it, (Mat. 13.44.) he did not carry it in his hand, but hid it, laid it up safely. So our life is said to be hid with Christ in God, (Col. 3.3.) which notes not only the secresie of this spiritual life, but the safety of it also. As some things are hid that they may not be seen, so other things are hid, that they may not be lost. Hence to carry the life in the hand, imports the danger of loosing it.

Quæ aliquis amittere timet diligenter abscondit. Aquin. in loc.

Secondly, There is another reason of that speech, because when a man is about to deliver a thing or to give it up, he takes it in his hand. They that put themselves upon great perils and dangers for God and his people, deliver up their lives and their all to God: Hence that counsel of the Apostle, (1 Pet. 4.19.) Let them that suffer according to the will of God, commit the keeping of their souls to him in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator. So here, the life of men in danger is said to be put in the hand, because such are as it were ready to deliver and commit their lives unto God, that he would take care of their lives to preserve them from the danger, or to take them to himself, if they lose them in his service, either doing or suffering according to his will. That of the Apostle comes near this notion, (1 John 3.16.) We ought to lay down our lives for the brethren: now if we lay them down, we must put them into our hands, as a man that is ready to lay down money upon a bargain, or for a commodity, takes his purse into his hand. Job had his life in his hand, ready to deliver it up to God, yea, though God should seem to take it violently from him, yet he would willingly resign it to him and trust him with it. This sense carries a clear reason of such kind of speaking, yet I do not conceive it to be the particular reason of it in this place: For, as to such a sense, Job should rather confidently affirm, I will or I do put my life in my hand, then either question or expostulate with himself, Wherefore do I put my life in mine hand?

Now, seeing Job speaking thus refutes a charge that was brought against him, that he was careless of his life, or through distemper and impatience cared not what became of it; We may Observe,

That though we are to venture or put our lives unto any hazard when God calleth us, yet no man may expose his life without a call.

Job would have his friends know, that he did not carry his life open in his hand as a thing he made no reckoning of. Our lives are given us of God, and till he bid us bring them forth and carry them in our hands, we must keep them as safe as we can. I only hint this here, because the strength of Jobs intendment in these words lyeth in their connection with the following verse, to which I pass.

Vers. 15. Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him; but I will maintain mine own integrity.

Why should you think that I am impatient? Why should you censure me as desperate and careless? This is the temper and frame of my soul; judge you of it, whether it look like your conceptions of me. Let God do what he will with me, slay me, tear me, take away my life, I am resolved what to do, to trust in him. Is this impatience or despair?

Further, If we consider the former expostulations in the last exposition, as a reproof or a check to the motions of his own heart toward impatience; Then these words are the lesson of instruction which he gives his soul. What? Thou my soul in rage? doest thou bid me take my flesh in my teeth? I tell thee what my former resolves have been, and what my present duty is, even to trust God in all estates. And now I am upon that resolve again, Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him.

Afflictiones graviores, mortis & occisionis nomine significantur. Drus.

Though he slay me.] Slaying speaks death, and that a violent death, yet all slaying is not death. (Rom. 8.36.) For thy sake are we killed, or slain all the day long. All the persecutions and troubles which the Saints endure, are their slaying; though they be not all unto death, yet they all go upon the account of death. For thy sake are we slain all the day long. Paul was alive, and yet in the number of these slain. By being slain all the day long, he means a being alwayes within the view, or under the sufferance of bloody persecutors.

Though he slay me. Slaying is the utmost of outward evils.

Hence Observe (before I come to the main), That there is no outward evil so bad, but God may lay it upon his best servants.

Job puts this supposition as his own case. Though he slay me,

Yet will I trust in him.] There is a double reading of these words. Some read them negatively, others (as we) affirmatively.

The reason why the negation is added by some Interpreters, is, because the same Hebrew word in sound, which we translate, him, signifies also the adverb of denial, not or no: therefore the Masorites observe that this text is to be corrected in the reading. There is a like variety of reading upon the occasion of this Monosyllable, Lo (2 King. 8.10.) Where when Hazael was sent by Benhadad to enquire of Elisha whether he should recover of his disease whereof he was sick, Elisha said unto him, Go say unto him, thou mayest certainly recover, howbeit the Lord hath shewed me that he shall surely die. As if he had said, though the disease in it self be not mortal, yet thou shalt die of it. Whereas others translate it, Elisha said unto him, say, thou shalt not certainly recover, for the Lord hath shewed me that he shall surely die.

Lo, in Hebræo mutatis literis mobilibus, aut non aut ei vel ipsi, sonat. Masoritæ hunc locum enumerant inter ea quæ cū scribātur לא legātur לו Merc. Vade dic ei sanaberis, quāquā aliqui existimant amphibologicā fuisse responsionem, nam vox eadem sola diversā Scriptura significat, aut ei, aut non. Dic nō omnino revalesces. Jun. Si enecaret me nō sperarem? Jun. Ecce occidet me nō sperabo. Mont. Quāvis ab eo mortis sententiā recipiarē, tamē me hortārē ab eo sententiā nō expectarem, quippe qui noverim non nisi justissimè ēn hoc feciſſe. Bol.

Now, the negative in Job hath a double reading. First, By way of interrogation, and then the sense is the same with our translation, Though, or if he slay me, shall I not trust in him? that is, yes, I will, or I ought to trust in him; should I distrust God because he afflicts me, when as he afflicts to shew his faithfulness, I will not do it. Others read it negatively, without an interrogation, thus, Though he slay me, I will not expect, or behold he will slay me, I will not hope. So the interlineal.

But would Job say so, can this stand with the state of grace and holiness? Were not this indeed to give up the cause, and to blaspheme God?

I answer, There is a sense wherein we may acquit Job of this charge, though we should read it negatively, which yet is not the sense I shall stay upon: For the clearing of it, I must premise two things concerning the Original Text.

First, That the Hebrew word which we translate to trust (of which more a little after) signifies also to expect or look for a thing at the hands of another.

Secondly, The word stands alone in the Hebrew without those words which we supply, in him, and must be rendred thus, according to the sense under hand, Though he slay me, I will not expect, and then the meaning may be given thus; Although God should pronounce that heavy sentence of death upon me, yea sign the Writ for my Execution, yet I would not expect a more gentle sentence or look for a reprieve, because I know that what God doth to any man, or to me, he is just in doing it; I know that if he load me with the heaviest afflictions, he may do it, and (without any further pleading or expectations) I am ready to submit unto it; and yet in this I do not cast my self as a wicked man, for I will still maintain my ways (as he adds in the next words) neither in this do I cast off all my hopes or expectations in God, for he shall be my salvation, as he speaks in the next verse. Thus much he had said in effect before, (chap. 9.15.) Whom though I were righteous, yet would I not answer, that is, I would not stand upon my terms with God, or expect any other terms from him: though God should wound me deeper, yet I would not hope to have him alter what he had done, as if I thought he had done me wrong. You, my friends, conceive that I complain of God, as if he had been cruel and too severe towards me; no, I do not think so, for if he should slay me, I would not sue to him to take off that sentence as unjust, but I would willingly lay my life down at his feet, knowing that he will give me a more desirable life then this. Thus we may fairly bring Job off in the negative reading; he was ready to undergo the hardest measure, and yet not to think hardly of God, or stand expecting any reversal of his judgement as too hard.

Again,

Ecce occidet me nō spero me hinc liberandū, vel fore ut convalescā, actū est de me, deploratus est hic morbus. Merc. è Rab. Lev.

Again thus, Behold he will slay me, I will not hope, that is, I see my bodily estate and outward comforts brought so low, that it were folly to hope; Why, should I hope for life and prosperity here, when providence speaks to me of nothing but death? and me-thinks I see the Lord ready to slay me; my disease is not for cure, nor my wounds for healing, why then should I stand hoping about these poor transitory things? yet I would not have you think I am without all hope, I have better things to hope for then these; and about them I have a lively hope, though I die, as he adds in the next verse: He also shall be my salvation, and an hypocrite shall not come before him.

Verba sunt magnæ spei & fidei cujusvis maximè in cruce & morte ostenditur, ideo utrūq; conjunxit, mortem & spem. Merc.

But I shall pass that negative translation, and give the sense as it lies affirmatively before us in ours. The strength of faith is never fully tried but under and upon a cross: Death and hope seem to be at the greatest distance; here we have death and hope brought together: Death could not kill Job's hope, his hope did almost enliven his death. Job had more life in death, then most have in their lives. God could easily slay Job's body, but his faith could not be slain. God will not slay faith, and no other power can. Behold Job dying and believing, Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him; and so this text is the triumph of Job's faith over sorrow and death: The uprightness of his heart, the greatness of his spirit, the undauntedness of his courage, his contempt of the world, and his longing desires after God, are all wrapt up and spoken out together in these words. As if he had said, I see the Lord is determined to take my life, but what if he do? do you think that I have nothing to trust him far beyond that? If he destroy my body, I know he will save my soul; I have matters of greater moment to trust God with, then those which concern this frail piece of flesh: Death it self shall not cast me down from the footings of my faith, or beat me off from the hold-fast of my hope in God.

Again, As these words have in them assertion of Job's faith, so also a vindication of his person from the suspitions or accusations of his friends. For how can he be charged as wicked, who professeth trust in God, and promiseth that he will trust in him, even unto death, and in it?

יחל Est expectare cum longanimi perseverantia, cū certitudine futuri boni & lætitia. Coc.

The word which we translate trust, signifies also to expect or hope; and it signifies expectation, first, with patience and waiting: Secondly, with assurance of receiving that which we wait for: thirdly, with present joy, or joy concomitant with sorrow. So then, I will trust him, is not only, I will stay more time, but I will stay with patience, with assurance, yea and with joyfulness.

But how can a man trust God when he is slain? He that is dead, is past hope, he hath for ever done trusting and believing. For when a man is slain and dead, he either goes to heaven or to hell: If to hell, there's no hope: if to heaven, there's no need of hope, what, should a man hope for that which he enjoyes, or trust when he is in possession?

I answer, first, All slaying in Scripture sense is not to bodily death; it notes sometimes only a civil death, or the putting of a person totally out of all his former power or present comforts: So the slaying of the witnesses is interpreted, Revel. 11. Take slaying so, and then, to trust when we are slain, is no more then to depend upon God for deliverance in extreamest dangers.

Secondly, Though a man who is actually slain, cannot be said to hope; yet a man may say, I will hope or trust though I am slain: For so this trust is the act of a living man concerning somewhat which he shall enjoy or be after death: So any believer dying, whether it be by a natural or a violent death, may say, Though I die yet I will trust in God: First, For the salvation of my soul: Secondly, For the resurrection of my body: Thirdly, For the eternal rest both of soul and body together in glory.

But what was it that Job was thus resolved to trust God for?

Take slaying in the first sense, for greater afflictions then any he had yet felt, and then, I will trust in him, is first, a serious profession of his faithfulness and adhering to God and his wayes what ever God should do with him, or how great discouragements soever God should put upon him. So we may well expound Job by that admirable protestation of the Church, Psal. 44. 17, 18, 19. All this is come upon us, yet have we not forgotten thee, neither have we dealt falsly in thy covenant; our heart is not turned back, neither have our steps declined from thy way; though thou hast sore broken us in the place of dragons, and covered us with of death. Trusting in God, in a large sense, is put for the whole compass of our duty to him, especially in evil times. Or secondly, I will trust him, is a high profession of his faith, that God would give remedy to the worst of his present, or possible outward evils, and raise him up or restore him again, how low soever he should be brought.

Take slaying in the second sense, for death, and then his meaning is, that though God should take away this life, yet he had a hope laid up beyond this life: and this I conceive most proper here, or certainly intended here, because he had so often given up his hopes of a temporal restoring, and adds expresly in the next verse; He also shall be my salvation.

Hence Observe, First, The character of a godly man; he is one that trusteth in God.

This is proper to godliness. It is the breath of the new creature, and only by the breath of the new creature can these words be spoken indeed, I will trust in God. (1 Pet. 3. 5.) The Apostle describing the holy women of the former time, exhorteth that they may be a pattern to the women of the age to which he wrote, For (saith he) after this manner the holy women also in old time, who trusted in God, adorned themselves. He describes holy women by this, they trusted in God. A carnal man is a man without hope, (1 Thes. 4. 13.) I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that you sorrow not even as others which have no hope. Who are these? The Apostle tells us, Ephes. 2. 12. Aliens from the Commonwealth of Israel, strangers from the Covenant of Promises, having no hope. A heathen (every carnal man is no better) hath no hope, or if he have, it is like himself, a carnal hope, in the nature of it, because it is so in the object of it: His hope is in man, (Jer. 17. 5.) Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm: He that is in the flesh, trusts only in the flesh, and fleshly things. (Psal. 52.7.) He trusts in the abundance of his riches: he can trust in earthly riches, but he cannot put forth an act of trust upon the unsearchable riches of God: It is an easie matter to say the words, but it is the hardest matter under heaven to say, and say it truly, to say and do it, Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him.

Secondly Observe, True trust can triumph over a worse condition then what is present, how bad soever it is.

Job doth not say, I will trust in God, though now my case is very sad, but he puts a harder case then ever he was yet in, Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him. David (Psal. 3. 6.) puts hard cases to his soul, If ten thousands of people set themselves against me round about, yet will I not be afraid: David was not in such straits at that time (though in straits) he was not beleaguered with ten thousand enemies, but he could put those straits to himself, and yet be enlarged in dependance upon God. We have David again breathing out the very same spirit of faith in like expressions, Psal. 27. 2. & Psal. 46. 2. Though the mountains be removed, and though the earth be carried into the midst of the sea, yet will not we fear. He puts not only such cases as he was not in, but such as there was no probability that ever he should be in; that the hils should be carried into the sea, that earth and sea should mingle. David's faith conquered not only real evils, but all imaginable evils. As the Lord puts the remotest suppositions to shew his own faithfulness, so do the Saints to shew their faith, (Isa. 54.10.) Though the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed, yet my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the Covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord. Though the whole course of nature fail, yet the Lord will not let one jot of the Covenant of grace fail: And that's indeed the reason why the Saints rejoyce over all difficulties, even because they know God is able to help them in greatest difficulties: He hath not spent the treasures nor the stores of his wisdom and power upon former salvations, they know if they need stronger and stranger salvations, he hath strength and wisdom enough to work them, and will, because he is as faithful and true, as he is strong or wise.

Thirdly

Thirdly Observe, Trust is due to God, it is due to God in all estates.

Some trust in God in fair weather; when they are full they can trust in God for bread; and when they are safe, they can trust him for protection: but for a man to trust God for bread in wants, and for safety when he slayeth him, to trust God in all turns, this is not only a benefit to our selves, but a duty unto God. There is nothing more due to God, as God, then trust is: even a man in high place looks to be trusted, and the higher any man is, the more he looks to be trusted. And shall not the most high God? We read (Judg. 9. 15.) that when the trees had chosen the bramble to be their King, the bramble puts these terms upon them, (Judg. 9. 15.) If indeed you anoint me king over you, then come and put your trust in my shadow; and if not, let fire come out of the bramble, and devour the Cedars of Lebanon. Even a bramble looks to be trusted in, if you set him up for your king. Now if creatures love to be trusted, though they be but exalted brambles, how much more doth the Lord, the great and glorious Lord exalted over all? Surely if he be not trusted by us, we shall be consumed by him, a fire will proceed from him to devour the tallest Cedars that either distrust or do not trust in him.

Fourthly Observe, To trust God is an high honour done to God.

Trust is a great part of divine worship. It is natural worship; the very discoveries of God unto us, though he should never manifest his will concerning this act, call for this. When it is discovered to us (which the word every where doth) that God is above all, that he is all-sufficient, that he is unchangeable, these very discoveries, though there were never a rule for it in all the word of God, would teach us to trust upon God. There are some parts of Gods worship which we should never have known if he had not given us a direct and expres rule for them. Such is all his instituted worship; The special forms of worship depend upon the revealed will of God, but the general worship of God (such as to love him, to fear him, to trust upon him) flow from the manifestation of his nature, or from his very being.

But you will say, What is trust?

Take it in brief thus, Pure spiritual trust is the highest exercise of faith, whereby looking upon God in himself and in his Son through the promises, the soul is raised above all fears or discouragements, above all doubts and disquietments, either for the removing of that which is evil, or for the obtaining of that which is good. This is the nature of that trust which is the honour of God, and his natural worship, as natural is opposed to special and instituted worship.

Fifthly Observe, A believer seeth God good to him, or a friend to him, when he receiveth nothing but evil from his hand, and sees nothing but frowns upon his face.

Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him. There is no man will trust a professed enemy at all, nor a reconciled enemy much: therefore Job did not think God an enemy, though he slew him; forasmuch as he resolved to trust him, though he slew him. No man will trust him that he suspects to hate him; A godly man hath good thoughts of God, let him be doing what he will with him. When God put Abraham upon that hard task to slay his son, he yet knew that God loved him, and therefore he was willing to do it, and he would trust God for that son, of which the promise of God said he should live, though the command of God said he shall die. Now, as Abraham (the Father of believers) was perswaded, that God loved him when he bid him slay his son; So though God himself slay a believer, yet he believes that he lives in the love of God. While a believer is all over as it were in gore-blood, whilst he is all wounds, and wounded (he sees) by the hand of God, yet he cannot be beaten out of this hold, God is good to him, yea, that truly God is good to all his Israel. Christ had said to his Disciples, (John 21. 11.) Our friend Lazarus sleepeth: but when Martha heard him give order to take away the stone from the Sepluchre, (vers. 39.) Lord (saith she) by this time he stinketh, for he hath been dead four dayes. Christ answers her, said I not unto thee, that if thou wouldest believe, thou shouldest see the glory of God? Though I was not so friendly to my friend as to come and keep him alive when he was only sick, or to raise him up as soon as he was dead, yet do not think but I am a friend to him still, Did not I say, that if thou wouldest believe, thou shouldest see the glory of God? I have not neglected my friend: Though I have let him lie four dayes in the grave, yet he hath lain in my heart all this while. We may say in all our extremities, though God lets us die and lie in the grave either of death or affliction till we stink, that yet we are his dead friends, and he is our living friend, in whose bosome and embraces we have lain all the while. See how Paul exulteth in the love of God in the midst of all troubles and persecutions: Suppose sword and famine should compass him about, Rom. 8. 38,39. I am perswaded that neither life nor death, &c. nor any other creature should be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. Holy David of old rejoyced in this assurance. (2 Sam. 23. 5.) Although my house be not so with God, yet (I know God is my friend, for) he hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things, and sure; for this is all my salvation, and all my desire, although he make it not to grow; that is, though my house should not flourish in worldly dignity and outward pomp; yet he is my salvation, and I can desire no more.

Sixthly Observe, Job had said before, Wherefore do I take my flesh in my teeth, and put my life in mine hand? Why should I take such courses as these to ease my present trouble? though he slay me, I will trust in him; as if he had said, my remedy is in God, not in tearing my flesh, or in impatient gestures: these would prove as miserable comforts as my friends are comforters: the neareſt way to sound consolation, is to trust in God.

Hence Observe, That trust in God is the best ease to the soul, and a remedy of evils before the remedy comes.

God often defers the remedy as to our sense, when he gives it to our faith. He that believes not, is condemned already, he hath his judgement before the judgement: and he that believes, is saved and eased already, he hath his deliverance before deliverance. Whilst our wounds have no cure, trust in God cures them. Faith is a remedy before a remedy in all kind of evils. (Isa. 50. ult.) Who is among you that feareth the Lord, that obeyeth the voice of his servants, that walketh in darkness and hath no light? Let him trust in the Name of the Lord, and stay upon his God. Trust in God, though you are in darkness, though you see no light; this is light before light, pardon before pardon. Trust God in temptations, and you are above temptations, while you groan under the burden of them. Trust God in weakness, and you are strong: Paul in such a case besought the Lord thrice, and was answered with this, 2 Cor. 12. 9. My grace (not thy grace) is sufficient for thee, for my strength is made perfect in weakness (he doth not say thy weakness is perfected into strength) This satisfied Paul to the full, as he concludes in the next words, Most gladly therefore will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me. When we rest with our weaknesses upon Christ, the power of Christ rests upon us. And then as it was with Paul (vers. 10.) when we are weak, then are we strong; when we are sorrowful, then have we joy; when we are in bondage, then are we free. Thus by trusting we have either a remedy from, or a remedy in all our troubles and afflictions.

Further, Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him; his faith was pitcht upon God, and he passeth by friends and creatures. As if he had said, Truly though you endeavour to comfort me, and would give me your utmost help, yet I cannot trust upon you; but if God should slay me, I would trust him: though all the world should engage and promise to do their best for me, I could not trust them; but if God should do the worst against me, yet I would trust in him.

Hence Observe, That we can never trust God too much, nor creatures too little.

We can never trust God too much, because as he is God, all all our trust is but due to him. And we cannot trust creatures too little, because they are but creatures, and so no trust is due to them. There is a trust of charity or civility due to man; it is not good to be alwayes jealous one of another; but though there may be a trust of charity, yet there must not be a trust of confidence upon any creature. Some jealousies of man are against the rule of love to man, but all trust in man is against the law of duty to God. Now, as it is a duty to trust God, so if we look upon God, we have the greatest encouragements, if upon our selves, the greatest cause, to trust him.

First, Consider the Being and Essence of God, and there's enough to draw out trust. His Being is in and from himself. It is best to depend upon him who is absolutely independant.

Secondly, Consider the excellency of his Being. Job said to his friends a little before, Doth not his excellency make you afraid? I may say here as truly, Doth not his excellency make you confide, or trust? The power, the wisdom, the goodness, the mercy, the faithfulness, the truth, the unchangeableness of God, these, all these excellencies of his Being, call upon us to trust in him. Who would not trust in him that hath all, and is All? Who would not trust in him that can do whatsoever he pleaseth, and will do whatsoever he hath promised?

Thirdly, Consider him in his relations to us: He is our Creator, that's the ground of trust given by the Apostle, Let us commit our selves unto him in well-doing as unto a faithful Creator. He that made us, will surely take care of us: We may well give up our selves and our all unto him, who gave us our selves, and our all. And if creation assure us of preservation, then redemption assures us of it much more. God was at so much cost in making of us, that he will certainly take care of us; but he hath been at much more cost in redeeming us, and therefore he will much more take care of us, upon the account of that relation. He hath been at too much charge with us, to lay us aside and throw us by. Again, He is a Father: earthly fathers lay up and provide for their children, and shall not our heavenly Father? All the relations wherein we stand to God, are grounds of our trust upon him, and engagements of his assistance to, and providence over us.

Fourthly, The operations and workings of God, call for this trust: What hath God wrought? and what cannot God work? He works without, and he works within, he stops or moves all the wheels of all creatures as seemeth best to him. The tongues, the hands, the hearts, the wills, the affections, the love, the hatred, the anger, the desires of all the sons of men, are under his power, and at his dispose. Who would not trust in God?

Fifthly, If we look upon our selves as creatures, and all creatures with our selves, we shall quickly find a necessity of trusting God. As creatures are not of themselves, so not in themselves. We receive life from God, and in him we live. If we depart from him in whom we live, we shall surely die. Our natural, as well as our spiritual life, is preserved by the power of God. The life of man consisteth not in the abundance of that which he possesseth, but in dependance upon him in whom he believeth. Man is not sufficient of himself (in spirituals) to think a good thought, that sufficiency is of God: and all temporal good things are not sufficient for man, their sufficiency is of God. A horse is a vain thing to save a man, bread is a vain thing to strengthen a man, wine is a vain thing to chear a man, yea, wisdom is a vain thing to counsel a man, without God. As there is nothing which the devil doth more oppose, or God more require, so there is nothing which we more need, or by which we gain more then by trusting God: God gives himself most out to us, when we trust most in him: As an act of trust gives most glory to God, so it fetcheth most good from God. Our trusting in creatures make them vain to us; and our not trusting in God, makes him (in a sense) vain to us; that is, God will not give out his strength and help, if we do not trust him: he is as one weak when we trust him weakly, he is as one empty-handed when our hearts are empty of trust.

For the advancement of this grace of trust, take these three rules from what we find in Job, whose trust was risen to such a height, that it did not only live, but was lively in the very approaches of death.

First, Labour to know God. Job was a man acquainted with God, and therefore he trusted in God, (Psal. 9.10.) They that know thy Name will trust in thee. The reason why God is trusted so little, is because he is so little known. We say of some men, They are better known then trusted; and if we knew some men more, we should trust them less: But the truth is, God is alwayes trusted as much as he is known; and if we knew him more, we would trust him more; every discovery of God shews somewhat which renders him more worthy of our trust.

Secondly, Recollect and meditate former experiences. The consideration of what God hath done for us, keeps the heart up in trust that he will do more.

Thirdly, Be upright. That which made Job confident to trust upon God, though he should slay him, was the uprightness of his heart with God. He may trust God, who is faithful to God. Job had Gods own hand to his certificate, that his heart was upright. Beloved (saith that beloved Disciple, 1 John 3.21.) If our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence towards God: An hypocrite may presume, but he cannot be truly confident. Besides, 'tis a dishonour to God, when they say they trust him, whose lives are dishonourable to him: They make God (as much as lies in them) a partaker in their wickedness, who pretend he will take their parts, while they are wicked and do wickedly. Railing Rabshakeh tells Hezekiah (2 King. 18.20,21,22.) Thou sayest (but they are but vain words) I have counsel and strength for war; and when he had beaten him off from humane helps, he labours to drive him from divine help also; thou perhaps wilt say, I trust in God; If thou sayest so, remember, Is not that he whose Altars and whose high places Hezekiah hath taken away, and hath said to Judah and Jerusalem, ye shall worship before this Altar in Jerusalem: As if he had said, Thou trust in God! thou who hast dishonoured God, pulled down his altars! &c. Rabshakeh thought that Hezekiah had done God great disservice in destroying the Altars; and if it had been so, this charge had cut off the confidence of Hezekiah: But how justly may we upbraid many that profess they trust in God, and say, Is not he the God whose name you blaspheme? the God whom you provoke? the God whose truths and wayes you neglect and kick against? the God whose servants you oppose? and will you say you trust in God? For shame either disclaim your confidences, or be reclaimed from your courses. That man who walks uprightly before God, may trust perfectly in God. He that contemns the command, hath no part in the promise. We do not oblige God to do us good by our doing good; but God hath not obliged himself to do us good, while we are doing evil. There are promises of grace, but there are no promises of reward to wicked men.

Lastly, Take two characters of holy trust.

First, It takes us off from all other dependances. As a man cannot serve, so neither can he trust God and Mammon: As in spirituals, so in temporals; while, with the Apostle (Phil. 3.3.) We rejoyce (which is an effect of trust) in God, we have no confidence in the flesh. If God be not trusted alone, he is not trusted at all. Every thing we joyn with him disjoyns us from him. He that takes hold of God, lets go his hold of all other things: We may use the help of creatures, but we must trust none but God. He that (in this sense) will needs be so wise and provident as to get two strings to his bow, shall find, when he comes to shoot, that he hath not one. If we trust in God and man together, God will not help us, and man cannot.

Secondly, Holy trust acts in all estates and turns: As true obedience respects all the commandments, so true trust respects all the dispensations of God. Trust reposeth upon God, not only for some, but for and in every thing. Some say they trust God for pardon, for heaven, and for eternal life, who do not, or think they need not trust him for the needs of this present life: For these, some suppose they can help themselves, and others suspect God will not stoop so low as to help them. A true Believer depends upon God as much (in proportion to the thing) for a piece of bread, as for heaven; and the Lord (in proportion to the thing) is as careful to provide Believers with the bread of this life, as he is to give them the bread and means of eternal life. This is trust indeed, when we trust God for all, for temporals as well as for spirituals, in the least as well as in the greatest matters: Yea, the less the thing is for which we trust God, the greater is the grace of trust. As it argues the greatest degree of holiness, when we will not offend God by committing the least sin, and when we are thankful to him for the least mercy; so it argues a great degree of faith, when we depend upon God (being convinced we have need to do so) for his good will in receiving the least comfort, and for his strength in performing the least duty. Some, when they have a great business to undergo, stir up themselves to trust God, and so they ought; but the spiritualness of trust is seen, when in the least businesses we undergo, and in the least duty we go about, we go out of our selves, and go forth in the strength of God: For as it is the very same love of God that saveth us eternally, and preserveth us temporally; so it is the same power of God which doth great or small things for us: And therefore we should in all depend upon God, knowing, that without him we cannot do the one, and that we shall be able to do all things through him strengthening us. Yea, lastly, we must trust God in our injoyments, as well as in our wants. It is an hard thing to say, Though he slay me, yet I will trust in him; but it is harder to say, Though he make me alive, yet I will trust in him. It is a glorious tryal of trust, to say, Should God make me not worth a groat, yet I will trust him; but it is a greater glory of this trust, to say, Though God make me worth thousands, yet I will trust in him: It is hard to trust God in a low and troublesome estate; but it is harder to trust God in a full and prosperous estate. When we (to sense) have the least need of Gods help, then to trust in him, and depend upon him, shews we are most sensible that we need his help: For by this we in one act give testimony to the All-sufficiency of God, and to the emptiness of the creature; by this we make God all, and the creature nothing at all. Faith gives a more spiritual discovery of it self, when it convinces us that we are poor in the midst of our abundance without God, then when it convinceth us, that we have abundance in God, though we are poor. Tis noble when we can say, though God afflict me, and empty me, I will trust in him; but 'tis heroically Christian to say, Though God comfort me, and fill me, I will trust in him. The stronger we are in grace, the less we go, either alone, or upon the crutches of the creature.

While I affirm this, I would not at all derogate from the excellency of Job's trust in God, I only shew you a more excellent way of trusting him.

But it may be questioned, Doth not Job derogate from, yea, contradict his own professed trust, when with the same breath, with which he concludes, Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him, he concludeth also,

But I will maintain mine own wayes before him.

In the former part of the verse, Job discovered the highest confidence in God. In this latter part, he seems to discover too much confidence in himself, But I will maintain mine own wayes before him. The Apostle argues the inconsistency of these two (Rom. 11. 6.) If by grace, then is it no more of works; otherwise grace is no more grace: but if it be of works, then is it no more grace; otherwise work is no more work. The wayes of a man are his works: If he trust in God, he depends on grace; if he maintain his wayes, he may be said to depend on works. How then shall we reconcile Job's trusting in God, with his maintaining of his wayes?

I answer, There is a maintaining of our wayes before God, which is but a fruit of self-confidence, and an Argument of our departure from the grace of God. But this act of Job sprang from no such root; nor will it yield any such fruit, as will appear in opening of the words.

But (or nevertheless) I will maintain.] The Original word signifies three things. First, (As we translate) to plead, dispute, and maintain a cause, or a position, as just and right. Secondly, To reprove. Thirdly, To correct or amend that which is amiss, faulty, and erroneous: And according unto these three significations, the sence of this Scripture may be given three wayes. But I will maintain

Mine own wayes.] His wayes were his works, or the manner and course of his life; which is therefore called our way, because we pass and repass up and down in it, as a man doth in a way to or from his own home.

Before him.] Or, Before his face, so the letter of the Hebrew. Which he adds, first, in opposition to men; and secondly, that he might more emphatically set forth the strength of his confidence towards God. I will maintain my wayes before him: I will not only make good what I affirm to those that are like my self; I have not only hope to render my self and my wayes fair to the eye of the world; but I am assured that I can render both fair to the eye of God himself. Some can maintain their wayes well enough before men, who cannot maintain them before God; his eyes look through all their coverings and vizards: He can distinguish between appearances and realities; he can see a rotten heart within a painted skin. Holy upright Job was not afraid to come into the presence of God, there to open himself, and to have all his wayes scanned and examined. Those wayes had need be fair and well mended which abide the survey of God himself.

I will maintain, &c.] That is (according to the first signification of the word) Though the Lord slay me, yet I will stand to, and abide my tryal, I will not be brought to an ill opinion of my self, nor will I think the worse of my spiritual, internal estate, how much evil soever the Lord shall be pleased to deal to me in my outward estate: No, I will be as high in pursuance of what I have heretofore asserted, namely, that mine heart is upright with him, and my wayes right (in the main) before him, when he is slaying me, as ever I was, when he was prospering me, or shall be again if he should prosper me again.

Priusquam hinc ab ea vias meas i. e. rationes & causam meā arguā. Ego sane ut perii perii, verum non continebo meipsū quin jus meū coram illo asseram. Merc. Sunt confidentiæ verba quod speret se causā suam probāndum coram Deo fretus sua innocentia. Merc.

Whence Observe, First, An upright heart keeps its ground in all turns and times.

Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him; and not only so, But I will maintain mine own wayes also. For as an upright heart maintains the same practice of holiness at all times: Though there be slaying and killing for the Name and Truth of Christ, yet he will not change his way, nor go into a wrong way, wherein perhaps he shall have more safety, by complying, and chiming in with the opinions or practises of other men. As he (I say) maintains his wayes in regard of his present practice, so also in regard of his former integrity in that practice: which is the thing Job intends chiefly in this Assertion.

Secondly, Job speaks this as an Argument of his uprightness, I will maintain mine own wayes before him.

Hence Note, That it is a sign of a heart sound in holiness, when we can with confidence set our selves before God, and maintain what we are in his presence.

It shews that a man is right when he dares come to tryal: I will dispute it out with God himself, saith Job: Not that he (as I have often shewed before) had an opinion that there was no sin in him; or that God could find no faults in him: Job acted upon the principles of the Covenant of grace, and knew upon what ground he went, but (taking that in) he is resolute to maintain his wayes, and this was a proof of his uprightness. It is an Argument that a piece of gold is weight, when a man is willing to have it brought to the ballance; and that it is right metal, not counterfeit and base, when a man is ready to offer it to the touchstone: Try me, prove me, do what you will with me, bring me to the ballance, or to the touchstone; I will maintain my wayes, I doubt not but I shall be found weight and right, saith the upright soul (John 3. 21.) He that doth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest. He that doth the truth is not afraid of the light; That will but make his deeds manifest that they are wrought in God, as Christ speaks in that place. How are the deeds of a man wrought in God? First thus, The deeds of the Saints are wrought in God; that is, in the strength and power of God. Secondly, They are wrought in God; that is, at the command, and by the authority of God. They that work in the power of God, and by the rule of God, their deeds are wrought in God. Now, He that doth the truth, comes to the light; he loves the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God, both according to the mind of God, and by the power of God. Our deeds have no value in them, but as they are done in God: Nor can we maintain any of our wayes before God, but when we walk in God. We may make a flourish before men, of what is wrought in man: But what we maintain before God, must be of God.

God. See how you can put your wayes before the light of Gods countenance, and debate them in his presence. It is an easie matter to carry it out with creatures: Consider what you can do with God. I (saith Job) will maintain mine own wayes before him.

quoniam ad anteactæ vitæ pœnitentiã quam ad sequentis puritatem pertinere existimat. Vatab. Arguere vias in conspectu ejus, est dare operam ut innocenter vivat coram illo.

Thirdly, I will maintain my wayes, may signifie his resolution to continue in the wayes of holiness and obedience for the time to come: Though he slay me, yet will I maintain my wayes; that is, I will not be brought out of love with holiness, though the Lord should lay me under the greatest discouragements: Here is another Argument of sincerity. A sound heart saith, What evil soever I find in the wayes of God, I will never think ill of the wayes of God: No, I will yet walk in them, I will now run in them; how hardly soever I am used in those wayes, I will never out of them; though I meet with Lyons in them, though I meet with blows and troubles in them, yea, though God meet me as a Lyon in them, though I receive blows and troubles from the hand of God himself, in whose wayes I walk, though he seem to stand there with a drawn sword to slay me, Yet I will maintain my way. This is a truth, and true of Job; yet I conceive the word in the Hebrew, which we render maintain, doth not lead us to it; and therefore (though it hath learned Assertors) I will not stay upon it.

Again, Take the word in the second sence, as it signifies to reprove, and then the meaning riseth somewhat different from the former, though it comes to the same issue: I will reprove my own wayes; that is, Though I still assert my sincerity, yet I do not presume my self free from sin: I will judge my self to have failed in many things; and that the Lord might justly correct me, slay me, yea (in regard of the desert of sin) cast me to Hell, thus, I will reprove mine own wayes before him; while God is smiting me, I will be accusing my self; I will say that I have sinned, and that he doth me no wrong: I will not only acquiesce and rest satisfied in the sentence of God upon me, though it be to death, but I will also blame my self for whatsoever is blame worthy in my heart or life. So then, he intended not any accusation of God, but an examination of himself, or a serious discussion of his course and conscience as in the sight of God.

Hence Observe, That when God is smiting or slaying us, we should be judging our selves, and confessing our sinfulness.

I will reprove mine own wayes before him. Job did not say, I will reprove his wayes, but mine own: He said not, God doth ill in slaying me, but I have often done ill in disobeying him. This is an Argument of a holy heart, when in the midst of all sufferings we can acquit God, and lay load upon our selves. The Apostle assureth us (1 Cor. 11. 31.) If we would judge our selves, we should not be judged of the Lord: There's one truth: And yet this is as great a truth, When we are judged of the Lord, we should judge our selves. When we are corrected of the Lord, we should correct our selves; when he reproveth us, we should reprove our selves, and acknowledge that we are such, as in whom God might find enough, not only to lay rods of correction upon us, but even scorpions of destruction. I also will reprove my wayes before him.

Lastly, Taking the word (as some do) for correcting, I will correct my own wayes before him; so there is this sence in it, When God is slaying me, I will be thinking how to be more holy; how I may amend my own wayes before him. As if he had said, I will not do like stubborn and rebellious ones, who when God chastens and afflicts them, they more pollute and corrupt themselves, or do worse and worse: No, I would be, and do, better and better; I would correct my wayes yet before him: I will not only maintain my wayes in holiness, as I have done; but I would put out a more pure and correct edition of my works, I would take care to have all the errata's (which I have observed in any page of my life) amended: and now that the Lord hath cast me into the fire of affliction, I would come out gold: I would have all my dross purged out, and my whole lump refined. These resolves, which the sence of the word now presented holds out unto us, discover also much holiness of heart. What greater discovery of holiness is there, then to make the best improvement of the worst estate; and to be mending our souls, while our bodies are a slaying? Yet I conceive (according to the coherence and drift of the place) that our translation renders it most fair, that Job, notwithstanding the Lord should slay him, would yet stand up with holy confidence to plead his own integrity, even in the sight of God: I will maintain my own wayes before him.

But this was not all, Job might possibly be checkt: What? Maintain your wayes? And that before God? Yes do, see what you can get by it; Will you plead with God? What will it advantage you? What? saith Job, I fear not any loss by this course, and I hope to be a gainer? I am so far from being startled with these fears, that I am settled in this assurance; what that was he gives in the next verse, Verse 16. He also shall be my salvation, for an hypocrite shall not come before him.

As if he had said, Never put me this doubt, that God will disclaim me, because I maintain mine own wayes before him; nor do I believe that God will damn me, because he slayeth me: No, Though he slay me, yet I will trust in him; and though I maintain mine own wayes before him, yet he shall be my salvation.

Hoc evadet mihi in salutem. Simile, ero, eis in Deum. Drus.

Some render, This shall turn to my salvation; He will not rebuke me, much less condemn me, as he will those who justifie themselves proudly, for this shall turn to my salvation; that is, he will be pleased with, and accept of me; he will not say it is rashness or folly, pride or self-conceit, which hath stirred me up to maintain my wayes; he will rather say, it is the integrity and uprightness of my heart; and that I have done no more then I might, yea, no more then I ought for his glory, being thus charged as I am by you my Friends: I do not distrust my cause, though you do; yea, I am setled in this perswasion, that when God hath heard my plea, he will give sentence on my side, though you are my accusers.

He also shall be my salvation.

Salvation is a large word. God is all salvations to his people, and the Author of all salvation, of temporal, as well as of eternal. Upon whatsoever we can write salvation, we may entitle God to it. He that is our God, is the God of salvation (Psal. 68. 20.) But what is the salvation to which Job here entitles God?

Sunt qui de futuro accipiunt, erit post mortem, sed ego de præsenti tẽpore accipio. Merc.

Some refer it to temporal salvation, He also shall be my salvation; that is, he shall deliver and restore me from my present troubles; though he now slay and quite undo me, yet I believe that he will revive and repair me again.

In salutem esse dicitur non ratione præsentis opis sed rationis liberationis ab omnibus malis & translationis ad beatitudinem. Coc.

Others interpret it strictly of eternal salvation; He also shall be my salvation; that is, though he slay me here, yet I am sure he will save me hereafter, and be my portion for ever. Three Reasons rise from the Text, why Job should here rather be understood of eternal, then of temporal salvation.

First, Because he speaks in the next clause about the presence of God, An hypocrite shall not come before him: coming before God (in the sence there intended) and salvation, are the same; eternal salvation consists in the vision of God, Psal. 16. 11. In thy presence is fulness of joy.

Secondly, Because we find Job expressing little confidence, but rather much diffidence about any temporal restauration; he gave himself for a lost man, as to the riches, honour and greatness of this world. He had better assurance of the glory he never had, then of the greatness he once had.

Thirdly, Because he speaks here upon supposition of his being slain; take slaying strictly, for the separating of soul and body; and he that is so slain is beyond temporal salvation. For these three reasons we may conceive Job here aiming at, and reaching after eternal salvation.

He also shall be my salvation.] Some connecting this clause with that sence of the former, I will reprove my own wayes, give the Observation thus.

Quamvis adversum me coram Deo vias meas tanquam malas arguo, scio tamen quod sententiam in mei favorem pronunciaturus sit. Bold.

While we reprove our selves, and confess our sins, our hearts may be raised up in confidence of the favour of God in the pardon of our sins.

He doth not say, If I reprove mine own wayes, God will reprove me too. There are some reprovings of our hearts, from which we may infer, that God will reprove us much more: So 1 John 3. 20. If our heart con- demn us, God is greater then our hearts, that knoweth all things. 'Tis so, when the heart is ingaged to any lust: When such a mans heart condemns him, God will condemn him a thousand times more: A man continuing in sin, cannot say upon good ground, I reprove my wayes, yet God shall be my salvation; yea, while such reprove themselves, they may be sure God will reprove them also. Only, when we humbly acknowledge the sinfulness of our wayes, and forsake them, we are assured of mercy. These, and none but these, have warrant from the word, to say, salvation belongs to them. Prov. 28. 13. He that covereth his sins shall not prosper; but whoso confesseth, and forsaketh them, shall have mercy. (1 John 1. 9.) If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins: To confess sin is self-condemnation. God is so gracious, that he will not condemn; so faithful and just, that he will forgive those that confess. While we implead our selves, God will not be our Judge, but Christ will be our Advocate: Hence that Gospel-prophet incourageth drooping souls (Isa. 43. 16.) Declare that thou mayst be justified: Declare, what should he declare? Declare thine iniquity, and thou shalt be justified from all thine iniquities. The Lord also will be thy salvation.

Secondly, Take the former clause according to our reading, I will maintain my own wayes before him: He also shall be my salvation.

From this Connexion Observe, There is a self-justification consistent with salvation.

Christ chargeth the Pharisees (Luke 16. 15.) Ye are they which justifie your selves before men, but God knoweth your hearts: That is, you bear up, and pride your selves with this, that men know no ill by you, that no man can say, black is your eye; but God can see, black is your heart. They who rest in a justification before men, while their hearts are naught, are condemned before God. And all who justifie themselves before God, upon the goodness of their works, shall be condemned. But though we may not justifie our selves upon the goodness of our works, yet they (whose works are so) may justifie themselves that their works are good. 'Tis not pride, but duty (when we are called to it) to say we are what we are, and to maintain that our wayes are right, when they are right. God takes it well at our hands, if we speak the most (with truth) of our selves, when others speak less then truth, or that which is not true of us. Self-condemnation is alwayes not only uncomely, but sinful, except it come under the notion of self-vindication, or of such a self-justification as this point leads unto. Thus we may maintain our wayes before men: Yea, thus (while we put our mouths in the dust, and are deeply humbled before God for the imperfection of our wayes) we may maintain the uprightness of our wayes before God, and be assured that he also will be our salvation.

Further, Take the words in their own compass, and we may Observe,

First, God is the salvation of his people.

How often do the Saints breath out this faith, He is our salvation; upon this faith they live, and in this faith they dye, That God is their salvation.

Secondly, Observe, A thought that God is salvation to us, is consolation enough to us.

Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him: he also shall be my salvation. When Jacob lay upon his death-bed panting and gasping for life, O God (saith he) I have waited for thy salvation. He could not go on blessing his sons, but he must make a parenthesis, to take a view, or get a taste of this salvation. To reflect upon our interest in the salvation of God, is light to us in darkness, and life to us in the approaches of death. To be saved by any hand carries comfort in it, much more to be saved by the hand of God: But the comfort of the Saints is yet higher, God is their salvation. We are happy enough that God saves us; but we have a further happiness, in that God is our salvation: If God be our salvation, we are not only as safe, but (according to our measure and receptibility) as happy as God himself is.

Thirdly, Job speaks emphatically, He also; he cryes up the Name of God. And in this open affirmation, that God is his salvation, there is a secret negation, or a denyal implied, that salvation is in any else: As if he had said, He, and he only; he, and none but he.

The point from it is, That none but God is able to give salvation to his people.

Salvation belongeth unto the Lord (Psal. 3. 8.) The Hebrew is, Salvation unto the Lord. Salvation is so much his, that the holy Ghost puts nothing between it and him. We supply the sence well, Salvation belongeth unto the Lord. And it doth not belong unto him in common with others, 'tis his propriety: He gives it, and none else can; (Isa. 43. 11.) I, even I, am the Lord, and beside me there is no Saviour. No? We find in the Book of Judges, that God raised up Saviours to his people (Neh. 9. 27.) True; but, first, He never raised up any Saviour for eternal salvation, but only Jesus Christ, who is also God. Secondly, They who were temporal Saviours did not save in their own strength, and by their own power; God is said to raise them up Saviours, because he raised up such Instruments as himself intended to save them by; it was God that saved them, though men were imployed to save them. Whosoever brings us salvation, God is the Author of it. The Prophet concludes (Jer. 3. 23.) Truly in vain is salvation hoped for from the hills, and from the multitude of mountains. He speaks but of a temporal salvation; and by hills and mountains he means the greatest means, the highest helps, the strongest hands, the wisest heads on earth; and yet he saith, In vain is salvation hoped for from those hills and mountains; truly God is the help of his people. It is much more vain to expect eternal salvation from any other; in vain is soul-salvation hoped for from hills, or from the multitude of mountains; from this good work or that good work; from hills and mountains of good works; though you pile up mountains of prayers, hills of alms, and deeds of charity; yea, though you dig the lowest valleys of humiliation, and make rivers and seas of tears with weeping, yet in vain is eternal salvation hoped for from these hills and mountains, from these valleys and seas, Salvation is of the Lord: He also shall be my salvation.

When Job had said, I will maintain mine own wayes before him; Doth he say, And they shall be my salvation? Doth he say, my righteousness, my integrity, shall be my salvation? His wayes were indeed the way to salvation; but his wayes were not, nor did he intend them to be, his salvation. The uprightness of our hearts, the righteousness of our wayes cannot save us; Christ only is our salvation. How much soever we may maintain, or may be compelled (as Job was) to boast of our wayes, yet we cannot make salvation of them; we must give that wholly to God. It is an admirable frame of heart, when we are highest in speaking for our selves, or in maintaining our wayes before God and man, yet then to go quite out of our wayes, and out of our selves. To expect all from free-grace, when we have been most free at works, most active in doing, or patient in suffering for God, is the right Gospel temper.

Fourthly, Observe this from it, That an upright heart in the worst of times, looks at, and hath an eye upon the best things.

Though he slay me, he shall be my salvation: With the same breath he tells us of God slaying him, and of God his salvation; he saw life in death, light in darkness, deliverances in destruction, repairs in ruine, salvation in slaying: such are the workings of a gracious heart, such the prospects of faith in the gloomest day, in the darkest night. Faith only sees such sights as these, reflected from the glass of precious promises.

Lastly, Job expresseth his special interest in, or relation to God, He also shall be my salvation.

Hence observe, That a Believer looks upon God himself as his salvation.

My God, my salvation. God hath (as it were) made himself over to Believers: Job doth not say, God will give, or bestow salvation upon me; but he saith, He shall be my salvation. It is God himself who is the salvation and the portion of his people. They would not much care for salvation, if God were not their salvation. It more pleaseth the Saints that they enjoy God, then that they enjoy salvation.

tion. False and carnal spirits, will express a great deal of desire after salvation: O they like salvation, heaven, and glory well, but they never express any longing desire after God and Jesus Christ. They love salvation, but they care not for a Saviour. Now that which saith pitcheth most upon, is God himself; he shall be my salvation, let me have him, and there's salvation enough; He is my life, he is my comfort, he is my riches, he is my honour, and he is my all. Thus David's heart acted immediately upon God, Psal. 18. 1, 2. I love thee, O Lord, my strength. The Lord is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer, my buckler, and the horn of my salvation, and my high tower. It pleased holy David more, that God was his strength, then that God gave him strength; that God was his deliverer, then that he was delivered; that God was his fortress, his buckler, his horn, his high tower, then that he gave him the effect of all these: It pleased David, and it pleases all the Saints more, that God is their salvation (whether temporal, or eternal) then that he saves them. The Saints look more at God, then at all that is Gods. They say (Non tua, sed te) We desire not thine, but thee, or nothing of thine like thee. Whom have I in Heaven but thee? saith David again (Psal. 73. 25.) What are Saints, what are Angels, to a soul without God? 'Tis true of things, as well as of persons. What have we in Heaven but God? What's joy without God? What's glory without God? What's all the furniture and riches, all the delicates, yea, and all the diadems of Heaven, without the God of Heaven? If God should say to the Saints, here is Heaven, take it amongst you, but I will withdraw my self, how would they weep over Heaven it self, and make it a Baca, a valley of tears indeed. Heaven is not Heaven, unless we injoy God. 'Tis the presence of God which makes Heaven: Glory is but our neerest being unto God. A Mephibosheth replyed, when David told him, I have said, thou and Ziba divide the land: Let him take all if he will, saith Mephibosheth; I do not so much regard the land, as I regard thy presence; Let him take all, for as much as my Lord the King is come again in peace to his own house, where I may injoy him. So, if God should say to the Saints, take Heaven among you, and withdraw himself, they would even say, Nay, let the world take Heaven if they will, let them take glory if they will; if we may not have thee in Heaven, Heaven wouldbe but an earth, or rather but a hell to us. That which Saints rejoyce in, is, that they may be in the presence of God, that they may sit at his table, and eat bread with him; that is, that they may be near him continually, which was Mephibosheth his priviledge with David. That's the thing, they say, which they desire, and which their souls thirst after; that's the wine they would drink. My soul (saith David, Psal. 42. 2.) thirsteth for God, for the living God, when (me thinks the time is very long, when) shall I come and appear before God? He spake this in the greatness and heat of his zeal to injoy God in the Ordinances of his publick worship: How much more was his soul on fire to injoy God, where he should be above Ordinances? The usual saying of Christians is, Come let us go to prayer, or, let us go to Church; we should rather say, Come let us go to God. We should prize duties no further, then as we obey and injoy God in doing them: Nor should we prize Heaven it self further, then as we shall have there a more full and perfect injoyment of God. Salvation it self were no salvation, without the God of salvation. He also shall be my salvation.

But an hypocrite shall not come before him.

In this latter clause, Job secretly refuteth the censure of his Friends, who had aspersed him as an hypocrite. Bildad did it in the eighth Chapter, though not directly, by way of assertion, yet obliquely, by way of inference, while he said (vers. 13.) The hypocrites hope shall perish, and be cut off, and his trust shall be as a spiders web. Here Job speaks that out, which no hypocrite can, I (saith he) will maintain my wayes before God, and he shall be my salvation: 'Tis not so with hypocrites, they dare not maintain their wayes before God; or if they do, they shall yet fall under the condemnation of God: Thus by way of argument, he denieth, as they by way of argument had affirmed him to be an hypocrite. Job could come where no hypocrite can.

Audeo coram Deo apparere, quod non facerem si impius & hypocrita essem ut vos me esse dicitis. Mere.

An hypocrite shall not come before him.] The Hebrew is, All hypocrites shall not come before him; that is, No hypocrite shall come before him. Not all, is often in Scripture put for none; or, none at all. David (Psal. 47. 17.) saith of the worldly rich man, When he dyeth, he shall carry nothing away with him: The Hebrew is, When he dyeth, he shall not carry all away with him. The meaning is, (as we translate) he shall carry nothing at all away, he shall not carry so much as a rag away with him. So the Apostle speaks (Rom. 3. 20.) By the deeds of the Law there shall no flesh be justified in thy sight: The Greek is, All flesh shall not be justified in thy sight, by the deeds of the Law: The meaning is, none shall. So here, All hypocrites; that is, No hypocrite. I have opened something about him at the eighth Chapter, and shewed there what an hypocrite is; he is one that acts another mans part; he acts a person which he is not. An hypocrite is a wicked man in a godly mans clothes.

Non veniet in conspectu ejus omnis hypocrita. Heb. Non omnis, in sacro sermone sæpe valet nullus Hypocrita, Græcis est quod Latinis histrio, Larvatus nimirum homo, qui aliud ipse est, & aliud se esse simulat. Sanct. Flagitiosus. Vatab. Impius. Pagn. Coram Deo dolus non ingreditur. Sept. Hanc vocis significationem agnoscere videtur Rab. Mord. & Rab. Lev. in lib. Rad.

Some translate by a general word, A wicked man shall not come before him: Others render, An accepter of persons shall not come before him; He taxed his Friends as such before. Two or three of the Rabbins (though they are somewhat hard put to it, to make out that sence of the word) are much for the latter, An accepter of persons shall not come before him. We render it strictly according to the proper signification of the word; yet to say a wicked men, or an accepter of persons, shall not come before him, is as much as to say, an hypocrite shall not come before him: For though all wicked men, all accepters of persons are not hypocrites (some sin, and care not who sees; they sin in the very face of the Sun, and the shew of their faces (as the Prophet speaks) doth testifie against them) But (I say) though possibly some wicked men (at least in some things) are no hypocrites; yet there is no hypocrite, but he is a wicked man; therefore we shall not call either of them out of his name, though we give both, or either of the names to each of them: And as their titles, so their estates are alike, we may as well say, A wicked man, as An hypocrite.

Shall not come before him.] Not come before him? Whither can they go? or where can they be behind him, whose face is every where? I answer, To come before God, may be understood either of this life, or of the life to come. We come before God in this life, while we attend the duties and ordinances of his worship. But it may be said, Do not hypocrites come thus before God? None come more before God in that sence then hypocrites; and herein lyes their hypocrisie chiefly, that they come before God in outward holy duties; and yet are so unholy in their lives, or at those duties. The Lord speaks complaining of such an hypocritical people pressing upon him (Isa. 58. 2.) This people seek me daily; they take delight in approaching to God: Yet all this was only as a Nation that did righteousness; they were not really a righteous Nation. In another Prophet (Jer. 7. 10.) the Lord reproveth hypocrites openly, and in terms, for coming before him, Will ye steal, murder, and commit adultery, and swear falsely, &c. and come and stand before me in this House? They came so much before God, that he was put to chide them out of his presence; he could scarce stave them off. How then is it that Job saith, An hypocrite shall not come before him, if we understand it of this present life?

Phrasis Hebraica idem est ac illum condemni, & rejici. Bold.

I answer, He comes not so before God, first in regard of right; secondly in regard of acceptance. An hypocrite hath no right to come before God in any duty, he cannot call God Father; he cannot lay claim to any promise of the Covenant; or if he do, he shall not be accepted, much less suffered to see God as his salvation. Thus an hypocrite shall not come before God in this present life, though he appear often personally before him.

Secondly, He shall not come before God in the life to come, to injoy, or joy in his presence; he shall not see God to his comfort, but to his torment; he shall only see God as a Judge, to be condemned by him, and thus he would not see him: He shall be driven to the Tribunal, or Judgment-seat of God, but he shall not stand in judgment.

Non veniet in conspectu ejus ut videat ipsum Deum in quo ultima salus hominis consistit, veniet tamen in conspectu ejus judicandus. Aquin.

There are four expressions in Scripture, which gradually set forth the rejection of wicked men from the presence of God.

First, They shall not be admitted entrance, Rev. 21. 27. Chap. 22. 14. There shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, nor whatsoever worketh or maketh a lye; that is, unholy ones shall not so much as set one foot over the threshold of that holy City. He speaks thus (Isa. 59. 14.) in another case, Equity cannot enter. It was a time, wherein equity was so far from having due respect and entertainment, that justice could not so much as get in adoors: Equity cannot enter. The wicked shall not enter into the Kingdom of Heaven; they shall not have the least admittance.

Secondly, The Scripture saith, wicked men shall not stand in the presence of God (Psal. 5. 5.) The foolish shall not stand in thy sight. David treateth there much upon the same Argument that Job doth; for after he had spoken of his own acceptance with God, he adds in a way of opposition, the foolish shall not stand in thy sight; though, possibly, he may enter, yet he shall not stand there.

Thirdly, The Scripture saith, they shall not dwell with God (Psal. 5. 4.) Evil shall not dwell with thee; that is, evil men shall not, though they should be admitted entrance, though they should be suffered to stand a while before God, yet they shall not dwell with God, they shall presently pass away.

The fourth expression is that in the Text, which comes between the first and second, between entring and standing, that is, coming before God; An hypocrite shall not come before him; that is, God will not have any thing to do with him in a way of favour. Thus he is excluded totally; he shall not enter, saith one Scripture; if he doth, he shall not come before God, saith another; if he come before God, yet he shall not stand in his sight, saith a third; if he stand, yet he shall not dwell with God, saith a fourth. I might add a fifth, which saith, He shall not inherit the Kingdom of God (1 Cor. 6. 9.) Now in opposition to all these, the upright and holy are admitted, they have entrance into the House of God, they come before God, they stand in his sight, they dwell with him for ever; yea, they shall not only dwell as servants, or as friends, but as sons, as his first-born, as heirs; all they shall inherit the Kingdom of God. One of the highest priviledges promised unto Sion is, that a time shall come when the wicked shall not come unto her (Isa. 52. 1.) Awake, awake, put on thy strength, O Zion, put on thy beautiful garments, O Jerusalem, the holy City. Wherefore must Jerusalem the holy City awake thus, and be ready in her dress, in her beautiful garments? Why, there is good news for her, For henceforth there shall no more come into thee the uncircumcised and the unclean: As if he had said, In times of Sions defection, or oppression, when there was no due reformation of worship, nor order among worshippers, then the uncircumcised and the unclean came and stood, yea, even dwelt with thee, as thy own children; but, O Jerusalem, a time shall come when the uncircumcised and the unclean shall not so much as come into thee, they shall be rejected and cast out for ever. Prophane ones shall find no place at last in Sion here below; and hypocrites shall never come into the Sion which is above. Some hypocrites will come into the Church when she is most refined; there is no keeping of them out, till they discover themselves, and so are cast out; or apostatize, and so go out of themselves. Possibly the Church militant may be so purged and reformed at last, that as there shall be no prophane in her, so but a few hypocrites. But into the Church triumphant, we are sure, the closest hypocrite shall not enter: God will wash off all the varnish and paint, which they have put upon the face of their profession, with rivers of brimstone, and will give them the cup of his fierce wrath to drink unto eternity.

Hence Observe, First, Hypocrites are the worst of wicked men.

Every wicked man is not bad enough to be called an hypocrite. Hypocrites are the chief of sinners; not only the children, but the first-born of the Devil. We may wrong a wicked man, by calling him an hypocrite; but we cannot wrong any hypocrite, by thinking him all that's wicked. The Moralist saith, When you have said a man is ungrateful, you have said all that is ill of him. I am sure, when we have said a man is an hypocrite, we have said all that's ill of him; and have called him not only (as we say) all to nought, but all that's nought. To do wickedly, or to be wicked, is bad enough; but to do wickedness under pretence of goodness; or for a man, whose heart tells him he is wicked, to pretend to goodness, this is abominable. An hypocrite is not worse then other wicked men, because he alwayes hath more sin then they, but because he hides his sin: Nor doth the greatness of his sin lye simply in this, because he hides how sinful he is; but because he appears holy, which he is not; that he seems to be good, is worse then his being really bad. That Satan is the Prince of darkness, speaks not so much ill of him, as this, that he transforms himself into an Angel of light. An hypocrite never doth good out of love to God, but out of design for himself. He thinks he can impose upon God, and mock him, as one man mocks another; he makes God an Idol, as if he had eyes and could not see; or had no eyes to see his wayes, not understanding to search into his heart. And to shew that hypocrites are the worst of sinners, they are sentenced to the worst of punishments. An hypocrite shall not come before him, saith Job here; how great a punishment that is, will appear in the next Observation. When Christ would express the forest judgment upon any sort of sinners, he tells them, They shall have their portion with hypocrites and unbelievers, (Mat. 24. 51.) implying, that the judgment passed upon hypocrites is the most dreadful judgment. Now if the judgment of an hypocrite be the greatest judgment, then the sin of an hypocrite is the greatest sin; for the justice of God takes the measure of punishment by the measure of sin. As every sin deserves punishment; so ever, where the punishment is greater, the sin is greater, either in the matter, or in the circumstances of it. Hypocrites are (as one glosseth this Text in Matthew) the freeholders of Hell; other sinners are but as inmates with them, and have but a portion of their misery. Now as that by which other things are proportioned and measured is a perfect measure, and that by which other things are weighed is a perfect weight in its kind: so that by which the greatest misery is weighed and measured, is the most perfect misery in its degree: Seeing then the weight and measure of that misery which rests upon an hypocrite, is used by God himself, to weigh and measure out the misery of those who shall have the greatest misery; therefore the misery of an hypocrite is the greatest; which clearly argues what is here asserted, that his sin is also greatest.

Secondly, Consider in what the punishment of the hypocrite doth consist: Job doth not say, An hypocrite shall be cast to hell, and tormented in that Lake with fire and brimstone (which yet other Scriptures say) but here Job saith only, An hypocrite shall not come before him, he shall be banished out of the presence of God. This is his punishment.

Hence Observe, That, The punishment of loss is a very great punishment, one of the greatest, if not the greatest punishment.

Sinful man falls under a twofold punishment, First, of loss. Secondly, of sense. Many dispute which of these is the greatest; and most determine, that the punishment of loss is greater then that of sense. This is the punishment of an hypocrite, He shall not come before God. This loss is a great punishment in this life: Not to injoy God by Faith in Ordinances, Promises, and Dispensations, is the great misery of man; hypocrites are denyed this injoyment. For though they come before God (as I said before) and press into his presence, to worship him; though they challenge the Promises, and are apt to flatter themselves, that God is with them in providential Dispensations, yet they have no acceptance with him. God denyeth them his presence: They come to God, but God doth not come to them; though they talk of the Covenant, and lay hold of it, yet it is with a false finger, and God reproves them for their boldness and usurpations (Psal. 50. 16.) Unto the wicked God saith, what hast thou to do to declare my Statutes, or that thou shouldest take my Covenant into thy mouth, seeing thou hatest instruction, and castest my words behind thee? I grant an hypocrite may have some flushes of the presence of God in Ordinances and duties, and that's his Heaven. This the Apostle calls his taste of the good word of God, and of the powers of the world to come (Heb. 6. 5.) he may have some raisings, yea, supposed ravishings of Spirit at the report and sight of heavenly things: but his taste of these is not spiritual, but sensitive only, such as the understanding gives in to the affections upon any rational discourse or demonstration of objects pleasing to the nature of man: any higher higher injoyment of God then this the hypocrite tasteth not. And usually he prayeth, and heareth, without any sense of these. He doth nothing with God, while he hath to do with him: And here is his punishment, though he be not sensible of it now, but he shall be sensible of it in the life to come. As he shall not come before God for ever; so he shall know the meaning of it, what it is not to come before him. Carnal men lightly esteem the presence and injoyment of God; yea, they are glad when they are out of his presence. Few know when God is near them, or when he is far off; what his departures mean, or what his returnings. They who know these things, count his presence their greatest gain, and his absence their greatest loss. When God sentenced Cain for the murder of his Brother, he complains chiefly of this, (Gen. 4. 14.) Thou hast driven me out this day from thy face, or, from thy presence. And what was that? It was but the common presence of God in Ordinances. Cain had been offering sacrifice, and God did not accept him; he could not go from the universal presence of God; and he was not at all admitted to his comfortable presence; yet he looked upon it as his greatest misery, that he was deprived of his common presence in publick worship, from which he was as a person excommunicated. I am driven out from thy face. When Saul could not get an answer from God, neither by Dreams, nor by Urim, nor by Prophets, this he represents as the worst of his affliction (1 Sam. 28.) To be shut out from the sight or society of a man whom we much esteem, is exceeding afflictive. Though Absalom was reconciled to David his Father, so far as to be admitted to come to the City; yet because David gave order that Absalom should not see his face, nor come to Court, he could not bear it, but resents this restraint so passionately, that he sends to Joab, and bespeaks him thus? Wherefore am I come from Geshur? It had been good for me to have been there still; now therefore let me see the Kings face, and if there be any iniquity in me, let him kill me (2 Sam. 14. 24, 34.) As if he had said, I cannot satisfie my self with my liberty in Jerusalem, if I stand excluded from the Kings presence: I had rather dye, then indure this piece of banishment. How then will hypocrites be tormented with an eternal banishment from the face of God! It is the greatest tryal the Saints have in this life, when they loose the sight of God by faith; when they come before God, and cannot find God; when God covers himself with a Cloud (as the Church complains) that they cannot come at him; this is the hardest exercise of the Saints in this life. And O how they are refreshed, when God returns and comes into their spirits; when he sheds his love abroad into their hearts by the Holy Ghost. This is Heaven upon earth; and of this they say as the Disciples at the transfiguration of Christ upon the Mount (Mat. 17.) It is good to be here. When the Lord Jesus perceived a vail drawn between him and his Father, and that (while he was suffering for the sin, and by the malice and wrath of man) he suffered also an eclipse (though he knew it was not a total one, and would be but a short one) of the light of his Fathers face, how did he cry out (who never shrunk, nor opened his mouth at the scourges and crown of thorns, at the spittings and buffettings, at the nails and spear which tortured his blessed body, how did he cry out I say) at this short desertion, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? (Matth. 27. 46.) Hence take a scantling of those torments which shall vex hypocrites in Hell, who shall be made to know fully (which they have here slighted) what the comfortable presence of God means, and yet shall see themselves shut out from it, without the least hope of any injoyment. And that which will make the suffering of this loss most torturing and insufferable, is, that they shall ever be thinking of it. If a man could forget his losses, how great soever they are, they would be only a privative evil to him, not an afflictive evil; but to be ever thinking of our losses, is to us worse then the loss it self. Now, wicked men shall ever be poring upon the loss of Heaven in Hell, and casting up the sum of it, though they cannot exactly make out the sum. This will be the sting of all their sorrows, and the very head of that poyson'd arrow which shall drink up their spirits. And this arises two wayes: First, From the very conduct of Nature, which alwayes leads our thoughts to, and fastens them upon our losses. As where the pain is, there we point with the finger; so where the loss is, there we dwell with our thoughts. Secondly, This arises inevitably from the justice of God; who having prepared this as the hypocrites punishment, will irresistably hold his thoughts and this loss together; so that it shall not be in his power to lay them aside, or suspend them for one moment. From all these considerations, let the hypocrite understand the terror of this sentence, that he shall not come before God.

If any shall object, How can hypocrites be said to lose this presence of God, seeing they never injoyed it?

I answer, We may be said to lose a thing three wayes. First, As having had and possessed it before; thus hypocrites do not lose the presence of God. Secondly, We may be said to lose that, which hath been offered and tendered to our injoyment: And Thirdly, That which we have hoped to injoy. In these two latter senses, hypocrites lose the presence of God, together with all the blessed concomitants of it. For salvation hath been offered to them, and they have professed, yea, possibly, they have had strong hopes that they should be saved. Whence else is that challenge of admittance (Matth. 7. 22.) Many will say unto me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy Name? &c. To whom Christ will profess, I never knew you, depart from me ye workers of iniquity.

Again, An hypocrite shall not come before him. Then, who shall come before him? Take the answer to this question, from the mouth of Christ himself (Matth. 5. 8.) Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. And the Apostles negative, Without holiness no man shall see the Lord, may be resolved into this affirmative, Holy ones shall see the Lord, the holy One; they see God here in a glass darkly, and they shall see him face to face clearly in Heaven. The reason why we see so little of God in the glass of Ordinances and Promises, is, because there is so much unholiness in our hearts: The hypocrite cannot see him at all; and the sincere cannot see much of him, because remaining corruption stands between God and them, hindering their sight. When we shall see God as he is, we shall be like him; and as we grow now to a clearer sight of him, we shall also grow into a fuller likeness with him.

Lastly, For as much as an hypocrite shall not come before him, we learn,

That there is no coming before God without Christ.

The reason why an hypocrite shall not come before God, is, because he cannot bring Christ with him; he comes in his own name, and therefore receives nothing from God but frowns, or a command to depart and be gone. Through Christ we have access with boldness to the throne of grace; and we may speak to God as to a friend: But they who come boldly before God without Christ, come presumptuously, not believingly; and shall find, that fool-hardness, not faith, hath acted them up to such a confidence. For as no man can come unto Christ except the Father draw him; so none can come unto the Father unless Christ bring him. Christ takes his people (as it were) by the hand, and leads them up to his Fathers Throne. As when a poor suitor comes to present some request to a great King, he (possibly) dares not come near, till the Favourite, or some eminent Officer of the Court brings him up. 'Tis so here: But as for the hypocrite, he may stay long enough at the door, before Christ vouchsafe to bring him to his Father; and if he shall be so impudent, as to come alone, Christ will quickly turn him back. Man cannot come immediately before God: The hypocrite is out of the Mediator, and therefore An hypocrite shall not come before him.

VERS. 17, 18, 19.

Hear diligently my speech, and my declaration, with your ears.
Behold now, I have ordered my cause, I know that I shall be justified.
Who is he that will plead with me? for now if I hold my tongue, I shall give up the ghost.

JOB had made his Preface, and called for attention at the sixth verse of this Chapter, Hear now my reasoning, and hearken to the pleadings of my lips. Having spoken a little, little, he makes a new preface, and again calls up their attention, Hear diligently my speech, and my declaration, with your ears.

There are two parts of this second preface.

In the first, he requireth a fair hearing from his friends, which, with some interpositions of his growing confidence, is contained in these three verses.

In the second, he desireth a fair hearing from God, vers. 20, 21, 22.

In this part of the preface directed to his friends, he calls for attention in general at the seventeenth verse, Hear diligently my speech. And shews a twofold ground of it, vers. 18, 19.

First, From the goodness of his cause, and the clearness of his conscience, at the eighteenth verse, Behold now, I have ordered my cause, I know that I shall be justified. A man that is sure he hath a good cause, cares not who hears it, only he would have it well heard.

Secondly, He giveth another ground, from his own necessity, he must be heard, he shall die else; in the latter part of the nineteenth verse, Who is he that will plead with me? for if now I hold my tongue, I shall give up the ghost.

Hear diligently my speech.

Job had found his friends unequal hearers, and therefore he begs a better hearing; and to prepare their attention for it, he layes about him (as we use to say) thick and threefold, Hear diligently my speech, and my declaration, with your ears.

Audiendo audite Attentionē ab iis nō quatemcunq; sed maximam efflagitat.

Hear diligently.] The Hebrew is, Hearing hear, that is, Be sure you hear when you hear. As if he had said, It is not any kind of attention which will serve my cause, you must give attentive diligence and diligent attention to my words. The doubling of the word imports two things; either first, that his friends were unwilling to hear; or secondly, that what he had to speak was of very great importance, such as might justly command a double hearing. Hear diligently my speech.

Ænigmata. Vulg.

And my declaration.] The Vulgar reads it, My dark speeches: But there is no light at all in the Original, leading them to translate dark speeches. They say it is because Job speaks about a difficult point, or the riddles of providence, shewing how the Lord had afflicted the innocent, and yet is himself just. These indeed are hard sayings, dark speeches; and we may grant, that there is a darkness in the matter, a depth and a mysteriousness in what he was about to speak. But Jobs design was to speak plain, not in parables, to speak in the sun, not in the clouds. And the Hebrew word in its native importance, is to open or explain, to set a thing forth in lively colours: Which signification is altogether inconsistent with that of the Vulgar, which reades, Hear my riddle, or my dark speech. Besides, the word [declaration] signifies a grave and a weighty speech, a speech which is not froth'd out with light words, nor wrapt up in obscure meanings, but is bottomed upon reason, and ordered with a clearness of discretion. Further, the word (declaration) is conceived to be a law-term, for he speaks afterwards of pleading, who will plead with me? I will make my declaration. In law-suits the Plantiff puts in a declaration of his grievance: so saith Job, Hear now my speech, and my declaration, with your ears. I am at the bar, let my declaration be read for the opening of my cause.

With your ears.] The ear is the Organ of hearing, and that only, we have nothing to hear with but the ear, why then doth he say, hear my declaration with your ears? when if they heard it at all, they must hear it with their ears. I answer, This is but an enforcement of what he said before, hear diligently, that is, hear with your ears, be sure you hear, set your ear to work upon it, take heed how you hear, or in hearing be sure you hearken. So in the new Testament often, he that hath an ear to hear, let him hear, which is as much as this, let him hear with his ears, that is, let the ear do its work, and not be idle. Every man that hath ears, hath not an ear to hear. Most are like the Idols of the heathen, who have ears but hear not. All ears are shut till Christ bores them to a saving hearing of the word. Till the heart be opened, the ear is deaf, and cannot hear to purpose. Further, take this rule. It is a heightning of the sense of what we say, when we put the Organ and the act together, and joyn them which cannot be severed: So, when we hear one say, I saw it with my mine eyes; we know he could not see but with his eyes; yet thus he speaks to note the certainty and clearness of the sight he had of such a thing. And thus, I heard it with mine ears, is, I heard it certainly, fully, and attentively. Such is the meaning of Job in this admonition to his friends, hear diligently my speech, and my declaration with your ears.

Hence (considering the state of Job when he called for this hearing) Observe,

That a man in affliction desires to be heard with much attention.

He that can hardly speak for attending upon his own pains, would fain have others attend to his speech; he would not have his words lost when they come drencht and bedewed with his own tears and blood. The affliction of others should move us to hear them; and they that are in affliction will be sure to put it as a motive why they should be heard. And that's one reason why times of affliction are such special seasons of prayer to God. Is any among you afflicted? let him pray, Jam. 5.13. As he hath reason to pray then, because of his own need, so he hath an encouragement to pray then, because he may have stronger hopes to speed. God hears at all times with his ears when we pray with our hearts, but his ear is quickest when our wants are sharpest. Afflictions do sometimes hinder us from hearing counsel, yea afflictions hinder some from hearing comforts, (*Exod.*6.9.) And Moses spake so unto the children of Israel (what spake he? Not the law which called them to obedience, but a promise which called them out of bondage), but they hearkned not unto Moses for anguish (or straightness) of spirit, and for cruel bondage. Their bondage suffered them not to hear of their deliverance out of bondage. But though affliction hinders many from hearing both counsel and comfort, yet they who are in affliction think all bound to hear their complaints.

Secondly, In that Job calls so often for attention (for I told you this was his second preface: at the sixth verse he bids them hear and hearken, now he bids them hear again)

Hence Observe, They who are at ease themselves, are seldom so sensible as they ought of those that are in misery.

Their pains, their prayers, their tears, are not laid to heart as they ought. The ground upon which the Apostle assures the Saints that they shall be heard when they cry to Christ, when they make declarations of their miseries and sorrows before his throne, is, his sensibleness of their sorrows, (Heb. 4. 15.) We have not an high Priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin: Christ was under temptations; he feeleth ours, because he had many of his own to feel. But they who never had experience of sorrows, know not how to hear, especially not how to hear diligently the cryes of those that are in sorrow. See more of this at the fifth verse of the twelfth chapter. Here I shall only add, that there are two sorts of men who are ill-hearers. First, Such as enjoy worldly pleasures and contentments to the full. Secondly, They who are over-full or intangled with worldly cares and businesses: both these are very ill-hearers. And hence I conceive that Proverb (among us) hath its original, when a servant, or any other we have to do with, regards not or forgets what we say; we say to such, surely you hear with your harvest ears. Harvest time is a time of great pleasure, and a time of great business: and so the meaning of the Proverb is, you hear as if you were taken up with some other delights or affairs. Most hear the word of God with harvest ears, and that's the reason we have so ill a seed-time for the word. While we are sowing the word, most men are in the harvests of their worldly contents and cares, and therefore their harvest in holiness is very small, if any: Most who bring forth fruit, bring forth but very little, and very many bring forth none at all, and all upon this account.

Thirdly Observe, Job, though but a man, yet (you see) he expects to be heard: Now

If a man speaking to men takes it ill if he be not heard, how ill may God take it if men will not hear when he speaks?

We put God to many of these prefaces: the Prophets of old, seldom, if ever, came with a message from God, but they begin with, Thus saith the Lord, or, Hear what the Lord saith, &c. Christ in the Gospel and in his Epistles to the Churches (Rev. 2. 3.) repeats this often. He that hath an ear to hear, let him hear. So (Psal. 81. 13.) O that my people had hearkened unto me: and vers. 8. Hear O my people, and I will testifie unto thee. Thus God calls for, yea even begs for hearing. It's a strange condescention, that he should stand wishing for our attention, who (upon the highest terms of Soveraignty) may command our attention. Besides, God hath no need that we should hear him, he doth not speak to us for our help, or to supply his wants, If he were hungry he would not tell us, for the world is his and the fulness of it, (Psal. 50. 12.) Now if take it ill, that men will not hear us, when we are hungry to feed us, or when we are weak to help us, how much more may God take it ill at our hands when we will not hear him, who only commands us to our duty, or counsels us for our good? We are apt to think much, if God do not speedily hear our prayers, and grant our requests: what cause do we give God to be angry, when we will not hear his precepts nor hearken to his laws? And yet the Lord instead of anger expresses sometimes nothing but compassion, when he is not heard. O that my people had hearkened unto me! God is much dishonoured when he is not heard, and yet he pities those who do not hear him.

Fourthly, Hear diligently my speech, and my declaration, with your ears. Hence Observe, Weighty and extraordinary matters must be heard with more then ordinary spirits.

Luke 8. Take heed how you hear. There is as much danger in hearing ill, as there is benefit and comfort in hearing well. And according to the concernment of the word we hear, ought to be our heed in hearing. He that hears the word of life, had need to hear for life.

Fifthly Observe, It is not unuseful often to stir up our auditors to attention.

Job makes more prefaces then one to be heard, and he doth more then speak; when he speaks to be heard, he speaks passionately. The Preacher tells us, that, if the iron be blunt, and a man do not whet the edge, he must put to more strength, (Eccl. 10. 10.) So we may say in this case, if our hearers are dull, and we do not whet their edge, we must put more strength to it, or rather we lose all our strength, how much soever we put to it. When spirits are low and dead, we must speak to raise and quicken them, or else we speak in vain to instruct or reprove them. We say in our Proverb, A whet is no let. He that is whetting his sithe mows no grass, and yet he shall mow little unless he whet. There is as much work done in preparing the instruments with which we work, or the objects upon which we work, as there is in doing the work it self.

Lastly Observe, That good duties must not only be done, but be done diligently.

Hear diligently my words. We must not only pray, but pray diligently: not only love God, but love him with all our strength and with all our heart. The manner in which we perform a duty is as much to our acceptance, as the matter of the duty, Eccl. 9. 10. Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might. It is very commendable in our worldly or special callings, to do what we do with our might: but especially when we are about the things of God, which concern our heavenly or general calling, then whatsoever we do, let us do it with our might; when you hear, hear with all your might, when you pray, pray with all your might. (Jer. 48. 10.) Cursed be he that doth the work of the Lord deceitfully: we put in the margin, negligently, according to the letter of the Hebrew: and those two words may very well interpret one another, for he that doth a thing deceitfully, doth it negligently, and he that doth it negligently doth it deceitfully: he doth it as if he would deceive God or men, or both, but at last he deceiveth his own soul. Therefore saith Job, Hear diligently my speech, and my declaration, with your ears.

Job having thus renewed his preface for an attentive hearing, proceeds to give them reasons, why he would be heard thus attentively. We have the first in the eighteenth verse.

Vers. 18. Behold now I have ordered my cause, I know that I shall be justified.

My business is ready, I have ordered all things, therefore I would be heard. When we have made great preparations, we do not love disappointments. As when the King (in the Parable) sent out, saying, my supper is ready, I have kil'd my oxen and my fatlings, and all is prepared, come to the marriage, and they began all to make excuse, he was wroth. When a feast is provided and set upon the table, and the invited guests come not, who can take it well? Tis so in all other preparations, and this is Jobs argument: Hear diligently my speech, I do not call for attention, having nothing to say, or nothing worth the hearing, I have ordered my cause.

Primâ argumentū à bona fide & conscientia sua. Jun.

I have ordered.] The word signifieth to order with reason, to methodize things, it is applyed to the marshalling of Armies, and so to words or things wherein skill and art are shewed.

עָרַךְ significat quicquid certa ratione & ordine disponitur, ut acies, &c.

My cause.] The Hebrew [Mizpat] hath a threefold use. It signifies First, a dispute between parties. Secondly, the sentence of the Judge. Thirdly, the execution of the sentence. In this place the word is taken in the first sense, for the setting and stating of a controversie about which parties are to plead or dispute. Behold I have ordered my cause; as if he had said, I am not come unprepared to this bar; though you through ignorance or prejudice mistake my condition, yet I have examined it and purely considered mine own cause, and upon good grounds I have concluded with my self, that notwithstanding all mine afflictions God hath not punished me for my sin, but still accounts me innocent and righteous. So the words carry that rejoycing which Job had in the integrity of his heart, and goodness of his cause, he having throughly weighed and digested what he had to speak. All things being thus ready he made no question but to go away with victory, and get the day after a full hearing. I know I shall be justified.

מִשְׁפָּט tria continet 1. rationes litigantium. 2. sententiā judicis. 3. executionē sententiæ. Rab. Sal. Ad causam meam disputandā compareo sic instructus ut me à vestris criminationibus absolutum iri nō dubitem. Bez.

I know.] We may distinguish of a threefold knowledge.

First, Notional or speculative, which is the work barely of the understanding. Of that I conceive the Apostle speaks, (1 Cor. 8. 1.) Knowledge puffeth up. There is a knowledge swimming in the brain, which hath some light, but no heat, much wind, but no nourishment in it.

Secondly, There is an experimental knowledge seated in the heart, and visible in the life: The Samaritans profess this (John 4. 42.) Now we believe, not because of thy saying, for we have heard him our selves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, that is, we are experimentally convinced by what we have heard and seen, that this is He. (Eccles. 8. 5.) Whoso keepeth the commandment, shall know no evil (so the Hebrew); we translate it, he shall feel no evil, that is, he shall not have an experimental knowledge of evil. A man that keepeth the commandment, knoweth what is evil, or else he could not do that which is good; but he that keepeth the commandment shall know no evil, that is, he shall not feel any evil. So we are to understand that of the Apostle, (2 Cor. 5. 21.) where he saith, that Christ knew no sin, shall we think that Christ died for he knew not what? He died to take away sin, and did not he know what sin was? Yes, Christ knew fully what sin was, he knew what the nature, and what the effects of it were: but he knew no sin experimentally, he felt no sin in his own heart, he acted no sin in his life. We say to a man that liveth in prosperity, You never knew poverty; and to an healthy man, You never knew sickness. This is experimental knowledge.

There is a third kind of knowledge, which we call fiducial, when the heart cleaveth to, or is assertain'd of what we know. Of this we are to understand the Apostle John (1 Ep. 2. 3.) And hereby do we know that we know him. To know that we know, is to be assured that we know. And again, in the fifth Chapter of the same Epistle, ver. 13. These things have I written to you that believe on the Name of the Son of God, that ye may know, that ye have eternal life. We may believe, and yet not know that we shall live, much less that we have eternal life. Many have a vital act, who have not a fiducial act of faith: And therefore, while the Apostle in this verse, saith, I have written unto you that believe on the Name of the Son of God, he saith also, I have written, that ye may believe on the Name of the Son of God. If they did believe before, why doth he write unto them that they might believe? They had the faith of adherence and recumbence; but he desires to raise and heighten them to the faith of evidence and assurance. Such a faith the Apostle expresseth (2 Cor. 4. 14.) Knowing, that he which raised up the Lord Jesus, shall raise us up also by Jesus, and shall present us with you. (Knowing this) How did the Apostle know this? Not barely by speculation, not at all by experience, for he was not yet raised up: But he was assured of it, as if it had been already done, That he which raised up the Lord Jesus, shall raise us up also by Jesus.

When Job saith, I know I shall be justified, his was not a speculative knowledge, but partly an experimental knowledge, for he found that he was already justified; and partly a fiducial knowledge; I know; that is, I am sure, that the Lord will justifie me, and that I shall depart from his bar acquitted in this controversie. He doth not say, I know that I have not sinned; but I know that I shall be justified from my sin; and not only carry this present cause, but continue in the love and gracious acceptance of God for ever.

Justus inveniver pronunciaverq. Justum esse nihil aliud importat quã in causa obtinere & a judice sententiam in favorem accipere. Justus invenitur in judicio, non qui culpa caret, sed qui justus declaratur. Sanct.

I shall be justified. Justification is the declaring of a man to be just: He is just, not only who hath no sin, but he who is acquitted from his sin; or to whom his sin is not imputed. He is righteous, whom God pronounceth righteous, though in himself ungodly; for God justifieth the ungodly, Rom. 4. 5. Job knew he was thus justified; yet, I conceive the justification strictly intended here, is the determination of the question between him and his Friends on his side; which yet reached his total standing in a state of justification. This he opposeth to what he had affirmed of the hypocrite in the former words, An hypocrite shall not come before him; that is, he shall not be justified; but I know that I shall be justified.

Hence Observe, First, That a godly man, even in this life, may arrive at assurance that he is, and shall continue in a good, in a justified condition.

It is good to be justified; but it is better to know that we shall be justified. There are three Graces spoken of by the Apostle (1 Cor. 13. 13.) Faith, Hope, and Love. And the Scripture holds out an assurance in reference to every one of these. First, The assurance of Faith (Heb. 10. 22.) Let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of Faith. This assurance of Faith hath a double respect: First, to our persons; Secondly, to our services; that in both we are pleasing unto God. Secondly, There is an assurance of Hope, (Heb. 6. 11.) We desire that every one of you do shew the same diligence, to the full assurance of Hope unto the end. Faith hath an eye to the truth of the Promise; Hope to the good of the Promise; and the assurance of Hope is, that we shall certainly receive that good. Thirdly, There is also an assurance of Love (1 John 4. 18.) Perfect love casteth out fear. How is Love made perfect? and how doth it cast out fear? Herein (saith the seventeenth verse) is love made perfect, that we may have boldness in the day of judgment, because as he is, so are we in this world; that is, as his love is sincere to us, so is ours to him (according to our measure) even in this life, and this gives us boldness or assurance, that all shall go well with us in the day of judgment, or in the next life; and so this love casteth out all fear of condemnation in that day; which fear, where it remains (as the Apostle concludes) hath torment, then which, nothing is more contrary to assurance. In perfect love there is no torment, because there is no fear; and there is no fear, because there is an assurance of the Love of God. In this love the soul doth repose, rest, and delight it self. There is a fourth thing spoken of, to which also assurance is annexed, (Col. 2. 2.) The full assurance of understanding: This is the clearness of our apprehensions about the things which we believe, and upon which we fasten by Faith and Love. The light of the understanding shining upon the mysteries of the Gospel, and mixing with our other graces, bottoms the soul upon the strongest foundation, and raiseth it up to the higest pinnacle of assurance. We may say of assurance, in reference unto these four Graces, as Philosophers do of the Heavens, in reference to the four Elements; they tell us the Heavens are neither earth nor air, neither fire nor water; but they are a quintessence, or a fifth essence. So we may say, assurance is neither faith, nor hope, nor love, nor knowledge, but it is a fifth thing, sublimated and raised, either out of, or above all these: It is somewhat of each of these; but more then all these. I know that I shall be justified, is more then knowledge, or love, or hope, or faith, even the result of them all in their best perfections. Knowledge above knowledge, is the assurance of understanding: Faith above faith, is the assurance of faith: Hope and love above hope and love, are the full assurance of hope and love made perfect. This is called by the Apostle (Rom. 4.) A full perswasion. Abraham (saith the Text, ver. 21.) being fully perswaded. It is a Metaphor taken from Ships that come into an harbour with full sail; so doth the Soul sometimes: It comes into the port of a heavenly peace, with full sail, with top and top gallant (as we use to say) with all the sails spread, and colours flying. So it was with Abraham, there was not any sail of his soul but was filled with the wind of assurance. This is called (John 14. 21.) the manifestation of Christ to the soul: He that hath my Commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me; and he that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and manifest my self to him. Christ is manifested to many by the reading and preaching of his Word; but he manifests himself only unto some by the light and influences of his Spirit. The former is common to all who live within the sound of the Gospel; the latter is the sole priviledge of those who obey the Gospel; nor do all these receive this priviledge now; very few injoy it at all times. Christ loves many a soul, to whom he doth not presently manifest his love. God hath love laid up in his heart for all his; but he doth not shed his love abroad into all their hearts, by the holy Ghost (Rom. 5. 8.) The first fruits of the Spirit (Rom. 8. 23.) The witness of the Spirit (ver. 16. of that Chapter.) The sealing of the Spirit (Eph. 1. 14.) The earnest of the Spirit (2 Cor. 5. 5.) are not bestowed upon every Believer at all times, and not sensibly upon some at all in this life: And all these are but several expressions of this one thing, our knowing that we shall be justified: Yet in this many of the Saints have gloried before they came to glory. Habakkuk had it in the height; so had many of the old Worthies, Heb. 11. 13, 35. Though their Gospel-light was not so clear as the Gospel-light after Christ came, yet they saw the Promises afar off, they imbraced them, and were perswaded of them; by these three steps, of seeing, imbracing, and perswasion, they ascended to an assurance, or knowledge, that they should be justified.

But some may say, These were extraordinary men; can ordinary Believers attain to, or know this?

All do not know it, but all may. There are but some Believers who reach this perfection, yet all should be aiming at, and reaching after it. And though they were extraordinary men in whom the Scripture gives instance, such as Abraham, Habbakkuk, Paul, &c. yet as the Apostle saith of some under eminent temptations, (1 Cor. 10. 13.) There hath no temptation taken you, but such as is common to man; so we may say of those who attained those eminent consolations, there is no consolation hath been given unto those, but what is common to Believers. For as few men fall into all those temptations which are common to man, so few Believers attain all those consolations which are common to Believers. Some are slothful, and will not give diligence to make their calling and election sure; others cannot find it sure to them (though it be in it self) notwithstanding all their diligence.

If any object further, that of the Apostle (Rom. 11. 20.) Be not high minded, but fear.

I answer, That fear is a duty, which is opposed to high-mindedness; but, that fear is, at least, an affliction, which is opposed to stedfastness. Again, this is not spoken to nourish doubting, whether we are justified, or no; but to preserve us from presumption when we are justified. So we may answer these places (Prov. 28. 14.) Blessed is the man that that feareth always. (Phil. 2. 12.) Work out your salvation with fear and trembling. These seem to call Christians to live in a doubtful condition, or in a state of trepidation, always fearing: but their intendment is, not to keep the soul from being setled by faith in Christ, but from being high flown in any opinion of our selves: or the Spirit speaks thus, not to put us upon doubts of our standing, but to preserve us from falling. For these cautions are so far from opposing assurance, that they strengthen it. The way not to be afraid is thus to fear: Nor are any so sure as they, who thus tremble. They that are working out their salvations with fear and trembling, may know without fear and trembling that they shall be saved: And they that thus fear always, may be assured that they shall be above fear for ever. But say some, the Preacher speaks out against this knowledge, Eccles. 9. 1. No man knoweth love or hatred. It is true, not by all that is before him. We cannot know love and hatred from the works of God without us; but we may know love and hatred by the work of God upon us, or by the workings of God within us. We cannot fetch an evidence that God loves us out of our chests and money-bags; nor can we read an assurance, or a conveyance for Heaven, in the assurances and conveyances of our lands; but we may fetch this evidence, and read this conveyance from, and in the Covenant of grace, received by faith, witnessed and sealed to our hearts by the holy Spirit.

Secondly, When was it that Job manifested this height of assurance? I know that I shall be justified. It was after he had said, I have ordered my cause.

Hence Observe, That true assurance, or a knowledge that we shall be justified, ariseth from a due consideration of the state of our hearts and lives.

I have ordered my cause, and now I know. Job's assurance did not grow whilest he slept, or was secure; his was not an assurance arising from negligence, but from diligence. Some conclude what they have no premises for: They will conclude for Heaven and glory, they make no doubt but they shall be saved; but they have no foundation to build this tower of assurance upon, they can say nothing to warrant, or bear up their confidence. It is an easie thing to say, I know I shall be justified; but it is an hard thing for a man to say, I have ordered my cause. They who say they know they shall be justified, before they have ordered their cause, do but build castles in the air; whereas this Castle should be built upon Christ, he is the foundation. Some are as confident as confidence it self, who yet are as ignorant as ignorance it self: Some are as confident as confidence it self, who yet are as prophane as prophaneness it self; as proud as pride it self, as worldly as the world it self: Is this the ordering of our cause? Or can they order their cause, whose hearts and lives are thus out of order? A true Believer is able to shew somewhat for it, why he is so sure: He can shew Christ (as I may so speak) his bracelets and his love-tokens; he can tell Christ of the secret smiles and kisses which he hath given his soul some time or other: He can say, Christ is come to me both by water and blood; he can produce the graces and the actings of his Spirit, and can say, by these I am assured, by these I am grown up to this perswasion, that nothing shall ever separate me from the love of God. If any man say he is sure, he shall be justified; let him consider how he came by his assurance: Have you ordered your cause, and viewed your state in the glass of the Word? Hath that presented to you justification, pardon and peace flowing to you in the blood of Christ? If it be so, you may say as Job here, I know I shall be justified. But disordered causes can never leave assurance of any thing but of wrath and death.

Job having thus made out his first ground, why he would be heard and come to a tryal, proceeds to another, in the nineteenth verse.

Verse 19. Who is he that will plead with me? for now if I hold my tongue, I shall give up the ghost.

Who is he that will plead with me?] Where is the man? The words, as the former, speak the greatness of his spirit? Job durst bid battel, and send a challenge to all opposites in the world. He throws down his Gauntlet to all comers,. Let me see the man that dares undertake me in this dispute? Who is he that will plead with me?

Job speaks not proudly, or vainly, confiding in his own strength, or wit, in his nimble tongue, or quick invention; he speaks thus, trusting in the power of Christ, and as being assured of such an interest and estate in him, as all the opposition in the world should never be able to overthrow.

Job speaks like another Goliah, who (1 Sam. 18. 8, 9.) stood and cried to the Armies of Israel, and said unto them, why are you come out to set your battel in array? Chuse you a man for you, and let him come down to me, if he be able to fight with me, and to kill me, then will we be your servants; but if I prevail against him, and kill him, then shall ye be our servants, and serve us. In such a manner (but with no such spirit) Job speaks here, where's the man? Chuse out who you will to plead and to dispute with me. Thus Job challenged like Goliah, but he fought like David (ver. 45.) In the Name of the Lord of hosts.

Hence Observe, He that is sincere, fears not to come to tryal.

The righteous is bold as a Lyon. He is so far from declining tryal, that he invites it; where is the man that will plead me? But I will not stay upon this, having been led to it by a former passage.

Secondly Observe, A soul that is sincere and well bottomed upon the grace of God in Christ, is unconquerable.

Job knowing he should be justified, calls out, Who is he that will plead with me? As the Apostle sends a challenge in the behalf of Believers (Rom. 8. 33.) Who shall condemn? Who shall lay any thing to the charge of Gods elect? Let me see the man, or devil, who dares. So Believers are able to send challenges themselves. Who is it that will plead with us? But are there none will do it? Will none accept their challenge? Yea, many may be found to plead with them, but none can overcome them. This Text in Job, and the point grounded upon it, is of the same interpretation with that (Rom. 8. 31.) If God be with us, who can be against us? Who can be against us? Many are against those with whom God is; yea, many will be against them, because God is with them. They are most opposed by men, whom God owneth most. But who can be against us, to overthrow and conquer us? We shall stand against all opposition, if God be with us. So here, who will plead with me? Job had those that would plead with him, he wanted not undertakers; there was Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar, these pleaded with him, but these did not overcome him. God gives sentence for Job, Chap. 42. 7. Ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath. The Prophet brings in Jesus Christ in such a triumph of spirit over all possible enemies or oppofers (Isa. 50. 7, 8.) Whereas he had shewed Christ professing, that all his power to fulfil the active part of his Mediatorship, was derived to him from his Father (ver. 4.) The Lord hath given to me the tongue of the Learned, &c. So there he shews that all the strength and courage with which he was armed to suffer or contend in the passive part of his Mediatorship, was also derived to him from his Father, and maintained in him by a continual supply of his assistance. The Lord God will help me, therefore shall I not be confounded; therefore have I set my face as a flint, and I know that I shall not be ashamed: He is near that justifieth me, who will contend with me? Let us stand together (as Plaintiff and Defendant use to do in a Law suit before the Judge) who is mine adversary? (or master of my cause, or owner of my judgment, that entreth his action against me) let him come near to me. Behold the Lord God will help me: who is he that shall condemn me? Lo, they all shall wax old as a garment, the moth shall eat them. These words are a comment upon Job, and fully explain his meaning: Both give us the strength of this Observation,

That the Lord being near to a soul, and standing on his side, he can never be prevailed against.

The Apostle Paul applyes that of the Prophet (which originally belongs to Christ) to the comfort of every Believer (Rom. 8. 33, 34.) Who shall lay any thing to the charge of Gods elect? It is God that justifieth: Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that dyed, yea, rather that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God. Here are the holy challenges challenges of faith; faith is ready for all comers. If the Law come to plead with us, faith tells it, that Christ hath fulfilled the Law for us. If sin come to oppose us, faith tells it, Christ in the similitude of sinful flesh hath condemned sin in the flesh. If death come and look the soul in the face, faith answers, Christ hath abolished death, and brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel: Yea, faith can, not only answer, but scorn death, O death, where is thy sting? If the Devil come, faith tells him, he is but a conquered enemy, and that Christ hath (long since) spoiled principalities and powers, and made a shew of them openly; that Christ came to destroy (and hath destroyed in us) the works of the devil. Thus faith repels the charge of the law, of sin, of hell, and of the devil; yea, if God himself frown upon the soul, and his wrath seem to burn as hot as fire against us, faith can tell God himself, that Christ hath paid our debt, and given a ransom to God for us, and therefore knows that he will not require it of us again, because he is just, and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus. If none of these, if neither law, nor sin, nor death, nor devil, no nor God himself (considering how he hath been pleased to condescend to poor sinners, and ingage himself to Christ on our behalf) can plead down the believing soul, then nothing can. Nor did Job boast beyond his line, when he said, Who will plead with me?

Sermæ ad modum conscientiæ, in trepidæ mentis, & ad certamen spirituale quemq; provocantis verba sunt. Nemo est qui me in mea causa convincere potest. Mer.

Lastly, These words, Who will plead with me? hold forth, not only Job's courage that he durst, in this case, speak with any living, but also the necessity which pressed him to speak, which was such, that if he did not speak, he could not live, as is clear in the last clause of this verse,

For now if I hold my tongue, I shall give up the ghost.

Mr. Broughton renders, If now I speak not; I should starve.

Nunc enim silebo & expirabo.

The Original may be literally rendred thus, For now I shall be silent, and give up the ghost. And so the meaning is, as if Job were hastning his undertakers to this quarrel, wishing them to make speed and come to plead with him, that he might try out this business by dint of argument, because he saw death ready to put him to silence: I shall dye, and then it will be too late to argue or speak with me, therefore while I live, and I perceive I shall not live long, let us try it out, and see what you have to say against me.

Secondly, These words, If I hold my tongue, I shall give up the ghost, may note two things. First, That Job was filled with abundance of matter, which was exceeding burthensome to keep within his breast, therefore he must needs vent, and let it out. As if he had said, I have so much to speak, that it will even kill me if I should conceal it. Elihu was in the same case (Job 32. 17.) I also (saith he) will shew mine opinion; for I am full of matter, the spirit within me constraineth me: Behold my belly is as wine which hath no vent, it is ready to burst like new bottles; I will speak that I may be refreshed, I will open my lips and answer. Elihu was constrained to open his mind, it would be an ease to him to speak. So saith Job, Now if I hold my tongue I shall give up the ghost. Or secondly, It may note, that Job was much afflicted, and exceedingly troubled in his spirit at what his Friends had spoken to him, and charged upon him. And so it is, as if he had said, you have so tormented me with your reasonings, that if I have not liberty to justifie mine own innocency, my heart will break: It were better for me to dye, then to live stained with such imputations; and I know not how to live, unless I may wipe them off.

Satius mihi fuerat mori quamsile re tio causam meam prodere. Bez. Non possum me continere quin loquar; Alioquin moriendum mihi est. Merc.

Hence Observe, First, It is a pain not to speak when we are much ingaged to speak.

Thus the Prophet complains (Jer. 20. 9.) I was weary with forbearing, and I could not stay. As some are wearied with speaking; so some are wearied because they do not speak: They are tired with holding their tongues, as much as some are with using them. Words kept in are as great a burthen to some, as words spoken out are to others. When a man is under such a pressure, he finds no rest till he hath delivered himself. When Joseph's Brethren came to him, he hid his affections a great while; but as soon as he saw his Brother Benjamin, he could not refrain; he must go into a private place to weep, and spend his passion, else it would have broak out before them all. 'Tis so with us when we have much to say to God in prayer; the heart hath a load upon it, and cannot be quiet, it is ready to break and give up the ghost, until we have broken or opened our minds to God.

From the second sence Observe, That a man can easier dye, then suffer blots to lye upon his integrity.

Our reputation should be dearer to us then our lives; therefore saith Job, If I keep silence, I shall give up the ghost; I cannot bear this. He was not so sensible of any of his sufferings as of this. And as it is an ease, so it is a duty to repair our own credit, and to take off what we find unjustly charged upon us: especially when it reflects upon Religion, as it did in Job's case. His Friends suspected him of hypocrisie, Is this thy fear; thy confidence, and the uprightness of thy wayes? These jealousies stirred up the spirit of Job to call for his Adversaries, and provoke them to appear and plead it out with him. I have from other passages toucht this point before, and shall therefore add no more here.

VERS. 20, 21, 22, 23.

Only do not two things unto me, then will I not hide my self from thee.
Withdraw thine hand far from me, and let not thy dread make me afraid.
Then call thou, and I will answer; or let me speak, and answer thou me.
How many are mine iniquities and sins? make me to know my transgression and my sin.

IN the three former verses, Job prefac'd to his Friends, and bespake their attention; being so well assured of his cause, that he sate down under the comfort of this conclusion, I know that I shall be justified. Here, in the three first verses of this Context, Job bespeaks God himself, and seems to indent with him upon some conditions before he would speak further, or proceed in this dispute.

Verse 20. Only do not two things unto me, then will I not hide my self from thee.

As if he had said, I am willing to argue, but it must be upon these precautions.

Cautionem videtur à Deo petere ante disputationis congressum. Pined. Duo, ut scilicet mecum litiges & simul me affligas & terres.

Some understand those words, Only do not two things unto me: As if Job had desired God not to do two things unto him at once; that is, not to afflict him, and confer with him, not to smite him and dispute with him together; it is too much to be at two such works, or rather to be doing and suffering at one time: Therefore do not two things to me, any one of these is exercise enough for one man at once.

What the two things he would not have done unto him were, are set down in the next verse. First, Withdraw thine hand far from me, &c. Secondly, Let not thy dread, &c. Then call thou, &c.

In that Job desires God would not do these two things unto him,

Observe, First, That all sufferings are not equal, there is a gradual difference among sufferings as well a specifical.

As all sins, so all sufferings are not equal. Some sins are more grievous and burthensome to God then others are, (Jer. 44. 4.) I did send unto you all my servants the Prophets, saying, O do not this abominable thing which I hate. This abominable thing. There were many other abominable things which the Lord hated, and which he would not have that people do; but their idolatrous worship, their burning incense to strange Gods, was a special abomination, O do not this abominable thing which I hate. Now, as some sins are more grievous unto God then others, and therefore he desires earnestly, that we would not burthen him with them: So the Lord layes some afflictions upon his people, which are more grievous to them then any other could be, and therefore they cry out, O do not this unto us: This is sad.

Hence Note again, That, We are apt to think we can bear any affliction better then that which we fear or feel.

O do not these two things unto me! Were it any thing else, I might undergo it, but I am not able to endure these. Some speak thus of any affliction; and he that hath pain in any part of his body, is apt to judge; were this pain somewhere else, I could bear it better: We are very prone to dispute the dispensations of God, and to think that he might place his chastenings (if he must chastise us) some where else, as much to his own glory, and not so much to our sorrow. Only do not two things unto me. What then?

Then will I not hide my self from thee.

The Hebrew is, Then will I not hide my self from thy face. But suppose the Lord would not do those two things for Job, could he hide himself from his face? David saith (Psal. 139. 4.) Whither shall I go from thy presence? It should seem Job had some whither to go out of the presence of God: Elihu in the 34th of this book, vers. 22. tells us, There is no darkness nor shadow of death where the workers of iniquity can hide themselves. How is it then that Job saith he would not hide himself, when as indeed he could not, upon what terms soever God should deal with him?

I answer; when Job saith, I will not hide my self, he intends not this, that he could hide himself; but that (if God would not do those two things to him) he should have no cause to hide himself. Hiding proceedeth from a double cause. First, from fear, (Isa. 2. 19.) They shall go into the holes of the rocks, and into the caves of the earth, for fear of the Lord, and for the glory of his Majesty, when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth. Here is hiding for fear. So (1 Kin. 22. 25.) the Prophet Micaiah having received such course usage from King Ahab, tells him to his face, Behold thou shalt see in that day when thou shalt go into an inner chamber to hide thy self. Secondly, Hiding proceeds from shame; a man that is ashamed dares not shew his head. That hiding of our first parents was the effect of both these (Gen. 3. 10.) In their innocency they were naked and were not ashamed: but after they had sinned they ran amongst the thickets to hide themselves, being both ashamed and afraid: (vers. 10.) I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid, because I was naked, and I hid my self. Fear and shame made him hide himself, when once he had sinned. When Job resolves, then I will not hide my self from thee, his meaning is, I will not be afraid to appear before thee, nor ashamed to speak unto thee; so he explains himself at the 22th verse, Then call thou and I will answer, or let me speak, and answer thou me, that is, I would come forth boldly, and stand with confidence at thy Tribunal. I shall give you a note from this, when I have shewed the matter of Jobs deprecation, Do not two things unto me: What two things?

Ritsi nihil mihi cõscius sum, me tamẽ abscõderẽ & latebras quærerem nisi benevolẽtiæ tuæ ostensione roborarer.

Vers. 21. Withdraw thine hand far from me, and let not thy dread terrifie me; or, let not thy dread make me afraid.

These are the two things which he so earnestly deprecates. And for the removal of both these, he prayed as earnestly once before, almost in the same words, (chap. 9. vers. 34, 35.) Let him take his rod away from me, and let not his fear terrifie me; then would I speak, and not fear him, but it is not so with me. Having opened these two verses there at large, I shall refer the Reader thither: yet because (though the matter be the same) the expressions vary, I shall a little insist upon them.

Withdraw thine hand far from me.] That's his first condition. By the hand of God, he means either the afflictions which were upon him, and so it is as much as this, mitigate my sufferings, abate my pains, release me from my sorrows. The word which he useth, Chap. 9. 34. for the rod of God, is the same in effect which he useth here for the hand of God; only with this difference, this properly signifies the palms of the hand; Withdraw thy palms from me: To strike with the palm of the hand, is to strike like a father; a blow with the palm of the hand, may have more smart with it, but it hath not so much force and wrath with it as a blow with the fist or hand closed. Yet I conceive Jobs intent is the same in both, and though he received stroaks of all sorts, some with the palm, others with the fist, some greater, some less, yet all were with the hand of a father: nevertheless, Job desires God would withdraw his hand, though he knew it was a fathers hand, because while the smart and pain of that was so vehement upon him, he could not speak nor manage his cause before him freely; Withdraw thine hand away from me.

הרחיק longe fac à me, כף habetur hic nõ יד quod cap. 9. 34. virgam, hic palmã i. e. plagã significat. Merc.

Further, There was another thing, which this request of Job may bear an allusion to, Remove thine hand away from me. It was a custome among the Ancients, to lay the hand upon the head of an offender, as a token of his condemnation. And that's the reason why the hand was laid upon the head of the sacrifice, when all the sins of the people were confest over it; shewing, that the sacrifice was (as it were) condemned to die, typifying the death of Christ, who was condemned for us, God having laid upon him the iniquities of us all. Now saith Job, Remove thine hand away from me: thou seemest to act towards me as if thou wert angry, or didst intend to pronounce a sentence of condemnation against me; O do not deal thus with me! How shall I treat with thee, whilst thou seemest to have such hard thoughts of me? Therefore, Withdraw thine hand away from me.

But, what was it that lay upon Job as the hand of God? I shewed before, that it was his affliction, which though in it self, it be no argument that God condemns, yet in the opinion of some men it is; and Jobs friends did therefore think God condemned him, because they saw he afflicted him. So then, the removing of those afflictions, in reference to which his friends pronounced him condemned by God, would be as the withdrawing of the hand from the head of an offender, a sign of his acquitting and absolution.

Hence Note, First, Afflictions are grievous to the sensitive part of the best and holiest men.

Even a Job prayeth, Withdraw thine hand away from me. There is no affliction for the present that is joyous but grievous; and as it is grievous to natural men, so it is grievous to the natural part of spiritual men. It is nothing else but grievous unto carnal men, they find no comfort, no sweet at all in it, the Saints do: their inward man hath joy and refreshing in their sorrows, but their outward man feels smart; therefore, Remove thine hand away from me.

Secondly Observe, While afflictions are sharp upon us, it is hard to compose the spirit to think of, or speak aright to God.

This discovers their folly, who put off the great businesses about which they are to treat with God, to a sick bed. Job saith to God, take away thy hand, and then I will speak: these say we will speak to God when his hand is upon us; we will look to the health of our souls when our bodies are sick: But how rare is it to find a sick body and a quiet mind together. Job could not argue with God about his innocency while he was greatly afflicted, how then shall others about the setling of their eternal peace and the pardon of their? We are more prone to impatience then to repentance in the day of our distress.

Thirdly Observe, It is lawful to pray for the removing of afflictions.

Withdraw thine hand away from me, was a good petition; we may make such petitions unlawful if we put our wills as a law to God, and do not leave all to the will of God. We may pray for the thing, but we must submit the circumstances of it, the time of it, the manner of it, to the wisdom of God. While we desire him to withdraw his hand, we should get our hearts willing to bear his hand; that's a gracious frame of heart indeed. As it is the worst frame of heart to pray for the pardon and removing of our sins, while we find a willingness, much more a resolvedness in our hearts to continue in them; so it is the best frame of heart to pray for the removing of afflictions, whilest we find a willingness to continue under them, if God shall so dispense and please. See more of this, Chap. 9. 34. Withdraw thine hand away from me,

And let not thy dread make me afraid.

Thy dread.] Giants are called Emims, from this word (because they are terrible to beholders.) And so are Idols; because becauſe though they are indeed but meer ſcarcrows and bugbears, yet they are terrible to the ignorant and unbelieving, as was further ſhewed, Chap. 9. 34.

What was this dread? It may either be, that terrour which accompanied his afflictions, there being as it were ſome ſparklings of Gods anger mixed with them. When God gives us the bittereſt cup of affliction to drink, if he do but drop in a little of his love we take it down as a pleaſant draught; but if he drop the leaſt of his anger into the cup of affliction, this is dreadful. Hence David prayeth, (Pſal. 6. 1.) O Lord rebuke me not in thine anger, neither chaſten me in thy hot diſpleaſure. He doth not pray abſolutely, let me not be rebuked, but rebuke me not in thine anger, let me ſee thy love in my rebukes. He knew God did love him, but he could not ſee it: God rebuked him, and he perceived nothing but anger; God chaſtened him, and he ſaw nothing but diſpleaſure, yea, and hot diſpleaſure; this made him cry out, O Lord rebuke me not, &c.

Secondly, This dread may be taken for the majeſtical preſence of God; though there be no lettings out of his anger or diſpleaſure, yet the very appearance of God to poor duſt and aſhes hath a dread in it, ſuch a dread, as not only ſtrikes the moſt eloquent man dumb, but the ſtouteſt dead: The majeſty of God is infinitely above the creature; therefore he ſaith to Moſes, No man can ſee my face and live: there is ſo much dread in the face of God, that man cannot behold it. We may conceive the Lord at this time letting out much of himſelf to Job, his terrour was upon him. God ſhews himſelf to man two wayes.

Firſt, In ſome external viſible form, ſo he often appeared to the Fathers in the Old Teſtament. 'Tis the opinion of ſome that the Lord ſhewed his dreadfulneſs to Job by an outward apparition.

Secondly, God ſhews himſelf to the mind of man: and as the appearances of God to ſenſe are very dreadful, ſo are thoſe which he makes to faith. They who have no outward viſions of God, are yet often terrified at the mental apprehenſions of his Glory and Majeſty. Faith makes things preſent, and doth evidence them to the ſoul as fully as ſenſe can. God cannot be ſeen, yet faith can give us a ſight of God, a ſight of his power, and of his wrath, as well as of his goodneſs and mercy: and until the Lord withdraw that, and put other evidences before the eye of the ſoul, there's no peace. That's the reaſon why many wicked men have been brought to utter deſpair, and die in horrour of conſcience: they apprehend the wrath of God revealed againſt them, and their conſciences are affected with it; there is a kind of faith upon their conſciences, ſuch as the devils have, who believe and tremble: and ſo do wicked men, they are full of trembling and aſtoniſhment at thoſe repreſentations of the greatneſs, Power and Majeſty of God which their faith makes to them. Now as it is with them, ſo it may be with true Believers much more: they have deep and terrible apprehenſions of God; and according to the degree of this faith, is the degree of terrour which falls upon them, (Pſal. 90. 11.) Who knoweth the power of thine anger? even according to thy fear ſo is thy wrath. Though the diſpleaſure of God be as himſelf, alwayes alike, yet to thoſe whoſe hearts are tender, the diſpleaſure of God is more grievous. Hard hearts have no fear in them, and to them the diſpleaſure of God is nothing, they dread it not, they will venture upon the Pikes, and ruſh upon the Swords point. Job was a tender hearted man, he feared God, therefore theſe appearances of God to his faith did exceedingly affect and trouble him: So he ſpeaks, Chap. 31. 23. For deſtruction from God was a terrour to me, and by reaſon of his highneſs I could not endure.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, The holy God is in himſelf very dreadful to the moſt holy and upright among the children of men.

Job had ſaid, Chap. 10. 7. Lord, thou knoweſt that I am not wicked: and at the eighteenth verſe of this chapter, I know I ſhall be juſtified. What a faith was here! Yet now he confeſſeth, Thy terrour makes me afraid. Where was there a holier man then Habakkuk? yet read the third chapter of that propheſie, and you ſhall find how he ſhook and trembled, how his lips did quiver, and rottenneſs entred into his bones, and all at the apprehenſions he had of the Majeſty and greatneſs of God. That holy Prophet Iſaiah, how was he affected when God appeared to him! he crieth out, Wo is me, for I am undone, for mine eyes have ſeen the King, the Lord of hoaſts. When the Lord appeared to publiſh that holy Law, how did the people tremble! O (ſay they) let Moſes ſpeak to us, but do not thou ſpeak leſt we die, Exod. 19.

Secondly Note, That God doth ſometimes appear to his people in Majeſty only, and not in mercy.

He letteth out his glory and his greatneſs, but conceals his goodneſs, his loving kindneſs and compaſſion. They can ſee a holy God, a juſt God, a high God, a glorious God, but they do not ſee a merciful God. God acts not as a natural, but as a voluntary agent, and therefore he can ſuſpend or diſpenſe himſelf as he pleaſeth. The Sun hath light, but the Sun (being a natural agent) cannot ſuſpend its light; it alwayes ſhews its brightneſs and beauty, except ſome cloud interpoſe, or the moon eclipſe it: but the Lord who is light and all light, doth not alwayes manifeſt himſelf in light; he puts clouds and darkneſs round about him, he hideth his face and will not be ſeen. Sometimes he appears all mercy, and at other times all juſtice; ſometimes all goodneſs, and at other times all wrath; ſometimes he lets out nothing but love, and at other times nothing but diſpleaſure: Now as he varies his diſpenſations to us, ſo we are apt to vary in our apprehenſions of him: and as we cannot ſee God at all until he manifeſt himſelf, ſo we ſee him no otherwiſe then he pleaſeth to manifeſt himſelf: Hence the ſame ſoul ſees him to day all mercy, and the next day, poſſibly, the next hour, all juſtice: Now his goodneſs refreſheth, and anon his dread terrifies.

Thirdly Obſerve, That as ſome afflictions are more grievous then others, ſo thoſe are moſt grievous to a godly man, which carry any appearance of the diſpleaſure of God.

O let not thy dread terrifie me. All ſufferings cannot terrifie, where God ſhews his love; and any will, where he ſhews his dread. If a man were in hell aſſured of the love of God, he could rejoyce; and if he were in heaven under thoughts of his wrath, he could not but tremble. His love is better then heaven, and his wrath is worſe then hell.

Laſtly Note, As a deduction from the whole, That if a godly man may be thus terrified with the Majeſty of God, how terrible will the wrath of God be to the wicked!

Job was not afraid of the wrath of God againſt his perſon, for he had ſaid immediately before, I know I ſhall be juſtified. If the Majeſtical dread of God ſwallow up the beſt, the holieſt men, how will the dreadful Majeſty of God ſwallow up wicked men! how will he conſume them, who is to his own as a conſuming fire! We may argue here as the Apoſtle Peter doth in language near to this (1 Pet. 4. 18.) If the righteous ſcarcely be ſaved, where ſhall the ungodly and the ſinner appear?

Job having thus deprecated the terrour of the Lord, Withdraw thine hand far from me, and let not thy dread make me afraid: reſolves (upon the ſuppoſition of this grant) what to do;

Verſ. 22. Then call thou, and I will anſwer, or let me ſpeak, and anſwer thou me.

This is as much and in effect no more then he ſaid before, Chap. 9. 3. Then would I ſpeak and not fear him: yet here he a little amplifies what he ſaid there; for though Job doth often ſpeak the ſame thing for ſubſtance, yet his expreſſions are full of uſeful variety, new flowers of Rhetorick, and new actings of his affections ſhew themſelves. There it was, Then I will ſpeak and not fear him: here, Let him call and I will anſwer, or let me ſpeak, and anſwer thou me.

Actor vocat reū, reus reſpondet: ita conflatur judiciū cū vocatione intelligitur actio, & cū reſponſione defenſio.

Job in theſe words, gives God his choice to take which part he pleaſed. As in law ſutes, one ſuſtains the part of the Plaintiff, and another ſuſtains the part of the defendant:

dant: Or as in disputes, one sustains the person of an Opponent, and the other the person of a Respondent. Unto these Job alludes, as if he had said, I am entring upon a dispute, and commencing my suit in Heaven, before the Tribunal of Jehovah: As for me, I know mine own integrity so well, that I care not which part I take, I will be Opponent, or I will be Respondent; I will be Plaintiff, or I will be Defendant; and therefore, Lord, I refer it wholly unto thee; take which part thou pleasest; I'le take up what thou leavest, and do what thou appointest. Then call thou and I will answer.

Verba sunt arrogantia & scandalosa. Caj.

This offer argues only abundance of courage and holy confidence; yet some have adjudged it scandalous and full of arrogancy: As if Job had taken too much upon him, and had spoken more boldly to God then became him: As if he thought himself match enough for God at any weapon, or were ready to deal with him upon any terms. Eliphaz is supposed to aim at this passage (chap. 15. 4. Yea thou casteth off fear) yet most excuse him, conceiving that all this did flow from an holy familiarity which Job had with God: and that, because he had a gracious friendliness in his heart towards God, he would therefore speak to God as to a friend. Or it imports only that Job was very sure of his cause; and therefore as when a man would shew the confidence he hath to foil his Adversary in combat, he saith, chuse what place you will, take what weapon you will, bring out two swords, take you one, and I will take the other, I desire not to surprise you, or deal with you upon disadvantages. So Job being assured of a good end, was content to stand to the determination of God himself, in what way he should proceed to tryal.

Deo dat optionem interim sui oblitus & immodicus. Merc.

Audacius agit peteret potius patientiam. Merc.

Then call thou, and I will answer.

Then. This particle Then, implyes that he could not do it till then, and that then he could: As if he had said, I shall be in no case, either to answer, or to oppose, unless these two conditions be granted; but then I shall.

Call thou. The Lord calleth us to do our duty, and he calleth us to answer, and give account how we have done our duty, or what we have done. He calleth daily to the first, in the preaching of the Word. And he will call us all to the latter, in that great day, by the sounding of the Archangels Trumpet. (Psal. 50. 4.) He shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth, that he may judge his people: And ver. 1. He hath called the earth; that is, the people of the earth; he will call them all before his Throne; Job offered himself to a personal day of judgment before that general day of judgment. Call thou, is (verbum forense) a Law-term, call me to the Bar, or call me before thy Judgment-seat.

And I will answer. The word which we translate, I will answer, signifies often in Scripture, to testifie, or give witness; (Exod. 20. 16.) Thou shalt not bear false witness: The Hebrew is, Thou shalt not answer false witness; that is, when thou art required by a Judge to speak in any case, thou shalt not answer besides the truth. When Jacob had put his part of the cattel on the one side, and Laban's on the other, he saith, So shall my righteousness answer for me in time to come (Gen. 30. 33.) it shall testifie or bear witness for me. The word is used in that sence (Isa. 59. 12.) Our sins testifie against us: The Hebrew is, Our sins answer against us; which imports that our actions, whether good or bad, shall be called out to speak what we have been and are. And then, good actions will give a good testimony; and evil actions will give an ill testimony; (Hos. 5. 5.) The pride of Israel doth testifie to his face; or, doth answer to his face. Thus here, Let him call, and I will answer: I will give in evidence and testimony according to the truth of my heart and life. I will not bear false witness, though it be in my own cause.

Or let me speak, and answer thou me.

שוב Verbum respondendi in hac secunda parte est ab alia radice & lenius accipi debet. Pin.

There's the other part. Let me speak; I will be Plaintiff, or Opponent, and let the Lord answer or return; for the word which we render to answer, in this latter clause, is of a different root in the Hebrew from that in the former, and carries in it more respect. It intends not any summons or citation of God to answer, but it is an humble supplication, beseeching him to return what his Wisdom should think fit in answer.

Hence Observe, That, Acquaintance with free grace, gives us mighty confidence towards God.

Take away thy dread, and then I am ready for a hearing. I acknowledge my weakness is such, that I cannot bear thy Majesty; and I know my own uprightness is such, that I am assured of thy Mercy. When the Lord had called his people to repentance (Isa. 1. 16.) Wash you, make you clean, put away the evil of your doings; then he invites them to a free conference; Come, let us reason together. He speaks familiarly to them, I will argue it out with you, against all your unbelief: Come, let us reason together. Now, as God speaks familiarly to man, when he hath put his sins away: so, when the Lord hath put his dread away, man speaks familiarly to God; Come Lord, let us reason together; now let me speak, and answer thou me: The place where God communed with his ancient people the Jews, was the Propitiatory, or Mercy-seat, Exod. 25. 22. and the place where God communeth now with his people is called, the Throne of grace (Heb. 4. 16.) Let us therefore come boldly unto the Throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need. We can have no boldness but at a Throne of grace: When grace in our own hearts opposing sin, meets with that grace which is in the heart of God for the pardon of sin, we are carried as upon Eagles wings beyond the regions of fear. Job lived long before Christ came in the flesh, yet Christ was come into his heart; and when he desired God to remove his dread, he moved to be looked upon and heard in a Mediator.

Job having thus prepared his way begins to plead.

Verse 23. How many are mine iniquities and my sins? make me to know my transgression, and my sin.

His way of arguing is much like that of the seventh and tenth Chapters, and his general scope is the same, at once to maintain his own former integrity, and to aggravate his present misery. That's the sum of his discourses, queries and expostulations, to the end of the fourteenth Chapter.

How many are mine iniquities?

He seems to take the hint of this first enquiry from Zophar's wish, Chap. 11. ver. 5. O that God would speak, and open his lips against thee: and that he would shew thee the secrets of wisdom, that they are double to that which is: Know therefore, that God exacteth of thee less then thine iniquity deserveth. Job answers, you desired that God would speak; you doubted not but if he did, he would make it appear my sins were double to mine afflictions: With all mine heart (saith he) this is it I long for; I desire that God would speak, and that he would speak out what my sins are. How many are mine iniquities and my sins? make me to know my transgression and my sin. As if he had said, I am willing to hear, and know the worst of my self.

Some conceive, that Job having made that motion, Let him speak, and I will answer, &c. stood waiting a while to see what God would do: But receiving no answer, he thus breaks out; How many are mine iniquities?

Adeone flagitiosus ego, ut ne dignus habear cui improbitatē exprobres? Saltem igitur scelera mea ostendi mihi.

And these put a very harsh construction upon this Interrogation,; as if Job had said, What? am I so wicked and sinful, that I am not worthy unto whom thou shouldest shew my wickedness, and my sin? if I am so vile, let it appear how vile I am, and shew me those sins which have rendred me (it seems) not only unworthy of acceptation, but of an answer. I like not this gloss, neither doth it bear the image of a gracious spirit, such as Job's alwayes was, though it was sometimes a little muddy and tumultuous.

Rather thus, Job having a purpose to defend his cause, asks at once from the grief of his heart, and from the clearness of his conscience, How many are mine iniquities? As if he had said, I am suspected of great crimes, and I am in the eye of my friends as a person condemned already; but I would those crimes were brought forth, and surely they ought, before I am either censured, or condemned: Therefore Lord, How many are mine iniquities and my sins? make me to know my my transgression and my sin.

So the words carry a strong desire, which this afflicted soul had discovered more then once before, to see the bottom of his condition, and to find out the reason why God did thus afflict him: And if it were for sin (about which he he had no fear upon his conſcience) O that God would but ſhew him his ſin. His ſin (under that notion) was a ſecret to him, but he was willing to know it. There are two queſtions which would be reſolved before I proceed further to the opening of this. How many are mine iniquities?

Firſt, Seeing Job at Chap 9. ver. 22. laid down this concluſion, He ſlayeth the wicked and the righteous; and upon that bottom grounded all his anſwers, that the diſpenſations of God are alike in outward things to good and bad: Hence the queſtion riſeth, why he labours ſo much to clear himſelf of ſin, as if his afflictions muſt needs argue him wicked, whereas he before had argued, that the Lord doth as much afflict the righteous as the wicked.

I anſwer, Job ſpeaks thus, as vindicating his perſon, not as doubting his ſtate. He did not queſtion whether God was his friend, becauſe he was afflicted, but he deſired to remove the ſuſpitions of his Friends. Zophar (chap. 11. ver. 14.) gave Job occaſion to call for this diſcovery, while he counſelled him, If iniquity be in thine hand, put it far away, and let not wickedneſs dwell in thy Tabernacles. His Friends put theſe jealous ſuppoſitions, theſe if's and an's often upon him, If iniquity be in thine hand, &c. The counſel was good; but their jealouſie was not. Job ſaw what hung upon their ſpirits, and therefore begs of God to unſecret his ſins, and lay open his tranſgreſſions. As if he had ſaid, Lord, my friends are unſatisfied with all the profeſſions and proteſtations which I have made of my innocency: They ſuppoſe that I keep my ſin cloſe, & roll it like a ſweet morſel under my tongue; they would rake into my life, and ſee the bottom of my heart. Lord, let them ſee all, ſhew them what I am, and let me know what I have done. If it be as theſe men ſay, let it appear to thy glory, and to my ſhame. How many are mine iniquities and ſins? make me to know my tranſgreſſion and my ſin.

Secondly, It is queſtioned why Job makes requeſt, that God would ſhew him what and how many his ſins were, was he curious to know their Arithmetical number? Did he think God had over-reckoned him, or that himſelf could know their reckoning? Or did he think his ſins were ſo few, or ſo ſmall, that they could not hurt him? One ſin is enough to juſtifie God in our condemnation, we need not ask for a great many. The beſt of Saints, even they who have lived in no ſin, and comparatively have committed but few ſins, have yet deſired the Lord to cover their ſins, and pronounced him bleſſed, Whoſe tranſgreſſion is forgiven, whoſe ſin is covered (Pſal. 32. 1.) As the Saints are not forward to proclaim their good works; ſo neither is it pleaſant to them to have their ſins proclaimed: Why then is Job ſo buſie about this point of knowledge?

I anſwer, Job did not ask this queſtion, either out of curioſity to know the number of his ſins, or as if God had put more to his account then he had committed. He did not deſire this, as if he thought his ſins were either ſo few, or ſo ſmall, that they could do him no hurt; nor doth he ſpeak by way of extenuation, as if they were not many. He knew his ſins were many and great, yea, that if he had but one, and that a little one, he could not boaſt before God.

Nihil aliud eſt quam ſe ſibi bene conſcium.

But Firſt, He ſpeaks thus, becauſe he knew his ſins were neither ſo many as his Friends had reckoned them; nor ſo great as they had aggravated them; nor ſo black as they had painted them.

Secondly, When he deſires to be ſhewed his ſin, it is a proof that he was not guilty of any beloved ſin. He ſpeaks as Paul, 1 Cor. 4. 4. I know nothing by ſelf. Lord, if any filth lye unſeen, make me know it; His heart did not condemn him, and therefore he had confidence towards God, 1 John 3. 21. As if he had ſaid, Lord, My accuſers have no proof, they do but gueſs that I am wicked, my own heart is not ſo much as my accuſer at all; Lord, thou knoweſt exactly what I am, ſhew me, ſhew all, how many are my ſins?

Thirdly, He deſired to know his ſins; Firſt, That he might mourn and repent for his unknown ſins. Secondly, That he might turn from them, and return to God more fully. Thirdly, That he might be more watchful againſt them.

Laſtly, He was bold to ask this queſtion, becauſe he knew God would deal with him, as a Father, by a Covenant of grace through Chriſt; not, as a Judge, by a Covenant of works in himſelf: and therefore he was not afraid to know his ſins, and to have them all ſet in order before him: He was aſſured God would not condemn him, and he did not contend to juſtifie himſelf before God, he only waited till God would juſtifie him againſt the contendings and uncharitable ſurmiſings of men. Theſe, or ſuch as theſe, were the grounds upon which Job makes this addreſs to God, and puts both this queſtion and requeſt: How many are mine iniquities and my ſins? make me to know my tranſgreſſion and my ſin.

How many. The word refers both to quantity and quality; the Vulgar reads it, How great ſins have I? or, How great are the ſins which I have? We read it quantitively, for the number, How many are my ſins? How great, or how many? Make me to know both their number and their nature.

במה ad utrumq; pertinet, ad multitudinē ſcilicet & magnitudinem. Quantas habeo iniquitates? Vulg.

Hence Obſerve, Firſt, God only can give us the number and nature of our ſins.

No man can tell how many his ſins are; they are more then the hairs upon our head, they are as the ſands upon the ſea-ſhore innumerable. The kinds or ſorts of ſin, yea, the greater acts of ſin may be numbred by man; but he only that numbers the Stars, can number all our ſins. We commit many ſins of ignorance; and we are ignorant of ſome of our ſins of knowledge: we commit known ſins, which we do not know that we have committed.

And as God only knows the number, ſo the greatneſs and the aggravations of our ſins. Who can underſtand his errors? (Pſal. 19. 12.) He means practical, not doctrinal errors. As theſe errors of wandrings are beyond our numbring, ſo alſo beyond our underſtanding. As there is a height and a depth in the love of God, which paſſeth our knowledge. So there is an height and a depth of wickedneſs in our hearts, which paſſeth our knowledge. The Lord only can ſhew us how ſinful we are; as he only can ſhew us how gracious himſelf is.

Further, The multiplication of terms in this paſſage is conſiderable, How many are mine iniquities and my ſins? make me to know my tranſgreſſion and my ſin. Here are three Original words, by which Job doth expreſs the ſame thing. Firſt, Iniquity. Secondly, Tranſgreſſion. Thirdly, Sin. The Latines give us four, and they labour much to find out a material diſtinction in this verbal diſtinction: or to ſhew how iniquity, tranſgreſſion, and ſin, as alſo, how ſin in the firſt clauſe, and ſin in the ſecond, differ.

חטאות Per errorem admiſſa
עונות ſunt propriè perverſitates
פשע gravius eſt defectionem & rebellionem ſignificans. Merc.

The firſt word, which we tranſlate iniquity, ſignifies a perverſeneſs and crookedneſs of ſpirit, or thoſe ſins which have a peculiar crookedneſs and perverſeneſs in them. The ſecond ſignifies any, the leaſt aberration from the way or rule of holineſs in our actings, though our hearts ſtand right: every ſtep beſide the line is ſin. The word in the ſecond clauſe, which we tranſlate tranſgreſſion, ſignifies rebellion and obſtinacy of ſpirit, the riſings of our thoughts againſt God.

The Latines make out the diſtinction thus. By iniquities, they underſtand thoſe evils which are committed againſt our neighbour. By ſins, thoſe which a man commits againſt himſelf. By tranſgreſſions, thoſe which are immediate againſt God: And by ſin in the fourth place, Omiſſions: As if he had ſaid, Lord, ſhew me mine iniquities, any evil I have committed againſt others: Shew me my ſins, thoſe which I have committed againſt my ſelf; ſhew me my tranſgreſſions, the rebellions of my life againſt thy Majeſty. And ſhew me my ſins, all my neglects to perform, or negligent performances of holy duties: ſpread all before my face. This hath a truth in it: yet the holy Ghoſt doth not obſerve ſuch a diſtinctneſs in theſe words, but uſeth much variety and liberty in their application.

Latini numtuntur quatuor diſtinctis verbis & curioſius inter hæc diſcrimen conſtituere nituntur, 1. iniquitas in proximũ. 2. peccata in ſe. 3. ſcelera in Deũ. 4. delicta omiſſionis: Lyran. Aquin, paulo aliter.

Sometimes ſin, which goes loweſt in ordinary ſignification, is an aggravation: (Hoſ. 12. 8.) In all my labours they ſhall find none iniquity in me, that were ſin; as if ſin here were more then iniquity, or great iniquity. Sometimes iniquity is put as an aggravation upon ſin (Pſal. 32. 5.) Thou forgaveſt the iniquity of my ſin: That is, the ſinfulneſs of my ſin; or thoſe conſiderations which have rendred my ſin out of meaſure ſinful. Now ſeeing there is ſuch a promiſcuous uſe of theſe words in Scripture, we cannot clearly eſtabliſh, or build upon ſuch a difference.

Therefore paſſing by thoſe critical niceties, I ſhall take the Est coacervatio quædam artificio plena; Nam sicut ejusdem vocis repetitio ita etiam plurimarum eandem rem significantium acervatio vim solet addere orationi. San.

the words as Synonimaes, signifying one and the same thing, yet being thus joyned, they signifie more then any one singly can. For as the repeating of the same words heightens the sence, so also doth the heaping up of divers words which have the same sence. So that this Rhetorical acervation intimates Job's earnest desire, that all his sins, by what name or title soever distinguished, might be produced, and made known unto him. Let my iniquities, my transgressions, my sins, call them what you will, let them all be presented to my face. When God proclaims his pardoning mercy, he heaps up these words in his own title, calling himself, The Lord, the Lord gracious, &c. pardoning iniquity, transgression, and sin. Lest any breach of the Law might be thought unpardonable, all the words which imply a breach, are used in the proclamation of pardon. And while Job would here shew both his repentance and his innocency, that he was far from hiding any darling sin in his bosom, he begs the discovery of whatsoever bare the name, or had the nature of sin, in his heart or life.

Hence Observe, First, That the better any man is, the more willing he is to know the worst of himself.

He who is light in the Lord, is willing to see his dark part as well as his light. Some are very desirous others should know the good they have done; but they cannot abide to be shewed the evil which themselves have done. The Pharisee (Luke 18.) publisheth to all, how he paid tithes and gave almes, how he fasted and pray'd, &c. but he spake not a word, either confessing his known sins, or begging a sight of what he did not know. Solomon perceiv'd that this spirit of self-flattery possessed many in his time (Prov. 20. 6.) Most men will proclaim every one his own goodness, but a faithful man who can find? Hypocrites labour much to shew others their goodness: The sincere labour more to see their own vileness. A godly man finds delight only in the knowledge of his graces; but he finds profit in the knowledge of his corruptions. We are pleased only with the sight of friends, or of wife and children in our houses; but if a thief be got in, we thank him that shews us who, and where he is. There are two things which argue a gracious frame of spirit: First, When we desire to know how frail we are: Secondly, When we desire to know how sinful we are. A natural man loves not to take notice either of the infirmities of his body, or of the presumptions of his soul: And though some wicked men will say from a spirit of impudence, they care not who knows their iniquities, transgressions and sins; yet no wicked man ever did or can say from a spirit of repentance, Lord make me to know mine iniquities, my transgressions, and my sins. A carnal heart is more willing that others should know his sins, then he is (under this notion of knowledge) to know them himself; he knows them in the history or matter of fact, with a kind of delight; it sometime pleases him to remember the evil which he hath done: but he cannot abide to know them in their nature; it never pleases him to repent of the evil which he hath done.

Secondly Observe, Whilst Christ is known to us, we need not be afraid to have our sins known to us.

To know sin, and not to know Christ, is sad. One sin seen, without a sight of Christ, swallows up the soul: but a sight of Christ swallows up all our sins. None can be truly willing that God should shew them their sins, but they to whom God hath shewed a Saviour. Job had said, He shall be my salvation, before he said, Shew me my transgression. When we have seen heaps upon heaps of mercy in God, we cannot despair (though we ought to grieve) when we see heaps upon heaps of sin in our selves. Heaps of mercy cast down or cover heaps of sin. All our mountains of sin become mole-hills, yea plains, before this Zerubbabel.

Again, It is remarkable, that Job having asked the question, How many are mine iniquities? follows it presently with this petition, Make me to know my transgression and my sin: As if he had said, I may see my sins how many they are; or that they are very many, and yet not know what any one of them is, without thy special teaching.

Hence Observe, Our sins may be told us, or we may have the tale of our sins, and yet not know our sins.

It is harder to know the nature, then the number; what, then how many our sins are. Every man (who knows any thing of the state of man) knows he is a sinner; but few know their sins. Christ is preached to all; yet Christ is not known to all: There is much in this, Make me to know. To know sin, is to be sensible of the evil of sin; as to know Christ, is to have a feeling of Christ, and to taste how sweet the Lord Christ is. We may hear of our sins all our dayes, and yet not know our sins: It is possible for a man to write down catalogues of his sins, and to keep a record of them every day, and yet not to know them, not only not so far as to mourn for them after a godly sort; but not so far as to be affected with them after a moral sort, or so far as an ingenious man might be. It is one thing to know our transgressions; another thing to write our transgressions, or to speak of them. For as some have whole books written full of Sermon-notes by them, who have not one line of a Sermon written in their hearts, or upon their wayes; so a man may have whole books written full of sin-notes, and yet not one sin making impression upon his heart. There are but few who know what they know.

There is a threefold knowledge of sin.

First, In the kind of it, that this or that is sinful; this knowledge of sin comes not from our selves. There are many actings which we do not know to be sinnings, till God makes us know them. Some things wherein we thought we did God good service, we may find our selves transgressors in them.

Secondly, There is a knowledge of sin in the nature of it, that it is a transgression of the Law, and a departure from God; that it is a filthy and a polluted thing, a base and dishonourable thing; that it is nothing that is good, and all that's evil; that it is so evil that we cannot make it worse then it is, nor call it by any name so bad as its own, Sinful sin.

Thirdly, There is a knowledge of sin in the effects and issues of it: That as it is filthy, so it defiles; that as it is a pollution, so it pollutes every thing that toucheth it; that, as it is base and dishonourable in it self, so it doth embase and dishonour every soul that commits it, much more those that love it: That it is big with, and brings forth death; that it is fruited with damnation, that it is armed with all the curses written in the Book of God against sinners; that the wrath of God is revealed from Heaven against it, and shall be poured out upon it for ever, unless we have part in the blood of Christ, which was poured out to wash and save us from it, We never know sin thus, till God makes us know it. Sin is as a fire to consume, as a serpent to sting and poyson us; yet sinful man esteems it but as a fire, or as a serpent painted upon a wall, or set upon a sign-post, which though they have the colour, yet have they not the heat of fire, nor the poyson of a serpent. Grace only gives us the true sense of our own sin: And he who hath received the largest measures of the grace of God, had need to be instant in prayer with the God of grace, To make him know his transgression and his sin.

Wherefore hidest thou thy face, and holdest me for thine enemy?
Wilt thou break a leaf driven to and fro? and wilt thou pursue the dry stubble?

Cum à me rogatus (O supreme judex) ut si quæ sunt apud te recondita mea scelera proferre velis, taces omnino, sane videris tuo isto silentio refutari, nihil tale in me reperisse; cur igitur abscondis faciem & mecum tanquam cum inimico agis? Aqui.

WE need not labour much for the connection of these words, which are indeed a continued description of the sorrows of a troubled spirit. Some joyn them with the request made in the former verse thus, How many are mine iniquities and my sins? make me to know my transgression and my sin. Wherefore hidest thou thy face? As if he had said, For asmuch as I proposing that to thy Majesty, to discover the worst and darkest part of me, and yet thou dost not bring forth any accusation, or lay any crime to my charge, seeing by thy silence thou seemest to acquit me of being guilty of any such transgression as my Friends have suspected me of; Wherefore is it that thou hidest thy face, and holdest me for thine enemy? If indeed thou couldest produce against me any studied wickedness, or arraign me at thy bar for an hypocrite, then I should see reason enough, why thou, who art of purer eyes then to behold any unclean thing, shouldst hide hide thy face from me in such uncleanness; and were I such an one, I might see reason enough why thou shouldest count me as an enemy, or never own me as a friend. But forasmuch as that not only appeareth not, but indeed is not; I now further desire to understand what is the cause why thou hidest thy face from me, and why thou holdest me as thine enemy.

Vers. 24. Wherefore hidest thou thy face, and holdest me for thine enemy?

The words are not so much a question, as an expostulation, which is a very vehement opening of the heart to let out the grief that lyeth there: Yet Job keeps within the bounds of duty and holy modesty: He did not invade the prerogative of God, whilest he thus asked an account of him. We must here take in a double supposition that we may clear Job. First, That, he knew God had a reason why he hid his face from him. Secondly, We must suppose, that in case the Lord should still hide the cause from him why he did hide his face from him, yet Job was resolved to sit down and honour God even in that darkness about his own condition: for without these suppositions, to put questions, much more to put expostulations upon God, is unbecoming the state of the creature, much more of a Believer. We must say God hath just cause for whatsoever he doth; and he doth not wrong us, if he refuse to shew us the cause, though we request him to shew it us.

Wherefore hidest thou thy face?

Here are two things to be opened.

First, What is meant by the face of God.

Secondly, What hiding his face doth mean.

This phrase [The face of God] must be understood by that common figure, an Anthropopathy. God is often spoken of in Scripture after the manner of men; sometimes inward passions, sometimes (as here) outward parts are ascribed to him.

The face of God is put First, For the essential glory of God. (Exod. 33.13.) When Moses desired to see the glory of God, the Lord telleth him, ver. 20. Thou canst not see my face; for there is no man can see my face and live. Thou canst not see my face; that is, my essential glory; thou mayest see my declarative, or my manifestative glory, the glory of my Attributes, as they are expressed in that proclamation of his great Name. The face of God, as taken for his essential glory, is alwayes hid; it is an object too pure and spiritual for the eye, and too high for the understanding of a creature.

Quare Divinitatem tuam subducis. Targ.

Secondly, The face of God signifies the general presence of God: And so when God hides his face, he denyes us the comfortable enjoyment of his presence.

Thirdly, and more particularly, The face of God signifies the anger and wrath of God, (Lev. 20.6.) The soul that turneth after such as have familiar spirits, and after wizards, to go a whoring after them, I will even set my face against that soul, and will cut him off from among his people. And in the Psalms often the Lord is said to set his face, that is, to manifest his displeasure against wicked men. The face of God, signifies also the favour of God, the good will of God. So in this place, and Psal. 18.19. 1 Sam. 13.12. Numb. 6.25. Dan. 9.17. both these, the anger and the favour of God, are called the face of God, because the anger and the favour of men appear in their faces. Man can form his face into the signification of either of these, into an angry look, or into a pleasing look: We may see wrath, or we may see love printed upon the countenance. Hence the favour and the anger of God are expressed by the face of God. Job complaineth, that the favour of God, the light of his countenance was hidden from him.

Hidest. The hiding of the face of God may be considered either as it is, or as we apprehend it to be. His face is never hid, but to our apprehensions. In his dispensations, there are the hidings, and there are the discoverings of his face; there are the shuttings, and there are the openings of his love. Further, the hiding of the face implyes two things.

Fratorum more qui eos quibus succensent aspicere dedignantur. Marc.

First, Displeasure. A man turneth away his face from those with whom he is displeased.

Secondly, Disdain. We turn from those we slight: and to turn the back upon a man is real slighting. Where we will not look, we do not love. As the Prophet said to a great King, (2 Kings 3.14.) Were it not that I regard the presence of Jehoshaphat the King of Judah, I would not look toward thee nor see thee. So here, Wherefore hidest thou thy face? is, Why art thou so angry with me? Why dost thou slight me, as if I were not worth a look, or a cast of thine eye: A man in misery usually saith, Pray look upon me.

Faciem avertere indignantis est & supplicium inferentis, sicut faciem convertere benevolentis & beneficientis est. Pin.

Again, This also (as some Interpreters conceive) hath reference to a judiciary proceeding: Speak thou, and I will answer; or, I will speak, and answer thou me: Wherefore hidest thou thy face? When a Magistrate finds a business foul against a man, he turns away from him. Some of the Ancients refer it to a known custom of the Judges in those times, who when they pronounced sentence of condemnation, caused a curtain to be drawn before them, or, hid their faces from the condemned party; for as the covering of a mans face was a token that he was condemned; so they who condemned them covered their own faces: Of which custom see more upon those words, chap. 9. ver. 24. He covereth the faces of the Judges thereof, &c. And whether the usages of former times in judiciary proceedings, give any light to this Text or no, yet the general scope and intendment of it is plainly thus. Wherefore, O Lord, dost thou put thy self into an angry posture against me? Why are all the appearances from Heaven to my soul black and lowring? Why is it that I see not those former smiles in thy face? Why am I not received into the embraces of thy armes? Why dost thou act the wrathful Judge, who art indeed a loving Father? As my soul hath delighted in thy forepassed kindnesses, so it desires to know, with all humble submission to thy will, why thou grievest me now with this unkindness, the hiding of thy face? Tell me Lord, tell me, wherefore hidest thou thy face from me?

Antiqua erat consuetudo, quod cum judices capitis sententiâ laturi erant interjecto velo se continebant absconditi. Hujus meminit, Basil. Ep. 79

Hence Observe, First, That holy men even in this life have a sight of the face of God.

Wherefore hidest thou thy face? It was not usual with God to hide his face, Job had seen it, else he would not have complained because he could not see it. We are not much troubled at the want of that, whereof we never had any experience nor enjoyment. We are not at all troubled at the non-enjoyment of that, of whose being, or whether there be such a thing or no, we are altogether ignorant. Job saw God did not deal with him as he was wont, nor do to him after the manner of a friend. God had been familiar with him, and given him frequent visits, this made him so sensible of his present shyness and estrangements. Chap. 10. v. 12. Thy visitation hath preserved my spirit. When friends visit they see one anothers faces. It is said of the two Kings (2 Kings 14.8.) that the one sent to the other, saying, Come, let us look one another in the face; that is, Let us have an interview. The soul of a believer hath interviews with God, God and he doth often look one another in the face. Whersoever the Saints are (except in cases of desertion) the place may be called, as Jacob called that where he wrestled with God, (Gen. 32.30.) Peniel, that is, the face of God: yet not in that sence fully in which Jacob calls it so: He called it the face of God, because he had seen God face to face. We can call it so only (ordinarily) because we see his face. It is one thing to see the face of God, and another thing to see God face to face. The former is the common priviledge of Saints in this life; the latter is very rarely given the Saints here; or it is the priviledge of but some Saints, and those rare ones, to have it here.

There is a twofold sight or vision of God.

First, A vision of grace. Secondly, A vision of glory. Glory is nothing else, but the vision of God; (1 Joh. 3.1.) We shall see him as he is. Both these sights of God are expressed by one phrase of speech, in the Hebrew of the Old Testament, and in the Greek of the new, and we translate both by seeing God face to face. So Jacob professed in the place now cited, that he had seen God; and the Apostle promiseth that we shall see him, so (1 Cor. 13.12.) where he also compares the sight of God here to seeing in a glass darkly, and calls the sight of him in heaven, a seeing of God face to face. Now the reason why some of the Saints (as Jacob and Moses) are said to see God face to face in this life, which the Apostle appropriates to the next, is this as I conceive, because those sights of God which Jacob and Moses had were immediate, God in an extraordinary extraordinary manner coming down to wreſtle with Jacob, and calling up Moſes in an extraordinary manner to ſpeak with him in the mount; Theſe diſpenſations being (præludia gloriæ) the foreactings of a glorified eſtate, are ſet forth by that act which is peculiar and proper unto the ſtate of glory, The ſeeing of God face to face. But as for the uſual manifeſtations of God to believers in this life, they are only the ſeeings of his face.

So then we muſt diſtinguiſh of the viſions of God in this life. Some are extraordinary, ſuch was that of Jacob and Moſes, ſuch was that of the Prophet (Iſa. 6. 5.) and of Job (chap. 42. 5.) By all theſe God was ſeen (in this ſence) face to face. There are alſo ordinary manifeſtations of God, in which only the face of God is ſeen, and thoſe may be referred to three heads.

Firſt, We ſee his face in the glaſs of the word, there we have a viſion of God: hence the preaching of the word is called viſion, (Prov. 29. 18.) Where there is no viſion the people periſh.

Secondly, We ſee the face of God in the glaſs of his works. What God is, appears in what God doth. God needs not ſubſcribe his name to his works (as men do) to ſhew that he is the Author of them, for his works are his name, and in what work ſoever his hand hath been, his face is ſeen. Eſpecially in thoſe three great works, firſt, in the work of creation, (Rom. 1. 20.) The inviſible things of him from the creation of the world, are clearly ſeen, being underſtood by the things that are made. Secondly, In the works of Providence. And this even in the common works of providence, our daily ſupport and protection, the conſtant recourſe of ſeaſons and times, of nights and dayes, Pſal. 19. 1. The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament ſheweth his handywork; day unto day uttereth ſpeech, and night unto night ſheweth knowledg; that is, the providences and turnings of every day, declare the glory of God, and ſhew his handywork: but chiefly in wonderful providences, in his great deliverances and miraculous operations for his people is God ſeen. Thirdly, In the work of Redemption, in which the face of God is more ſeen then in both the former, even his manifold wiſdom, Epheſ. 3. 10.

Thirdly, We ſee the face of God in the Ordinances of his worſhip, in them we have moſt viſible viſions of God in this life. For this ſight holy David was athirſt, Pſal. 63. 2. O God, thou art my God, &c. My ſoul thirſteth for thee in a dry and thirſty land, where no water is, to ſee thy power and thy glory ſo as I have ſeen thee in the Sanctuary. The ſight of God in the Sanctuary, is through the Ordinances and worſhip of the Sanctuary. God is ſeen in his works, but he is ſeen more in his word; in that as in a glaſs with open face we behold the glory of the Lord, till we are changed into the ſame image, (2 Cor. 3. 18.) The ſight of God is a transforming ſight; we cannot ſee what he is, and be what we are. The beauty of God ſhines in his Ordinances, and that beauty beheld doth not only reflect upon, but aſſimulate the beholder. Hence David again (Pſal. 27. 4.) makes it the chiefeſt and the choiceſt, the one and the only thing of all his deſires, One thing have I deſired of the Lord, that will I ſeek after, that I may dwell in the houſe of the Lord all the dayes of my life; what to do? To behold the beauty of the Lord. Where doth beauty ſit? Beauty ſits in the face, and therefore to behold the beauty of the Lord, is to behold the face of the Lord. Theſe are the ordinary viſions of God in this life, or the ſeeing of his face: and when the Lord is pleaſed to give any of his ſpecial favorites extraordinary and immediate manifeſtations of himſelf (which as he did to ſome Saints before the coming of Chriſt, ſo he can renew it (when he pleaſeth and ſees it fitting) to believers now) when I ſay God gives immediate manifeſtations of himſelf, they may be ſaid to ſee God face to face, becauſe ſuch manifeſtations are the firſt-fruits of glory, or glympſes of heaven before we come to heaven, where we ſhall as fully and as clearly as a finite nature can take in an infinite, ſee God face to face.

Now as unbelievers ſhall never ſee God face to face in glory: ſo they know not what it means to ſee his face in wayes of grace. And therefore they entertain it with a kind of ſcorn, when it is reported that any man hath ſeen the face of God; This is a ſtrange language to the men of the world, who live without God in the world. They who live without God in the world, live without God in the Church: and we are as Barbarians to them, they underſtand not what we ſay, when we ſay we have ſeen God in prayer, or at the word, in private duties, or in publick aſſemblies. In theſe, believers ſee the face of God; they who do not, do nothing in any of theſe. Our buſineſs in ſuch duties is to ſee God: we come not to ſee one another, or to ſee the walls and ornaments of the place we meet in, we come not (as the Diſciples ſpake wondring at the fabrick of the Temple) to ſee what manner of ſtones and buildings are there, but to ſee what a holy and gracious God is there; and when the worſhippers in ſpirit miſs this ſight, though they know their labour is not loſt, yet the comfort they expected is not gained, and therefore they mourn, yea humbly complain, Wherefore hideſt thou thy face?

It is the ſole priviledge of the Saints to ſee the face of God, but they live not alwayes in the enjoyment of that priviledge: (Iſa. 8. 17.) I will wait upon the Lord that hideth his face from the houſe of Jacob, and I will look for him. The Saints are now the houſe of Jacob; the eye, yea the heart of God is ever upon this houſe, yet he ſometimes hideth his face from it. Then the Lord hideth his face, when he doth not enlighten as formerly, when he doth not enliven as formerly, when he doth not aſſiſt in doing as formerly, when he doth not ſupport in ſuffering as formerly; when there is a withdrawing of theſe or in any of theſe, then God is ſaid to hide his face from the houſe of Jacob; David often bemoans himſelf under theſe hidings. And the Prophet puts the caſe in general, that ſuch as fear the Lord and obey the voice of his ſervants, may yet walk in darkneſs and ſee no light (Iſa. 50. 10.) We never want light in our ſpirits, till the face of God is hid from us, as we never want light in our eyes till the Sun is hidden from us: but why doth God hide his face from his choiceſt ſervants? Job a choice ſervant of his asks the reaſon, wherefore hideſt thou thy face far from me? I ſhall (upon that occaſion, and the clearing of this Scripture) anſwer it in ſome particulars.

Firſt, The Lord hides his face ſometimes, becauſe he will hide his face. What if God ſhould have anſwered Job when he enquired, Wherefore hideſt thou thy face? It is my pleaſure? God may do it by prerogative, and neither ask us leave, nor give us the reaſon why. As he hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardneth (Rom. 9. 18.) ſo he may ſay, I ſhew my face to whom I will, and from whom I will, I hide it.

But, Secondly, He hideth his face at one time, becauſe he intendeth to ſhew it more clearly at another. When he means ſhortly to give the ſoul a full ſight of himſelf, he gives it at preſent no ſight of himſelf: when he is about to pour out abundance of love into a boſome, he quite withdraws the ſenſe of his love.

Thirdly, Undervaluings of former manifeſtations are often chaſtned with after hidings.

Fourthly, God denies his preſence, that we may prize his preſence, and pray more earneſtly for it.

Fiftly, When we value the face of the world too much, God hides his face. When we are deſirous to make a fair ſhew in the fleſh, God will not ſhew himſelf to our ſpirits. Our dalliance with the creature, cauſeth God to look off from us, or to look ſtrangely upon us. The heart of a godly man may get a haunt to ſome vanity here below, and then God reſtrains viſion from above. He ſhews us the wandrings and out-lyings of our affections, by the withdrawings and vailings of his own. We cannot love God till he ſhews us his face; and after we have ſeen it, we cannot but love him: yet they who have ſeen him, and love him, may for a time be overtaken with the love of the world, and then God will not be ſeen. Every opening of our ſelves to the world is a hiding of our ſelves from God. When we hide our faces from God, no wonder if God hide his face from us.

Sixthly, When we hide our faces from the wayes or from the people of God, God will hide his face from us. Some who have had Communion with God, and have ſeen his face, may (under a temptation or upon a guſt of carnal fear) if not withdraw from, yet ſcarce own the people or the the wayes of God; yea, possibly they may set their faces against some of the wayes of God. When it is so with them, God will surely hide his face from them. Apostates draw back totally from profession, when they perceive they cannot bring forward their own profit or other private interests by their profession; and of such the Lord hath said, My soul shall have no pleasure in them, (Heb. 10. 38.) True Believers may draw back partially or in part, and when they do so, God will make them know that while they are in such a base temper, his soul hath no pleasure in them, and therefore hides his face from them.

As these or the like are causes in us, why God hides his face, so he hath gracious designes upon us, which he effects by hiding his face. Chiefly these two,

First, To try us. There is no greater trial of grace then the withdrawing of comfort; and in that state where we shall have a conjunction of all comfort, we shall never be put to the trial of any grace; yea, the graces which act in trials shall have no existence there. Faith and hope and patience have no place in heaven, because they have no work in heaven: And they have no work there, because God will never hide his face, and Satan shall never shew his face there. For between the appearing of Satans face, and the hiding of Gods face lieth the work of these graces, (Isa. 8.17.) I will wait upon God who hideth his face: there's the trial of patience, to keep close to God, when God seemeth to depart from us.

Secondly, God hides his face that we might be in love with that state where his face shall never be hid. 'Tis best of all to be dissolved and to be with Christ, because then we and our joyes shall never be divided. That joy which depends upon changeable things, must needs be changeable. The joy of heaven is a dependent joy, yet because God on whom it depends, will never change a look towards us, therefore our joy shall be unchangeable. If the Sun did alwayes continue the same aspect upon the moon, which it doth at the full, the Moon (though hers be a dependent and a borrowed light) would ever continue at the full, and know no change. God will not vary his aspect toward the Saints in heaven, for one moment, to all eternity, and therefore the joy of Saints in heaven will be for ever at the full. There is a double difference between the manifestation of God here upon earth, and in heaven. First, A difference in the degree, the manifestations in heaven are clearer; here in a glass, there face to face, as the Apostle speaks. Secondly, The manifestations of God to the Saints in heaven are without intermission, there shall not come one cloud between the face of God and our souls for ever. Hence as the holiness, so the joy of the Saints in heaven shall be the same for ever. Now God hides his face, and puts us to this question, Wherefore hidest thou thy face? that we may long for that estate where this question shall never be put, Wherefore hidest thou thy face?

Thirdly Observe, That it's a great affliction to the soul, when the face of God is hid.

Wherefore hidest thou thy face? As if he had said, Lord, I could suffer any affliction, yea all afflictions better then this one. Job was not a type of Christ (as I have toucht before) but as in many things, so in this, his spirit and his condition were very parallel or like to Christ. When Christ was upon the cross, he cryed out, and put this question, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Such was Jobs cry, Why hidest thou thy face from me? As Christ upon the cross, so Job upon the dunghil, had a body full of pains; but he passeth by these, and only complains of the sufferings of his soul in the hidings of his fathers face. Here was the pinch; Why hidest thou face from me? The Lord threatens, Deut. 32. 20. I will hide my face from them, I will see what their end shall be: Certainly no good end if God hide his face. He speaks in reference to temporal or outward things, I will hide my face from them, that is, I will withdraw my protecting presence, my wonted influence and assistance; or as he tells them (Jer. 18. 17.) I will shew them the back and not the face in the day of their calamity; when I have done this, then I will see what their end shall be. Though God be not seen, yet he can see; having hid himself, and left a sinful people to shift for themselves, he then (as it were) watches, like Moses sister, when he was put into his boat of bulrushes (Exod. 2. 4.) to see what will become of them. God knows the end from the beginning, and looks quite through all causes into their issues; yet thus he speaks after the manner of men, who cannot see an hour before them; I will see what their end shall be. God sees they must needs come to a miserable end, whose wayes he will not vouchsafe to see. Much more is this true in regard of our inward and spiritual estate, if God hide his face, he seeth what the end will be, even anguish and sorrow, trouble and vexation of spirit. What can that soul see but visions of darkness, which hath no vision of God, who alone is light? After the people had said (Hos. 6. 2.) Let us return unto the Lord; for he hath torn and he will heal us; he adds, After two dayes will he revive us, in the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight: In his sight, which some interpret, when God brings us into his sight, or into a sight of him, we shall live, that is, our lives will be sweet unto us, we shall recover when God appears to us, and gives us evidence that we are accepted with him. A sight of the face of God is the happiness and life of man. As no man can see the essential face of God and live, so no man can live comfortably, unless he see the providential face of God. It is observed, that the heathens exceedingly desired a sight of their gods, and that they might see them, they invented images, and set up statues to represent the gods; that so they might see whom they worshipped, and at once behold and adore their dunghil-dieties. They knew no way of seeing their gods, but by their sence; and therefore they made sensible Gods. They would rather have Gods with eyes that could not see, then not see their gods with their eyes. Yea, I find a learned Christian among the Ancients, giving this as one reason why Christ took our nature upon him, and so became God manifested in the flesh, that, God who in himself is altogether invisible, might be visible in his Son; God is more visible in Christ, then he is in all creatures; The Apostle calleth him the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, (Heb. 1. 3.) Jesus Christ is the brightness, the sent-forth-light, the beams or splendor of his Fathers glory, and the imprinted image of his essence or person (for the words are a metaphor drawn from a lightsom body, which sends forth beams of light, and from a seal, which leaves its own impression or image where it is stampt, I say) Christ Jesus is all this, not only in regard of his Divine Nature, and eternal generation, but also in respect of his incarnation, and sending in the similitude of sinful flesh. For in Christ manifested in the flesh, the glory and excellency of God the Father shined forth; who as he is in himself altogether invisible, so he is in nothing so visible as in his Son our Lord Jesus Christ; and therefore all the former wayes of manifesting God under the Law, have been laid by and disused, since God manifested himself to us by his Son: the excellency of this being so great beyond the former, that to look for them, would be but like calling for Star-light after the Sun is risen, as the Apostles way of argumentation doth clearly evidence in the first of the Hebrews, vers, 1, 2, 3. But to return to the point (from which, I have upon the overture of this notion, a little digressed). It appears by all this, that the manifestation of God to the soul, is our highest both priviledge and comfort, and that the hidings of his face are our greatest both loss and sorrow.

Gentiles ab hoc simulacra finxerũt ut oculis cernerent quod colebant. Chrysologus hinc argumẽtatur incarnationis causam, ut se invisibilis deus faceret visibilẽ satisfaceretq; amori, qui quod amat videre cupit.

There are four particulars from which I shall briefly evidence this yet further.

First, The need or rather the absolute necessity we stand in of the presence and favour of God. It is needful for us to have the creature, but there is a necessity that we should enjoy God. God is enough for us without any creature, but all creatures are nothing to us without God; God and all that he hath made, is not more then God without any thing that he hath made.

Secondly, All our profits come in at the door of divine favour and munificence. And having God, we have all: He that hath the fountain, hath the stream; he that hath the Mine, hath the gold and silver. He that hath the Sun, hath the light: Whilst we enjoy Communion with God, we enjoy the fountain the mine, the Sun of all enjoyments. We say there is no fishing to the sea, because the sea hath the vastest capacity; there's fish enough in the sea to fill all our nets, and to lade all our vessels: we may say infinitely more truly, there is no enjoyment to the enjoyment of God,

God: God hath enough not only to supply all our needs, but to satisfie all our desires. The best of meer creatures is but a particular good. All creatures are not an universal good. The One the One-most God is all good. God will be hereafter, and he can be now, All in all unto us.

Thirdly, Nothing is so honourable to man as the enjoyment of God. It is an honour to a common man when he is admitted to the presence of a great man. If a Prince (who is but man in a great letter) speak kindly to us, and shew us any countenance, we think our selves honoured not a little: what is it then for the great God of heaven to shew us his face, and give us countenance?

Fourthly, It is joy and delight unspeakable to enjoy the face of God. One of the Roman Emperours was of so amiable a temper and composure, that he was called The Delight of mankind: God is indeed the delight of Saints. The joy of glory is this, We shall ever be with the Lord; the joy of grace is, when the Lord is with us. We may have grace, but we can have no joy, when God hides his face from us; and he that hath once seen the face of God, can never give over asking, knocking, praying, begging, till the Lord restore unto him the light of his countenance, and the joy of his salvation. Wherefore hidest thou thy face?

And holdest me for thine enemy.

We may expound this latter clause by the former: Surely thou holdest me for an enemy, else why dost thou hide thy face from me?

חשב existimare, reputare, etiã in pretio habere.

Holdest.] The word signifies the esteem or account which we have either of persons or of things. (Gen. 31. 15.) Are we not counted of him strangers? say the wives of Jacob, in reference to their Father Laban, he deals with us as if we had not been born in his family, or as if he had no relation to us. So here, Thou counteſt me, or, thou holdest me for thine enemy, that is, thou carriest it as if thou hadst nothing at all to do with me upon terms of friendship, as if thou hadst no acquaintance with me, or hadst never seen me before, yea thou dealest with me, not only as with a stranger, but as with an enemy; not only as if thou didst not know me, but as if thou didst hate me.

Non pluris facit nos quã si extera & peregrina essemus.

By nature we are all enemies to God, (Rom. 5. 10.) Whilst we were yet enemies Christ died for us. Yea, we are his hearty enemies, or enemies with our hearts: we hate God naturally, as we should love him spiritually, with all our might and all our mind. We were enemies in our minds, or, by our minds, by reason of wicked works, (Col. 1. 21.) Job was once such an enemy, but he knew he had been reconciled unto God by the death of his Son in the promise, and so was become his friend. Job knew he was justified and pardoned, that God was his God in covenant, and therefore it was strange to him to receive the usage of an enemy. Is this thy kindness to thy friend, to number him among thine enemies?

ἡγῆσαί μὲ ὑπεναντίον σοὶ. Putas me tibi contrarium. Sept. Ita me percutis ut soles quos inimicos judicasti. Sic caro judicat in cruce. Merc.

For thine enemy.] An Enemy is first one whom we hate. Secondly, He is one who hath done or attempts to do us wrong: Thirdly, An Enemy is one whom we oppose, and seek to destroy. Job seems to have this thought, that God had all these thoughts of him. Thou holdest me for thine enemy, that is, as one whom thou hatest, as one that had done thee wrong, as one whom thou opposest and wouldst destroy. Thus the flesh judges even in those who are more then flesh. The rule of love given by Christ is, Love your enemies: if thine enemy hunger, feed him, if he thirst, give him drink: Job speaks of himself as of an enemy in vulgar notion, or as of an enemy dealt with according to the laws of nature or of nations, not according to the law of Christ or of Gospel-grace; yet God did indeed feed and comfort Job, though he outwardly dealt with him as an enemy, pulling the bread from his mouth, and stripping him of all his comforts.

Hence Observe, First, God acts towards some of his neareſt friends as if they were his greateſt enemies.

He may not only hide his face from them, but shew his wrath against them. God wounds his with love, and he wounds those whom he loves. Whom I love I correct: there is wounding in correcting. So he acted toward Jacob, (Gen. 32.) he wrestled with him. Is it the part of a friend when he meets his friend to wrestle with him? When friends meet, they imbrace and salute one another, they rejoyce and confer one with another: God wrestled with Jacob, and wrestled with him, not in sport, but very roughly, he put his thigh out of joynt, and made him halt for it. And as God dealt with personal Jacob, so he dealt with national Jacob, or the people of the Jews, who were his friends above all the nations of the earth, Jer. 30. 10. Therefore fear not thou O my servant Jacob, saith the Lord, neither be dismayed O Israel, for I will save thee from afar, and thy seed from the land of thy captivity. This was a gracious promise that the Jews should return from Babylon. But who sent them into Babylon? or was it the part of a friend to send them into Babylon? It was God who sent them into Babylon, and himself interprets his own action, (vers. 14.) I have wounded thee with the wound of an enemy, with the chastisement of a cruel one, for the multitude of thine iniquity, because thy sins were increased. God who wrestled with Jacob till he lamed him, smites the seed of Jacob till he wounded them, and that not with some slight wound, but with the wound of an enemy, that is, with such wounds as an enemy is wounded with: God wounds a beloved people with the wounds of any enemy, even with such a wound as an enemy gives, and with such a wound as an enemy receives. God was not an enemy to Job, but God wounded him as if he were an enemy. The wounds of God are the wounds of a father, whose end is to correct, not to kill; he smites us as children, and counteth us children whilest he is smiting us; yet he smites so hard and wounds so deep as if wrathful anger moved his arm to smite and wound. Great wounds are the wounds of an enemy; for, as a man is said to hate father and mother, yea and his own life, when he regards not what they say to withhold him from the duty which he oweth to Christ, in this case (though he truly reverence father and mother) he is said to hate them, because we commonly hate those whose counsels and desires we reject, or they at least think we do so; so, a great wound is called by the Prophet the wound of an enemy, because none but enemies use to give such wounds. There is no outward condition so sad, but God sometimes puts his own into it. As a wicked man can do any thing to God but love him, he prayes to God, he hears the Word of God, he gives an outward conformity to the Law of God, but he cannot love God: So God can do any thing against his own people, but hate them: He can impoverish them, weaken them, and wound them, he can correct and chasten them, he can speak cursedly to them, and deal coursely with them, but he cannot hate them.

Ab inimico illata dicitur illa plaga quia gravis est qualẽ inferre solet inimicos. Sanct.

Secondly Observe, A Godly man may doubt whether God love him or no.

Where God loves he loves to the end. All his friends are his sons. A son is not taken for years, as a servant is: once a son and ever a son, and because every friend of God is a son of God, therefore once a friend and ever a friend: yet, they who are for ever the friends of God, are not alwayes perswaded of the love of God. The relation cannot be lost, but the sweetness of it may. As many wicked men are high flown in confidences that they are the friends of God, and that God useth them as friends, they are rich, and they are full, they have favour and honour in the world, above thousands of their brethren, upon these grounds they boast, see how God loveth us, and yet at that time God hates them and counts them as his enemies. The Jews had an high esteem of Moses, they trusted in Moses, yet Christ saith unto them, (Joh. 5. 45.) I will not accuse you to the Father, there is one will accuse you, even Moses in whom you trust. So will some glory that God is their friend, and they his favourites: But while they think they trust God, and God helps them, we may say, God whom they trust will accuse, and not only accuse but destroy them as professed enemies. Now, as some have false perswasions that God is their friend, so others are under false suspicions that God is their enemy. An upright heart is not alwayes setled in this great truth, that God loves him, yea he may come almost to a settlement in this great errour, that God hates him. Nothing can separate us from the benefits of the love of God (Rom. 8. 39.) but many things may separate us from the feelings of it.

Thirdly

Thirdly Observe, To be an enemy to God is the worst of all conditions.

God is the best friend and the worst enemy; no love like his, no wrath like his: Those mine enemies that would not have me reign over them, bring them forth and slay them here before me. His foes shall be his footstool. And as to be a real enemy to God, is to be in the worst condition, so to apprehend our selves enemies to God, or not in the favour of God, is a very sad condition. I have opened this point further at the seventh Chapter, vers. 11. Where Job complains in language near this, Why hast thou set me as a mark against thee, so that I am a burden unto my self? An enemy is the mark against whom we direct all our shot, and brandish all our weapons. We are all by nature enemies to God, blessed are they who through grace are his reconciled friends. Job having asked the question, why God, hid his face and held him as an enemy, beseeches him not to contend with him, because he was (if he was) so weak and inconsiderable an enemy.

Vers. 25. Wilt thou break a leaf driven to and fro? and wilt thou pursue the dry stubble?

There is a twofold consideration of this verse, First, as it stands in its own bounds. Secondly, As it relates to the words following. I shall here open it in its own compass, and only explain the meaning of this manner of speaking.

Folia prepulsum concutit, secundum vulgare dictum, qui afflicto afflictionem addit. Drus.

Both parts of the verse are proverbial, and are nearly allied in sense to that proverbial speech used by the Prophet (Isa. 42. 3.) repeated by Christ (Mat. 13. 20.) He will not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoaking flax. To break the bruised reed, and to quench the smoaking flax, is as much as to break a leaf driven to and fro, and to pursue the dry stubble. So that both these similitudes express such as are weak and unable to resist, or the adding of affliction to those who are already over-burdened with affliction. That for the general.

Wilt thou break.] The word which we translate, to break, signifies to break terribly, or to beat a thing to powder: to break with power, or to shew much power in breaking. Sanctifie the Lord in your hearts, and let him be your dread. He is to be dreaded who can break all power, and whose power none can break (Luk. 12. 4.) Fear him which after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell; yea, I say unto you, fear him. The mighty man is expressed by this word, because men of might are able to break opposers. But wilt thou mightily break that which hath no might? What's that?

עֲרָצִים Potentes dicti qui potentia sua aliis sunt formidabiles. Merc.

A leaf driven to and fro?] Wilt thou put out thy power against him that is but weakness? A leaf upon the tree is a weak thing, but a leaf shaken off the tree, driven to and fro upon the ground, is contemptible: Wilt thou break a leaf? and,

Verè eadē sententia, nisi fortè stipula aliquid ignobilius & inutilius significat.

Wilt thou pursue the dry stubble?] To break a leaf, and to pursue the dry stubble, are one thing. And as there he speaks not barely of a leaf, but of a leaf driven to and fro; so here he compares himself, not only to stubble, but to dry stubble. Stubble will consume quickly, but dry stubble is at once flame and ashes. Such a poor thing, such a nothing am I; and wilt thou strive with me? While he saith, wilt thou do this? he intimates that 'tis not Gods manner to do this.

Hence Observe, First, God useth not to afflict those that are afflicted, or to act his strength upon those who have no strength.

The day of the Lord (saith the Prophet, Isa. 2. 12.) shall be upon every one that is proud and lofty, and upon every one that is lifted up, and he shall be brought low, upon the Cedars of Lebanon, and upon the Oaks of Bashan, and upon all the mountains, and upon the hills that are lifted up. God doth not use to deal with the leaves of the Oak and Cedar, but with the body and roots of the Oak and Cedar: his quarrel is not with the stubble which grows upon the hills and mountains, but with the hills and mountains themselves. He loves not to humble the humbled, but the proud; nor to bring down those that are low, but the lofty. 'Tis true the meanest sinner shall not escape his judgement, but he chiefly desires to be doing with the mighty. Usually the Lord gives strength to the weak, he rarely opposeth the weak with his strength. That's the report which the same Prophet makes (Isa. 25. 4.) Thou Lord hast been a strength to the poor, a strength to the needy in their distress (thou dost not put out thy strength against the poor and needy in their distress) Thou art a refuge from the storm, a shadow from the heat (therefore surely thou usest not to storm those that are in the storm, or kindle a fire upon those that are in the heat). 'Tis the Lords manner to bind up the broken, not to break the broken; to heal the wounded, to comfort the mourners, to raise up them that are cast down; he useth not to smite the wounded, to grieve the mourners, or to cast them lower, who are already cast down. 'Tis the way of God to weaken the strong, and to strengthen those that are weak. Will he break a leaf? he will not.

Non est cōveniens ut aliquis fortissimus ostenderet suā potētiā in re debilissima. Aquin. Itane velis te fortē præbere conterendo foliū quod vento rapitur? Pin. Cōtra foliū cui avellendo satis est tenuissimus spiritus, insurgere jubes vehemētissimum ventum? --An gloria magna est, Insidias homini supposuisse Deū? Tibul.

Secondly, Job speaks it as a thing unbecoming, and below the great, the mighty God, to contend with the weak.

Hence Observe, It is no honour to the strong to overcome the weak.

Is it an honour to the eagle to catch a fly, or for a lion to kill a mouse? Thus David bespeaks Saul (1 Sam. 24. 14.) After whom is the King of Israel come out? after a dead dog or after a flea? Am I match for thee? Go rather and lead thy army against the Philistims, engage with thy equals, if thou wouldest get honour. To see a strong man fight with a child, or conquer a woman, is it any honour to the man? The Poet of old said, Is it a glory to God to lay snares for man? God is so much above man, that he cannot honour himself in opposing man. The strongest men, compared with God, are so weak, that when he would get himself honour in opposing them, he usually gives them more strength, that so his strength may be somewhat glorified in overcoming them. God sets the creature on high, that his highness may appear in pulling them down. Strength subduing the strong, and wisdom befooling the wise, get a name in the world. Thus he saith of Pharaoh, Even for this same cause have I raised thee up, that I might shew my power in thee, and that my Name may be declared in all the world, (Rom. 9. 17.) Job gave us a particular of Gods powerful acts, (chap. 12.) and he shews all along that God acted his power upon men of greatest power, He looseth the bond of Kings, and girdeth their loins with a girdle; He leadeth Princes away spoiled, and overthroweth the mighty: he had not to do with underlings; Kings, Princes and Councellours, the combined strength of whole kingdoms and nations, are no match for God, but these carry the fairest appearance of a match, and therefore he delights to deal with them. He suffers Babylon to arrive at a great height, to be founded upon seven hills, to be counselled by seven heads, to be defended by ten horns: Now when Babylon sits upon seven hils, and becomes a beast having seven heads and ten horns, that is, abundance of wisdom and policy, store of power and outward force, even the civil power of ten kingdoms to back her, here is wisdom and strength for the wise and strong God to glorifie himself upon; and therefore when Babylon falls, the Name of God is cried up, (Rev. 19. 1.) After these things (that is, after the tragical downful of Babylon) I heard a great voice of much people in heaven, saying, Alleluia, salvation, and honour, and glory, and power unto the Lord our God. God needs not break a leaf or pursue the stubble to shew his power, for the tallest and best rooted tree is before him, but as a leaf, and the hardest metals but as the dry stubble. The vision in Daniel tells us (chap. 2. 35.) that, not only the clay, but the iron, the brass, the silver and the gold (that is, the mightiest Monarchs and Monarchies of the earth) were broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floors, and the wind carried them away. And when at any time God breaks those who are (comparatively to other men) but as a leaf driven to and fro, or pursues those who are but as dry stubble, he doth it not to get himself honour in the acting of his breaking and pursuing power, but of his preserving and saving power; for he preserves his whom he thus breaks, and saves his whom he thus pursues. Yea, the very reason why he breaks them is, that he may preserve them, and he pursues them upon design to save them.

I may

I may add further, that God breaks the leaf, not to shew his power, as to shew what power the leaf hath received from him: The strength of a believer is never more seen then when he endures breaking. God punishes the wicked to shew his power, but he afflicts the godly to shew their power; That power I mean, which he hath given them, not only to do, but to suffer, whether for him or from him. It were indeed no honour for God to try his strength upon us; but it is a great honour for us when God at once gives and tries our strength. To see a leaf whole in the very breaking, and flourish in the withering, to see dry stubble endure the flame (and like the bush in the book of Exodus) to burn and not to consume, this gives witness to all the world how strong weak man is by the power of God, Being strengthened with all might according to his glorious power, unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness, Col. 1. 11. As God never indeed breaks the bruised reed, nor quencheth the smoaking flax, so he would never assay to break the bruised-reed, but to shew that it will not break; nor would he assay to quench the smoaking flax, but to shew that it will not quench or go out, till he send forth judgement unto victory: as if he had said, the bruised-reed shall not break till it be made strong, and the smoaking flax shall not be quenched till it be a perfect flame, that is, it shall never be broken, it shall never be quenched. Judgement brought to victory, is holiness, or the principle of grace within us, triumphing over all temptations without us, and all corruptions within us, by the power of Jesus Christ.

Aptissima similitudine utitur Jobus ad hominis imbecilitatē notandā. Pin.

Again, A leaf or dry stubble are the emblems, not only of that sort of men who are accidentally weak, but of all men in regard of their natural weakness. Thus the strongest men are but stubble: And some conceive Job speaking here of himself, not only as he was a man in affliction, whom the tempest of Gods wrath had shaken as a leaf, and the heat of troubles had parched into dry stubble, but he speaks of himself as a man; and what he speaks of himself is applycable to mankind. Man at his best estate is altogether vanity, Psal. 39. He is compared indeed sometimes to a flower in the field, which hath sap and moisture, greenness and verdure in it, yet he is of so short continuance, that even this green flower is but dry stubble: He hath a spring wherein he buddeth, and a summer wherein he is green; but his Autumn and his winter, wherein he fadeth, and his fruit falleth off, come so fast upon him, that we may call his whole life a winter, and all his dayes the fall of the leaf. A godly man in reference to his spiritual estate, is like unto a tree, whose leaf shall not wither, (Psal. 1. 3.) but in reference to his temporal estate, he is likea withering leaf: So the Prophet complains, Isa. 64. 6. We all do fade as a leaf, and our iniquities like the wind have taken us away.

Dū se Jobus folijs & stipulā appellat, sibi accessum præparat ad divinā misericordiā quæ eo se facilius inflectit, ubi majorē esse videt miseriā. Sanct.

Lastly Note this, The Lord is moved to pity, when we mind him of our frailty.

Non fuit hæc Jobi mens ut quicquā voluit de Dei gloria detrahere, sed ut cōmemoratione tenuitatis suæ & sūmæ Dei potentiæ illū ad misericordiam flecteret. Merl.

The intendment of Job was not to charge God with severity, but to move him to mercy. Our strongest argument to prevail with God, is to shew him our weakness: To confess our natural weakness, moves him much; to confess our spiritual weakness, moves him much more. If a Pharisee come and tell him a long story of his righteousness, the Lord abhors it; but if a poor publican look upon himself as unworthy to look up to heaven, this stirs, not only compassion, but acceptation; He went home justified rather then the other. If you would prevail with God, hold forth your soars, your sicknesses, your diseases, your distempers, your nothingness; say, you are but smoaking flax, and bruse reeds, that you are but leaves driven to and fro, and as the dried stubble. There is yet a further sense to be given of these words as they stand in connection with the following verse, to which I pass.

VERS. 26, 27, 28.

For thou writest bitter things against me, and makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth.

Thou puttest my feet also in the stocks, and lookest narrowly unto all my paths; thou settest a print upon the heels of my feet.

And he, as a rotten thing consumeth, as a garment that is moth-eaten.

AT the four and twentieth verse, Job was sadly inquisitive, Wherefore hidest thou thy face? &c. here he makes as sad a narrative. David (Psal. 66. 16.) invites all that fear God, Come and I will declare what he hath done for my soul. Job seems to invite attention from all, while he declares what God had done against his soul, Thou writest bitter things against me, &c. The whole relation is carried on in a continued metaphor, alluding to a judiciary proceeding, as if himself were a guilty malefactor, and God the Supream Judge, First, Aggravating his faults and pronouncing sentence upon him, vers. 26. Thou writest bitter things, &c. Secondly, Executing the sentence, vers. 27. Thou puttest my feet also in the stocks. In the close of all, Job declares the effect which that sentence pronounced and executed, wrought upon him, (vers. 28.) He, as a rotten thing consumeth, as a garment that is moth-eaten.

Thou writest bitter things against me.

God hath a double book, and both in a figure. He hath a book of his resolved decrees, and a book of his acted providences. This latter (the book of his providences) is but a transcript or a copy of the former. Those huge Original volumes of love and blessings which God hath laid up in his heart for his own people, those also of wrath and judgement which he hath laid up there against his enemies from all eternity, these volumes (I say) of love or wrath, are in writing out every day, by the hand and pen of providence, in the ordering of all those affairs which concern both persons and nations. Job is to be understood of this latter book, the book of providence, in which God writ bitter things against him, though those bitter things compared and laid together, with the comfortable issues in the book of Gods decrees, were indeed, if not sweet and pleasant, yet very wholesome and profitable.

Scribere forense videtur & pertinet ad firmum & irrevocabile judicis decretū. Translatio ducta est a regibus sententiam scriptām mandantibus. Chrys.

Further, This writing of bitter things, is also conceived to be an allusion to Judges, who command the sentence against offenders to be written. That which is written, is not only recorded but established. What I have written, I have written, saith Pilate; as if he had said, I may sometime recal a transient word, but what I have written, and is under my hand, shall stand. Any writing hath a firmness in it, especially laws, which tell men what they must doe, and judgments which tell them what they must receive or suffer: So the people of God are said to execute the judgment that is written upon the Kings and Princes who oppose the kingdom of Christ (Psal. 149. 8, 9.) To bind their Kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron, to execute upon them the judgment written. That is, written in the decrees of God, and written by the decrees of men. Thus they spake in the book of Daniel. Now, O King, establish the decree, and sign the writing that it may not be changed, Dan. 6. 8. And when the Lord would shew Belshazzar the certainty of his approaching ruine (Dan. 5. 24.) he presented to him upon the plaister of the wall of his palace, the fingers of a mans hand, which wrote over against the candlestick, and this writing was written, Mene, Mene, Tekel &c. A bitter thing was written against that Prince in the midst of his delicious banquetings. Thou art weighed and found too light, Thy kingdom is divided, &c. And as in all civil nations, the sentence of judgment is written; so among the Grecians, to write was as much as to accuse and impeach: why not also among the Jews? Jobs wish seems to imply it (chap. 31. 35.) O that my adversary had written a book against me, that is, a book of accusation, which in the civil law is called a Libell, and the act of bringing in an accusation, Libelling. It is the way of our law to bring in writings of inditement, or of charge against offenders, as well as to write the sentence or judgment given upon it. Thus (Jer. 32. 30.) Write this man childless (saith the Lord) a man that shall not prosper in his days. As if he had said, the decree is gone out against him, he shall not escape.

Græci dicunt γεγραφέναι τινὰ, quum judex reo latā sententiā perscribit & γέγραφθαι est accusare. Merc.

Thou writest bitter things.] The Laws of Draco are said to be written in blood: and this Decree of God against Job was (as he conceived) written with gall and wormwood. Thou writest bitter things against me.

I find some variety of opinion about these bitter things.

And

And there are divers ingredients to make up these pills.

First, Some expound these bitter things of sin; Thou writest or settest down my sins. Thou keepest an account of all my weaknesses and transgressions. There are two who write our sins. First, God books our sins; that is, he knows the sins we commit as exactly, as if they were written down before him in a book. The formality of writing is infinitely below God, but the effect of writing, which is the evidencing of what is done or spoken, is always before him. Secondly, Conscience books our sins; Job intends the writing of God, Thou writest bitter things, which some aggravate; as if Job did secretly tax God with severity; and had said thus: I know thou keepest a book, thou writest diaries and annals, the whole history of my life: but thou settest down little of my good works, or of what is praise-worthy; thou takest little notice of any thing that might render me acceptable to thy self, or commend me to the acceptation of others: only my sins and failings, which are a bitterness to me, those thou settest down, and keepest a perfect account of. But Job was far from such reflexions upon God, yet we may give a safe sence of the whole, though we interpret these bitter things by sin: There be two reasons why sins are called bitter things.

First, Because they provoke God to anger, even to bitter anger, they imbitter the Spirit of God against us (Hos. 12. 14.) Ephraim provoked him to anger most bitterly.

Secondly, Because sin procures us evil and bitter things. Sin is bitter in the effects of it, as well as base in the nature of it.

Hence Observe, How sweet soever sin is in the acting, it will be bitterness in the end.

There is a bitterness in the best of sin. One of these two things do always follow sin, Repentance or punishment. Repentance is the best we can expect when we have sinned; and they who do not repent, shall find punishment whether they expect it or no. Now, there is a bitterness in Repentance; Repentance is no pleasant portion. Though the Saints have a holy delight in repentance, yet (take it in it self) repentance is no delightful work, and therefore it is often expresst by breaking the heart, and afflicting the soul: The repentance of the Jews is so described, (Zech. 12.10.) They shall look upon me whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for me as one that mourneth for his only son, and shall be in bitterness for him: In bitterness and in repentance at the same time. So that let the best come of sin which can come, that we repent and are humbled for it, and repent savingly, yet bitter sorrows, bitter tears, and bitter mournings are the issues of it. I believe Peter did not sin very sweetly, when he denied his Master, but I am sure after he had done it, he wept bitterly, (Matth. 26. 75.) But if the sin be not repented of, then comes the bitterness of punishment. Possibly a sin we repent of, may receive bitter chastenings: God may correct us medicinally, for the sins over which we have mourned penitently; but if the sin be not repented of, then he punisheth for the satisfaction of his own righteous justice, as well as for the correction of our unrighteousness; and that's a bitter thing indeed. Thus sin is a bitter thing, as the effects of it are bitter: It is a bitter thing also, as the root of it is bitter: So much that caution of Moses to Israel imports (Deut. 29. 18) Lest there should be among you a root that beareth gall and wormwood. In the soil of mans heart there is such a root: Our natures bear nothing but gall and wormood; sinful actions sprout and shoot forth from our sinful corruptions. Yet this place of Moses is to be understood, not so much of that general corruption which is in our hearts; for if so, then he needed not to say, Lest there should be among you a root which beareth gall and wormwood. For every man in the world, regenerate or unregenerate, hath such a root in him: But he means it (as the Text hath it) of some apostatizing or backsliding person that should solicite others to sin; saying, Come, let us go, and serve other gods; he meant it of those whose hearts were hardened and heightened in sin, whose original corruption was drawn out not only to do wickedly themselves, but to provoke their brethren unto wickedness; these he calleth emphatically a root which beareth gall and wormwood. For look what a mans own corruption or original sin is to him, the same is another corrupt and sinful person to him; namely, an inticer unto sin. So the Author to the Hebrews expounds Moses (Heb. 12. 15.) while he useth the same phrase, or rather borrows it of Moses, Lest any root of bitterness springing up, trouble you, and thereby many be defiled: That is, lest some scandalous persons not only trouble the peace of the whole Church, but also vitiate the purity of some particular members of the Church, by the contagion of their evil example: Now, though these Scriptures do rather call sinful persons, then the sin in a person, a root of bitterness, yet those persons are therefore called so, because of their sin; and their sin is a root, which as it defiles others, so it destroyes themselves. When the Apostle Peter saw he was deceived in Simon Magus, he saith, Now I perceive that thou art in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity. In the gall of bitterness (Acts 8. 23.) that is, in a state of sin and impenitency, which will at last bring forth the bitterness of punishment. In that sence also the Prophet threatens, Isa. 24. 9. They shall not drink wine with a song, strong drink shall be bitter to them that drink it; that is, it shall be turned into bitterness: We have a common saying amongst us, Sweet meat hath sowr sauce: So here, strong drink, which goes down merrily, shall be turned into bitterness, they shall not drink it with a song. Voluptuous men mingle their drink with singing; but these sorrowful men should mingle their drink with weeping; this would make it bitter to those that drank it. Solomon describing the harlot (Prov. 5. 4.) with the contentments which she offers, concludes, Her end is bitter as wormwood; that is, the end which she brings others to. That's her end in which she causeth others to end, as well as that wherein she ends her self: Her end both wayes is the same, bitter as wormwood. The Prophet Jeremy shuts up his admonition (chap. 2. 19.) with, Know therefore and see, that it is an evil thing and bitter, that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God, &c. Sin is like that book (Rev. 10. 9.) Sweet in the mouth, but bitter in the belly. Or, as Abner said to Joab, (2 Sam. 2. 26.) Shall the sword devour for ever? Knowest thou not that it will be bitterness in the latter end? Yea, we may call every sin a bitter thing, not only in reference to the future effects of it, but in reference to the present taste of it. Sin is often bitter, not only in the belly, but in the mouth: It is bitterness not only in the end, but in the beginning, yea, the very sweetness which is in sin, promotes the bitterness of it: for as in nature, sweet meats liberally fed upon, breed choler, and beget bitterness in the stomack; so these sweet morsels of sin, upon which the soul feeds, cause bitter tastes, and sowr humours, disaffecting both soul and body, and troubling the whole man.

Secondly, Bitter things are the displeasure of God, take it abstractedly from the punishments which usually are sent out after it. Thou writest bitter things against me; that is, thou art angry with me. A man of a bitter spirit, and an angry man are the same. (Dan. 8. 7.) In the vision of the He-goat and the Ram, it is said, That the He-goat came close unto the Ram, and he was moved with choler against him; so we translate it: It is the same word in the Chaldee, which we have here in the Hebrew: He was moved with bitterness; that is, he was very angry. So (Hab. 1. 6.) the Chaldeans are described to be a bitter and an hasty Nation; that is, an angry Nation. Anger is bitter both to those who are angry, and to those with whom we are angry. Again (Prov. 17. 11.) An evil man seeketh only rebellion; it is this word, He seeketh only bitterness, which we translate rebellion; because they who indeed rebel are full of wrath, rage, and bitterness. The word is used in the same sence upon the surprise of David's Carriages by the Amalekites at Ziklag; 'tis said, The soul of all the people was grieved, or bitter (1 Sam. 30. 6.) That grief was properly anger, as we may collect by the effect of it; for they spake of stoning him; stoning is an high act of angry revenge. The learned Physitians tell us, that bitter things are naturally very hot; anger and displeasure are the heat of a mans spirit; Anger is the boyling of the blood about the heart, as Philosophers teach. So that bitterness being caused by heat, we may well express bitterness by anger, which hath so much from heat. Hence cursing (which is an act of anger) and bitterness are put together (Rom. 3. 14.) as also bitterness with wrath. Eph. 4. 31. Thus here, Thou writest bitter things, or bitterness against me, is, thou writest thy self angry and displeased with him. And so the words [against me] me] have an accent, a weight in them: As if he had said Thou seemest to vary the course of thy dealings towards me, both in reference to former times, and in reference to other persons: thou wast not wont to be thus bitter against me, and towards others, thou art sweet and gentle; (Isa. 54. 7.) In a little wrath I hid my face from thee, for a moment; but with everlasting kindness I will have mercy on thee; that is, the experience which thy people have had of thee, and such have been my experiences: but now thou seemest to run another course, Thou writest bitter things against me.

Taking bitterness for anger, I might Observe,

That God sometimes appears very angry with those whom he entirely loveth.

He seems to be all gall, when he is nothing but honey; to burn with wrath, when an everlasting flame of love is kindled in his breast. I have lately insisted on this point, therefore I forbear.

Again Observe, The anger of God is very terrible, it is a bitter thing.

There is no dallying with Divine displeasure.

Analogia sumi videtur ex lethalibus quibusdam venenis, quæ cum ignea & calidissima sunt, amarissima etiam sunt. Fel terræ. Pined.

Thirdly, Others restrain these bitter things to death. Thou writest bitter things against me; that is, a decree of death. Death is a bitter thing: Bitterness and death are joyned in Scripture, (2 Kings 4. 40.) The Prophets said, Death was in the pot, when they had put wild gourds or bitter herbs into the pot: Wild gourds are very bitter, so bitter, that the Persians called them, The gall of the earth; death was in the pot when such bitter herbs were there: So Moses speaks (Deut. 32. 32.) Their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter, their wine is the poyson of Dragons; that is, their grapes, their clusters, their wine, all their designs and actions are all deadly; deadly to themselves chiefly; but deadly also unto others (Prov. 31. 6.) Give wine unto those that be of heavy hearts; so we read it, give wine unto those that be of bitter hearts: so saith the Original: And it it is plain from the context, that he means it of persons ready to dye, or to be put to a violent death. The borders of death are bitter, much more death it self; yea, to some the borders or approaches of death are more bitter then death it self. When Agag was spared by Saul, he doubted not of quarter at the hands of Samuel, and therefore comes out delicately (both in his gate and garb, 1 Sam. 15. 32.) and saith, Surely the bitterness of death is past; that is, the fear of death is past; surely if Saul a Souldier saved me alive in the heat of the battel, Samuel a Prophet will not kill me in cold blood. In this sence Hezekiah complains (Isa. 38. 17.) For peace I had (or on my peace came) great bitterness; that is, the fear of death, as the next words explain, while he saith, But thou hast in love to my soul delivered it from the pit of corruption. Job had the sentence of death in himself, and he thought God had written that sentence too. Thou writest bitter things against me.

Amaritudo est quicquid potest vitam reddere molestam. Inter sapores amaritudo est inimicissima naturæ & palato. Hinc amaritudo dicitur de re quacunque tristi, sc. amara anima, amarus fletus, amaræ lachrymæ. Pined. Κατήγεσις, ἐμὲ κατὰ Sept. Malim a verba intelligi suppicia. Merc.

But I conceive [bitter things] are here intended in a larger sence, being put not only for the evil of death, but for all the evils of this life, for whatsoever renders the life of man bitter and grievous. For as bitterness among all tastes is most unpleasant to the palate: so also are afflictions both to the mind and outward man. The seventy agree in this sence so fully, that in stead of bitter things they translate, Thou writest evil things against me. It is frequent in Scripture to call any afflicting evil a bitter thing. (Ruth. 1. 20.) Naomi changeth her name to Marah, when she was full of trouble: Call me not Naomi, that is beautiful; but call me Marah, that is bitter, for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me, I went out full, and the Lord hath brought me home again empty. She had lost all, and was in great affliction, therefore she takes a name sutable to her estate, Call me Marah. We read of the waters of Marah, that is, bitterness (Exod. 16. 23.) All the waters of affliction may be called Marah, only the Lord shews his people a tree (as there he did Moses) which being cast into them makes them sweet. Afflictions in themselves are not joyous but grievous, Heb. 12. 11. How grievous or bitter afflictions are to the flesh, hath been heretofore insisted on, therefore I pass it here. Thou writest bitter things against me.

And makest me to possess the sins of my youth.

The Hebrew word which we translate to possess, signifies also to dispossess or disinherit, and by consequent to consume and destroy: so some translate it: whereas we say, Thou makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth; they say, Thou dispossessest me by the iniquities of my youth; or as the Vulgar, Thou dost consume me by the sins of my youth; thou makest me poor and naked, thou strippest me of all my comforts by reason of the transgressions of my youth. And so thou dispossessest me, is the same with our rendring, Thou makest me to possess

The sins of my youth.] What are those?

First, Some expound these words [of my youth] not of Job's youth personally taken, but of his youth relationally taken; that is, of his Children. So, Thou makest me to possess the sins of my youth, is, thou makest me to possess the sins of my youths, or of my young ones, who sinned against thee; I seem now to be punished for them, and to inherit my Childrens transgressions. So did Eli, God reckoned with him for his childrens sins: Eli possest the sins of his youth, of his relational youth, of his sons whom he did not restrain (as he had power to do) when they were not only vitious, but scandalous. Sin is an inheritance which ascends as well as descends: As many children possess or are punished for the sins of their old age, that is, of their fathers (they imitating their fathers sins) so many fathers possess or are punished for the sins of their youth, that is, of their children, they having not sufficiently reproved their Childrens sins: While Parents neglect their duty to their Children, they feel smart for their Children; and the Father of spirits layes those rods upon their backs, which their foolish indulgence would not suffer them to lay upon the backs of the Children of their flesh. But I pass this interpretation, as over-reaching the scope of this Text, though it contains a general truth.

Secondly, Others interpret these words as a proof of Job's eminent and exemplary piety and holiness, all the time of his elder and more confirmed years: As if God could find little or nothing to charge him with as sinful, after he came to be a man, and was master of himself. 'Tis said by the reporter of Cardinal Bellarmine in his life and death, that when the Priest (according to the Romish custom) came to absolve him, he could not remember any particular sin to confess, till he went back in his thoughts as far as his youth. If it were so, I must say, that how great a Scholar soever this Cardinal was in books, he was but a mean Scholar in his own heart and life, in which the best Christians see sin enough to confess and bewail in their best times; yea, the better any one is, the more he sees his own sinfulness. The oldest and sincerest of Saints in this life, needs not go a day back, much less back to the beginning of his knowing dayes, his youth, to find matter of confession, seeing he sins every day, yea, every hour. Yet thus they report of Bellarmine to advance his piety, that, if he had not confest the sins of his youth, he could not tell what to confess. In this sence, the present exposition makes Job speak to God, Thou makest me to possess the sins of my youth, as if all the other sections and parts of his life had been unblameable. But this savours not the spirit of Job, who, as he was very confident of the sincerity of his heart, so he was well acquainted with the sinfulness of his nature, and saw himself not only a sinner, but much sin, all his life over.

Quidam ex hoc loco colligunt eximiam viri sanctissimi sanctitatem, qui in ætate jam confirmata & matura nihil sibi conscivit. Sanct.

Thirdly, Thou makest me to possess the sins of my youth, is, Thou makest me possess or remember all my sins: Job had the whole course and tenour of his life in view. Old age and youth are the two extreams of mans knowing time upon the earth: We can hardly remember what we were, or what we did before the days of our youth; though before that we are evil, and do evil. Man is born in sin; and he sins almost as soon as he is born; but those sins fall not under our own observation. Austin said of himself, I know not the sins I committed in my infancy, yet I know that then I sinned; which he proves; because he had observed anger and envy in sucking Children. Job goes not back to the sins of his infancy and childhood, which others might remember, but he goes as far as himself could remember, even to the sins of his youth: These he possessed, or the thought of these possessed him. That possesses a man which his mind runs much upon. God is therefore said to make him possess the sins of his youth, because the dealings of God with him caused him to recollect and read over all his sins, especially the sins of youth.

Fourthly, To possess the sins of youth, is, To feel sorrow or pain for the sins of our youth. We may be said to possess the sins of our youth two wayes: First, When we feel the smart of them: Secondly, When we are affected with the filthiness of them in our riper years. Some old men possess the sins of their youth another way, namely, by delight: For as most delight in the act of sin, and not a few are delighted in the hopes of sin, a sin to be committed pleases them with a promise of future pleasure, To morrow shall be as this day (said those Epicures, Isa. 56. 6.) and much more abundant. They tasted the sweet of sin before they came at it. So there are some who take delight in the sins that are past: They that are old in sin can talk merrily of, and contemplate sweetly upon the sins and vanities of their youth; and in this they do not only possess the sins of their youth, but react the sins of their youth: For so often as a man remembers a sin which he hath committed with content, he commits it again. Holy Job did not possess the sins of his youth thus; he reflected upon them to mourn over them, and repent afresh for them, not to make merry with them, he chewed them over again in his thoughts, not as sweet morsels, but as gall and wormwood. Thus he was made to possess the sins of his youth.

Fifthly, The sins of youth are possessed, When the guilt of them flies in our faces, and our tears that they are not pardoned return upon our spirits: In this sence also (possibly) God made Job possess the sins of his youth. He was as much (or more) exercised with inward terrour, as with outward trouble; and when God hid his face from him, he saw his sins with open face.

Hence Observe, First, Youth is easily overtaken with sin.

Young men are least able to foresee the issues, to resist the temptations or keep out of the wayes of sin. The Prophet describes the childehood of Christ, our Emanuel, under the notion of childehood in general, which knows not how to refuse the evil and chuse the good (Isa. 7. 15.) Paul saith of himself (1 Cor. 13. 11.) When I was a childe, I spake as a childe, I understood as a childe, I thought as a childe: all in him, or done by him, was childish, when he was a child. 'Tis but a little better, (ordinarily) and sometimes it is much worse, in the next step of mans life, which is youth. He that is a youth, thinks as a youth, speaks as a youth, acts as a youth; all in him and done by him is youthful, that is, imperfect and immature, subject to miscarriages and mistakes. David puts and answers the question, (Psal. 119. 9.) Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? Young men are apt to go foul wayes, or to defile their wayes, and therefore need instruction how to cleanse them. And David prayes in special that God would pardon the errours which he found in that paragraph of his life, Psal. 25. 7. Remember not the sins of my youth! And besides the obnoxiousness of youth to sin in general, Youth hath its proper sins. The Apostle writing to Timothy, an holy man, yet a young man, exhorts him (2 Tim. 2. 22.) Fly youthful lusts, look to that; there are lusts which hang upon youth, & dog that season of life more then any other, there are certain sins to which we are peculiarly endangered in each division of our lives: As every calling, every place, every relation hath its special sins and temptations, so hath every age of life. Old men are passionate and covetous, men of middle age are revengeful and malicious, young men are precipitate and voluptuous. The Hebrews call a young man Nagnar, which springs from a root signifying to shake off or to be tossed to and fro, implying that such are unconstant to their own resolutions, and apt to shake off the gravest counsels. Hence the Apostle cautions not only Timothy but Titus, Let no man despise thy youth: as if he had said, thy youth lies open to contempt, because it lies so open to sin: keep to the rule, and thou wilt keep up thy reputation. Be thou watchful over thy self, lest thou be despised: For, I conceive, the charge is not so much given unto others (though that be a good sence) as unto Timothy himself. Paul puts it close upon him, Let no man despise thy youth, do thou so behave thy self, that none may have so much as a colour or pretence to despise thee. How he might do so, his next advise directs: Be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity (1 Tim. 4. 12.) Make it appear that thy wisdom and understanding have outstript thy years; make it appear that all gravity doth not wait upon the hoary head; make it appear that some, even in the bud and blossome of nature, are ripe in grace and mature in holiness; write after this copy, and all will either imitate thee or not condemn thee: Thus aged Paul lessons and cautions his young scholar Timothy, as knowing the disadvantages of youth, and the temptations it subjects us to.

Hence Observe, Secondly. That sins of youth may prove the sufferings of old age.

As young men who are very active and venturous receive bodily bruses and blows in the heat of youth, which they feel and groan under when they are old; so likewise the sins which young men venture upon and make light of, may press their souls and lie heavy upon their spirits in old age. Job speaks of some wicked old men (chap. 20. 11.) whose bones are full of the sins of their youth, which shall lie down with them in the dust. The sins of some old men are young; while their bodies grow weak, their lusts grow strong: such shall feel more smart of them in old age, then ever they found pleasure or delight in them in youth: Their bones shall be full of them, though their bellies are never full of them. It is a sad meeting when young sins and old bones meet together: And it is possible that even they who have truly repented of the sins of youth, may yet feel the grief of them in old age: For though such shall not be punished for the sins of youth, yet they are often chastened for them, and though God will not remember their sins against them, yet he may give them such mindings of them as will make their hearts to ake, and themselves cry out, What fruit have we of those youthful vanities, whereof we are now ashamed, and wherewith we are now pained? If our youth be not given as first-fruits unto God, he usually gives us (yet in mercy to his) bitter after-fruits. Give God the possession, yea the dominion of thy youth, least thou say (as Job) he makes me possess the sins of my youth.

Seek first the kingdom of God, seek it first in intention in the first place, and with the best of thy desires and endeavours: Seek it also first in time, let him have the flower of thy youthful services, least thou taste the fruit of youthful sins.

Hence Observe, Thirdly. That a godly man looks often upon present sufferings as the chastenings of his former sin.

God did not afflict Job for his former sins, for he told satan (chap. 2.) Thou movest me against him without cause, that is, without any such cause as thou hast pretended and suggested, I finde no affected unrighteousness in him: yet Job saith to God, Thou makest me to possess the sins of my youth. He look't back upon his life and saw such failings and corruptions as might call for the rod of this sharp and severe correction. Whatsoever Gods aim is in afflicting, it well becomes the best of Saints to have an eye upon their sins when God hath them under his afflictions. They who are freest from the fear of Gods revenging hand for sin, are readiest to remember their sin, when they feel his correcting hand.

Hence Observe, Fourthly. Sins formerly repented of and pardoned, may be presented to the soul as unpardoned.

Some conceive Job under that temptation, while he was under this affliction. The tenour of the covenant of grace is, I will forgive their iniquities and remember their sins no more: and when their sins come to be searched for, they shall not be found, because I have pardoned them. God never revoked any of his gracious pardons, nor doth he ever recharge pardoned sins: yet a godly man may remember his old sins with new fears that they are not pardoned. As it is one of satans devices to fill them with assurance of pardon, who are under guilt: so to fill those with doubtings that they are not pardoned, who are acquitted from guilt: while it is an easie thing with a soul to sin, it is also very easie for that soul to believe the pardon of sin: But when once Christ helps us to dispossess our souls of the power of sin: how doth Satan labour to possess our souls with the guilt of it?

Furiosus juvenibus animi habitus. Plat. l. 2 de Leg.

it? yea, God himself may for a time or for our tryal make us possess the guilt of it; and leave us to the questionings of passed pardon. In such a case the sins which have been pardoned are pardoned again, not that the first pardon is recalled, but cleared, and faith strengthned that we are pardoned. For though there are no degrees in pardoning grace it self (in sanctifying grace there are, that doth or should grow every day in us, and we encrease in it with the encrease of God) yet pardoning grace may have an encrease as to the person pardoned. All the sins of a believers youth are pardoned, yet he often wants evidence of their pardon: The grace of God knows no decay, but there are decays in our spirits and upon our faith about it, and those sins whose commanding strength is broken, may stand up in much condemning strength. Thou makest me to possess the sins of my youth.

Lastly Observe, That in times of affliction believers are apt to have misgiving thoughts about the pardon of sin.

Affliction carries with it a renovation of guilt, though it be no argument of guilt; As punishment is the daughter of guilt, so affliction is somewhat akin to punishment. Now because he who is but afflicted often thinks himself punished, and he that is punished ought to acknowledge himself guilty, hence it comes to pass that he who is but afflicted thinks himself under guilt, he is full of fears that his sins stand still upon his own score, and that God is reckoning with him upon that account. When the womans son was dead, she said to the Prophet, Art thou come unto me to call my sins to remembrance, and to slay my son, (1 Kings 17. 18.) Her sorrows brought her sins to remembrance, and then she feared that God contended with her for her sins. God maketh us to possess the sins of our youth, when in old age (as it follows) he puts our feet in the stocks.

Vers. 27. For thou puttest my feet also in the stocks, and lookest narrowly into all my paths, and settest a print upon the heels of my feet.

I shall add only a word of this and of the next verse, because both are but an aggravation of Jobs sufferings, about which he hath spoken so much before.

Me coerces istis malis quasi sontē compedibus vinctū. Jun.

For thou puttest my feet.] As if he had said, Thou proceedest with all severity against me as against a grand malefactor, thou layest me fast by the heels. It is usual to put offenders into prison or into the stocks. Some translate this word by shackles, some by stocks, some by prison: Job amplifies his misery under all these notions. His afflictions were to him as a prison, as stocks, as shackles. The Church expresseth her sufferings in this metaphorical language, He hath builded against me, and compassed me with gall and travel: he hath set me in dark places, as they that be dead of old: he hath hedged me about that I cannot get out, he hath made my chain heavy. Jerusalem was as a prisoner loaded with irons, bound in chains, and enclosed round about with thick and mighty walls. Such was Jobs condition, Thou puttest my feet in the stocks,

Lam. 3. 5, 6, 7.

Amplificatio est artissimæ custodiæ. Pined. Singulis his malis circūcludens me, tanquā armatis custodibus. Jun.

And lookest narrowly into all my paths.] This good man was not only a prisoner but a close prisoner; His paths were looked narrowly unto, his troubles like armed keepers went with him whithersoever he went: if at any time he was let out of the stocks, a watch was set upon him lest he should escape, or rather it was with him as with those prisoners who are narrowly watcht while they are in closest prisons. When Peter was in prison, the keepers watched at the door, and more then that, he slept between two souldiers bound with two chains, (Act. 12. 6.) Thus narrowly was Peter looked unto; And thus in allusion was Job looked unto: Am I a sea or a whale, that thou settest a watch over me? was Jobs question in the seventh chapter; His assertion here, Thou lookest narrowly into all my paths, seems to carry the same intendment; thither I refer the Reader for the further clearing of this.

ἐφύλαξας πᾶς τὰ ἔργα. Sept.

Yet others give the meaning thus, Thou observest all my actions, and then paths are taken metaphorically: so the seventy translate, Thou takest notice of all my works: Which reading bears a proportion to the proceedings of a Magistrate, who having attached an offendour, and laid him fast, looks and enquires into his life, and examines his particular offence, that so a charge or an inditement may be drawn up and brought in against him at his tryal. The next clause runs in the same strain.

Radices pedū sunt vel vestigia vel planta. Coc. Radices pedum vocat ipsos primores vel extremos pedes, qui in digitos quasi radicis partes dividūtur. Jun. Simplissimū puto signū tibi facis, i.e. annotas omnia vestigia mea. Merc. Ita me quacunq; incedā sollicite observas, ut ubicunq; pedē posui, tu quoq; vestigium figas. Bez. Vel ut sensus sit, se nervo & cippo adeo constringi & premi, ut vibices appareant. Lav. Vestigia iræ tuæ usq; ad extremos pedis articulos pertingunt, ut quum pes sontis totus urtur gravitate compedū. Jun.

And settest a print upon the heels of my feet.] Master Broughton translates from the letter of the Original, And thou leavest thy prints upon the roots of my feet. The roots of the feet are, say some, the soles, say others, the steps of the feet. And whereas we translate the heel, which is the hinder part of the foot, the word is translated also by the forepart of the foot, which is divided into toes, as the root of a tree divides it self; But though there be some variety about the particular signification of the word, yet the general sence is, That Job prosecutes the allegory of a prisoner.

First thus, Thou settest a print upon the heels of my feet, that is, Thou followest me as it were at the heels; Thou dost not only watch my paths, but even tellest my steps, if I do but set down my feet, thou printest upon the very same place, and so it falls in with the sence of the former clause.

Or Secondly, He in these words complaineth of his soreness by reason of this imprisonment. Thou settest a print upon the heels of my feet, the shackles and the chains which are upon me, leave their marks behind them in my flesh, my feet, the very soles and toes of my feet swell with my heavy fetters. Jobs condition was like that of the afflicted Jews in the Prophet (Isa. 1. 5.) The whole head was sick, and the whole heart was faint, from the sole of the foot even unto the head, there was no soundness in him, but wounds and bruises. There was a wound in the very soles of his feet, that is, he was all over wounded, or afflicted quite through. As Paul said I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus, so might Job, Paul had marks or prints of his suffering for God, Job of his sufferings under the hand of God.

I will not draw out any particular observations from these words, seeing they all tend (which hath been more then once observed already) to shew,

First, That God casts his outward dispensation towards his choicest servants into forms of greatest rigour and severity.

Secondly, That great afflictions often draw out great complaints from the choicest servants of God.

Thirdly, That the most patient man may sometimes let fall words of impatience under the hand of God.

Where faith is highest it is not alwayes at the same height, and where patience hath a perfect work, some of its works may be full of imperfection. But I pass these, and shall only note two things.

First, The several stairs or steps by which Jobs spirit ascended to the highest sence of his afflictions. Here is a sevenfold gradation, in this and the precedent verses. First, God hid his face. Secondly, He counted him as his enemy. Thirdly, He broke him like a leaf. Fourthly, He writ bitter things against him. Fifthly, He made him possess the sins of his youth. Sixthly, He puts him into prison. Seventhly, He watched him, lest he should escape, and followed him step by step. What could be added to these sorrows? might not Job say with the Church in the Lamentations, Was there ever sorrow like unto my sorrow? They that are greatest in holiness, may be greatest in sufferings.

Secondly Note, Job still keeps his eye and heart upon God in all his afflictions.

THOU hidest thy face. THOU countest me thine enemy. THOU pursuest me. THOU writest bitter things against me. THOU makest me possess the sins of my youth. THOU puttest me in the stocks, THOU settest a print upon the heels of my feet. He sees God in all, and fears not to make him the Author of all these evils: We honour God as much in acknowledging him to be the fountain of all the evils we suffer, as of the good things we enjoy.

The twenty eigth verse is joyned by some to the next chapter, as if that whole chapter were but an explication of this verse, or at least this verse the preface to that whole chapter.

Verse 28. And he as a rotten thing consumeth, as a garment that is moth-eaten.

And he.] Who is that? He changeth the person from the first to the third; he doth not say, I, but He, though he meaneth himself; such speaking is frequent in Scripture, and hath been noted before in this Book.

He as a rotten thing, &c.] As if he had said, I am not able to continue under these afflictions, or bear these pressures any longer. I faint, I fail, I decay, I dye. He asked the question what he was (Chap. 6. 12.) Is my strength the strength of stone? or is my flesh brass? Here he tells us what he and his strength, what he and his flesh are, Even as a rotten thing, as a garment that is moth-eaten.

We have here a double similitude, both implying his insufficiency to stand in the hands of God. First, Of a rotten thing. Secondly, Of a garment eaten with moths. I consume; and how? As a rotten thing. The Hebrew is concrete, I consume as rottenness; rottenness it self is consuming; and rottenness consumeth any thing it toucheth. Time will consume that which is sound; but that which is already rotten, how quickly doth it consume? How can that hold out against decay, which is a decay? I consume as a rotten thing.

And as a garment that is moth-eaten.] David compares man under affliction to a moth, as here Job to a moth-eaten garment. Psal. 39. 11. When thou with rebukes dost chasten man for iniquity, thou makest his beauty to consume away like a moth. Moths have so little substance in them, that they have scarce any subsistence. The least touch crusheth and moulders them into nothing. A Moth is as weak as weakness it self; yet it eats out the strength of the strongest garment. A moth-eaten garment is scarce a garment: The beauty of it is defaced, and the usefulness of it is departed. Mans best garments of honour and riches, are little better then a moth-eaten garment: (James 5. 1, 2.) Go to now ye rich men, weep and howl for the miseries that shall come upon you; your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth-eaten. Where the Apostle is conceived to invite rich men (from which they think themselves at greatest distance) to mourn over their miseries. First, Because they treasure up riches, of which they make no use, but let them corrupt; and because they provide Wardrobes of apparel, which they wear not, but the Moths eat them up. Secondly, Because they lay out their strength and time in gathering a perishing portion, riches which are corruptible, and garments which are meat for Moths. As if he had said, how vain are you who labour for that which is more then corruptible? Your riches are actually corrupted, and your garments, how careful soever you are to perfume and preserve them, are more then subject to Moths; the Moth actually eats them. Now (I say) if mans best garments are little better then a moth-eaten garment, what is a moth-eaten garment? And then what is that man (such a one Job accounted himself) who consumeth as a garment that is moth-eaten? Surely the spirit of this holy man could not go lower for a comparison, then the effects of Moths and rottenness.

By which self-abasement he seems to argue with God for compassion and sparing mercies: As if he had said, Could I bear these sorrows any longer, I would not so earnestly beg an end of them: But alas! if they do not end speedily, I must: My strength is gone, and I am but rottenness: Thou who teares me as a Lyon, by open and violent afflictions, dost also eat me as a moth by secret and silent consumptions.

I might here also draw out divers Observations about the frailty of man: As,

First, That man is but weakness and rottenness.

Secondly, That man cannot hold out against the hand of God.

Thirdly, That even some of Gods chastenings are destroyings and consumings to all the strength and lustre of the outward.

Fourthly, That a Believer in affliction is apt to mis-judge the issues of his own condition.

But because these points have occurred upon other Texts of like sence with this, therefore I only hint them, and shall shut up this whole Chapter, with this brief admonition from the conclusion of it. How should we labour to please God in walking uprightly with him, before whom we cannot stand when he is angry with us? How should we labour to live in his favour, by whose displeasure we are suddenly consumed? And if the chastenings of God consume those whom he loves, how will his judgments consume those whom he hates? When thou, Lord, with rebukes dost chasten man for iniquity, thou makest his beauty to consume, Psal. 39. 11. How then will his beauty consume, when God with severest revenges chastens man for iniquity? Our God is a consuming fire, he can consume us as a rotten thing, and as a garment that is moth-eaten; therefore let us (ask and) have grace, that we may serve him acceptably with reverence and godly fear.

CHAP. XIV. Vers. 1, 2.

Man that is born of a woman, is of few dayes, and full of trouble.

He cometh forth as a flower and is cut down: He fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not.

IN the last verse of the former Chapter (which some connect with this) Job shewed how poor and pitiful, how weak and miserable a thing man is under the afflicting hand of God, and he did it under the shadow of a two-fold similitude. First, Of a rotten thing. Secondly, Of a garment which is moth-eaten.

He prosecutes the same Argument in the first and second verses of this Chapter; From all, drawing down this expostulatory conclusion, vers. 3. And dost thou open thine eyes upon such an one? &c.

Verse 1. Man that is born of a woman, is of few dayes, and full of trouble.

Job doth not say, I who am born of a woman, am of few dayes; but Man that is born, &c. He speaks in the third person, rather then in the first, for two reasons, as I conceive.

First, To shew that those miseries which were fallen upon him might fall upon others; No temptation had taken hold of him, but such as was common to man.

Secondly, He speaks thus, the more to abase himself. The third person put for the first implyes contempt. He thinks himself scarce worth the naming, who doth not speak of himself in his own name. Man that is born of a woman, &c.

Tertia persona pro prima usurpatio contemptum denotat. Bold.

Man is here described two wayes: First, In his original or procreating cause, Woman. Secondly, In his state or condition, and that from a double adjunct: First, Of time, He is of few dayes: Secondly, Of affliction, Full of troubles: Both further illustrated by two similitudes: First, Of a flower: Secondly, Of a shadow: Of all which this is the sum or the result, He continueth not, vers. 2.

Man

Man that is born of a woman.] That is, Every man, or (as we say) every mothers child. Mr. Broughton adds an Epithete borrowed from the signification of the Hebrew word Adam, Earthly man born of a woman. The first woman was (in a sence) born of a man; but since all men are born of a woman: And as the first man received his proper name Adam (which is now become an Appellative or common to all men) from the matter out of which he was formed, earth, or red earth, Gen. 2. 7. So the first woman received her proper name (which is now become an Appellative or common to all women) from the matter out of which she was formed, the flesh and bone of man, Gen. 2. 23. And Adam said, this is now bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh, she shall be called woman, because she was taken out of man. And as in our language the woman hath but a syllable more in her name then the man, so also in the Hebrew, there it is, Ish, Ishah, with us, Man, Woman. The Rabbins have an observation, that in the words Ish and Ishah, the letters of the Name of God Jah are contained, which is (say they) an Argument or token of the gracious presence of God with Husband and Wife, while they walk in that relation according to the will of God; but if they depart from that, God departs from them, and taking the letters of his own Name from their names, there remains nothing but fire (so the words denuded of Gods Name signifie) between them both.

Mulier dicitur virago quia de viro sumpta.

אישׁ & אשׁה Continetur nomen Dei. י Quod est symbolum gratiosæ Dei præsentiæ si maritus & uxor juxta Dei præcepta vivant, si ab eis decedant & Deum recedere ab ipsis, ut utriusque nomen excluso יה maneat אש ignis Buxt.

But to the Text. Man is here spoken of as born of a woman, rather then as begotten by man, and that (possibly) for these three Reasons.

First, Because the formation and production of man is from the woman, in her the body of man is framed by the mighty power of God, and all the pieces of it put together; and in her man receives his life and quickening. Hence it was that Adam, who at first called his Wife Woman, because she was taken out of man, calls her afterwards Eve, because she was the mother of all living, (Gen. 3.20.) And upon this ground some Nations have made a Law, that all descents should be reckoned by the Mother, because the Mother gives the greatest contribution towards the birth and bringing forth of man.

Apud Lycios si quis percontetur, qua familia ortus? &c. A matribus genus suum repetere solebant, quod plurima substantia qua constamus materna sit. Plut. de Clar. Mulier. cap. 9.

Secondly, He speaks of man as born of a woman, thereby leading us to the original of mans sin. The woman was Satans instrument to ensnare the man: Sin began at the woman, though it was finished by the man. Adam charged his sin upon the woman sinfully, to excuse his sin, The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat, Gen. 3. 12. Paul charged the sin of man upon the woman holily, to humble woman for that sin, 1 Tim. 2. 14. Adam was not deceived (that is, he was not first deceived) but the woman being deceived, was in the transgression. While we remember, that we were born of a woman, by whom sin came into the world, we cannot but remember and be convinced, that we came sinners into the world.

Thirdly, He speaks of man born of a woman, to mind man of his weakness. Sin and weakness enter'd man at the same time; and the woman is not only a weak vessel, because of her transgression; but the weaker vessel, because of her constitution (1 Pet. 3. 7.) Man being born of a woman, the weaker vessel, must needs be a vessel of weakness. The Apostle saith, God sent forth his Son made of a woman (Gal. 4. 4.) Which imports, not only the mystery of Christs birth, that he was made of a woman (a pure Virgin) without the help of man; but also, the frailty of Christ in his birth, that he was born, into the world passible, mortal, and infirm, because born of a woman. Hence when men act weakly, or below men, they are in Scripture called, or compared to women (Jer. 51. 30.) The mighty men of Babylon have forborn to fight, they became as women; that is, weak and pusillanimous. So the Prophet Isaiah describes the degenerate Governours of Judah (Chap. 3. 12.) As for my people (saith the Lord) women rule over them; that is, men rule over them, whose spirits are effeminate, and whose courage rises no higher then that of women. Some of the superstitious Heathen, to advance the strength and abilities of their Goddess Wisdom, fancied, that she was born of a Father, without a Mother. And here I conceive the principal intendment of Job, in leaving out the mention of man, and ascribing the whole production of man to the woman, was to imply, or rather to prove how weak and frail a piece of flesh man is by nature.

Hanc de patre ferunt sine matris fœdere natam. Martianus in Palla. Hym.

As that which is impure cannot send out that which is clean; so neither can that which is weak produce that which is strong. As man breeds that in him which will consume him; so he is bred of that which shews he must consume. If it be asked how a garment frets when it is not worn, or how timber wasts when it is not used? We answer, the garment breeds a moth which frets it; and the timber a worm which eats it out. If it be also asked, How man decayes when no outward violence appears against him? We may answer, he breeds his own decay; himself gives life to a worm in his root, which smites his flourishing gourd to death: Thus man breeds his own consumption. But besides this, he is bred of that which doth consume, Man is born of a woman. And, as God decreed, for the punishment of her sin, That the woman should bring forth in sorrow (Gen. 3. 16.) so the woman brings forth a sorrowful man. Can we expect any thing but sorrowful from sorrowful? From frail but frail? Or from her who is of few dayes, and full of trouble, any thing but him who is such himself? So it follows in Job's description of man, where having given us the cause, he proceeds to the effects. Man that is born of a woman. Woman is the procreating cause of man, and from her man derives a double effect. First, He is of few dayes. Secondly, He is full of troubles.

Is of few dayes.] The letter of the Hebrew is, short, or cut short of dayes. Mr. Broughton renders, Short of life. So the Psalmist (Psal. 89.45.) The dayes of his youth hast thou shortened, or cut off. 'Tis said of Abraham (Gen. 25. 8.) that he died in a good old age, an old man, and full. The Hebrew goes no further, He died full. Full of what? Our Translators, to fill up the sence, add by way of explication, Full of years. Abraham had his belly full of living before he died, he had not an hungry desire after a day more in this life: He was both hungry and athirst for eternal life. He died full of years: but though Abraham was full of years, yet his life came also into Job's reckoning. Few of dayes.

The dayes of man are few, or short: First, Considered in themselves (Psal. 39. 5.) Behold thou hast made my dayes as an hand-breadth. That is not long, which is no longer then the breadth of an hand. The breadth of the hand is taken two wayes: First, In the largest extent, for a span, or the whole space between the top of the thumb, and the little finger stretched out. Secondly, In the lesser extent, for the breadth only of four fingers, which is the measure (as Interpreters conceive) which David takes of the dayes of man.

Secondly, The fewness or shortness of mans dayes, may be considered comparatively, and that two wayes. First, As man may be compared with man. Secondly, As man is compared with God.

We may collect the fewness of mans dayes now, by comparing him with man, under a twofold consideration. First, Of what number the dayes of man once were. Secondly, Of what number they shall be.

First, The dayes of man are few now compared, first, with what his dayes were before the flood; then many men lived, six, seven, eight, nine hundred, and some almost a thousand years, as Moses hath reported the genealogy, age and death of the Patriarchs from Adam unto Noah (Gen. 5.) Now, if any man attain fourscore, or a hundred years, he is wondrous old; and if any reach one hundred and forty or fifty, (as lately one of our Countrey men did) he is such a rarity, that he draws more eyes to behold his wrinckled withered face, then any can with their most youthful beauty. I read of one, who had been an Esquire for the Body to Charles the Great, Emperour of Germany, who is called in History John of Time; because he lived three hundred sixty and one years. Yet three hundred sixty one, is but a few to eight or nine hundred years: And besides, the life of that Age is not to be cast up by what years one man lived; but by what was the ordinary number of mans years in that age.

Johannes de Tempore Caroli M. Armiger, obiit annos 361. natus. Ranic. Temp.

But as mans dayes are few, compared with what he lived before the flood; so they are fewer compared, secondly, with the dayes which man might have lived if he had not fallen. The ſtate of innocency had in it a kind of immortality; it was not impoſſible for Adam to die before he fell; but it was poſſible for him not dye; this is now changed into a certainty, that we ſhall dye, according to that Law of Heaven (Heb. 9.27.) It is appointed unto all men once to dye. Now the dayes of man are truly called few, or cut ſhort, becauſe it is determined they ſhall end, and that ſhortly: And though the determined end of theſe dayes is uncertain to us; yet their end is certainly determined.

Now if the dayes of man are few, compared with what they once were, or might have been upon the earth; how few are they in compariſon of what they ſhall be when he ſhall be raiſed out of the earth? Then the dayes of mans life, whether in Heaven or Hell, in happineſs or in miſery, ſhall be as many as the dayes; or rather as long as the day of eternity.

Again, As the dayes of man are few, compared with what he once had and ſhall have; ſo they are feweſt of all, compared with the dayes of God; ſo few, that as his dayes cannot be counted becauſe they are ſo many; ſo ours can hardly be counted becauſe they are ſo few. David, who found out a dimenſion (a hand-breadth) for the dayes of man, conſidered abſolutely, or in themſelves, could find out no dimenſion little enough for the dayes of man compared with God (Pſal. 39.5.) Mine age (and his age may be the meaſure of every mans age, Mine age, ſaith he) is as nothing before him. All time is as nothing, compared with eternity; what a nothing then is the age of one man to eternity, which is ſcarce any thing to all time? Some things created and finite are ſo great above others, that they are nothing to them: What is the Ant to the Elephant, or the Shrimp to the Whale? What is the whole body of the Earth, to the body of the Heavens? Naturaliſts ſay, 'tis but a point. Now if one creature be ſo far exceeded by another creature, that it is ſcarce diſcernable; how indiſcernable are all creatures to the Creator, finite to Infinite? As one part of the earth is but a point to the whole, and the whole earth but a point to the Heavens; ſo one part of time is but a moment to all time; and all time is but a moment to eternity; eſpecially to the eternity of God: which is not only as ſome creatures (by his diſpenſation) ſhall have, an eternity forwards; but alſo as no creature is in a capability, or poſſibility to have, an eternity backwards; and yet in ſtrict ſence, there is neither forwards nor backwards; neither paſt nor to come in Gods eternity; His Being conſiſts in one eternal Now, or I am; and hath nothing to do with, I was, or I ſhall be: And therefore the age of man is nothing before him; for mans age, though it be as nothing, undivided, is yet divided, into paſt, preſent, and to come. Three nothings, which being added together, amount in the total ſum to this nothing of the age and dayes of man (as David ſpeaks) before God.

Hence Obſerve, Sin is the ſhortener of mans dayes.

Job leads us to this Obſervation, while he ſaith, Man that is born of a woman is of few dayes. Man born of a woman is ſinful man. This truth is ſo general, that it never received an exception in any one man born, after the ordinary way, of a woman. Chriſt was born of a woman; but he was conceived miraculouſly by the holy Ghoſt. Man might have been born of a woman, and yet have been of many dayes, if he had not been born in ſin. 'Tis the birth of ſin in man which is the ſeed of death: And as ſin makes the dayes of all men few in nature; ſo the ſins of ſome men makes theirs fewer then the dayes of nature. For, as though the dayes of a good man at the moſt are but few; yet becauſe of ſome ſpecial goodneſs they are often prolonged: So, though the dayes of a wicked man at the moſt are but few; yet, becauſe of ſome ſpecial wickedneſs they are often ſhortened. Solomon gives us both parts of this aſſertion in one verſe (Prov. 10.27.) The fear of the Lord prolongeth (or addeth to) dayes, but the years of the wicked ſhall be ſhortened. And as Solomon tells us poſitively, they ſhall be ſhortened, ſo David tells negatively, how much they ſhall be ſhortened (Pſal. 55.23.) Bloody and deceitful men ſhall not live out half their dayes: Poſſibly they ſhall not live out a quarter of their dayes; but he is peremptory that they ſhall not live out half their dayes. Thus, as every man, becauſe he is a ſinner, ſhall live but a few dayes; ſo ſome ſhall not live half thoſe few dayes, becauſe they are notorious ſinners. All men are of few dayes; ſome men are of fewer then a few. The ſin of nature ſhortens all mens lives into a few dayes, and ſins of practice ſhorten ſome mens lives into fewer then a few.

From Job's ſolemn Doctrine of mans ſhort life, or few dayes, we may draw out many leſſons of very ſerious admonition.

First, Seeing our dayes are few, let us live all our dayes: Some loſe many out of a few, and live not one of their few dayes. 'Tis poſſible to have a being (according to the account of man) many dayes, and to have lived none of them; or not to have lived at all. We live no more of our time then we ſpend well. A Heathen ſaid, He lived no day without a line; that is, he did ſomewhat remarkable every day. What a ſhame is it that a Chriſtian ſhould live a day without a line; do nothing in it worth the doing!

Secondly, Be perſwaded that your dayes are few. It is eaſie to ſay our dayes are few; but it is hard to believe it: Every Age hopes to ſee the next Age. The child hopes to be a youth, and the youth to be a man; the man hopes to be an old man; and he that is an old man, hath hopes to be very old; he that is very old hopes to live more then a few dayes yet; or that yet he ſhall not dye theſe many dayes. And becauſe every Age hath hopes to live that which is to come, it doth not live that which is preſent. We ſhould do more work, but that we hope for more dayes.

Thirdly, Seeing the time of this life is ſhort, and haſtens out of our hands, let us make haſte to lay hold upon eternal life. Our dayes here are few, ſuch as a Child may count; but dayes innumerable, ſuch as no man can count, or depend upon them. All our dayes are but few; and every man living hath lived a few dayes already; poſſibly thy few dayes paſt are all that thou ſhalt paſs. Say not of repentance, I will repent to morrow: Say not to Chriſt when he is tendered thee to day, come again to morrow. Boaſt not thy ſelf of to morrow (ſaith Solomon, Prov. 27. 1.) for thou knoweſt not what a day (even the day thou now haſt) may bring forth. Poſſibly this day may bring forth thy death (for the dayes of man are few) and then how ſhall to morrow bring forth thy repentance, or make thee another offer of a This-dayes refuſed Chriſt? Wilt thou boaſt of the births of to morrow, when as thou knoweſt not whether a morrow ſhall be brought forth to thee? Man (whoſoever thou art) waſt thou not born of a woman? If ſo, thy dayes are few, thy buſineſſes are many, and there is one thing neceſſary. We ſay of ſome men, that they do much in a little time: And truly how much ſoever any man hath to do, he hath but a little time to do it in. Few dayes ſure are but a little time; and all the time we have is but a few dayes. Beſides, Theſe few dayes are all the working-dayes that ever we ſhall have: Let this be a ſpur to diligence and to duty. Hear and obey the counſel of the Preacher (Eccleſ. 9.10.) Whatſoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wiſdom in the grave whither thou goeſt. In Heaven there is nothing but reſt; and in Hell, though there be no reſt, yet there is no labour. In Hell there is nothing but wages; and in Heaven there is nothing but reward; our whole work lyes in the few dayes which are on this ſide both.

Ab hoc momento pendet æternitas.

Fourthly, See in this truth, what falſe concluſions worldly men make unto themſelves, when with him in the twelfth of Luke, ver. 19, 20. they ſay to their ſouls, Souls, ye have good laid up for many years, take your eaſe, eat, drink, and be merry. How vainly do men reckon upon many years yet to come; when as their whole time paſt, preſent, and to come, can make up but a few dayes! The Apoſtle James rebukes thoſe upon this ground, who forelaid their buſineſs but one year; How much more are they rebukeable who forelay their pleaſures for many years? Chap. 4. 13, 14. Go to now, ye that ſay to day, or to morrow, we will go into ſuch a City, and continue there a year, and buy, and ſell, and get gain; whereas ye know not what ſhall be on the morrow: For what is your life? Is it not even a vapour, that appeareth for a litte time, (that's at moſt but a few dayes) and then vaniſheth away? So Paul pleads down a worldly ſpirit, (1 Cor. 7. 29, 30.) I ſay brethren, the time time is short; it remaineth, that they who have wives be as if they had none; and they that weep, as though they wept not; and they that rejoyce, as though they rejoyced not; and they that buy, as though they possessed not; and they that use this world, as not abusing it. We should shorten our joyes and our sorrows; we should take up or draw in our affections about worldly things, because our time in the world is short; and our dayes are continually drawing off from the world.

Fifthly, This should check our envy at the prosperity of wicked men. Their day (of account) is coming, and their dayes (of receit) are going (Psal. 73. 18, 19.) How are they brought to desolation in a moment, as a dream when one awaketh? so, O Lord, when thou awakest, thou shalt despise their image.

Sixthly, Let the righteous be patient in affliction; all their dayes are but few; and therefore their dayes of sorrow cannot be many. Yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry.

Lastly, Trust not in man; yea, cease from man whose breath is in his nostrils, and whose dayes (because they are few) must shortly cease. Place not the hopes of your life in him, who cannot (with warrant) hope for a long life, much less assure you of any comfort of your life: seeing as his own life is empty of dayes; so it is, as it follows in this Text.

Full of trouble.

Few dayes and many troubles make up the character of man. We use to say, Short and sweet; but here it is, Short and sowre; yea, short and bitter. As some speak much in a little; much matter in a little discourse; many matters in a few words: And as some do much with a little; much good with a little talent: So all men suffer much in a little; much trouble in a little time; many sorrows in a few dayes.

שבע repletus, satur, ad ventriculum & appetentiam refertur.

Full of trouble. The word which we translate Full, alludes to the filling of the stomach, and the satisfying of the appetite with meat. Trouble is hard fare, but there is plenty of it. Man usually hath his fill, and never knows the want of trouble. Ever since man brought forth sin, the earth brought forth trouble. Sin is the seed of trouble; and trouble is all the harvest we reap by sin.

רגז est conturbari, inquietari aliquo vehementi doloris effectu. Satur Tremore. Regia. Plenus iracundia. Pag.

The word which we render, trouble, contains in it more sorts of trouble then one. It notes, not only all kind of outward trouble, but inward trouble; vexing trouble, such as disturbs and unquiets the whole man. Some render it by trembling; so the word is used Hab. 3. 16. My belly trembled (or my bowels were moved) rottenness entred into my bones. Holy men are full of trembling at the holiness of God; and sinful men have reason to be full of trembling at their own sinfulness. The body trembles when the visions of impendent evil pass before, or are represented to the mind. Others render it by anger, wrathfulness, rage. Man is full of anger: And that in a twofold construction; First, Passively, he feels the anger both of God and man; the sad effects of mans rage and of Gods displeasure. Secondly, Actively, man is full of his own anger; full of anger. First, Against his fellow-brethren. Secondly, Against God. Thirdly, At the dispensations of God; when God sends him trouble, he is angry. When God sends others prosperity, if it like not him, he is angry. Anger makes the prosperity of others our trouble; and our own troubles would be little trouble to us if we were not angry with our troubles. Trouble and anger are well expressed by the same word, seeing most of our troubles proceed from the anger of God, and are all increased by our own anger.

For the clearing of Job's Proposition, or Observation, That man is full of troubles, I shall present the Reader with a particular of the troubles of man.

The troubles of man are either inward or outward.

Inward troubles proceed from a threefold cause. First, From the terrors wherewith God first exerciseth the spirits of his own people. Job was full of these troubles, as we have opened before; and so was Heman, Psal. 88. 15. Secondly, There are terrors wherewith God vexeth the spirits of wicked men; Cain, Saul, and Judas were full of these troubles; and the Prophet pronounceth of wicked men in general, that they are like the troubled sea when it cannot rest, Isa. 57. 20.

Secondly, Inward troubles arise from the temptations of Satan; we hear many poor souls complaining of these: As that wicked spirit goes about seeking rest, and finding none; so he would not suffer any man to rest. Satan is a troubled spirit; and he is a troubling spirit.

Thirdly, Inward troubles arise from the lusts and corruptions of our own hearts. Paul who triumphed and rejoyced over all outward troubles, cryes out, O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death? Rom. 7. 24. Who is there that hath any spiritual life, who groans not under the body of this death? One bemoans and weeps over unbelief; another over pride; a third over passions and base fears; a fourth over deadness of spirit, and hardness of heart. These fill the Saints with trouble while they keep them in; much more when they prevail and break out. And as Believers are full of trouble because of their own corruption; so also by reason of the corruptions of others. Their hearts bleed at the prophaneness, and their eyes weep at the pride of other men.

These inward troubles are enough to fill us; but as Ezekiel's Roll was full of woes, so our lives are full of troubles, both within and without.

Outward troubles are of two sorts.

First, Ordinary, or those which come daily upon us, the labours and businesses of our callings. The Apostle speaking of and to those that marry, saith Such shall have trouble in the flesh, 1 Cor. 7. 28. Flesh and troubles are married together, whether we marry or no; but they that are married, marry with, and match into new troubles. All our relations have their burdens as well as their comforts.

Secondly, Extraordinary troubles; and these are of three sorts. First, Publick, in the common calamities which fall; First, Upon the Kingdoms: Secondly, Upon the Churches wherein we live. Secondly, Private troubles, which are those which befal our dwellings and Families. Thirdly, Personal troubles, which fall upon our own selves. To these three kinds all our outward troubles are reducible; but the particulars of them are almost innumerable. What Paul saith of his perils (2 Cor. 11. 26.) we may say of our troubles, we are in troubles by waters; in troubles by Robbers; in troubles by our own Countreymen; in troubles by the Heathen; in troubles in the City; in troubles in the Wilderness; in troubles in the Sea; in troubles among false Brethren. We are in weariness and painfulness, in hunger and thirst, in cold and nakedness; of all these troubles we may say as he (ver. 28.) They are without.

Again, we have troubles in getting, troubles in keeping, and troubles in losing the things of this life. We have trouble in doing our duties; troubles for doing our duties; and troubles worst of all for not doing our duties; or for doing that which is not our duties: As some have troubles of Conscience; so not a few have troubles for Conscience.

Lastly, Besides all these troubles, whether of action or passion, we are also, or ought to be, (we seldom want occasion to be) full of the troubles of compassion at the troubles of others, though we our selves be free from trouble. Thus Paul speaks of himself (2 Cor. 11. 29.) Who is weak and I am not weak? Who is offended and I burn not? And thus Paul charges us, Weep with them that weep (Rom. 12. 15.) Remember those that be in bonds, as bound with them; and them which suffer adversity, as being your selves also in the body (Heb. 13. 3.) Sympathy is a Christian duty. Christ himself (our Head) is afflicted in all our afflictions; we also should be afflicted in the afflictions of one another, as fellow-members. He that hath no cross of his own, must take up and bear his brothers: And he that hath many of his own, must bear a part of all his brethrens crosses. Now, what between the troubles which we feel, and the troubles whereof we have a fellow-feeling, we must needs be full of troubles; few of dayes and full of troubles. The report which old Jacob made before Pharaoh of his life (Gen. 47. 9.) may be the report of all our lives, when we have lived most, and lived best; Few and evil have the dayes of the years of our lives been: yea, though we should have attained (which Jacob said he had not) to the dayes of the years of the life of our fathers in the dayes of their pilgrimage.

What

What hath man (as Solomon concludes by way of question concerning man in a natural consideration) of all his labour, and of the vexation of his heart, wherein he hath laboured under the Sun? What hath man of all his labours (much more of all his sufferings) but trouble? For all his dayes are sorrows, and his travel grief, Eccles. 2. 22, 23.

From all observe two things.

First, Observe the difference of the life of Saints on earth, and their life in heaven: Here it is few of dayes, and full of troubles; there it will be full of dayes, and full of comforts: In thy presence is fulness of joy, and at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore.

Secondly, Observe in this conjunction of few dayes and full of troubles in the life of man, the goodness of God to man. Few dayes are (in themselves) an affliction; fulness of trouble is (to us) a great affliction, but many dayes and full of trouble, had been a greater affliction. How sad would our condition be if perpetuity and misery, a multitude of dayes and a multitude of troubles had met together in our lives? The curse of hell is eternity and misery, a life without end, and troubles without end. 'Tis a mercy, when that which is sharp is but short, when that whose very beginning grieves us, ends quickly. Christ having foretold the destruction of the Temple at Jerusalem, and the great tribulation which should accompany it, even such as was not since the beginning of the world, no, nor ever shall be, concludes (Mat. 24. 22.) And except those dayes should be shortned, there should no flesh be saved; but for the Elects sake those dayes shall be shortned. God did not make the dayes of those troubles shorter then himself had decreed, but shorter then the enemy had determined, or then any wise man, who judgeth only by the rules of humane policy, could have expected. The troubles of those dayes seemed to be very long-visag'd, but God shortned the dayes, that the trouble of his people might be shortned, and that some flesh, that is, some men, and those men some of the Jews (for there is a double Synecdoche in the word flesh) might be saved: that is, with a temporal salvation, from the Roman Sword and devouring calamities which attended that terrible War. Now as it is a mercy when God shortens the dayes of special trouble, into which any sort or nation of men fall; so it is a mercy that God hath shortned and lessened the dayes of mankind, considering the general trouble into which we are fallen. Let it not be a trouble to us that our dayes are few, seeing if our dayes were more our troubles would be more, and our sorrows would encrease as the number of our years encreased. He that is displeased because his dayes are few, is also displeased because his troubles are so few. We have little reason to be in love with this life because our dayes are few, and less because our troubles are many. But we have much reason to love God, who when we had procured to our selves many troubles while we live, hath contracted and epitomiz'd our lives into a few dayes.

Job having asserted the shortness and troublesomeness of mans life in a direct proposition, proceeds to illustrate both by a double similitude. First, Of a flower. Secondly, Of a shadow, in the second verse.

Vers. 2. He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down: he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not.

Man is like a flower and a shadow, he is but the shadow of a flower, or the flower of a shadow.

He cometh forth like a flower.] Some restrain this similitude to those who die in childhood or in youth: such indeed are blasted in their blossom, and cropt in their flower. But as one part of mans life compared with another, may be called the flower of his life, so his whole life laid together may be called a flower, and that's the meaning of this place. As man in his best estate, and in all estates is altogether vanity, so man in his best dayes, and in all his dayes is but a flower.

And whereas there are many rarities and excellencies in a flower, three especially. First, Odour or sweetness, affecting the smell. Secondly, Beauty and variety of colour, affecting the eye. Thirdly, Softness and smoothness, affecting the Touch: whereas (I say) there are these three rarities in a flower, Job passeth them all by, and speaks of it not as flourishing but withering, not in its springing up but in its cutting down, or of its springing only in relation to cutting down. He cometh forth like a flower.

And is cut down.] Death is the sithe which cuts down these flowers, either first, Natural death. First, By sickness. 2. By age: or secondly, Violent death, which is, first, Casual, when a man is slain by accident. Secondly, Cruel, when a man is slain by murderers. Thirdly, Legal, when a man is slain by the Magistrate.

Hence Observe, Man in his flourishing is near to withering.

He cometh forth and is cut down, his standing is so small that it is not so much as mentioned. We are born to die, and we die as soon as we are born. Christ speaks to the Church, Canticles, 2. 11, 12. Rise my love, for lo the winter is past, the flowers appear on the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come; so we translate, but others thus, The time of cutting is come. The same word in the Hebrew signifies both to sing and to cut; we taking the former, adde the word birds (which is not at all in the Original) to fill up the sence, or to shew what singing is there meant; namely that, which is most proper in the spring when flowers first appear, the singing of birds. The other reading, as it is clear in the letter of the Hebrew, so it elegantly suits the point in hand; The flowers appear, the time of cutting is come, implying that flowers are cut even as soon as they appear: Such a flower is man. He cometh forth and is cut down. Thus David describes him, Psal. 103. 15, 16. As for man, his dayes are as grass; as a flower of the field, so he flourisheth; for the wind passeth over it, and it is gone, and the place thereof shall know it no more. Though the flower be not cut down with any instrument of iron, nor cropt by the hand, yet a breath of wind blasts it, yea the gentle motion of the air quickly blows off its beauty. The Naturalist tells us of a plant called Ephemeron, because it lasts but one day, as he doth also of a worm called Hemerobion, because it lives but one day. Such a worm is man; or (as the Psalmist speaks) a worm and no man. Such a flower is man, or (as we may speak) a flower and no man. The heathen Poet gives his wonder and observation of the Rose, that it grows old in the very budding. The Septuagint read the words of Job in the same tenour. He decayes like a budding flower, that is, he decayes in his very budding: As if death did rise early and watch for the flourishing flower, to crop or cut it down. And though some of these flowers stand till they wither, or as Solomon allegorizeth, (Eccles. 12. 5.) Till the Almond-tree shall flourish, that is, till gray-hairs; yet all the time of their standing they have been falling, and every hour which increaseth or swells their stalks, hath been also cutting of them down. And it would have been better for some, if they had been actually cut down in that state, which we distinctively call their flower, while they were well-sented and beautiful, whereas standing long, they have not only decayed, but smelt ill upon their stalks. Man in his best estate is vain, and many who have stood beyond that, have proved far worse then vain.

Tempus putationis advenit. Pagn.

Mirabar celeri fugitiva ætate rapinam. Et dum nascuntur consenuisse rosas. Virg.

Tanquã flos efflorescens decidit.

Now lest this first similitude of a flower coming forth and cut down, should not reach the transitoriness of this dying thing called man; therefore Job puts him upon his fullest speed, or rather upon the wing in his motion through the world, by a second similitude, which carrieth in it the hastiest swiftness and the most unsetled changeableness.

He fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not.

Shadows are caused by the interposition of any gross body between us and the Sun. Every shadow is dark, and darkness is but a great shadow. Hence there are two sorts of natural shadows. First, The shadows of the night, to which the Church alludes, (Cant. 2. 17.) Until the day break, and the shadows flee away. Secondly, The shadows of the day; these are according to the motions of the Sun, in continual motion or variation, sometimes on our right hand, sometimes on our left, sometimes shorter, sometimes longer, and are longest in the evening, as the Prophet speaks, (Jer. 4. 6.) The shadows of the evening are stretched out. When the Sun riseth, the shadows of the night are not, and while the shadows of the day are, they continue not, but receive some change every moment.

ment. Such is man, he fleeth as the shadow of the night before the day, and as the shadow of the day till night return again.

He continueth not.] The Hebrew is, he standeth not. A pillar is expressed by a word of this root, because of its standing and firmness. Man is not a pillar, but a shadow; or if he be a pillar, he is but a pillar of smoak, which is carried and scattered with the wind, as a shadow is altered or changed with the Sun. We read often of the shadow of death, and our life is but a shadow; because it continueth not. Death is a perfect shadow, and a shadow is the similitude of our imperfect life: To have no shadow of turning, notes the perfection of God (James 1. 17.) To turn like a shadow, notes the imperfection of man. The Vulgar translates, He continueth not in the same state.

Et nunquã in eodẽ statu permanet. Vulg.

There is a threefold state of man. First, A natural state. Secondly, A civil state. Thirdly, A spiritual state. The two former of these, are of little or no continuance, the third doth not always continue in the same state.

The natural state of man may be considered,

First, In reference to his body; this suffers an alteration every day, either a perfective alteration, as in those that are young; or a corruptive alteration, as in those who are of full age: Yea, the perfective alteration of the body tends to a corruptive alteration, and while we are growing stronger, we are hastning, not only to weakness, but to dissolution.

Secondly, The natural state of man may be considered in reference to his mind: This continues not in one state. 'Tis the sole priviledge of God to be one within. He (saith Job, chap. 23. 13.) Is in one mind, who can turn him? Men are in twenty minds, they cannot but turn. We use to say of several men, So many men, so many minds: But we may observe in the same man, How many minds! The mind of man is more mutable then the wind or weather: Now he is pleased, anon he is angry; now he likes, anon he dislikes; now he loves, anon he hates; now he wills, by and by he wills not: The will, the affections, the understanding of man, are so often in new habits and changes of dress, are shaped into such various forms of opinion and judgement, that 'tis hard to say what any mans mind is; and there are not many who know their own minds.

And as man continues not in his natural state, whether of body or mind; so his civil state is of as little continuance: whether we look upon him, First, In his honour; Or, Secondly, In his power; Or, Thirdly, In his riches; Or, Fourthly, In his relations. I leave the Reader to enlarge upon these common places of mans mutability. Day unto day makes report, and every dayes experience is a Sermon of these things: yea, how many have we seen in one day, honourable and dishonourable, in fulness of power, and emptied of all their power; abounding in riches, and brought to beggery, compassed about with friends and kindred, with wife and children, and yet forsaken of all before the evening. Their inward thought (saith David, Psal. 49. 11.) is, that their houses shall continue for ever, and their dwelling places to all generations: nevertheless man being in honour (power or riches) abideth not. If he abides, these do not; and if these abide, he doth not: and the longest that both these have abode in any example since the foundation of the world, is not long enough to warrant this conclusion, that, They did abide.

Thirdly, Consider man in his spiritual estate, where his continuance is most steady, yet there he continues not in the same state. Some have a spiritual estate, which is of as little continuance as mans natural or civil state is. The hypocrite appears to others, and is often conceited of himself, full of the flowers of grace; but he quickly disappears: he is cut down like a flower, and fleeth away like a shadow. The parable saith of such a man, (Mat. 13. 20, 21.) He heareth the word, and anon with joy receiveth it, yet hath he not root in himself, but dureth for a while: that is, he continueth not: his leaf of out-side profession falls, and his goodly form of godliness without power breaks to pieces upon the least blast or touch of persecution. And if persecution do not kill his profession, it will die alone, or rather, it will decay alone; for indeed it never had any life.

Now, as temporary believers have total decayes, and continue not at all in their spiritual estate; so true believers may have temporary decayes. The way of a man in Christ doth not flee like a shadow, but increaseth more and more unto the perfect day, (Prov. 4. 16.) And that Scripture which takes up Jobs similitude, comparing all flesh to grass, and the goodliness thereof to the flower of the field, the grass withereth, the flower fadeth, doth yet by way of opposition, assure us, that the Word of God abideth for ever, (Isaiah 40. 8.) Now, as the Word of God, so that grace which is revealed to us and wrought in us by the Word and Spirit of God, abideth for ever. And yet though a state of grace, wheresoever, it is doth continue for ever, yet it doth not continue always in the same state: and that not only because it is gradually changed by way of improvement here (till it take its highest degree in glory, where it shall know no change at all, either by way of abatement or of improvement) but also because it is often changed by way of gradual abatement. Peter did not always continue in the same state of faith, nor the Church of Ephesus in the same state of love, though their faith and love did continue. What soul can say it continues ever in the same degree of spiritual strength, health, life and enlargements? Though the whole time of a Christian in this world be a growing time, yet consider it in parts, and we shall find many declining times. Thus as man continues not at all in his natural and civil state, so his spiritual estate doth not always continue the same: and so of all it may be said, He continueth not.

VERS. 3, 4.

And doest thou open thine eyes upon such an one, and bringest him into judgement with thee?
Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? not one.

JOB having shadowed the frailty of man under divers similitudes, in the close of the thirteenth Chapter, and in the beginning of this, draws down from all, this passionate question, at the third verse, And doest thou open thy eye upon such an one? Upon such an one as I, who am as a rotten thing; or, as a garment that is moth-eaten! Upon such an one as I, who am of few dayes and full of trouble! Upon such an one as I, who am like a flower coming forth, and presently cut down! Upon such an one as I, who am like a shadow fleeing away and continuing not! Doest thou open thine eyes upon such an one; and bringest me into judgement with thee?

Such an one, is a term of diminution; Job debaseth and lowers himself, Such an one! Is such a poor one, a man so inconsiderable, a man who besides the common condition of men, which is low enough, is yet brought lower by these afflictions?

Terminus diminuens.

Such an one, sometimes increaseth the sense and heightens it. (Neh. 6. 11.) When Sanballat and the enemies of the Jews by secret practices and cunning plots would have discouraged Nehemiah, telling him what designs were against him, and perswading him timely to avoid his own fall, that so the work might fall, he answers, Should such a man as I flee? such a man! A man in such a place, and having such power; a man so trusted, and under such ingagements; a man upon whose care and conduct the well-fare of a nation, and the advancement of publick good so much depends? Should such a man as I flee? there the sense is raised: but here it falls; Such an one, is a poor one, a mean one; Doest thou open thy mouth to speak against, or thine eye to look upon such an object?

Job having considered his own estate in common with that of mankind, concludes, And doest thou set thy eye upon such an one?

Whence Observe, That the due consideration and knowledge of what we are, leads us to low thoughts of our selves.

There is no man proud of himself, but he that is ignorant of himself: we are lifted up with high thoughts above what we are, because we have not true thoughts of what we are; if once we saw what moth eaten garments, what rotten things, what fading flowers, what fleeing shadows, what decaying, dying creatures we are, every one would say say to God in holy wonder, Doest thou take notice of such an one? of so mean an one as I. We should not aspire to be counted some bodies, some great ones in the world, but we should look upon our selves as no bodies, as unaccountable in the world, such as deserve not, that the great, the high God should vouchsafe us a cast of his eye. This is Jobs sense of himself, Doest thou open thy eye upon such an one as I?

Oculi Dei providentiã denotat.

The opening of the eye is taken two wayes.

First, In a way of fatherly care and providence: Thus David speaks (Psal. 144. 3.) Lord, what is man that thou takest knowledge of him, or the son of man that thou makest account of him? So Job (chap. 7. 17.) What is man that thou shouldest magnifie him, and that thou shouldst set thy heart upon him? that is, that thou shouldst take care of him, and make such provision for him. When Hezekiah was in a day of rebuke and blasphemy, he spread Rabshakehs railing letter before the Lord, and prayed, Lord bow down thine ear and hear, open Lord thy eye and see, 2 Kin. 19. 16. that is, take care of me and of the people under me: the mouth of Rabshakeh is open to threaten and revile, let thy eye be open to see and prevent all the evils which he threatneth.

Further, Opening the eye is an act of little or no difficulty; it is as easie to open the eye as to turn the hand; to give a look is a small gift. Thus we may understand Job, as if he thought himself unworthy the least motion of providence. Doest thou vouchsafe to open thine eye upon such a one? I am not worthy thou shouldest take notice of me or of my condition. A glance of thy eye is more then I can look for.

I will not prosecute this sense, both because I handled it, chap. 7. 17. as also, because though it be a truth, yet, I conceive, it is not the proper truth of this place.

Aperire oculos in aliquẽ, est intentis oculis eũ valdè observare, quid rerum agat. Drus.

Secondly, As opening of the eye signifies providence and care to do us good, so watchfulness to discover and find out what we are, or what evil we have done: for as in Scripture to open the hand is to be liberal, bountiful, and munificent (Psal. 145. 16.) Thou openest thy hand and satisfiest the desire of every living thing. So to open the eye upon a man, notes diligent inspection over him, or an accurate observation of his wayes, goings, actings, to bring him to a strict account for all: he that passeth a man by, and will not bring him to judgement for what he hath done, is said (in our common speech) to connive or wink at him. He that winks at another, will not see though he doth see. It is said (Act. 17. 30.) that God winked at the former times of their ignorance, but now he commands all men every where to repent, because he hath appointed a day, wherein he will judge the world. There is another meaning of winking which I have opened (chap. 8. 4.) but this is a truth, God winked, that is, he did not take much notice, or follow men up and down, to see what they did in those times, because they were in the darkness of ignorance; they had but little light to do good by, therefore he was not so strict to observe what evil they did; so that the opening of the eye, implieth a critical, or a judiciary inspection, as well as a paternal, fatherly, careful inspection, and so we are to expound this place, as is evident from the sixth verse of this chapter, where Job desires that which is contrary to opening the eye, the turning from him, that he might rest till he shall accomplish as a hireling his dayes. He that openeth his eye to a man turneth his face to him; now seeing man is weak, and his dayes determined, turn from him with thine eye, or why doest thou set thine eye upon him? As if he had said, Doth it become thy greatness and majesty, to take such strict notice of all the motions of so poor a creature as I am? or doth it become thy goodness and mercy to be so severe to watch me so narrowly, to look after me so exactly, that I cannot stir but thou observest it, and numbrest my very steps?

Contextus exposcit, ut de severitate divini judicii loquatur, Sanct.

Cum stomacho & indignatione legendum est: Itane Jupiter hoc solium & stipulã, &c. Mer.

Job speaks in a kind of passion, and the gloss which some interpreters put upon his words, renders them, not only very unbecoming, but very sinful; as if he thought it altogether unfit for God to eye what he did, or to bring him into judgement for it. Heathens said of their Jupiter, he was not at leasure to look at small matters; but it is a great dishonour to God, to say he cannot look after the smallest matters and motions of the creature: We cannot dishonour God more, then by counting this a dishonour to him. The lowest persons and actions are not beneath the observation of the most high God. Jobs intendment was to move God to compassion, not to put himself beneath his consideration.

Hence Observe, That our frailty is a good pleadable argument to move God to deal mildely and gently with us.

I am a weak poor creature, therefore pitty me, therefore spare me; we must never plead our fulness before God, but we may plead our emptiness; we must never plead our goodness, nor our worthiness, but we may our sinfulness and unworthiness. The latter clause of the verse shews us what Job desires, when he deprecates the opening of Gods eye upon him.

And bringest me into judgement with thee.

Observe here the change of the person: He spake before in the third person, Doest thou open thine eye upon such an one? here he speaks in the first person, Doest thou bring me to judgement with thee? He relates to his personal condition and makes application to himself, Doest thou bring me into judgement with thee? I shall not stay upon these words, having often (from like passages) shewed how unable man is to stand before God in judgement. Job insisteth much upon it, being provoked by his friends, charging him with a conceit of self-righteousness, which he disclaimed as often as they charge him with it, Doest thou bring me to judgement with thee? Men of eminency will not contend with those who are much inferiour to them, they cannot honour themselves by such contests, as was lately shewed at large (chap. 13. 25.) upon that expostulation, Wilt thou break a leaf driven to and fro? &c. Thus Job pleads here, Doest thou bring me to judgement with thee? I am no match for thee, there is no equality between us, thou canst not raise thy Name by casting me down: thou mayest honour thy mercy and compassion, by pardoning me, but not thy power by overthrowing me. The worst and weakest of sinful men, are the best foil to set off the beauty and strength of mercy.

Verbum est futuri temporis, quod debitũ connotat & decorum, ut Gen. 18. 25.

Huc pertinent omnia quæ hoc loco copiosè disserit Job de miseria humanæ vitæ, ut Deus tã misero homini misereatur, nec tam duris experimẽtis probet. Mer.

Yet men are not therefore free from the judgements of God because they are low and mean, for God will judge the lowest, even such as lie on dung-hills, or grind in the mill; the great God of heaven and earth will bring the least to judgement, as well as the greatest. The Rabbins have a conceit that some shall be exempt or privileg'd from the judgement of God hereafter, because they endure much pain and poverty here; but these are vain conceits: All must come to judgement, though but few shall stand in judgement. God will glorifie his justice in casting the lowest of wicked men to the lowest hell, as well as high and lofty ones.

Take one Observation from both parts of the verse laid together, Doest thou open thy eye upon such an one as I am, and bringest me to judgement?

There must be a discerning of the person and cause, before either can be brought to judgement.

You must open the eye to see what the man is, and what he hath done, before sentence be given upon him. The law forbad the Judge to receive gifts, because gifts blind the eye of the Judge; a Judge had need to have his eyes open, to discern the cause and every circumstance of it. If a gift put out the receivers eye, how shall the Judge discern him that gives it. We cannot judge what we do not know, nor can we judge aright without a right knowledge.

Job having pleaded his weakness, pleads his sinfulness.

Vers. 4. Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? not one.

As if he had said, Lord, if thou openest thine eye upon me, thou must needs find me unclean, full of sin and defiled with sin: Nor canst thou expect any other of me, for, who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? surely not one; therefore do not open thine eye severely upon me, do not bring me into judgement with thee, thou art of purer eyes then to behold iniquity.

I shall

I shall first open the words and give the sense as they contain an entire proposition, A clean thing cannot be brought out of an unclean, and then I shall consider Jobs scope in using this plea,

Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?

The word which we render clean signifies shining, beautiful, a substance so pure and transparent that we may see through it, so pure that it is free from all spot or defilement, from all blackness and darkness; Who can bring such a clean thing out of an unclean? the Hebrew word (Tama) comes near the word (Contaminatum) which is used by the Latines for unclean; and it speaks the greatest pollution, the sordidness and filthiness of habit, the goar of blood, the muddiness of water, whatsoever is loathsome or unlovely, noisome or unsightly: All these meet in, and make up the meaning of this word, Who can bring a clean thing out of this uncleanness?

טמא immundus, pulchra est illius turpitudinis & sordium appellatio, in quam squalor quidam mœrentis animi & sordidatus habitus, cruoris & sanguinis macula, nubila, crassa omnia turbida immundaque cadant. Pined.

Clean and unclean may be taken two wayes; either first corporally and externally; or secondly, morally and internally; Job speaks not of the former; the uncleanness here meant is moral or internal,

Which is also twofold. First, The uncleanness of our natures: Secondly, Of our actions; the uncleanness which lyes in the inward man, puts it self forth in the outward man; and so we are unclean both within and without.

Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? This question may undergo a threefold exposition. First thus, Who can bring a morally clean person out of a person originally unclean? The word which we render bring, is give in the Hebrew; Who can give a clean thing out of an unclean? Which may well refer to the birth of man: So the word is used (Gen. 17. 16.) God promiseth Abraham to bless Sarah, and give him a Son of her: So here, Who can give a clean thing? That is, cause it to be born of an unclean; Job layes his hand upon his birth-sin; as if he had said, all men are naturally unclean; therefore the children born of them are unclean too.

Secondly, Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? May refer to the action of the same man, take Job or any other person who is morally unclean by nature, this man being unclean, cannot bring forth a clean thing; that is, a clean action: As the root is, such is the fruit; we are such fruit as our parents are, unclean both; and our fruit is such as we the parents are, unclean both.

Thirdly, Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? May note the change of the same person from his moral uncleanness into moral cleanness; Who can make a person clean who was born unclean? The Hebrew particle (Min) rendred, out of, hath a double use; sometimes it notes the Original of a thing, That which is originated is like its original. Again, it notes also change and mutation; Who can bring a clean out of an unclean? That is, who can change unclean into clean? Besides the word which we render bring signifies to make a change, Isa. 51. 12. Who art thou that art afraid of the son of man, who shall be made as the grass? The Hebrew is, who shall be given, that is, changed as the grass.

Thus we have a threefold interpretation of the words, The first respecting the extraction of one person from another. All persons are unclean, because they come from an unclean root.

A second referring to the actions of the same person. That which is done by man cannot but be unclean; because man himself is unclean who doth it.

A third respecting the change of the person himself from what he was. Who can make an unclean person clean? This is a work too hard for any creature, Man or Angel. Man cannot by his own power make a natural man, much less a spiritual man; he cannot give any man a being, much less a holy being.

First observe from the connection, Job having described mans life, Few of dayes and full of troubles, like a shadow, and like a flower cut down and withered; he now descends to mans uncleanness, as if he would lead us to the spring-head and cause of all our sorrows: This is the method and dependance of Job's discourse, which teacheth us,

That the length of our troubles, and shortness of our lives, are caused by the corruption and uncleanness of our natures.

Are our lives troublesome? Is the scene of our actions intangled? sin hath done it. Is the thread of life cut off? have we but a few dayes? sin hath procured this. We are unclean, therefore we are dying, fading, withering. In all, whether personal or publick troubles, we may answer our selves with this, we have what we deserve, the root of all our miseries is within us, we may thank our own evil dispositions, that our condition is so full of evil. God made man upright and happy; he gave him a life wherein he might have continued long and long, even for ever. Though man might have died as created, yet there was no necessity he should dye till he had sinned. Both the troubles of this life and death it self are debts of penalty for our uncleanness; and when we are once perfectly cleansed, we shall never be under any arrest for these debts.

Secondly Observe; Sin is an unclean thing.

They who see the face of sin in the glass of the Law, see it the most ugly and deformed object in the world. If Vertue could be seen, she would attract all eyes and hearts to her: Vertue is an invisible beauty. So if sin could be seen, all eyes would turn away from it: Sin is an invisible deformity. The Spirit of God doth as it were strive for comparisons to set out the ugliness of sin: It is compared to the blood and pollution of an Infant (Ezek. 16. 6.) to the corruption of a rotten Sepulchre (Rom. 3. 13.) to the scum of a seething pot (Ezek. 24. 11, 12.) All these comparisons shew us somewhat of the ugliness of sin; but it is ugly beyond compare. How sad is their mistake who think to adorn themselves with sin? Who put on pride as a cloak upon their backs, and unrighteousness as a Crown or a Diadem upon their heads: who boast as if they had their holy-day clothes on, when they are cloathed with unholiness, and make to themselves beauty spots of the blackest spots of sin! The Apostle (Col. 3. 12.) calleth us to put on another kind of dress, to be cloathed with humility, meekness, humbleness of minde, charity; these are shining, pure, white rayment indeed; Our righteousness is a filthy rag, if we boast in it, or would be justified in it: then how filthy a rag is our unrighteousness, especially if we boast of it, or justifie our selves in it!

Thirdly Observe, Man being naturally unclean, his children and posterity are unclean too.

John. 3. 6. That which is born of the flesh, is flesh. The copy cannot be better then the Original, nor the effect nobler then the cause; This flesh hath an ill name all the Scripture over: 'Tis no wonder if that which is poysonous bring forth a poysonous seed, or that a stinging Serpent procreates a stinging Serpent, a Toad a Toad, or that a Wolf brings forth a Wolf: The son of an Ethiopian is also an Ethiopian: Our father was an Amorite, and so are we. The natural constitution of every thing is transmitted by natural generation; man is himself unclean, and all his issue is like himself. God created man pure in his own likeness after his Image; and man begets man impure in his own likeness after his image.

Caro in scriptura male audit. Mirum non est si aruginis vanus aut cicutæ vacuus fit à medulla, aut noxium aliquod bibeat; Aut si Æthiopissæ filius Æthiopicis ab ea colorem trahat. Sanct.

There are two things in this uncleanness.

First, There is a privation of that comeliness and beauty which was stampt upon man in his creation: Some define original uncleanness to be only a privation of original righteousness, and that it is one part of it, all agree; but there is something positive in it too; for it is as if a man, who is richly cloathed, excellently adorned, should not only have all his goodly garments pulled off (which were an abasement to him) but should be thrown into the dirt, or have dirt cast upon him; Joseph's Brethren took off his party-coloured garment, and then threw him into a pit; so doth sin: that strips us first of our goodly array, our original righteousness; and then drenches, or daubs us rather all over, or over head and ears, in mire and filth.

There are seven considerable properties in this natural uncleanness.

First, It is an internal uncleanness; a spot upon the garment is bad enough; a spot upon the face is far worse; but an infection in the flesh is yet worse; and that is worst of all which is seated in the bowels, or hath seized on the vitals: The uncleanness here spoken of is not as a spot upon the garment, or dirt upon the face, but a soar in the flesh, (a soar is nothing but the uncleanness of the flesh gathered to a head) yea, it is like a soar in the bowels, or intrals, trals, in the heart or liver; for even the mind and conscience is defiled, Tit. 1. 15.

Secondly, It is an abiding uncleanness, all the water in the Ocean cannot wash it out; all the fire in Hell cannot burn it out; Hell fire shall never consume this dross: Though wicked men in this life be cast into the fire of Gods judgments, and he kindle it with the bellows of his wrath, yet their dross remains, reprobate silver shall men call them; (Jer. 6. 30.) they will not be purged in this life, and in the next life they shall not be purged. They shall be for ever in punitive flames; but they shall not find (as Papists dream) any purgative flames. The corruption of nature will not depart from them. The uncleanness of the metal is the dross of the metal; the dross of mans nature is harder to separate then the dross of metal; the lead in that infernal furnace will not consume, nor will the bellows break; yet the dross of lust will not out of reprobates. And as fire and brimstone shall not fetch this uncleanness out of reprobates in the next life; so grace and mercy do not fetch it fully out of the elect in this life; they who are renewed and regenerate, are yet in part carnal and corrupt. Grace is in a continual conflict with corruption; but glory only makes a total conquest.

Thirdly, It is an abounding uncleanness, it is not in the hand or face only, but in and upon the whole man, it goes quite through. There is not the least part free: Man from head to heel, from top to toe is described unclean (Psal. 14. Rom. 3.) The Lord looked down from Heaven, to see if there were any that did understand and seek after God: they were all gone out of the way, and become vile, vile all over. There is a double universality of this uncleanness. First, It doth defile all men. Secondly, All of man: Not one man in the world but is unclean; and not one part in any man but is unclean; survey him in his understanding, will, memory, affections, conscience, eye, hand, tongue, feet, all the parts of the body and powers of the soul are unclean. As grace sanctifies, so sin defiles all where it is, even body, soul, and spirit, 1 Thes. 5. 23.

Concupiscentia est appetitus inordinatus per quem superiora inferioribus tupitt servium, aut inferiora superioribus contumaciter reluctantur. Janson.

Fourthly, It is an active or a powerful uncleanness, stirring up an holy war in man, against the holy will of God: An inordinate appetite accompanies it; or it is an inordinate appetite causing the inferiour parts of the soul stubbornly to resist the superiour; or the superiour basely to submit unto and serve the inferiour. This makes Lust a King, and Reason a Slave; yea, this would make Grace a Slave. As Paul's experience teacheth us, (Rom. 7. 23.) But I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. That is, it doth captivate me in part, and hath a design to captivate me altogether.

Fifthly, It is a diffusive or an infectious uncleanness, like a leprosie or a plague. Now, as good is by so much the better, by how much it is the more diffusive, so evil is so much the worse by how much it is the more diffusive. This evil is diffusive two wayes. First, By way of propagation, from Adam to all his posterity. Secondly, By way of imitation, and so one man doing evil, another seeth and catcheth it, he is infected and defiled with it: That's the reason why David (as some conceive) was so exceeding strict, in this point (Psal. 101. 7.) He that worketh deceit shall not dwell within my house; he that telleth lyes shall not tarry in my sight; his wickedness may spread, it may poyson the heart of a King, I will not put my self upon the temptation. The Apostle (Heb. 12. 15.) warns the Church of this danger, Lest any root of bitterness springing up trouble you, and thereby many be defiled. Though this uncleanness doth not infect by imitation only (which was the error of Pelagius) yet it infects strongly and commonly by imitation: Hence Moses chargeth the people of Israel to have nothing to do with the Canaanites, lest they should be misled by their example. And when they acted against this rule, they quickly broke all rules (Psal. 106. 36.) They were mingled with the Heathen (then immediately follows) and learned their works. He means not works of art, or agriculture, of peace, or war, but of false worship and idolatry; They served their idols, which was a snare unto them. Evil men endanger the good, as bad humors do the blood, or an infected house the whole neighbourhood.

Sixthly, It is a bewitching and an ensnaring uncleanness. All the bodily beauty in the world did never intice so many as the deformity and foul face of sin hath. It was prophesied of Christ (in reference to his outward appearance) He hath no form nor comeliness; there is no beauty that we should desire him. Hence the Prophet foresees what entertainment he was like to find in the world: He is despised and rejected of men; we, as it were, hid our faces from him, and we esteemed him not, Isa. 53. 2, 3. Beauty and comeliness are the attractives, the loadstone of love. Christ was not loved because he did not appear beautiful: Lust is loved though it be unbeautiful: There is no form nor comeliness in sin, nothing why it should be desired, yet it is admired and highly esteemed by all sorts of men. They dote upon it, and run mad with love for it, as the choicest beauty in the world.

Seventhly, It is a murderous and a mortal uncleanness; there is no escaping death if we live in it. This uncleanness doth not only spoil our inward beauty, and put the soul out of fashion, but it destroyes the life of the soul, it is the ruine as well as the dishonour of man.

Now as all men, because unclean, bring forth an unclean personal issue (which riseth from the second exposition.) So because every person is unclean, the actions which he brings forth are unclean too. What soever sinful man doth, is sinful: Consider mankind under two ranks, regenerate and unregenerate: The unregenerate are so unclean, that whatsoever they do is altogether unclean. Do men gather grapes of thorns, and figs of thistles? Make the tree good and the fruit good, while the tree is evil, the fruit cannot be good. 'Tis because the heart is evil, that (as God complains Gen. 6. 5.) All the imaginations of the thoughts of the heart are only evil continually. The imagination gives shape to every thing which the mind works upon; all that man frames and fashions, all the creatures he makes within him are unclean. The works of a natural man are unclean for the most part in the very matter; but all that he doth is unclean for the manner; his hands are unclean, and (by his handling) he makes all unclean. The mind and conscience of a wicked man being defiled, he is abominable, disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate, (Tit. 1. 15.) that is, he knows not how to do a good work, he is not handsome-handed, or rather not handsome-hearted at any good work: he knows neither how to contrive, nor act, much less to delight in any thing that is good; that's the meaning of being reprobate to every good work: Though he may set about many good works, yet at best they do but bungle at them all. Some good works are so good that no man can do them ill; they cannot be done sinfully, though they may be done imperfectly. Such are, to love God, to fear, to believe, to trust, to rejoyce in him, and to hope for his mercy. These works are so good, that, as no wicked man can do them at all, so, no good man can sin in doing them. These works are so good, that the least degree of them is good; and therefore though they are acted often weakly, yet they are never acted wickedly. But there are good works which a carnal man will be dealing in, as to pray, to hear the Word, &c. These he will be doing, but he is reprobate to the doing of them; he defiles and spoils them in the doing. The case is put Hag. 2. 14. If a man that is unclean do carry holy flesh, shall it not be unclean? The Prophet states it affirmatively, ceremonially holy flesh is defiled with our spiritually unholy flesh: The uncleanness of the giver renders his gift unclean: The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord: Their prayers are sometimes called howlings (Hos. 7.) sometimes bablings (Mat. 6.) Their prayers at best are but wouldings and wishings, or meer presumings, such were Balaam's (Numb. 33. 10.) they desire mercy more then grace, they will have the end, but care not to walk in the way.

Now if the prayers of carnal man be unclean, how unclean are their oaths? If their mercies be cruel, how merciless are their cruelties? If their praises of God be filthy, how filthy are their prophanations? If the best they can do be bad, how bad is their worst?

Secondly, The works of the regenerate are unclean also. Job speaks his own case, he was a holy man by Gods own testimony, yet he saith, Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? All our righteousness are as filthy rags, (Isa. 64. 6.) A regenerate man sins in all he doth: We do not say, all he doth is sin, as the Papists charge us: The work of Gods spirit upon us, and the motions of grace in us are pure;

Mala mea pure mala sunt, & mea sunt: bona autem mea nec pure bona sunt nec mea sunt. Hugo pure; yet, as clean water passing through an unclean pipe, receivs a tincture of that uncleanness; so sinfulness cleaves to our holiest action, we the instruments being sinful.

If it be objected, That which is sinful is a transgression of the Law; but good works are not a transgression of the Law; therefore they are not sinful.

I answer.

First, Sin is a transgression of the Law; but every thing which hath sin accompanying it, is not a transgression of the Law: We cannot argue from the abstract to the concrete.

Secondly, There is a twofold transgression of the Law: First, Against the matter of any duty required. Secondly, Against the manner in which the Law requires that duty should be performed: In this latter sence there is a transgression in the best works of Believers: Where is the soul that is carried out in prayer, &c. with that love and delight, with that purity and fervency of spirit, which the spiritualness of the Law doth call for?

If it be again objected, That good works in the regenerate are the works of the Spirit of God in them, and therefore are not sinful,

I answer.

That which proceeds from the Spirit as the immediate and sole cause, is not sinful: But good works are not wrought solely by the Spirit of God; the spirit and mind of man are subservient and instrumental in that work: Now an effect which proceeds from divers subordinate causes, takes its qualification from the lowest as well as from the highest. Though a Writer have exact skill, yet if his pen be naught, the writing cannot be exact.

Lastly, (Say some) good works are pleasing to God; but that which is sinful doth not please God.

To which I answer.

That our good works do not please God, as done by us; but as done in Christ: He is the Altar which sanctifies all our gifts; he is our High-priest who takes away the iniquity of all our holy things, that we may be accepted in all our offerings. 'Tis through a Mediator that God is pleased with what we do, and pardons our defects.

Thirdly, The words may import a change of the same person, Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?

Hence Observe, Man cannot convert or make himself clean; nor can any man make man clean.

Man can no more sanctifie himself or another, then he can redeem himself or another. But you will say, A man is often exhorted to cleanse himself (Isa. 1. 15, 18.) Wash you, make you clean, (2 Cor. 7. 1.) Having these promises, let us cleanse our selves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit.

I answer.

First, If these Texts be understood of persons regenerate, as that of the Apostle clearly is, then it is true, they who are already cleansed may further cleanse themselves; for though we do not cooperate in the first conversion (there we are meerly passive) yet we do in the second: We cannot begin holiness, but we may and ought to perfect holiness in the fear of the Lord. We cannot work our own salvation; but we may work out our own salvation. They who have received the Spirit are fitted to carry on spiritual work.

And though the Text in Isaiah speaks of persons unregenerate, yet it is not in vain to say even to such, Wash you, make you clean. An unclean person may apply himself to the means of cleansing: They who have no grace, yet have reason; and God deals with us, as with rational creatures: They who are dead in sins and trespasses, may hear the word of life and live. The dead and unclean are invited to the means of life and cleansing; and God in the use of means hath promised to cleanse and enliven them; but man of himself cannot cleanse himself, nor make himself differ from what he is, or others are. As our sanctification is the will of God; so it is the work of God too. 'Tis neither our own power, nor the power of any creature, which gives us the new creation: so the last words of the verse resolve, Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean?

Not one.] That is, No man can do it. Some read this interrogatively, or by way of question, Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? Cannot one? Or, Is there not one that can? We negatively, There is not one that can: No man can do it..

If we take (as we safely may) the former reading, the question affirms; Is there not one? Yea, there is one, and but one, who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean: As the Scribes said (Mark 2. 7.) Who can forgive sins but God only? So, who can cleanse a soul but God only? God only of unclean can make us clean. He who can raise up Children to Abraham out of stones, and alter the course of Nature, he can make the Leper change his spot, and the Blackamore his skin; to God nothing is impossible; but to man many things are impossible; and there is nothing more impossible then this, the cleansing of the spiritually unclean. As that only can make and continue a cold body hot, which is it self and of it self hot; so he only can make an unclean thing clean, who is himself and of himself clean; God is clean, and there is no spot in him; therefore he can make us clean, and take out all our spots. The Chaldee Paraphrast takes the word, One, for the description of God, or for the Name of God. And so this place is paralleld by that (Mark 2. 7.) which according to the letter of the Greek is to be read thus. Who can forgive sins but one? or, the one God?

Some expound this, One, strictly of Jesus Christ, who was designed to that work when he came into the world, who is the great cleanser: In whom a fountain is opened to wash for sin and for uncleanness, and whose blood cleanseth from all sin: Who purifieth those he saveth, and purgeth all he pardoneth. Christ is that clean, that holy thing: And he being so, makes us so; yea, he is made to us of God, wisdom, righteousness and sanctification or cleanness. Christ bringeth clean out of unclean, by removing a twofold uncleanness. First, The guilt of sin when he pardons. Secondly, The filth of sin when he sanctifies.

From this whole Doctrine of mans uncleanness we learn.

First, Man cannot oblige God.

What hath man to boast of? Will any one be proud of his filthy garments, or of a spot in his face? Much less can we boast who have a spot upon our hearts, and are all over spotted in our lives.

Secondly learn, That in our confession of sin, we should lay our hand upon our birth-sin.

The sense of our natural uncleanness humbles most; and we should often reflect upon it, that we may be more humbled. We cannot shift off our sin upon the temptation of Satan, or the solicitation of men; we have the root of the matter in our selves. Job was most sensible of the sinfulness of his nature: He had many sins, but he saw this at the bottom of them all. 'Tis our duty to mourn for actual sins, but chiefly for original sin. We must weep over the streams; but most over the fountain: The heart of man hath not laboured more to corrup any truth, then this about mans natural corruption. The old Pelagians dressed up Nature very fine, and would at least perswade us it is not so bad, or so opposite to good as some would make it. They told us it hath some disposition to good; and that if helped a little, it would come on to do good. Papists at this day follow them, if not in the same steps, yet in the same path: Both have darkned counsel by words without knowledge.

Thirdly, If all men be unclean, then every man hath need of washing.

Thou shalt not wash my feet, said Peter to Christ, John 13. 8. If I wash thee not (saith Christ) thou hast no part in me. Then he prayes, Lord (wash) not only my feet but my head, &c. Christ speaks thus to every soul, If I wash thee not, thou hast no part in me: Christ is a clean Head, and he cleanseth all his members.

Fourthly, The thoughts of our general uncleanness, should provoke us to bless God, that there is a fountain open for sin and uncleanness.

Fountains should be as welcome to those who are filthy, as to those who are thirsty. When Hagar was thirsty, God shewed her a fountain of water: When Sampson was very thirsty, God opened a fountain in the jaw, and he drank and was revived. We are filthy, and God opens a fountain, he sends our leprous souls to the Jordan of his Sons blood, and bids us wash and be clean. When our hands are unclean, is not a bason of water welcome? Our souls are unclean, O how welcome should the blood of Christ be unto us? Bless God, who, as he hath discovered our uncleanness, so a fountain, that we may wash away our uncleanness. How wonderful are the workings of Divine love, that we, who were all spots and unclean, shall at last be presented unto God perfectly clean, Not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing, Ephes. 5. 27.

Having opened the sence of these words, as they contain this doctrinal Proposition of mans natural uncleanness: There is yet somewhat considerable in their scope? Why doth Job speak of this uncleanness?

Quasi innuat Job non debere Deũ hominem punire, ob peccatum ad quod ist pronus ex ſe, ſed ſui oblitus hoc dicit. Merc.

Some give this for his scope, as if Job from his original uncleanness would extenuate his actual uncleanness: or that he ought to be pardoned by Grace, because he was polluted by Nature: As if he had said, Lord, I was born unclean, and therefore cannot but be unclean; no wonder ill fruits grow on me, who have a root of evil in me. But this was (in proportion) as far from the mind of Job, as it is from the truth of God. Besides, that we are born sinful, and cannot chuse but sin, is no extenuation, but an aggravation of our sin. That sin is not only our act, but our nature, leaves us without desert of pity, or matter of apology. We pity a man, who by accident hath taken poyson, and is sick: But who pities a Serpent, whose nature is poysonous? or such creatures, to whom poyson is as food? When David confesseth (Psal. 51.) In iniquity was I conceived, &c. Was he sowing a fig-leaf over his uncleanness? Or covering it with carnal reasonings? No marvel though I bring forth sin, who was conceived in sin. No marvel if I conceive iniquity, who was brought forth in iniquity. No, David doth not excuse, but humble himself; he doth not challenge mercy, but sees his need of mercy, because he was conceived in sin, and brought forth in iniquity. Such also (I conceive) was the frame of Job's spirit in making this confession, and pouring out this complaint upon his birth-sin.

His design was, First to abase himself, to make his heart more pliable and ready to submit unto saddest dispensations. I am unclean; And is it any wonder that the holy God, who cannot behold any unclean thing, should throw an unclean person over head and ears into the waters of affliction?

Ex naturæ ſuæ corruptione ſperat Deum facilius pertrahere, ad veniam ſibi dandum, ne ſe ita graviter affligat. Merc.

Secondly, He speaks this as a motive to compassion, desiring the Lord to mitigate his sorrows, while he aggravated his sin; yea, to cease from afflicting, because he knew (by reason of this natural uncleanness) he could not cease to sin, till he should cease to be in this world. Thus God himself argues for his own compassions and sparing mercies to the renewed World after the Flood: For whereas he had said (Gen. 6. 5.) The imagination of the thought of mans heart is only evil continually, and therefore I will destroy, man whom I have created, from the face of the earth. Yet at the eighth Chapter, ver. 21. the Lord resolves thus, I will not again smite the earth any more, and every living thing, as I have done: Why? For the imagination of mans heart is evil from his youth: As if he had said, Though I drown'd the world with water, yet they are not washed from their uncleanness; I see water will not fetch out sin, nor my judgment make man holy: I must always destroy, if I should destroy as often as men do wickedly, therefore I will not smite the earth in this sort any more. Thus Job might move the Lord to forbear afflicting him, because he could not (being born in sin) forbear to sin; though in this he aggravates his own sinfulness. We may beseech the Lord to spare us when we act sin, because our natures are sinful: But wo unto those, who go about, either to palliate or extenuate their acts of sin, by the sinfulness of their natures.

VERS. 5, 6.

Seeing his dayes are determined, the number of his months are with thee, thou hast appointed him his bounds that he cannot pass.

Turn from him that he may rest, till he shall accomplish as an hireling his day.

JOB having pleaded for pity, upon consideration of the weakness and frailty of man, upon the consideration of the shortness of his life, and sinfulness of his nature, proceeds here to another Argument from a double consideration about death.

First, Because death hath a set and a fixed time, at which it will come, and will not tarry, in the fifth and sixth verses.

Secondly, Because there is no returning from death: When death hath got us into its hand, it holdeth us fast, and keepeth us sure enough. This he illustrates two wayes,

First, By a dissimilitude, in ver. 7, 8, 9, 10. There is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, &c. But it is not so with man: Man dieth and wasteth away; man giveth up the ghost, and where is he? This is a dissimilitude.

Secondly, He illustrateth it by a similitude, ver. 11, 12. As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and dryeth, so man lyeth down and riseth not. By these two are set forth the prevailing strength of death. When once we are under the power of the grave, there is no release nor fetching us back by any created strength.

In these two verses, the fifth and sixth, Job openeth his first Argument, that there is a set time; and not only a set time, but a time irrevocable; a time so set, that there can be no unsetling of it, The number of his months are with thee, thou hast set him his bounds, which he cannot pass.

His dayes are determined.

The Argument stands thus,

He should be mercifully and gently dealt with in this life, whose life is set out by certain bounds and limits, beyond which he cannot pass, and from which he cannot return.

But thus it is with poor man, There is a set period of his life, and as he cannot get beyond it, so he cannot come back from it.

Therefore turn away and let me have some rest

As if he had said, Besides, that this life is full of evil (as was shewed before) death, the greatest of natural evils, is at hand, which suddenly takes us away, throweth us into the grave, hides us there without possibility of returning to such a life as we here enjoy. Job hath used this Argument before: Neither should it seem strange, that he now repeats, and modestly objects it unto God to move pity, and stir the bowels of his compassion towards him. The Psalmist, whether David or some other Pen man, argues thus; (Psal. 89. 48.) Remember, Lord, how short my time is; wherefore hast thou made all men in vain? What man is he that liveth and shall not see death, and shall he deliver his soul from the power of the grave? He urgeth the Lord to grant some ease, some breathing, some respit and relaxation in this life, because death cannot be far off, from which there is no rescue, no returning.

The word which we translate determined, signifies properly to dig, and by a Metaphor to make an exact and curious search; or by searching thoughts to dig down into the depth of a business, and then to settle it. Hence it is translated diligent, (Prov. 10. 4.) The hand of the diligent maketh rich; properly, The hand of the digger makes rich. And the word imports not only digging in the ground for ordinary commodities, as for stones, or coals, but digging for gold and silver, for the most precious metals or minerals; How diligent are men when they dig for such treasure and for riches? Such is the diligent hand which maketh rich. Now because when we make any serious determination upon any matter before us, we first search or dig into the bottom of it: Therefore the word is translated here to determine. Tis so also, Isa. 10. 23. The Lord God of hosts hath made a consumption, even determined in the midst of all the land. God makes many consumptions, he layes whole Countries and Kingdoms waste; but his are not consumptions at a venture, or by hap-hazard, accidental consumptions, but consumptions determined; that is, the Lord sets down directly who and how many, where and when, what persons, what places, what estates and things shall ſhall be conſumed; God makes a determined conſumption in the greateſt confuſions and hurry of the nations. When we think nothing is done wiſely, all is done wiſely. And that which croſſeth the revealed, fulfils the ſecret will of God. The moſt diſorderly conſumptions (to us) are determined and ordered by God.

Dies hominis dicuntur definiti ad menſuram certam & anguſtam. Dies breves hominis ſunt, Vulg. Ἐὰν ᾖ μία ἡμέρα ὁ βίος αὐτῶν ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς. חרצ idem quod חתן Rab. Dav.

As this word [determined] is applyed to the dayes of man, it hath a twofold ſignification.

Firſt, It notes that the dayes of man are reduced by God to a certain number.

Secondly, That they are reduced to a ſhort number, ſo ſome tranſlate, Are not the dayes of man ſhort or few? and the Septuagint yet cloſer: Is not the life of man upon the earth one day? as if all life were contracted into one ſingle day, or determined into the narroweſt compaſs.

Yet I conceive (though the Original may bear it) this latter ſenſe is not ſuteable to this place; Job told told us at the beginning of the chapter, that the dayes of man are few upon the earth; And 'tis not probable that he would touch upon the ſame ſtring twiſe in ſo narrow a compaſs.

So then, This determination of our dayes refers to a certain number or meaſure of our dayes. Which expoſition as it keeps a difference in the words, ſo it doth much illuſtrate the mind of Job, who in this diſcourſe endeavours by various arguments to ſet forth the miſery and weakneſs of man, and to plead with God upon that account of pity and ſparing mercy. This interpretation falls in joint alſo with the next clauſe of the verſe, about which I ſhall add a word before I give the point.

The number of his moneths are with thee;

Apud nos numerum illorum eſſe dicimus quorum numerus a nobis ſtabilitur. Aquin.

That is, In thy power, under thy eſtabliſhment, or in thy knowledge, ſo we render this phraſe (chap. 10.7.) Thou knoweſt that I am not wicked, the Hebrew is, It is with thee that I am not wicked, ſo, the number of his moneths are with thee, that is, they are plain before thine eye, and eſtabliſhed in thy counſel.

Obſerve firſt, into what ſmall portions he diſtributes the life of man, dayes and moneths, His dayes are determined, and the number of his moneths are with thee.

God hath a diſtinct knowledge of every particular time of mans life, and digeſteth it into the ſmalleſt diviſions;

Non de annis ſed menſibus & diebus ſolum fit mētio ad diſtinctam de ſingularibus Dei notitiam exprimendam. Bold.

He knoweth not only thoſe more remarkable ſtages of infancy, of childhood, of youth, of full age and old age, but the moneths and dayes of our lives: yea, his knowledge reacheth unto (which to us are almoſt indiſcernable) hours, minutes and moments, even theſe are meaſured, numbred, caſt up by the infinite foreknowledge of the eternal God.

Secondly Obſerve, The dayes and moneths of mans life are ſet and fixed.

There is a reſolve paſſed upon every man, our times are not now to be diſpoſed of; God hath paſt the account of time from all eternity. As to every thing there is a ſeaſon, (Eccl. 3.1.) ſo to every perſon: and this is true not only of ſingle perſons, but even of whole generations, yea of all the generations of mankind, (Act. 17.26.) He hath made of one blood, all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed. God hath determined not only how long man ſhall live, but how long the world ſhall live; he ſaid of mankind before the flood, his dayes ſhall be an 120. years, Gen. 6.3. He told Abraham his ſeed ſhould be a ſtranger four hundred years. He told the Jews their captivity ſhould continue ſeventy years in literal Babylon. And he hath told us (if we could read the figures) how many years the Church of the Goſpel ſhould groan under myſtical Babylon. All things and perſons on earth are dated in heaven. Whatſoever man is Lord of, I am ſure he is not Lord of time, he cannot diſpoſe of one minute for himſelf or others. We live not at our own pleaſure, nor at the pleaſure of any creature, God keeps reckoning for us. The very hairs of our head are numbred, then ſurely the dayes of our lives are numbred. The hairs of the head are meaneſt parts indeed but an excrement of man, and there are ſuch multitudes, ſuch numbers of hairs upon the head, that it is a wonder they ſhould be numbred, or any account kept of them: yet to ſhew the providence of God extending to the leaſt things, it extends to the numbring of hairs and dayes.

Now, if God hath determined the dayes of mans life, then enquire not of the ſtars or of ſtar-gazers for the number of them. When David would know the number of his dayes, he doth not reſort to Aſtrologers, but to God; Lord, teach me to number my dayes, he puts that requeſt to God; nor did he put it to God as enquiring for the preciſe number of his dayes, (about this we muſt not be curious) as to know whether we ſhall live twenty or thirty, whither ſeventy or eighty years, ſuch numbers are not to be ſearched after. It is not for us to know theſe times and ſeaſons, God keeps them in his own hand: David I ſay, did not trouble himſelf or God about this) but he prayed that God would teach him that holy skill to number his dayes, that he might apply his heart unto wiſdom; conſidering he had but little time, he would be inſtructed how to improve and uſe it well.

I ſhall open the laſt branch of the verſe, and then add ſomewhat further by way of Obſervation.

As Job acknowledgeth that our dayes are determined, and that the number of our moneths is with God, ſo he concludes that this determination is unalterable and indiſpenſable.

Thou haſt appointed him his bounds which he cannot paſs.

חקי עשית Statuta feciſti Statuta enim & decreta Dei de hominis vita ſunt velut cancelli intra quos homo continetur & ſunt certi fines, quos ultra citraque nequit conſiſtere vita. Merc.

It is uſual with men to do and undo, to reſolve and reſcind their reſolutions: but the determination of God ſhall ſtand. He ſaith and may ſay it, What I have written I have written. There are no raſures in the records of heaven: Thou haſt appointed him his bounds which he cannot paſs; The Hebrew is, Thou haſt made him a ſtatute, thou haſt made him a Law: we rightly tranſlate law by bounds, for laws are the bounds of mens actions, men would be boundleſs and keep within no compaſs, if there were no laws to rule and order them; God gave a law to bound all men, and men make laws to bound ſuch as are under them. And as God gives us a law to bound our lives in morality, ſo he gives a bound or a law to our lives in nature; and as the way of mans life is ſet out by a Law, ſo alſo is his end or death. The Apoſtle ſpeaks very ſutably to this expreſſion (Heb. 9.27.) It is appointed (or made as a ſtatute or law) to all men once to die. There is a law, or a ſtatute paſſed that man muſt die: and there is a law, or a ſtatute paſſed how long man ſhall live, or when he muſt die, and that Law of death is irrepealable. When the Apoſtle ſaith, it is appointed to man once to die, (as we tranſlate,) The word once is not to be referred to die, as if there were ſome ſuſpition that man could die twiſe (when the Apoſtle Jude ſpeaks of ſome that are twiſe dead in ſpirituals, he means only they are throughly dead) But once is referred to appointed, it was once appointed, and that once ſhall ſtand; there ſhall never be any altering or renewing of the ſtatute; there's no need to make a new law upon the point, God hath once ſetled it, and it is ſetled for ever: When Abiſhai went to the cave where Saul was, and asked David leave to kill him, I will ſmite him (ſaith he) but once, and I will not ſmite him the ſecond time, I will make ſure work at a blow; (1 *Sam.*26.8.) Such is the intendment of the particle once in that Law: The Lord hath appointed the bounds of life once, and the bounds of death once: he will not appoint them a ſecond. Thou haſt ſet him his bounds which he cannot paſs.

Iterato præcepto opus non eſt.

There are two opinions about the bound of mans life, or what this bound is: Firſt, ſome place it in natural cauſes, as in the temperament and conſtitution of the body. There is a truth in that, but we muſt not reſt there: Natural cauſes are ſomewhat, and men who live long are uſually of a laſting complexion and conſtitution. But ſecondly, the true bounds are ſet by God; the will of God is the limit of mans life; for though there be a ſutableneſs in the natural temper of men to ſuch a term of life, yet God often acts beſide and croſſeth that; ſome healthy men die young, and ſome crazy men live till they are old. The bounds may be paſſed which our natural complexion ſets, the bounds cannot be paſſed which the providence and will of God ſets: That, man dies at ſuch a time, may be a contingency in reference to ſecond cauſes, but let him die when he will, it is neceſſary in regard of the firſt cauſe. He cannot paſs.

The word pass, is proper to laws and bounds; bounds are set on purpose to keep us from passing beyond them. As all good laws are bounds which we should not pass: so transgression which is the breach of some law, signifies a passing over or beyond the law. God hath set man a bound or a law, how long he shall live, as well as a law in what manner he shall live. The former bound is passed by man every day, the latter was never passed by any man. We often pass the bounds of the moral law of God, but we cannot pass the bounds of the eternal decree of God.

Hence Observe, That as the dayes of man are determined by God, so man cannot live a day beyond that determination.

Friends cannot protract, enemies cannot shorten the life of man one moment. How often did the Jews design the death of Christ, but they could not accomplish it, till his hour was come. And when his hour was come, he would not pass it. What was said of Christ is true of every man, he lives not after, nor dies before his hour is come. Man is apt to think himself master of his own life, if not to continue it, yet to end it: and we have a saying (which some count a subtle and a wise one) He that cares not for his own life is master of another mans life: but both speak false doctrine, and are confuted by Jobs divinity. What God speaks of that law which is the rule of our lives in grace (*Mat.*5.18.) Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or title shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled: The same may we speak of this law, which is the limit of our lives in nature, one jot or title of this law shall not pass unfulfilled, and when once this law is fulfilled, the life of man cannot pass one jot or title further.

Some Scriptures seem to speak against Jobs doctrine of the certain determination of mans dayes by the decree of God. I shall briefly clear them.

First, When Hezekiah was sick, and (as he thought) dying, did not God send him a message by the Prophet Isaiah (2 King. 20. 5.) Turn again and tell the captain of my people, thus saith the Lord the God of David thy father, &c. I will heal thee, and (not only so, but) I will add to thy life fifteen years. If fifteen years were added, then surely his dayes were not determined: either God had not appointed him a set time, or he changed his mind and came to a new appointment: and Hezekiah did either pass the bounds which God once fixed, or he might have fallen short of them.

I answer,

The fifteen years added to Hezekiahs life, were added to Hezekiahs date, not to Gods. Hezekiah looked upon himself as a dead man: he was sick, and sick to death in his own opinion, possibly also in the opinion of all his servants and Physitians, yet he, & they too were deceived; God had determined him a longer time, and tells him he had, Thou shalt live yet fifteen years: This addition doth not imply any alteration in the purpose of God, as if having once decreed that Hezekiah should live but forty years, he afterwards (upon his prayer) granted that he should live fifty five: For as he determined Hezekiah should be sick unto death, and that he should receive sentence of death in himself, so he determined also, that Hezekiah should recover and out-live that dangerous sickness fifteen years.

Secondly, That of the Preacher may be objected (Eccles. 7. 16, 17.) Be not righteous over-much, neither make thy self over-wise; why shouldest thou destroy thy self? Be not over-much wicked, neither be thou foolish, why shouldest thou die before thy time?

I answer,

He that dies before his time, dies not before the time which God hath determined. An unseasonable death to man doth not prevent Gods season. To clear which we must distinguish about death, which is twofold; first, natural, secondly, violent: A man that dieth a violent death, is said to die before his time, because he dieth before that time which he might have reached according to the course of nature: sin cuts man off before nature cuts him off, but then God cuts him off for his sin. Thus many die before their time; and, except in that sense, no man dieth before his time. That, such was the meaning of Solomon, is plain in the text, when he saith, be not wicked over-much: Which (by the way) doth not imply that there is a mean in wickedness, or that the Preacher would perswade men only to a temper in wickedness; be wicked so far but no further; all wickedness is too much or more then enough. Every mean in sinning is an extream. But when he saith be not over-much wicked, he intends only thus much, give not thy self up to wickedness, lest the Magistrate (who bears not the sword in vain) call thee to an account, and send thee to the grave by the hand of justice, before old age or sickness send thee thither. The Hebrew is, Wherefore shouldest thou die in a time not thine? that is, before thine old age, for that is mans proper time of dying. Again, The proper time of mans dying is, when he is ready for death: As when a Steward is ready to make his account, then is his best time to give up his Stewardship; and therefore be not wicked over-much, lest God take thee away when thy accounts are altogether unready, that's no time for thee to die in. There is a time of him that dieth, and a time of death; the time of death is whensoever a man dieth, but the time of him that dieth is only then, when he is fit to die.

Thirdly, Some may object the promise which is added to the fifth commandment, Honour thy father and mother that thy dayes may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee (Exod. 20. 12.) which carries this threat in it; if thou dishonour thy father and mother, thy dayes shall be shortened: Whence it may be argued, that, the shortening or lengthening of mans dayes depends upon his own actings, upon his obedience or disobedience, not upon the sentence and decree of God: for if a mans life cannot be lengthened beyond its set time, where lieth the motive or strength of this argument?

I answer,

This explicit promise of lengthening, and implicit threat of shortning our dayes, doth not enforce a mutability in the appointment of God about the date of our dayes; but only holds forth a token or an evidence who they are to whom God hath appointed many dayes. Such as are obedient to parents, may with warrant look upon themselves as designed by God to long life: and they who are rebellious against their parents, have a witness against themselves, that God hath allotted them but a short life, or will cut them off shortly by death. For (as Solomon speaks) The ravens of the valleys shall pluck out the eyes of such and eat them, that is, they shall die ignominiously and their carkasses shall become meat for the fowls of the air. Our obedience or disobedience to the revealed will of God, doth not make any change of, but fulfils and draws out the secret will of God.

Fourthly, Saith not David (Psal. 55. 23.) that, The blood-thirsty and deceitful man shall not live out half his dayes: And again (Psal. 89. 45.) The dayes of our youth hast thou shortened: If our dayes may be halved and shortened, then our dayes are not unalterably bounded and determined.

I answer,

There is a twofold limit of mans dayes; there is a general limit, and there is a special or personal limit: The general limit, is threescore and ten or fourscore years (Psal. 90. 10.) (Those few exceptions which some have made by exceeding this limit, do not weaken this general rule). But besides this general, there is a particular limit upon every person. The limit of one may be threescore years, when another is limited to fourty, a third to twenty, a fourth to five, and a fift to four, &c. These are special limits upon special men; now when the Psalmist saith, that a deceitful man shall not live out half his dayes, the meaning of it is, he shall not live out half the dayes of mans general limit, as suppose a bloody man be cut of at thirty, he hath not lived out half seventy or eighty years, which are the common bounds of life prescribed to mankind beyond which they cannot pass; but this man lives out all the dayes of his special limit, or all the dayes which were determined for his portion in the land of the living. Thus the bloodiest and most deceitful wretch that ever was in the world lives out all his dayes. Our dayes are as many as God appoints in special and no more, whensoever or in what way soever we are brought to the period our dayes.

From

From the whole context Observe by way of corollary,

First, The decrees of God are absolute and irrevocable.

As we cannot add one cubit to our stature, so not one hour to our dayes. And such as the statute or decree of God is concerning the number of dayes, which every person shall pass in this temporal life, such also is the decree of God concerning the number of those persons who shall inherit eternal life. The dayes of mortality are determined for every person, how many they shall be; and it is determined who and how many persons shall enjoy a blessed eternity.

Secondly Observe, The absoluteness and irrevocability of Gods decrees concerning the number of our dayes, doth not disingage us from the use of means, and second helps for the continuance and lengthening of our dayes.

Man must not say, God hath decreed how long I shall live, therefore I need not take any care of my life; this were to resist the command of God, while we think we submit to his decree: Whereas indeed all the commands of God are subordinate and ministerial to the fulfilling of his decrees. Will any man say, God hath determined my dayes, which I cannot pass, therefore when I am hungry I will not eat, when I am sick I will not take physick nor use medicines. The decree of God is so far from calling us off from, that it obligeth us to the use of all due means for our preservation. When Satan tempted Christ to throw himself down from the pinacle of the Temple, he answers, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. While we neglect our selves we tempt God: we must not throw away our lives, because God keeps them. Jacob had assurance of his life by a special promise, yet when Esau came out against him with four hundred men, he doth not say, Lord, thou hast undertaken for my protection, what need I trouble my self? I will sit down under that banner of thy promises and providence, which thou hast displaid over me, let Esau rage and threaten, let him muster and lead all his forces against me if he will, what care I? I fear him not, he must break through the truth of God before he breaks in upon me; the word of God must fall before I fall: I am under the charge of heaven. Doth Jacob make this use of the promise? no, he falls a praying like a Saint, and he falls a providing for his defence like a Souldier (Gen. 32.) Had not David a sure word from God, that he should live to wear the crown of Israel and Judah? yea, he had not only a word but a sign, he was anointed by Samuel, which ceremony assured him he should be king, yet how doth he improve all aids and friends to save his life: He doth not say, Samuel hath told me from the Lord, that I shall be king, therefore I will not stir a foot from Saul, let him do his worst: no, he withdraws from Court, and gathers an army; he defends himself by power, he doth not stand to the naked defence of the promise. And if it be our duty to labour after the preservation of a temporal life, though God hath decreed the bounds of it, then much more should we do thus in reference to spiritual and eternal life. Some will say, God hath made a decree which cannot pass, who shall be saved and who damned, therefore what need we use the means of salvation? what need we avoid the wayes of damnation? but remember, the same word commands us to depart from iniquity, which saith, The foundation of God standeth sure, and he knoweth who are his. 'Tis as much our duty to give all diligence to make our calling and election sure, as it is to believe that the election and calling of God are sure.

Hominũ excusationes sunt Dei tẽtationes.

Thirdly Observe, If our dayes are determined by God, then we should not be afraid (when we have a due call) of shortening our dayes, by running hazards and hard adventures for God.

Our life is in Gods hand, he hath set the bounds, which no mans malice can shorten, nor any cowardise of our own lengthen. As none could bring us into the world, so none can thrust us out, till the time appointed. Let not persecutors take away the truth from us, which God hath given us to believe, for they cannot take away a day from us, which God hath given us to live. This is an excellent ground of courage, but no ground of carelesness: Were we perswaded of this truth, it would ease us of much inordinate fear, though it should not at all abate our orderly care of this present life. Paul was in deaths often, but he died not once, till his day came. Paul was in the lions mouth, but the lion could not eat him, because he was not then meat for death.

Lastly, God is most exact to his own numbers.

As he is exact concerning duties by him commanded to require them, so he is exact concerning dayes by him appointed, that we may enjoy them. My Spirit (saith the Lord) shall not alwayes strive with man, his dayes shall be an hundred and twenty years (Gen. 6.5.) The flood came not upon the old world an hour before this number of years was run out, and the old world could not pass that number of years an hour, the deluge comes, and all are drowned. The Lord foretold Abraham (as was toucht before) Gen. 15.13. Thy seed shall be a stranger in a land which is not theirs, they shall serve them and they shall afflict them four hundred years (beginning the account at the birth of Isaac) The fulfilling of which prophecie is reported in the holy story (Exod. 12.40.) It came to pass at the end of the four hundred and thirty years (beginning the account from the day in which the promise was made to Abraham) the self-same day it came to pass that all the hoast of the Lord went out of the land of Egypt. God did not only not fail them a day, but he did not fail them a piece of a day; for they came out in the night, because the four hundred and thirty years were expired that night, and when the time was out, though it were night, God would not stay till morning or break of day: he would rather provide them a Torch, an extraordinary night light (then stay for day-light) that so his word might be fulfilled in its perfect season. The Babylonish captivity continued seventy years and no longer. And some give that for the reason why Belshazzar was slain in the night, because then the years of that captivity were expired. The collation of times proves it, that Daniels weeks were fulfilled to a day at the death of Christ. God the great disposer of time and numberer of dayes, hath also calculated all the times of the Churches troubles and deliverances in the book of the Revelation: and there the dayes of Babylon are determined, and her bounds are set which she shall not pass. We have a saying, much like our selves, A day breaks no square: but it is not so with God, he keeps time with us to an hour. All the visions of God are (as the Prophet Habakkuk speaks of that vision, chap. 2.3.) for an appointed time, but at the end they shall speak, they shall not lie, though they tarry, wait for them, because they will surely come, they will not tarry. The visions of God do tarry sometimes beyond our time, but they never tarry beyond Gods time. He hath set a bound to all the affairs and states on earth, which they cannot pass.

Job having thus asserted the certainty and irrevocability of Gods decree about the dayes of man, grounds an earnest petition upon it in the next verse,

Vers. 6. Turn from him that he may rest, till he shall accomplish as a hireling his dayes.

But is this a good petition? Doth Job pray in faith or according to knowledge, when he prayeth the Lord to turn from him? Is not the presence of God most pretious and desirable? Is not the departure of God the saddest affliction of man? why then doth he desire the Lord to turn away, seeing it is our happiness to have God near us.

I answer,

God may be said to turn away from man in two respects, First, In displeasure, when he ceaseth to do us good, Secondly, in favour, when he forbeareth to lay any further evil upon us, it is this latter turning away which Job prayes for.

ἀπόστα ἀπ' ἐμοῦ. Sept. Discede ne tuâ præsentiâ cõserves me, meque morti permitte. Aquin. Absiste ab eo ut desinat, cum jã grato animo excipiet diẽ fatalẽ, tanquã mercenarius. Tygur.

Yet some interpret him in the first sense, turn away, that is, withdraw thy presence from me, even thy supporting and strengthening presence, which while it remains with me I cannot die, therefore withdraw it, and let me die, let me go to rest, until I may expect at the resurrection my reward, even as a hireling doth his dayes-wages for his dayes-work.

There is a threefold truth in this exposition, yet I cannot give it as the truth of this text.

First, It is a truth that the presence of God is the support of our lives; if he do but turn away we quickly dye, and return unto our dust. The damned would dye, but God will not turn away from them, his angry presence is with them to hold their souls in life, that so both soul and body might be held in pain. The Elect must dye if God should turn away from them; his favourable presence holds their souls in life, and will hold both their souls and bodies together in joy for ever. As the rising of the Sun is the cause of the day, and when the Sun departs and turns away, darkness covers the face of the earth; so the presence of God is the support of our lives, and when God departs and turns away, death covers our faces in the earth.

Secondly, 'Tis true, death is a rest; death is not only (like sleep) the parenthesis of our labours, but the full stop and period of our labours: There's no work in the grave.

Thirdly, 'Tis a truth, that the toils, troubles, and evils of this life make death desirable. 'Tis best to desire to dye, that we may enjoy Christ and God, who are the chiefest good; yet the fear or feeling of evil cause most to desire death. It is some mercy to dye before times of judgment; and it is a mercy to dye in times of judgment (Rev. 14. 13.) I heard a voice from Heaven saying to me, write, blessed are the dead that dye in the Lord, from henceforth, yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours: Some lay the emphasis upon those words, From henceforth: John was prophecying of troubles and persecutions to come upon the Church of God. Now, the Spirit saith, Blessed are the dead that dye in the Lord, from henceforth: As if he had said, The time I am prophecying of, will be so full of labour and trouble, that even they who live in the Lord, may account it their blessedness to dye then, as well as it is their blessedness to dye at any time in the Lord.

But I pass this exposition. The words hold out rather a deprecation of, then a prayer for death: Take it thus; Job having said to God, at the third verse, Wilt thou open thy eye upon such an one? here intreats God to turn from him: As if he had said, Be not so strict in marking who I I am, or what I have done: He speaks after the manner of men, who turn away from those whom they intend to spare: If a Father would not correct his Child, who hath offended him, he turns away, that he may avoid the temptation, or provocation of doing it. Thus Job intreats the favour of God, or the forbearance of his anger, Turn away from me, let me be quiet a while; let me have some peaceable dayes in the world before I depart the world.

Ne me tam accurate & attente observes, q. d. simula te non videre.

Turn from him that he may rest.

The word signifies to cease or give over action (Ezek. 3. 2.) He that heareth let him hear; and he that forbeareth let him forbear. (Gen. 41. 9.) Joseph took account of the corn, till there was so much that he left numbring, he numbred no more. God is said to cease from the work of Creation, because he rested from that kind of action, he created no more. Here, Let me rest, is, let me have a cessation from sufferings, let me be afflicted no more.

Ut cesset sc, hæc plaga vel afflictio. Chal. Metr. Non vitam longiorem precatur sed pœnæ relaxationẽ

Others read, Let me alone that it may rest; that is, let the affliction rest: So he prayed (which may expound this place) at the tenth Chapter, ver. 20, 21. Are not my dayes few, cease then and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little: As if he had said, Forbear, let this poor man alone.

Till he shall accomplish as a hireling his dayes.

עד־ירצה׃ Verbum רצה׃ Significat vehementer velle & delectari re aliqua. Metaphorice complere velut lato animo, res finem velut optare videntur, & gratum habere quasi eo propendeant. Merc.

That the dayes of man are like the dayes of an hireling, was shewed (chap. 7. 1.) I shall now only open the accomplishment of his day.

The word which we translate accomplish, signifies properly to desire and will with great delight, and by a Metaphor to accomplish, because we labour earnestly to accomplish that, which we greatly desire and delight in. So here, till he shall accomplish with delight, with willingness, his day, or bring his life to that longed for end, as a hireling his day: so some render, Till the hour or time comes, which is so much desired: That is (saith the Glos) till I am as willing to dye, as a labouring man is to go to supper and to bed. A hireling is put to hard labour, yet he comforts himself that evening will come, and then he shall have both rest and wages: Let me alone, that I may accomplish as a hireling (who is hard wrought) my day: That's pleasing to him, and so would this be to me. Again, The dayes of an hireling, notes a time set out to a special business: As the dayes of a man note the whole time of our pilgrimage here on earth: And then his meaning is, let me rest, till I have finished the work for which I came into the world; let me not depart without my errand. One of the Ancients finds it thus in some copies, Turn from me that I may rest and refresh my life as a hireling, who hath breathings and times of intermission granted him from his labour. But surely Job intends here a period, not a pause of his labours.

Donec optata veniet. Vulg. Hebraizantes putant Jobum hic petere, ut tam diu permittatur vivere, quo usque ipse sponte sua senio jam confectus optet mortem, i.e. donec sponte moriatur. Chrysost.

Hence Observe, First, The life of man is a laborious life.

He must accomplish his dayes as a hireling: He is a labourer, not a loiterer. Sin brought pain into our labour; but the duty of labour was before sin.

Secondly Note, We have but a day of labour:

A hireling doth not think much of it; it is but a day, and if some have a longer day then others, yet still 'tis but a day: This day will end, and it will be as if it had never begun; we shall forget all our sorrows. A woman in travel hath great sorrow, but when the work is over, she forgets all her sorrow, for joy that a man is born into the world: When we come to the wished accomplishment of our labours, we shall forget that we were in labour. As our labours are little regarded by the world here, so we shall as little remember them our selves hereafter; we shall lay them all under our pillows, when we go to the grave, and talk no more of them.

Thirdly Note, This life must be accounted for; or, there is a reckoning to come about this life.

Every man accomplisheth as a hireling his day; a hireling hath his work viewed before his wages are paid: Every man must give an account of himself to God. Evil workers shall be paid with death: They who do good shall receive the free gift of eternal life: Our labour shall not be in vain, either in the Lord, or out of the Lord: all that we do shall be considered: Wicked men shall have their pay for what they have done, and the Saints shall receive their reward: Their works shall follow them: They shall not receive wages for their work; but they shall receive benefit by their work, worth more then their work ten thousand times told. Though Saints are not mercinary (they work, not as hirelings for pay) yet in the issue they shall have better then pay for all their works. They shall receive more for the least work, then the best works can deserve. A cup of cold water shall have a reward, rivers of oyl have no merit. It were not worth while to be as an hireling, or to set our hand to the noblest works among men, if all the return were to come through the hands of men: But as whatsoever we do in this world is in the sight of God: so it is also in the memory of God. For, He is not unrighteous to forget our work and labour of love (Heb. 6. 10.) Both the labour of our callings, and the labour of our sufferings, shall have a full reward.

VERS. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12.

For there is hope of a tree if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not cease.

Though the root thereof wax old in the earth, and the stock thereof dye in the ground:

Yet through the scent of water it will bud, and bring forth boughs like a plant.

But man dyeth and wasteth away; yea, a man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?

As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and dryeth up:

So man lieth down and riseth not; till the Heavens be no more they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep.

IN these six verses, Job amplifies and illustrates his former Assertion, that, The dayes of man are determined, and the number of his months, which he cannot pass: He doth this, First, By a dissimilitude, Secondly, By a similitude.

The dissimilitude is laid down, in the seventh, eighth, ninth ninth and tenth verses: We have the explication in the seventh, eigth and ninth verses, and the application of it, at the tenth. There is hope of a tree if it be cut down, &c. ver.7. But man dyeth and wasteth away; yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he? ver. 10.

The similitude is contained in the eleventh and twelfth verses, As the waters fail from the sea, &c. So man lyeth down and riseth not, till the Heavens be no more.

Verse 7. For there is hope of a tree if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not cease.

The general subject of this context is the same with the former, which hath also been insisted upon from other passages in this book; namely, that man dying, returns not from death in this world: So that (here being no new matter) my chief business will be to explain the terms, and clear the parts of this dissimilitude:

Quia est arbori spes. Pagn.

There is hope of a tree.] Or, A tree hath hope, so the letter of the Hebrew, and so it is rendered by learned Interpreters, ascribing that to a tree which is proper to a man, hope: That which hath no reason cannot have any hope; nor doth the Hebraism intend any more then our reading. To say, A tree hath hope, is only this, Man hath hope of a tree: or, There is hope of a tree. A tree hath a natural aptitude to sprout up after it is cut down, and therefore man hopes it will. There are three opinions concerning the scope of these words.

q.d. Arbor habet naturalem aptitudinem ut reparetur.

First, Some conceive Job expressing his hope of the resurrection by this comparison: And then the words are a similitude, not a dissimilitude: As a tree cut down sprouts again: so, though man be cut down by death, yet he shall revive and rise again. What the Prophet speaks of the restoring of the people of God, the Jews, from the grave of their civil death (their captivity in Babylon) is as true of the restoring of all the people of God from the grave of a natural death. Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing ye that dwell in the dust, for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead, Isa. 26. 19. In pursuance of which exposition, the question at the close of the tenth verse, And where is he? is read with an admiration, which gives the sence thus: Doth the tree grow when cut down? And doth man dye, waste away, give up the ghost? And, Is he no where? What? Is he no where? That's incredible: man is somewhere when he is not here, and in due time it will appear where he is. Some of the Ancients expound the words as a holy triumph over, or scorn of death, as if he had said, What? shall senseless trees and shrubs grow up again? And shall not man the noblest of the creatures? Is this good Reason, or good Divinity, that trees shall rise, and men shall not? The Scripture by the reviving of a dying creature, sets forth the resurrection of man after death, (1 Cor. 15. 36.) Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it dye. The seed dyeth and then groweth, there is an argument from Nature; a tree may dye, and yet grow, there is an argument from Nature. The resurrection of the dead is an Article of Faith, and yet our eyes may shew us an argument of it in Nature. We may see a resurrection in the annual reviving of a tree; the tree in winter casts its leaves, and looks as dead; but when the Sun returns, and with that the heat, the tree reviveth: Every spring is as a resurrection from death. There is a truth in this interpretation, but to make out such an Irony by the Grammar of the words, or such an inference from the scope of the Text is very hard, if at all possible: And therefore I lay it by.

Augustinus docet hæc verba continere in se vim similitudinis & exponi debere per ironiam, q. d. scilicet homo non resurget cum videatur resurgere, arbor sic etiã. Lyranus apud Mer.

Secondly, Others interpret Job bemoaning the condition of man (as to this point) inferiour to that of trees. For first, The boughs of a tree may be lopt, yea, the body of it quite cut down, and yet it feels no pain: The tree is not grieved how much soever you hew, cut, and mangle it; but when God layes his Axe either to the boughs of man by sickness, diseases, and outward afflictions, or to his root by death, man feels pain: every stroke puts him to smart. Secondly, As the tree is cut and cut down without pain, so it will sprout up again, and renew, which man doth not.

Hence Note, That a man in extream affliction thinks any condition better then his own.

Job seems to envy the happiness of a tree. How low will the thoughts of man descend when he is laid low? He would even change estates, or (as we say) turn tables with stones and shrubs. There is hope of a tree; but I am (as to a temporal restoring) past hope.

Thirdly, The words carry an Argument to move the Lord to spare Job, or not to cut him down, though he had beaten off his leaves and fruit (his substance being swept away by robbers) though he had lopt off his boughs and branches (his children being swept away by death) yet he desires that he would not press upon his person also, and cut him quite down, because then he should be lost for ever out of this world. He was not like a tree, which when cut down shouts forth at the root again. We find such Arguments used by Orators and Poets to set forth the vanity of man beyond that of other creatures. The sun sets (saith one of them) and riseth again; But when mans Sun goeth down, it riseth no more; 'tis alwayes night with man when this night comes. The snow dissolves (saith another) and then the fields are cloathed with grass, and the trees with leaves, but neither the honour, nor the eloquence, nor the piety of man can restore him to a spring after the winter of his death. There is hope of a tree if cut down,

Soles occidere, & redire possunt Nobis cum semel occidit brevis lux, nox est perpetua una dormienda. Catullus. Diffugere nives, redeunt jam gramina campis arboribusque comæ, &c. Nõ Torquate genus, non te facundia non te restituet pietas Hor. lib. 4 Car. Od. 7

That it will sprout again.] The word which we translate to sprout, signifieth to change, and renew to another, or a better state. Job makes use of it, at the fourteenth verse of this chapter, I will wait till my change, or my sprouting come. Though he was hopeless of a change from death to this life, yet he was assured of a happy change in death, yea, of a change from death to eternal life.

חלף

But it may be doubted, how a tree if cut down sprouts again. 'Tis true, when only the boughs are lopt off, it sprouts presently; but if the body of a tree be cut down, will it grow again? That seems to be the sence of Job.

Proprie mutabitur, instaurabitur.

I answer.

The bodies of some trees (as for instance the Willow) being cut down and set into the ground, are every where observed to grow, and their tender branch doth not cease. Some interpret Job not of trees in general, but of this or some other particular sort of trees.

Again, Some trees though the body which is cut off will not grow, yet the root which remains will grow up into a new body. Such a tree is the (a) Laurel, whose description given by Pliny in his Natural History doth well agree with this discourse of Job. And because the Heathen did not believe a resurrection, therefore they made those trees to be Symbols and Emblems of death, which being once cut down, grow no more: It is observed that the Romans were wont to place a (b) Cypress-tree at the threshold of the house of death, because the Cypress being cut down never springs any more.

(a) Quavundum arboris radix vivacior superficie ut lauri, itaque cum truncus interiit, resciſſa etiam lætius fruticat. Plin. Nat. Hist

Lastly, Many trees (their roots remaining in the earth) will grow after cutting, though not in a full body, yet in sprouts, their tender branches will not cease; or as some render the Hebrew, Their suckers will not leave: We often see young slips rise at the root, when the tree it self is cut down. And this I conceive to be the meaning of Job, who calls such shoots suckers, because they live upon the root, like little children at their mothers breast. Job carries on the explication yet further.

(b) Romani moris fuit ut potissimum cupressus quæ excisa renasci non solet in vestibulo mortui ponerentur. Serv. in Virg. lib. 4. Plin. l. 16. cap. 32.

Verse 8. Though the root thereof wax old in the earth, and the stock thereof dye in the ground.

In which words he puts a supposition of greater improbability. 'Tis much that a tree cut down should grow, much more if the root wax old, and the stock dye in the ground. It shewed not only the improbability, but impossibility (in nature) that Sarah should have a son when she was waxen old, and her womb (as the Apostle speaks, Rom. 4.) was dead. And will the dead root of a tree grow naturally again? I conceive this dying of the root is only the decaying of the root; or that he intends only a partial, not a total death. Christ tells us (John 12. 24.) That except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and dye, it abideth alone, (that is, it doth not increase or bring forth more corns) but if it dye, it bringeth forth much fruit. The death of corn in the ground is not a total death, but only a corruption or alteration of it; for if the seminal life and vertue of it be quite extinguisht or drawn out, it could not yield either blade or ear without a miracle; yet because that alteration of it is a kind

kind of death, therefore it is used as an illustration of Christs rising, and also of ours (by Paul 1 Cor. 15.) from a total death. Now as according to the course which God hath set in Nature, a corn of wheat (in this sence) dying, bringeth forth fruit: so according to the course of nature, the root of a tree (in this sence) dying or dead, buds and brings forth boughs, as it follows in the next words.

Verse 9. Yet through the scent of water, it will bud, and bring forth boughs like a plant.

Odor levem rei alicujus contactum denotat. Suavis Metaphora. Dicuntur arbores quasi ad capiendum aquæ odorem & ad humorem contigendũ se suasque radices convertere. Pined.

It is an elegant Metaphor, as if a tree smelt the water as soon as it came near: And it notes thus much, That the tree upon the first soaking in, or springing up of the water, is refreshed and made fruitful. When the three Children were cast into the fiery Furnace, 'tis said, The smell of fire had not passed upon them, (Dan. 3. 27.) that is, their garments were not so much as touched or singed with fire. The fire had not made the least impression upon them. So 'tis said, when Samson was bound, he broke the cords, even as a thread that smells the fire (Judg. 16. 9.) A log will endure the fire long, but upon the first approach of fire, a thread is burnt asunder. The Prophet saith of Christ, The Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon him, and shall make him of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord (Isa. 11. 3.) The Hebrew is, Shall make him smell in the fear of the Lord; or, He shall smell in the fear of the Lord. Smelling is put for understanding; and (because the smell is a very quick sence) it notes freeness or quickness of understanding, as we render, He shall be quick of understanding; he shall understand the deepest mysteries, and most difficult cases as speedily as the most exquisite smell takes a scent. So then, when Job saith, by the scent or smell of water it will bud, it notes quick growing, or an easie bringing forth of a harvest of boughs (as the Original imports) whereas man will not grow again by an application or use of means.

קצר Propriè messis, ut palmites qui sunt rami vitium vocantur. קצירים Psal. 80, 12.

A tree cut down springs again: But how? Through the scent of water.

Hence Note, First, Every effect hath a cause.

The tree will grow, but it must have at least a smell of water.

Secondly, Observe, Natural effects have their natural causes.

Through the scent of water it will grow; Water is as proper to preserve or draw out the life of plants, as bread is to preserve the life of man.

Thirdly, Observe, Upon the presence of the cause the effect follows presently.

Through the scent of water it will grow; give it water, and you shall soon perceive a growth. How doth this shame man! A tree grows, sends out both leaves and fruit through the scent of water; but man hath spiritual water, the rain of holy Doctrine from Heaven; he hath not only the scent of water, but abundance of water soaking upon him, yet how little doth he grow! Yea, how many are there that grow not at all? Many souls are continually digged, dressed, and rained upon, who stand like old dotards in a forrest, not having so much as one green bough upon them: Is this to honour the means, or to honour God who gives the means? Trees answer all natural causes with sutable effects, when the Sun turneth about, they put on their green suits, they send out their leaves, their blossomes, and their fruits: The Sun of righteousness shines, the warm beams of Gospel-light dart upon thousands of souls, who continue in a winter of ignorance and unbelief, yielding neither the pleasure of leaves, nor the profit of fruit. And though some bring forth leaves, yet how few bring forth fruit, especially fruit meet for repentance from dead works, or for the hopes of eternal life? We see many spiritual helps; but how rare are spiritual effects? The grass and trees of the earth will condemn those who make no growth in grace, though they have been often watered with the word of grace.

Verse 10. But man dyeth and wasteth away; yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?

גבר Vir potens & clarus.

The Hebrew is, Strong and powerful man dyeth; let him be as strong as he will, dye he must, waste, and give up the ghost: Some observe an inversion of natural order in the words. For man goes down to the grave by these steps. He first wastes, secondly, giveth up the ghost, and then he dyes. The Spirit of God doth not alwayes exactly attend (prius & posterius) first or last, according to the order of nature: Neither is there any redundancy in this plenty of words. There is not one tittle in Scripture but hath its use and elegancy; and because the Spirit of God would shew the certainty of this thing, he heaps many words together into one asseveration, man wastes, dyeth, and giveth up the ghost; he is all things, and suffers all things which speak mortality.

Sunt qui volunt hic esse hysteron proteron.

Ego hanc geminationem ad copiam linguæ sanctæ facere puto. Merc.

We render, Yea, man giveth up the ghost; as if that implyed somewhat more then the former two: The particle, Yea, (in the Hebrew) heightens the sence, man wasteth, dyeth, yea, he giveth up the ghost.

Some understand wasting and dying but as preparatories or antecedents to giving up the ghost: Man decayes and wastes, yea, he dyeth every day, but he doth not give up the ghost every day, that's the last act. Paul speaking of his outward troubles and persecutions saith, I dye dayly; and in another place, I have been in deaths often: Natural death steals upon us part after part, it seizeth now upon the eyes, and makes them dim, then upon the ears, and makes them deaf, and so takes in now this member, and anon that, till it conquer the whole man. Death hath its forerunners and harbingers, sicknesses and diseases: A sick diseased man hath many symptomes of death upon him before he gives up the ghost: When he gives up that all is given up, death enters his fort, and takes full possession of him.

Ubi est? Nullibi, ut inde redire possit ad eandem vitã quam semel reliquit. Non est, quia non est in vivis. Drus.

And where is he? The question seems to carry a negation in it, Man is no where. He is not transplanted as trees sometimes are, and set in another ground. But is that goodly thing, man, quite gone, and vanished to a nothing when he dyeth? That which is no where is nothing: There must be some place for every thing: Every entity must have its ubi, every what its where: Therefore to say man is no where, is to say man is nothing, or to assent to a total mortality both of soul and body? We must therefore restrain where is he? to, where is he in the world? Look for him in the Countrey, in the City, at home or abroad, he is not to be had: Man gives up the ghost, and where is he?

I might here give Observations about the mortality of man, but having done it lately, ver. 1, 2. I will not do it again.

Note First in general, Man is a wasting, dying creature.

He hath received a life which he must shortly render and repay.

Secondly, When man dyeth, himself and all his glory are gone, gone for ever out of this world.

Where is he? He and his riches, he and his honour, he and his wisdom? what's become of all his designs, devices, counsels and thoughts? (Psal. 146.) Trust not in Princes, nor any of the children of men, their breath is in their nostrils, they dye, and then all their thoughts perish. The things which they have contrived in, or produced out of their thoughts, those curious fabricks of the brain fall and dye with them. So much of Job's dissimilitude.

The similitude follows in the two next verses, Job's discourse moves from the root and sprigs of a tree, to the seas and waters.

Verse 11. As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and dryeth up.

The similitude is opened in this eleventh verse, and applied at the twelfth, So man lyeth down, and riseth not, &c.

As the waters fail from the sea.

The particle, as, is not in the Original. There we read, Waters fail from the sea, and the floods decay and dry up, man lyeth down and riseth not. This hath led some Interpreters to render it (as the former) by a dissimilitude: And they make out the sence thus: The sea ebbs and fails from the shoar, yet it returns again when the tide turns; and though the floods decay and dry up through the extremity of heat heat and drought, yet the rain comes and fills them up again, but man (whose life is like water spilt upon the ground 2 Sam. 14. 14.) is unlike the sea, or river water: for when he ebbs he flows not again, when his moisture is dried up it returns to him no more.

But the stream of interpreters conclude it a similitude, and I shall keep to that, it being also very suitable to the purpose of Job.

As the waters fail from the sea.] How do the waters fail from the sea? The sea is the great vessel or receptacle of waters, God calleth the gathering together of waters sea, (Gen. 1.) And if the waters which are gathered together fail, what will become of the scattered waters?

There are different apprehensions about the making out of a clear meaning.

First thus, As waters after an exundation of the sea, or of some great river are (upon the reflux of either) separated from the channel, and left behind upon the land, which they overflowed, and because they cannot return (for then they must ascend, which is impossible to nature) they there utterly dry up and evaporate: so man dieth and returneth no more unto his place; As if he had said, It is as absurd and incongruous to affirm that man shall return again to this present life, when he dieth, as to say the sea-water left upon the land, can conveigh it self back into that ancient channel.

Argumentū sumi arbitror ab impossibili, sc. tunc hominē ad hanc vitam reversurum, cū aqua sursum versus ad locū se referat unde defluxit. Sanct.

Secondly, Others make it an argument of the resurrection, As if he had said, just as the sea decayes and dryes up, so man when he dies shall be utterly lost: One is as true as the other. We have a Proverbial speech, This is as true as the sea burns: we may speak to the same sense, This is as true as the sea is empty or dried up.

Thirdly, This sence is given, as when the sails from the place to which it hath usually flowed; and leaves its former bounds, then the floods and streams adjacent dry up (because they are fed and maintained by the sea, Eccl. 1.7.) so when natural moisture decayes in man (which is the supplement and oyl of life) man fails and can no more revive himself, then a river can recover its streams when it is cut off from those secret supplies and springs which it receiveth from the sea: Thus the similitude is applyed in the next verse.

Vers. 12. So man lieth down and riseth not, till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep.

שכב cubat in pulvere sive in sepulchro quod Chaldæi vocant שכיב unde שכיבים mortui.

As if he had said, Death brings man to bed in the grave, from whence he riseth not,

Until the heavens be no more.

What Heavens? and how are the heavens no more? there is a threefold heaven, first, the aiery heaven, or all that space between the earth and the moon, birds are said to flie abroad in the heaven, that is, in the air: Secondly, The starry heaven, or the heaven where the stars are placed, whether moveable or fixed: Thirdly, The imperial heaven, which is called the seat of the blessed, or, which is more transcendent, the place of the special residence of God, when he saith, till the heavens be no more, means he the aiery, or the starry, or the highest heaven? there is no question but these last heavens shall continue for ever: then we must interpret him of the starry and aiery heavens.

Until the heavens be no more.] Until hath a threefold signification in Scripture.

First, Until signifieth a certain period or duration: The sceptre shall not depart from Judah until Shiloh come, (Gen. 49. 10.) So, (Rom. 11.25.) Blindness in part is hapned unto Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in. In these and many other texts, Until notes a determinate time with an exclusion or shutting out of succeeding times, or any stop till the accession and accomplishment of that time.

Secondly, Until notes perpetuity, and is put for, ever, Psal. 110. Sit thou at my right hand until I have made thy foes thy foot-stool. Christ shall not sit at the right hand of God till that time only, and then be put from his place; For, Unto the son he saith, Thy throne O God is for ever and ever, Heb. 1. 8. yet we must distinguish between the substance and the circumstance of Christs Kingdom, between the thing it self and the form or manner of administring and dispensing it. In the former sense it is absolutely everlasting, in the latter it shall remain only until the consummation of all things.

Thirdly, Until signifies as in some places, for ever, so in others, never, 2 Sam. 6. 13. Michol had no child until the day of her death, that is, she never had a child. And so until is most generally interpreted (Mat. 1.25.) Then Joseph took unto him his wife, and knew her not, till she had brought forth her first born son. That is, he never knew her, it being (though no article of faith, yet) a received opinion, that Mary was a virgin as before, so ever after the birth of Christ.

When it is said here, man shall not rise till the heavens be no more, Some conceive Job expressing one impossible thing by another, or implying that it is as impossible to nature for man to rise from the grave of corruption, as it is for the heavens to corrupt. As if he had said, Man shall never rise by natural power, as the heavens shall not decay by natural weakness. The heavens have no seed of corruption in their constitution as not being mixed or made up of different qualities: hence heaven in Scripture notes perpetuity. To have a throne as the dayes of heaven, is to have a throne for ever, (Psal. 89. 29.) And so Daniel speaks in that prophecie of the Kingdom of Christ, (Dan. 2. 44.) And in the dayes of those Kings, shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed, and the Kingdom shall never be left to other people: so we render, but whereas we joyn heaven to God, some of the learned joyn heaven to Kingdom, and read it thus, In the dayes of these Kings shall God set up the Kingdom of heaven, or a heavenly Kingdom, that is, an everlasting Kingdom, for so he explains it, which shall not be destroyed, in this sense the Gospel is called the kingdom of heaven, because of the perpetuity of it: No sin of those that profess it, no violence of those who oppose and persecute it, shall prevail against it or totally abolish it: The Kingdom of heaven is (in this sense) above the possibility of earthly violence. So then mans lying in the grave till the heavens be no more, notes continuance in the grave, even as long as this world continues, or that it shall be night with every man that dies till the day of judgement.
